BLANC, JEAN JOSEPH LOUIS, a talented French political and historical writer, who, in 1839, established a paper in Paris, called "La Revue du Progrès," intended to be the organ of certain democratic sections of the French community then in existence. In 1840 his work on the "Organization of Labour" appeared, advocating the doctrine that men should labour for the community, rather than for themselves, and that they should be remunerated in accordance with their wants by a central government under a chosen administration. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected a member of the provisional government, and was principally instrumental in abolishing the punishment of death for political offences. In the same year he was compelled to leave his country, when he took refuge in London. After the fall of the empire in 1870, he returned to Paris, and took a prominent part in political affairs. Louis Blanc has written a "History of the Ten Years," a "History of the French Revolution," and numerous political pamphlets and letters.

Born at Madrid 1813. Died 1882.

BLANCA, blan'-ca, a Spanish town, province of Murcia, near the left bank of the Segura. Manf. Silk, linen, and oil. Pop. 2,250.

BLANCHE OF CASTILE, blansh, queen of France, was the daughter of Alphonso IX., king of Castile, and in 1200 married Louis VIII. of France, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters. On the death of her husband in 1226, she became regent, her son Louis (afterwards Louis IX.) being only twelve years old. In this position, aided by Cardinal Romain, she acted with firmness and prudence, and defeated several attempts made against her and the government. The education of the young king she sedulously promoted, and he was early married to the daughter of the count of Provence. During the expedition of St. Louis to the Holy Land, she also governed the kingdom with great discretion; but the news of his defeat and imprisonment so affected her spirits, that she died. Blanche was equally noted for her beauty as her wisdom. Thibaut, count of Champagne, was greatly enamoured of her, and sang her charms in his verses.

Born 1197; died at Melun, 1252.

BLANCO, CAPE, blan'-ko, the name of various capes in different parts of the world, the principal being on the west coast of Africa. Lat. 20° 47′ N. Lon. 16° 58′ W.

BLANDFORD, or BLANDFORD FORUM, blan'-ford, a neat and well-built town in Dorsetshire, on the river Stow, 16 miles N.E. of Dorchester. The church, in the centre of the town, is an elegant modern structure. Manf. Principally shirt buttons. Pop. nearly 4,000.

BLANDRATTA, GIORGO, blan-drat'-ta, a physician of Pavia, who was compelled to leave Italy in consequence of his theological opinions, and became the founder of Unitarianism in Poland and Transylvania. He was murdered by his nephew.

Born 1520; died 1590.

BLANES, blan'-nes', a city of Spain, province of Genoa, at the mouth of the river Tordera. Fishing and navigation, and lace-making for the women, are the chief occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 2° 51′ E. Lon. 41° 42′ N.

BLASIUS, bla'-se-us, bishop of Sebaste, in Cappadocia, who suffered martyrdom. It is said that he was tortured with a wool-comb, and he is therefore considered the patron saint of wool-combers. His memory is still commemorated at Bradford, Yorkshire, by a procession every seven years, on the 3rd of February.

Died 316.

BLAUBEREN, blou-bair'-en, a town of Wurtemburg, on the Aach, 10 miles from Ulm. Pop. 1,700. Manf. Woollens and linen goods, vinegar, iron, and paper. There are several breweries. The French, in 1800, here defeated the Austrians.

BLAYE, blai, a fortified seaport of France, department of the Gironde, on the Gironde. Manf. Linen, woollens, glass, and earthenware. There is a large export trade. Pop. 3,300.

BLEDDYN, bled'-in, an ancient British prince, who reigned with his brother Rhiwallon, in North Wales, till 1068, when he ruled alone. Bleddyn was an active prince, and framed a code of good laws.

BLEDDYN, a British bard, many of whose pieces are in the Welsh archæology.

Lived in the 13th century.

BLEEK, FRIEDRICH, bleek, German theologian and biblical scholar. He studied at Kiel and Berlin, and in 1829 became professor of theology at Bonn. In comprehensive learning and profound criticism he had scarcely an equal among the great scholars of his day.

Born 1793; died 1859.

BLEEK, WILHELM HEINRICH IMMANUEL, traveller and philologist, son of the above. He studied at Bonn and Berlin, and in 1855 accompanied bishop Colenso to Natal. He had previously published an elaborate treatise on the African languages. He made an expedition into the interior of South Africa, the result being a volume on the languages of Mozambique. In 1860 he was appointed librarian of the Cape Town library, and compiled a Comparative Grammar of the South African languages, a Handbook of African, Australian, and Polynesian Philology, a collection of Hottentot fables, and other works.

Born at Berlin, 1827; died at Cape Town, 1875.

BLEIBACH, bli'-bak, a town of Austria, province of Corinthia. Pop. about 5,000. Here are lead-mines which annually yield from 33,000 to 35,000 cwt. of mineral.

BLENHEIM, or BLINDHEIM, blen'-him, a village of Bavaria, in the circle of Swabia, on the left bank of the Danube, a few miles below Hochstadt. It gives name to a great battle fought in its vicinity, on the 13th August, 1704, by the English and Imperialists, under the duke of Marlborough, with the French and Bavarians, under marshal Tallard, count Marsin, and the elector of Bavaria, the latter being completely defeated. This battle is known on the continent as the battle of Hochstadt.

BLERE, blar'-ra, a town of France, department Indre-et-Loire, on the left bank of the Cher, 16 miles E.S.E. of Tours. Near the town is the splendid castle of Chenonceaux, the residence of the famous Diana of Poitiers. The town carries on a large trade in timber. Pop. 3,500.

BLESSINGTON, MARGARET, countess of, bles'-sing-ton, was the third daughter of a Mr. Edmund Power, whose fortunes were entirely dissipated by a reckless extravagance. She, in her 15th year, was married to a Captain Farmer, with whom she led a very unhappy life, and whose house she left. Subsequently he, in a state of intoxication, fell from a window in the King's Bench prison, and was killed. Four months after this event she married the earl of Blessington, and after passing a few years in the enjoyment of every luxury, she and her husband in 1822 set out on a continental tour, which was prolonged to the death of the earl, which took place in 1829. In 1827 count D'Orsay had married a daughter of Lord Blessington by his first wife; but this marriage proving unhappy, they separated, and he, after the death of the earl, continued to live with Lady Blessington during the remainder of her life. After the decease of the earl she came to London, where, for twenty years, her salons at Gore House, Kensington, were as popular as those of Holland House, and were the resort of all the celebrated men of the day. To support her expenditure, she entered upon a career of authorship, which knew little relaxation throughout the remainder of her life. She wrote "Conversations with Lord Byron," several novels, an endless number of tales and sketches; edited Heath's "Book of Beauty," "The Keepsake," "Gems of Beauty;" and also contributed to newspapers. With all this industry, however, she could not support her extravagance, and, in 1849, the costly furniture of Gore House had to be sold. Count D'Orsay, in the hope of getting employment under Louis Napoleon, went to Paris, where he died. The countess had followed him, and shortly afterwards suddenly expired.

Born near Clonmel, Ireland, 1790; died at Paris, 1849.

BLICHER, STEN STENSEN, blee'-ker, Danish poet and novelist. He was a clergyman, and wrote many tales and poems which gained him a great reputation. Among other works, he translated "Ossian" and the "Vicar of Wakefield."

Born in Jutland, 1782; died 1848.

BLIDAH, bli'-da, a town in Algeria, 30 miles S. of Algiers, beautifully situated among orchards and gardens, and well-built. There is a thriving trade in fruit, grain, cotton and tobacco, and in the neighbourhood are copper mines, and groves of cedar and cork trees. The town suffered greatly from earthquakes in 1825 and 1867. Pop. 8,200.

BLIGH, WILLIAM, bli, English admiral. He accompanied captain Cook in his second voyage round the world, and in 1787, when a lieutenant, was appointed to the command of the ship Bounty, in which he made a voyage to Otaheite for the purpose of obtaining bread-fruit plants and others, to be transported to the islands of the West Indies. A mutiny took place on board his ship, when he and eighteen others were cast adrift in an open boat, in which, after a voyage of 3,500 miles, they arrived at the island of Timor without having lost a man. Bligh subsequently reached England, and narrated the history of his adventures, when he was again sent out to the South Seas, and carried out the object of his original mission. He afterwards distinguished himself during the mutiny at the Nore, in 1797, and at the battles of Camperdown and Copenhagen. In 1806 he was appointed governor of New South Wales, but the wildness of his conduct and the severity of his measures, caused him to be arrested by order of the civil and military officers of the colony, which ended his government. (For the fate of the mutineers of the Bounty, see ADAMS, John.)

Born 1754; died 1817.

BLOCH, MARK ELIEZER, blok, a German naturalist, who practised medicine at Berlin, and was a member of the Society of the Curiosities of Nature. He wrote a "Natural History of Fishes," with 432 plates, which has been translated into French, and forms 12 vols. folio. It is one of the finest works of its kind.

Born at Anshach, 1730; died at Carlstad, Bohemia, 1799.

BLOEMFONTEIN, bloom'-fon-teen, the chief town of the Orange River Free State, South Africa. It is the seat of a bishopric, and has several churches. Pop. about 3,000.

BLOIS, blwaw, an ancient city of France, chief town of the department of Loire-et-Cher, on the Loire, 35 miles S.W. of Orleans. It is united by a bridge, with the suburb of Vienne, on the opposite side of the river. The streets are narrow, and many of the houses old and picturesque. The castle, an immense structure, some parts of which were built in the 13th century, stands on a rock overhanging the river. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, a modern structure; the Hotel de Ville, the Jesuits' college (now a provincial school), the episcopal palace, (now used as the hotel of the Prefecture), and a public library. The town is supplied with water by an aqueduct cut in the solid rock by the Romans. Manf. Hosiery, gloves, hardware, and pottery. It has, besides, a trade in wine, brandy, corn, timber, and fruit. Pop. 15,609. Before the time of Gregory of Tours, the French historian, who lived in the 6th century, this was an important place. In later times it was the residence of several of the French kings, and the scene of many events memorable in French history.

BLOMFIELD, CHARLES JAMES, blom'-feeld, bishop of London, was the son of a schoolmaster, and received his university education at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was distinguished by his classical, critical, and philological abilities, and edited the works of Æschylus. In 1824 he was raised from the rectory of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, to the episcopal bench as bishop of Chester; and, in 1828, succeeded bishop Howley, as bishop of London. From that time he exerted himself to extend the influence of the church, and in the discussion of all ecclesiastical subjects took a prominent part in the House of Lords. He resigned the bishopric in 1856.

Born at Bury St. Edmunds, 1786; died at Fulham, 1857.

BLONDEL, blon-del', a favourite minstrel of Richard I., Cœur-de-Lion, who, on being made prisoner and thrown into a German dungeon, on his return from the Crusades, was accidentally discovered by Blondel singing, beneath the walls of his prison, the first part of a lay of their joint composition.

Lived in the 12th century.

BLOOD, COLONEL THOMAS, blud, originally an officer in Cromwell's army, and who has rendered himself famous for his extraordinary exploits. One of these was the seizing of the duke of Ormond with an intent to hang him at Tyburn; from which fate his grace was delivered by his servants. A second was the attempt, in 1671, to steal the crown and other regalia from the Tower. In this daring enterprise he was taken disguised as a clergyman. Charles II. caused him to be brought before him; and, in his presence, Blood confessed that he had once formed a design against his life, but that the sight of his majesty awed him so greatly, that he desisted from its execution. The king granted him a pardon, and gave him an estate of 500*l.* a year in Ireland; but for what reason, or upon what principle of justice, history has never yet explained.

Born 1628; died 1680.

BLOOMFIELD, ROBERT, bloom'-feeld, poet, was the son of a village tailor in Suffolk, and himself a shoemaker. While working at the trade in London, he composed "the Farmer's Boy," a beautiful didactic poem, in which the scenes of rustic labour are truthfully described. He was patronized by Mr. Capel Lofft, who brought out his poem in 1800. The admiration which it excited is attested by the fact of 26,000 copies having been sold in three years. He wrote several other effusions, but his first was the best. He died in poverty.

Born at Honington, Suffolk, 1766; died at Shefford, Bedfordshire, 1823.

BLOUNT, CHARLES, blount, lord Mountjoy, and earl of Devonshire, was the second son of James, lord Mountjoy. His person and accomplishments attracted the notice of queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and some of our readers will remember the manner in which he is introduced, among the courtiers of that queen, in Sir Walter Scott's "Kenilworth." In 1594 he was made governor of Portsmouth, and succeeded his brother in the peerage, assembling some troops, with which he served in the Netherlands, and in Brittany; but the queen was displeased at his absence, and ordered him to remain at court. She made him knight of the Garter in 1597, and gave him a military appointment in Ireland, where he suppressed a rebellion. In 1603 he returned to England, bringing with him Tyrone, the rebel chieftain. Subsequently, James I. created him earl of Devonshire, and made him master of the ordnance. Towards the close of his life he fell into disgrace by marrying the divorced Lady Rich, daughter of Essex.

Born 1563; died 1606.

BLOUNT, CHARLES, English author, best known for several works of a satirical and sceptical kind, attacking in a scoffing style the doctrines of revealed religion. He wished to marry the sister of his deceased wife, but not being able to do so, shot himself. Some of his political pamphlets caused great excitement.

Born at Holloway, 1654; died 1693.

BLOUNT, a county of Alabama, United States. It is traversed by offshoots of the Blue Ridge mountains. The capital is Blountsville. Area, 955 square miles. Pop. 15,369.

BLOUNT, a county of Tennessee, United States. The surface is diversified by mountain ridges; and the soil of the valleys is very fertile. Area, 955 square miles. Pop. 15,985.

BLOW, JOHN, blo, musical composer, succeeded Purcell as organist of Westminster Abbey, and was appointed composer to the royal chapel.

Born 1648; died 1708.

BLUCHER, GEBHARD LEBERECHT VON, bloo'-ker, a distinguished Prussian field-marshal, and prince of Wahlstadt, whose energy and boldness procured him the sobriquet of "Marshal Forward." In his fourteenth year he entered the Swedish service as an ensign, and fought against the Prussians in "the Seven Years' War." He was made a prisoner, when he was persuaded to enter the Prussian service, in which he was afterwards to become so distinguished. In 1789 he received the order of Merit; and, in 1793-4, fought at the battles of Orchies, Luxembourg, Oppenheim, Frankenstein, Kirchweiller, and Edesheim. In 1802 he possessed himself of Erfurt and Muhlhausen; and, in the same year, after the battle of Jena, made a successful retreat before Soult, Murat, and Bernadotte, although ultimately forced to capitulate, only upon the condition, stated in writing, of being "without ammunition and provisions." Being now a prisoner of the French, he was exchanged for general Victor; and, in 1813, was again in the field, at the head of a combined force of Prussians and Russians. At the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Haynau, he greatly distinguished himself, and received, in acknowledgment, the order of St. George, from the emperor Alexander of Russia. In 1813 he held the undivided command of 60,000 men, with whom he defeated Marshals Ney, Macdonald, Sebastiani, and Lauriston, and contributed greatly to the victorious results of the battle of Leipzig. In 1814 he took possession of Nancy; and, at Brienne, withstood a determined attack from Napoleon I. In the same year he entered Paris, and would have taken a dreadful revenge upon its inhabitants, had he not been restrained by Wellington and the other generals. He now wore upon his breast all the insignia of all the illustrious orders of Europe, and the king of Prussia created a new one for his especial honour. Its symbol was a cross of iron, as the sign of his invincible courage. At this time he visited England, where he had the academical degree of LL.D. conferred on him by the university of Oxford. It is said that, on first seeing London, he exclaimed enthusiastically, "What a city for to sack!" After this he returned to his country, and retired to his Silesian estate. In 1815, however, the escape of Napoleon from Elba summoned him once more to the battle-field, and he took command of the Prussian army in Belgium. He was defeated, with great loss, at Ligny, on the 16th of June, when his horse was shot under him, and where he himself lay, covered by the animal, until several regiments of French cuirassiers had passed over him. He was reported dead to Napoleon; but le vieux diable, "the old devil," Napoleon's name for him, appeared at the close of the battle of Waterloo, and inflicted a terrific slaughter upon the flying French. After this crowning triumph, he once more retired to his château in Silesia.

Born at Rostock, on the Baltic, 1742; died at Kirblowitz, Silesia, 1819.

BLUE EARTH, a county of Minnesota, United States. The chief town is Mankato. Pop. 22,889.

BLUE FIELDS, a river of the Mosquito territory, Central America, falling into an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, after a course of several hundred miles. At its mouth is a town of the same name, where is the residence of the king, and which commands the entrance of the harbour.

BLUE MOUNTAINS. (See JAMAICA.)

BLUE RIDGE, the easternmost ridge of the Alleghany Mountains, in Pennsylvania and Virginia, U.S., about 130 miles from the Atlantic. (See ALLEGHANY or APALACHIAN MOUNTAINS.)

BLUM, ROBERT, bloom, German author and politician. He managed a theatre at Cologne, and afterwards set up as a bookseller at Leipsic. He took an active part in the revolutionary movements of 1848, displaying remarkable powers as an orator, and was chosen vice-president of the provisional parliament at Frankfort. He joined the insurgents at Vienna, and was arrested and shot.

Born at Cologne, 1807; died 1848.

BLUMENBACH, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, bloo'-men-bak, a distinguished German anatomist and physiologist, who in 1775 published a work on the "Varieties of the Human Race," which fixed his fame. In 1776 he became extraordinary professor of medicine in the university of Gottingen; and from that time devoted himself to the promotion of the sciences in connection with medicine, anatomy, and physiology. He published numerous works, and in 1812 was appointed secretary to the Royal Society of Sciences at Gottingen. In 1816 he was made physician to the king of Great Britain and Holland; and in 1821 a knight commander of the Guelphic order. In 1831 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris.

Born at Gotha, 1752; died at Berlin, 1840.

BLYTH, blythe, four rivers of England; one of which falls into the German Ocean, near Southwold; another into the river Tame, Warwickshire; another into the North Sea, at Blyth, Northumberland; another into the Trent, about 5 miles from Rugeley.

BLYTH, a seaport-town of Northumberland, at the mouth of the Blythe, 11 miles from Newcastle. The chief trade is in coals and salt. Pop. 20,974.

BOABDIL, or ABU-ABDULLAH, bo-ab'-dil, the last Moorish king of Spain. He was killed in a battle in Africa.

Died 1526.

BOADICEA, bo-a-di-se'-a, a British queen, the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, a people inhabiting the eastern coast of Britain, who, for the security of his family, made the Roman emperor co-heir with his daughters. On this, the Roman officers took possession of his palace, gave the princesses up to the brutality of the soldiers, and scourged the queen in public. Boadicea, roused to revenge, assembled her countrymen and stormed Camalodunum (the present Colchester), and put its garrison to the sword. Subsequently Suetonius Paulinus defeated the Britons near London, and Boadicea either fell among the slain or poisoned herself after her defeat.

BOAZ, bo'-az, "alacrity," in the Old Testamen a wealthy citizen of Bethlehem, who married Ruth.

BOBBIO, bob'-be-o, an Italian town, province of Alessandria, on the Tebbia, 37 miles N. of Genoa. It is surrounded by walls. Pop. 4,500.

BOBRUISK, bob'-ru-isk, a town of Russia, in the government of Minsk, on the right bank of the Berezina. Some pottery is made, and a trade is carried on in the importation of grain and salt. Pop. 54,928, about half of whom are Jews. Lat. 53° 15′ N. Lon. 28° 52′ E.

BOCCACIO, GIOVANNI, bok-ka'-chè-o, a celebrated Italian writer, the illegitimate son of a Florentine merchant, and who, when young, became intimate with the poet Petrarch. He resided a long time at Naples, where he fell in love with Maria, the natural daughter of the king. Under the name of Fiammetta, this lady is the object of several of his tales and poems. His "La Teseide," written in octave-syllabic measure, was the first chivalrous poem in the Italian language. Chaucer borrowed from it his "Knight's Tale," to which Dryden gave a new name, and re-cast it as "Palamon and Arcite." He wrote several other poems; but the work upon which his fame rests is the "Decamerone," consisting of one hundred tales, ten of which are supposed to be told in the afternoons of ten successive days, by a party of three young men and seven young women. Some of the stories are pathetic, but the greater number are broadly humorous, and of a licentious character. Boccacio and Petrarch were the revivers of classical learning in Italy, and the former may justly be considered as the father of Italian prose in its purer state; for, although he is chiefly known as an admirable story-teller, yet he, at the same time, was a learned man, and wrote several treatises on classical subjects, and was the first to introduce into Italy copies of the Iliad and Odyssey. Of Boccacio's works many editions and translations have been published. In his latter days he suffered in his conscience for the licentiousness of his past life, and would have entered a monastery, but was dissuaded by Petrarch. Two years before his death he became professor in the university of Florence, and delivered lectures on the "Divina Commedia" of Dante.

Born 1313; died at Certaldo, 1375.

BOCCAGE, MARIE ANNE FIQUET DU, bos-caj', a French poetess, who at the age of 16 married Peter Joseph du Boccage. While young she displayed a taste for poetry, and acquired the friendship of several eminent literary characters. She was elected a member of the Academies of Rome Padua, Bologna, Lyon, and Rouen.

Born at Rouen, 1710; died 1802.

BOCCALINI, TRAJANO, bok-ka-lee'-ne, Italian satirist, an architect by profession, but chiefly distinguished by satiric attacks on his contemporaries.

Born at Loretto, 1556; died at Venice, 1613.

BOCCANERA, bok'-ka-nair'-a, the name of a noble Italian family, who figured in Italian history during the 13th and 14th centuries. One of them, SIMON, was the first doge or duke of Genoa, being elected in 1339. Died of poison, 1362. (See GENOA.)

BOCCHERINI, bok-ker-e'-ne, a musical composer, who excelled in symphonies, in which he was the precursor of Haydn. The king of Spain attached him to his court, and he settled at Madrid.

Born at Lucca, 1740; died 1805.

BOCCHETTA, bok-ket'-ta, a celebrated pass of the Apennines, the key of the route from Novi to Genoa, and from which a magnificent view may be had of the surrounding scenery. Redoubts were raised here by the Imperialists in 1746, and the French passed the defile in 1796.

BOCCOLD, JOHN, bok'-kold, commonly called JOHN OF LEYDEN, li'-den, a fanatic tailor of that city, who associated himself with Mathias, a baker of Haarlem. They, at the head of a rabble of Anabaptists, made themselves masters of the city of Munster. Here, however, they were besieged by the bishop, and Mathias being slain in a sally, Boccold succeeded him, assuming the regal and prophetic character. He set up a government modelled according to a perversion of scriptural declarations, and called himself king of Sion. He allowed a plurality of wives, and took fourteen to himself; one of whom he put to death for questioning his divine authority. The city being taken, Boccold was hanged.

Born 1511; died 1536.

BOCHART, SAMUEL, bok'-ar, a celebrated Oriental scholar, who was a Protestant minister at Caen, Normandy. He was versed in most of the Eastern languages,—Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, Ethiopian, &c. Christina of Sweden, wishing to see him, he, in 1652, went to Stockholm, where he was received with great honours. His intense love of the Phœnician languages led him to propound some fanciful theories as to the origin of other languages. He died suddenly. He is the author of many works; of which the principal are "Sacred Geography," "History of the Animals of Scripture," "An Account of the Minerals, Plants, and Precious Stones of the Bible."

Born at Rouen, 1599; died at Caen, 1667.

BOCHNIA, bok'-ne-a, a town of Austrian Galicia, on a tributary of the Vistula. It is built chiefly of wood, and is remarkable for the salt mines beneath the town. The excavations are of immense extent, nearly 15,000 tons of salt being obtained annually. Pop. 7,500.

BOCHUM, bok'-um, a Prussian town, province of Westphalia, 25 miles N.E. of Dusseldorf. Manf. Carpets, kerseymeres, cast steel, ironmongery, wine, and tobacco. Pop. 15,000.

BOCK, JEROME, bok, called also LE BOUC, a German naturalist, one of the fathers of botany, being the first who attempted a natural classification of plants, and to seek under their modern names those mentioned in the Bible.

Born at Heidelbach, 1498; died at Hornbach, 1554.

BOCKENHEIM, bok'-en-hime, a busy town of Prussia, province of Hesse Nassau, near Frankfort. Manf. Cloth, machinery, ironware, and crucibles. Pop. 6,800.

BODE, JOHANN ELERT, bode, German astronomer, who acquired a remarkable knowledge of the science while a boy. At the age of 25 he was appointed astronomer to the Berlin Academy of Sciences, and two years afterwards commenced the publication of the famous "Year-book of Astronomy," which is continued to the present day. In 1801 he published observations of 17,240 stars. He discovered the rule known in astronomy as "Bode's Law."

Born at Hamburg, 1747; died at Berlin, 1826.

BODIN, JEAN, bo-dahn', French writer on political and economical science. He studied law at Toulouse, and in 1576 represented Vermandois, in the states-general of Blois, exhibiting great ability and courage in defence of the Protestants against the enmity of the League. Notwithstanding his liberality, he was a devout believer in witchcraft, and urged the burning of wizards and witches. His great works on the philosophy of legislation, and the causes of scarcity, were far in advance of the general spirit of his age. He died of the plague.

Born at Angen, 1530; died at Laon, 1596.

BODLEY, SIR THOMAS, the founder of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and from whom it derives its name, was, in 1564, chosen fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and served the offices of public orator and proctor. He was subsequently employed by Queen Elizabeth in several embassies; but, in 1597, falling into disgrace, he determined to retire from public life, and the same year began to restore the University Library of Oxford. That noble fabric was almost wholly rebuilt by him, and furnished with a great number of books collected at a considerable expense, and at his death he bequeathed nearly his whole property for its support and augmentation. By this means the Bodleian Library has come to be the first of its kind in the world. On the accession of James I. he received the honour of knighthood. There is a monument to his memory in Merton College, Oxford, where he was buried.

Born at Exeter in 1544; died at Oxford in 1612.

BODMIN, bod'-min, a market-town, parliamentary and municipal borough of Cornwall, 26 miles from Plymouth. It principally consists of one wide street, extending nearly a mile from E. to W. It has a spacious church, built in the 15th century, a market-house, a county jail, a bridewell, and a lunatic asylum. Pop. 5,061

BODROGH KERESTZUR, bod'-rog keresht'-zur, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Bodrog. There are large annual cattle-markets, and the famous Tokay wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 4,500.

BOECE, or BOETHIUS, HECTOR, bo-e'-the-us, a Scotch historian, who studied at Paris, and afterwards became professor of philosophy at Montaign, where he enjoyed the friendship of Erasmus. On the foundation of King's College, Aberdeen, by Archbishop Elphinstone, he was appointed the first principal. In gratitude for this honour, he, on the death of that prelate, wrote his life, with an account of his predecessors in that see. But his greatest work is the History of Scotland, in Latin, which is written in an elegant style, although full of legendary tales and perverted facts.

Born at Dundee in 1465; died at Aberdeen, 1536.

BOECKH, AUGUST, bo'-ak, German scholar and classical antiquary, studied at the university of Halle, and in 1811 was appointed professor of eloquence and ancient literature in the university of Berlin. He wrote extensively on Greek poetical metres, history, chronology, and the Platonic doctrine of the world; and on subjects connected with education.

Born at Karlsruhe, 1785; died 1867.

BOEHME, or BEHMEN, JAKOB, bo'-ai-mai, German mystical theologian and philosopher. He was a herd-boy, then a shoemaker, and afterwards a glove-maker at Goslitz. At the age of 37 he began authorship, and wrote several extraordinary works, professing that he was inspired by a direct revelation and visions with which he was favoured. He professed to have had an insight into the root of all mysteries. It is not possible to give, in this brief notice, even an outline of his theories, which have exercised and influenced some of the most accomplished intellects of Germany. In his lifetime he excited the hostility of the Church, with which, however, he died in communion.

Born in Upper Lusatia, 1575; died at Gorlitz, 1624.

BŒOTIA, be-o'-she-a, a country of Greece, forming, with Attica, a monarchy, and divided into two eparchies or districts, Thebes, and Livadia. It is surrounded by mountains, and is naturally divided into three portions, having marked differences —the valley around Lake Topolias, the valley of the river Asopus, and the coast district between Mount Helicon and the Corinthian Gulf. The first-named district is marshy and frequently inundated. In the eastern part of Bœotia the vine is extensively cultivated. The lowlands were notorious in antiquity for a moist and heavy atmosphere. It was called Bœotia, according to some, from Bœotus, son of Itonus; or, according to others, from bous, "an ox," owing to Cadmus having been led by an ox to the spot where he built Thebes. Its inhabitants were noted for their natural dullness and stupidity, even to a proverb (Boiōtia us); yet it will be found that no single province in Greece, save Attica, could furnish a list of poets and other writers in which are included such names as Hesiod, Corinna, Pindar, and Plutarch. Area, 1,119 square miles. Pop. with Attica, 185,364.

BOERHAAVE, HERMANN, boor'-haf, a celebrated physician, who was educated at the university of Leyden, with a view to the ministry, and in 1689 took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In two discourses he had refuted the doctrines of Epicurus and Spinosa, by which he raised his character for piety and learning. Subsequently, however, a report spread that he had become a disciple of Spinosa, and which, although untrue, determined him to renounce the ministry, and adopt medicine for his profession. In 1701 he read lectures upon the institutes of physic; and in 1705 was appointed professor of medicine and botany. In 1713 he was nominated professor of chemistry, a science which he greatly improved. In 1714 he was appointed rector of the university of Leyden and physician to the hospital of St. Augustine. His fame had now spread over the world. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London; and a Chinese mandarin is said to have written him a letter with this direction, "To the illustrious Boerhaave, physician, in Europe."—Boerhaave was the most distinguished physician of his age, and wrote a great many works upon those sciences in close connection with his profession. He excelled as an illustrative experimentalist, and it is said that he had such unwearied patience, that he performed one experiment 300 and another 877 times.

Born at Voorhout, near Leyden, 1668; died in 1738.

BOETIUS, bo-é'-the-us; ANCIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS, a Roman philosopher, who was descended from a patrician family, and who in 510 was advanced to the consulship. He was a profound scholar, and well versed in mathematical learning. He defended the Catholic faith against the Arians, and for his zeal in defence of Albinus, a senator, Theodoric, king of Italy, sent him prisoner to Ticinum (Pavia), where he wrote his immortal book, entitled "Consolation of Philosophy," which has passed through numerous editions, and was translated into Anglo-Saxon by King Alfred. He was put to death by the emperor Theodoric. He was regarded as a martyr, and was canonized as St. Severus. In 996 Otho III. erected to his memory, in the church of St. Augustine, in Pavia, a monument, which existed till the last century, when the church was destroyed.

Born at Rome, 455; died 525.

BOGLIPOOR, bog-le-poor', the capital of a district of the same name in British India, on the Ganges, 104 miles from Moorshedabad. It is a handsome and flourishing town. Pop. 30,000.—The district is watered by the Ganges, and is supposed to be inhabited by the aborigines of Hindostan. Area, 8,270 square miles. Pop. 1,966,158. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 86° and 89° E.

BOGNE, or BOCCA-TIGRIS, a name given to a portion of the estuary of the Canton river, China. There are several small rocky islands, on which are forts, that have been more than once captured by the British.

BOGNOR, bog'-nor, a market-town and watering place of Sussex, 6 miles S.E. of Chichester. There is a good pier. Pop. 2,600.

BOGODOUKHOV, bo-go-doo-kof', a fortified town of Russia, in the government of Kharkov, on the Merle. Manf. Leather and boots. There is a large trade in cattle and hides. Pop. 10,000.

BOGORODITZK, bo-gor-o-ditsk', a town of Russia, government of Tula. Pop. 7,300.

BOGOTA, or SANTA FE DE BOGOTA, bo-go'-ta, the capital of the United States of Colombia, in the state of Cundinamarca, S. America, situate on a plateau nearly 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. The houses are generally low, in consequence of the prevalence of earthquakes. There are a cathedral, and about 30 other churches, a large building for the meeting of Congress and for the various offices of State, a theatre, a mint, a barracks, and some convents. It has, besides, a university, three colleges, and other educational institutions. Manf. Cloth, leather, gold and silver articles, and soap. In the neighbourhood are coal-fields and salt-mines. Pop. 100,000.

BOGOTA, RIO DE, a large river of S. America, rising near the above city, and, running through a narrow glen of 40 miles long, forms the cataract of Tequendama, 900 feet high.

BOGRA, or BAGURA, bo-gra', a district of British India, in the province of Rajshahye, Lower Bengal. There is rich alluvial soil in the eastern part. The western portion lies higher. The district is watered by several channels of the Brahmapootra, which swarm with fish. Area, 2,000 square miles. Pro. Rue, pulses, jute, sugar cane, oilseed, pepper, and hemp. Pop. 734,358, 80 per cent. being Mahometans.

BOHADDIN, or BOHA-EDDYN, bo-had'-din, an Arabian writer and statesman, famous for his scholarship. He presented to Saladin a treatise on the laws and discipline of sacred war, which attracted the favour of the king. Bohaddin was afterwards cadi of Aleppo, where he founded a college. He wrote on jurisprudence and divinity, and was the author of a life of Saladin.

Born at Mosul, 1145; died at Aleppo, 1235.

BOHAIN, bo-hahn', a French town, department Aisne. Manf. Shawls and musical clocks. Pop. 5,300.

BOHEMIA, bo-hé'-mi-a, a kingdom of the Austrian dominions, is situate nearly in the heart of Germany. It has Bavaria on the W., Saxon and Prussian Silesia on the N., Moravia on the E., and Austria proper on the S. It is separated into nearly two equal parts by the river Moldau, and forms an inclosed plateau, traversed by various offsheets from the lofty mountains with which it is surrounded. These are the Rasenberg, or Giant Mountains, on the N.; the Suderengebirge on the N.E.; the Böhmerwald on the S.W.; and the Erzgeberge, or Ore Mountains, in the N.W.

Area, 19,983 square miles.

Rivers.—The Moldau and the Elbe, of which Bohemia forms the upper basin, and to which all its streams are affluents. There are on the right the Isar, and on the left the Aussc, Mettau, Moldau, Erlitz, and Eger. The Moldau is the largest, and also receives several tributaries.

Forests.—Extensive, and supplying a large amount of timber.

Climate.—Cold, but healthy.

Pro.—The soil being fertile, corn, pulse, hops, flax, hemp, fruit, and all kinds of garden vegetables are produced in abundance. Saffron is raised in a smaller proportion; and wine, though made of an excellent flavour, is produced, but in small quantities.

Minerals.—Bohemia formerly had mines of gold; and still has those of silver, tin, iron, copper, quicksilver, cobalt, zinc, arsenic, bismuth, calamine, antimony, sulphur, saltpetre, vitriol, alum, and pit-coal; garnets, sapphires, topazes, hyacinths, chrysolites, amethysts, opals, chalcedonies, cornelians, and agates, are also found. The Bohemian diamond is a species of rock crystal. This country abounds likewise in marble, alabaster, porphyry, jasper, asbestos, serpentine, gypsum, and moonstone, as well as in porcelain earth and granite. Mineral waters exist in various situations.

Manf.—Woollens, cottons, yarn, linen, cambric, veils, lace, ribbons, stockings, thread, gloves, linen, woollen stuffs, wax-cloth, glass, mirrors, hats, paper, leathern, wooden wares, musical instruments, earthenware, sugar, alum, vitriol, and gunpowder.

Divisions.—There are 12 circles: Prague, Budweis, Pisek, Pilsen, Eger, Saatz, Leitmeritz, Bunzlau, Königgrätz, Chrudim, Czasiau, and Tabor. These circles are subdivided into 91 departments. (See under each heading.)

Towns.—PRAGUE, and the capitals of the sixteen circles, most of which are of the same names.

Pop. 5,560,819, of whom one third are Tchèques or Sclaves, about one fourth Germans, and the rest Jews.

Lat. between 48° 33′ and 51° 4′ N. Lon. between 12° and 16° 25′ E.

History.—Bohemia derives its name from the Boii, a Celtic race, who took possession of the country about 600 years B.C., but who were driven out, under Augustus, by the Marcomans, who were in their turn conquered by the Tchèques, a race of the Sclaves. These founded many states or republics, the principal of which was Prague. At the commencement of the eighth century, all these states were united under one chief, named Croc or Crac. Pozémysl, who had married Crac's daughter, succeeded; and thus, in 722, laid the foundation of a dynasty which did not expire till 1306. Up to 1086 it had been a dukedom, but in that year Wratislas II. was named king by a decree of Henry IV., emperor of Germany, Duke Spitignew I. having, in the 10th century, recognized the suzerainty of the Germanic empire. At the death of Wenceslas II. in 1306, the kingdom passed at first to Rudolph of Austria, then to Henry of Carinthia, and finally to the house of Luxembourg, belonging to which four kings reigned, from 1309 to 1437. It was in the reign of Wenceslas IV., one of this dynasty, that John Huss and his disciples spread through Bohemia the doctrines of reform. In 1437 Albert of Austria, by marriage, became possessed of Bohemia; but his son, Ladislas I., dying in 1457 without issue, George Podiebrad, a simple gentleman, was then elected. This monarch maintained his position in spite of the thunders of the Vatican, the treason of his son-in-law, Mathias, king of Hungary, and the rebellion of his most powerful nobles. After him Ladislas II. and Louis of the Jagellons of Poland, occupied the throne. In 1526 Ferdinand I., brother of Charles V., was elected king; and with him commenced the Austrian house of Bohemia. Up to 1547 the kings had been elected; after that time they became hereditary, and, since that date, Austria retained possession of this kingdom. The king of Bohemia was one of the seven electors of the German emperors.

BOHEMOND, or BOEMOND, MARC, bo-hé'-mond, the first prince of Antioch, who, in 1081, accompanied his father, Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, in his attempt on the Eastern empire. On the return of Guiscard to Italy, he left the command to his son, who defeated the emperor Alexis in two battles. On his father's death, in 1085, he became prince of Tarentum; but, desiring to increase his dominions, took part in the first crusade. In 1098 he took Antioch, of which he was made prince by the Crusaders, and established there a little kingdom, which existed nearly 200 years. He afterwards took Laodicea, but was himself made prisoner. On gaining his liberty, he returned to Greece with a large army, but met with little success, and was obliged to conclude a peace in 1108.

Born 1056; died in Apulia, 1111.

BOIARDO, MATTEO MARIA, Count, bo-a-r'-do, Italian poet. He was a member of a noble family, and studied at Ferrara. He distinguished himself at the court of the dukes D'Este, and held some important offices. His chief literary work is the Orlando Inamorato, one of the chief poems in Italian literature, and the model of the famous "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto.

Born at Scandiano, 1434; died at Reggio, 1494.

BOIELDIEU, bwoild'-yu(r), a celebrated French musical composer, who was made professor at the Conservatory, and subsequently quitted Paris for St. Petersburg, where the emperor Alexander appointed him master of the chapel. In 1812 he returned to Paris. His principal works are "The Caliph of Bagdad," "Jean de Paris," and "La Dame Blanche." He is generally considered to stand at the head of French composers of comic opera.

Born at Rouen, 1775; died at Jarcy, la Brie, 1834.

BOILEAU, NICHOLAS, surnamed DEPREAUX, bwoi-lo', a famous French poet, who was bred to the law, in which, however, he made little progress. His satires gained him great reputation, and placed him in the foremost rank of the reforming poets of his time. Louis XIV. was highly pleased with them, and distinguished him by several marks of his favour. His "Art of Poetry" appeared in 1674, and served in some degree as a model for the English poet Pope, who imitated it in many of his best passages in the "Essay on Criticism," and in the same year appeared Le Lutrin, "the music-desk," also imitated by Pope, in "The Rape of the Lock." In 1684 he was chosen member of the French Academy, and in 1701 was elected pensionary of the Academy of Inscriptions and Medals, which he held till 1705, when his growing infirmities obliged him to resign. Boileau rendered great services to French literature by his teaching the rules of poetic composition, and illustrating his views by such admirable models as his own poems.

Born at Paris, 1636; died 1711.

BOIS-LE-DUC, bwaw-le(r)-dook, "the duke's wood," is a strongly fortified town of the Netherlands, in North Brabant, situate at the conflux of the rivers Dommel and Aa, 28 miles S.S.E. of Utrecht. The town is entered by four gates, and is approached by water at three openings. The cathedral church, built in 1366, is one of the finest structures in the Netherlands. There are also a town-hall, with a fine set of chimes in the tower, government buildings, an episcopal palace, a grammar-school, and other public buildings. The city is intersected by several canals. Manf. Linen, cutlery, needles, and glass. Pop. 25,720. Originally a hunting-lodge of the dukes of Brabant. It was raised to the rank of a town, and fortified, in the 12th century.—This city surrendered in 1794, without much opposition, to the French under General Pichegru. In January, 1814, it again surrendered to the Prussian army under General Bulow.

BOISMONT, bwaw'-mawng, a celebrated French preacher, well known for his sermons and panegyrics, in which are many very eloquent passages, and who was admitted to the Academy in 1755. His sermon which is most to be noted was preached in 1782, in order to gather contributions for the establishment of an asylum for disabled soldiers and ecclesiastics. Such was its great effect on his auditors, that a sum sufficient to found the asylum at Rougemont was obtained. He delivered the funeral orations over the Dauphin, Queen Maria Leczinska, Louis XV., and Maria Theresa.

Born 1715; died 1786.

BOISSONADE, JEAN FRANÇOIS, bois-son-a'de, French classical scholar, who, having highly distinguished himself by his writings, became, in 1828, professor of Greek literature in the college of France.

Born 1774; died 1857.

BOISSY D'ANGLAS, FRANÇOIS ANTOINE, Count, bwois'-se-dawng'-gla, a French statesman, who was, in 1792, elected by the department of Ardèche a member of the Convention, in which assembly he distinguished himself by his moderation, powers of application, and by his heroic firmness. He was president on the 1st Prairial (1795), when the mob, invading the assembly, wished to force the Convention to establish the reign of terror. Boissy was insulted and menaced; and, to terrify him, the head of representative Féraud, who had just been beheaded before his eyes, was shown to him. He uncovered himself, and saluted this relic of his unfortunate colleague; then, resuming his seat, remained unmoved in this scene of disorder and anarchy. He took a part in all the affairs of his country during the Republic and the Empire, was called to the Senate by Napoleon, and, at the restoration, was made a peer. He was the author of a work on the life and writings of Malsherbes, and of some essays and poems.

Born at St. Jean Chambre, 1756; died at Paris, 1826.

BOJADOR, CAPE, boj'-a-dor', situate on the W. coast of Africa, in lat. 26° 7′ N.; lon. 14° 29′ W.—The ancients considered it the end of the world. It was doubled for the first time about 1433, by Gillianez, a Portuguese, who gave it its name, signifying a round cape.

BOJANO, bo-zha'-no, an Italian town, province of Campobasso, 13 miles S.W. of the town of that name, situated on the Biferno. There are a cathedral, and some remains of the old city of Bovianum, which occupied the site. The present town has suffered greatly from earthquakes. Pop. 3,000.

BOKHARA, or UZBEKSTAN, bok-ha'-ra (the "East land"), or khanate of Independent Tartary in Central Asia, bounded on the N. by the desert of Kizil-Koom and the khanat of Kokhand, E. by Kunduz and Badakshan, S. by Cabul, and W. by the desert of Kharism. The country is mostly barren, its soil consisting of a stiff clay of great aridity, save where it is watered by the streams which descend from the high mountain-ranges with which it is surrounded.

Rivers.—The Amu or Jihun (the ancient Oxus), the Kurshi and the Zar-afshan. About nine-tenths of the cultivated land of the country is situate on the banks of these rivers.

Pro.—Rice, pulse, wheat, barley, maize, cotton, indigo, and fruits, which are very fine. In the gardens, great quantities of melons, pumpkins, and cucumbers are raised. The natives extract a kind of molasses from a plant known as the "camel's thorn." In the mountainous regions a considerable quantity of timber is grown, and, in the plains, willows and poplars, which are used in house-building.

Minerals.—Some gold is found among the sands of the Oxus or Amoo, and there are salt, alum, and sulphur.

Manf.—Unimportant, the most extensive are those of cotton and silk, and a cloth in which both of these materials are combined, leather, jewellery, and fire-arms.

Towns.—Bokhara, Samarcand, and Balkh.

Pop. 1,500,000.

Lat. between 36° and 42° N. Lon. between 63° and 70° E.

Government.—The government of this country is administered by a khan, who is despotic.

BOKHARA, the capital of the above, is situate on the banks of the Kohik. It is nearly 9 miles in circumference, surrounded by walls, with 11 gates. The citadel is in the centre of the city, and it contains the palace, the harem, the royal stables, the residences of the state officers, and the barracks. A vast number of mosques adorn the city, and there are schools and colleges in abundance. As the merchants of Turkey, Persia, Russia, China, Tartary, India, and Cabul meet here, there is an active commerce carried on. Pop. estimated at 70,000. Lat. 39° 48′ N. Lon. 64° 26′ E.

BOLAN PASS, bo-lan', a defile in the mountains of Beloochistan, on the route from the Lower Indus to Afghanistan, and about 55 miles in length, with an elevation, at its highest point, of 5,793 feet. It is infested by the Beloochee freebooters. Lat. 29° 30′ to 29° 52′ N. Lon. between 67° and 67° 40′ E.—In 1839 the British army, which invaded Afghanistan, traversed the pass, occupying six days in the march.

BOLBEC, bol'-bek, a town of France, on the Bolbec, department of Seine-Inférieure, 18 miles N.E. of Havre. Manf. Cottons, woollens, linens, dyes, and chemicals. Pop. 9,000.

BOLESLAS, bo-les'-la, the name of five kings of Poland, who reigned at different periods between 992 and 1289.

BOLEYN, BULLEN, or BULLEYNE, ANNE, bool'-en, wife of Henry VIII., king of England, and mother of Queen Elizabeth, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards created Viscount Rochford and earl of Wiltshire. Her mother was Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the duke of Norfolk. Her early years were spent at the French court, where she attended the wife of Louis XII., on whose death she returned to England, and became maid of honour to Queen Catharine, which occasioned her to be often in the company of Henry. That monarch became enamoured of her person, and in order to make her his wife, determined to procure a divorce of his queen, or, at least, his admiration for her helped to trouble his tender conscience. This design he carried into execution, and married Anne privately; but, when she became pregnant, he publicly acknowledged her his queen, and she so continued till he conceived a passion for Jane Seymour. He then caused her to be tried for high treason, in having been unchaste with her brother and four other persons, Henry Norris, Sir Francis Weston, William Brereton, and Mark Smeton, all of whom suffered death for their alleged crime.—The body of this unfortunate lady was thrown into a common chest of elm-tree, "used to put arrows in," and the king married Jane Seymour the day following her execution.

Born 1507; died 1526.

BOLI, bo'-le, a city of Asiatic Turkey, on the caravan route between Erzeroum and Constantinople. There are mineral baths in the neighbourhood. Pop. 6,000.

BOLINGBROKE, bol'-ing-brok, a market-town and parish of Lincolnshire, 4 miles from Spilsby. Area, 2,570 acres. Pop. 1,000.—Here are the remains of a castle in which Henry IV. was born.

BOLINGBROKE, HENRY ST. JOHN, Viscount, a distinguished political writer and statesman. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and in 1701 entered parliament as member for Wotton-Basset, and, in 1704, became secretary at war. In 1708 he resigned; but, in 1710, he was secretary of state for foreign affairs. For the next four years he assisted in governing the country, and, by the inglorious treaty of Utrecht, in April, 1713, brought the war with France to a close. In 1712 he was created Viscount Bolingbroke; and, in 1714, Queen Anne died. This was a fatal blow to Bolingbroke, who had quarrelled with his old friend Harley, the earl of Oxford, who was endeavouring to form a new cabinet. The death of the queen disarranged all his measures, and, in the following year, he was compelled to make his escape to France in disguise, to evade the vengeance of his enemies. On the accession of George I., he was impeached, by Walpole, at the bar of the House of Lords, and, not appearing to take his trial, he was attainted by act of parliament. Meanwhile he had entered the service of James Stuart, the Pretender, who appointed him secretary of state, but who, after his return from Scotland, dismissed him. In 1723 he was permitted to return to England, but he was not re-admitted to the House of Lords. This excited his animosity, and he began to write against the ministry with considerable effect, and finally succeeded in overthrowing Sir Robert Walpole. In 1735 he once more withdrew to France, where he resided until the death of his father, in 1742, which event enabled him to take possession of the family estates at Battersea. Here he passed the remainder of his days, employing his pen upon subjects connected with history, theology, and philosophy. Pope dedicated to him the "Essay on Man," the argument of which, it is said, was furnished by Bolingbroke. His works are now little read, notwithstanding the many charms which his style possesses.

Born at Battersea, 1678; died 1751.

BOLIVAR, SIMON, bol'-e-var, the liberator of the South American State, Bolivia, from the Spanish yoke, was the most distinguished general that has yet appeared in that country. He received his university education at Madrid, and afterwards visited Italy, Switzerland, Germany, France, and England. In 1802 he returned to Madrid, and married a beautiful lady three years younger than himself, he being then only 19. In 1809 he returned to S. America, where, shortly after his arrival, his wife died, when he once more visited Europe, and did not return till the following year, when he dedicated himself to the freedom of his country, and, at Venezuela, entered upon his military career as a colonel in the service of the newly-founded republic. In June, 1810, we find him in London, endeavouring to induce the British cabinet to assist the independent party against the royalists, and in the following year he was acting as governor of Puerto Cabello, the strongest fortress of Venezuela. He was now fairly committed to the revolutionary cause, serving under General Miranda, whom he afterwards accused as a traitor, and who subsequently died in a dungeon in Spain. In 1821 the independent troops were successful in the battle of Carabobo, where the royalists lost upwards of 6,000 men, and which decided the cause against Spain. On the 20th of August of the same year a republican constitution was adopted, and decreed to continue, as then defined, till 1834. Bolivar was chosen president, and he turned his attention to the internal administration of the country. In 1823 he assisted the Peruvians to obtain their independence, and was declared their liberator, and invested with supreme authority. On the 10th of February, 1825, however, he convoked a congress, and resigned his dictatorship in the following words: "I felicitate Peru on being delivered from two things which, of all others on earth, are most dreadful—war, by the victory of Ayacucho, and despotism, by this my resignation." He now visited the upper provinces of Peru, which, calling a convention at Chuquisaca, gave the name of Bolivia to their country, in honour of their liberator, and appointed him perpetual protector, and to draw up a constitution. On the 25th of May, 1826, he presented his Bolivian code to the congress of Bolivia, which was afterwards adopted, though with some dissatisfaction, although it was also subsequently adopted by the congress of Lima, where, under its provisions, he himself was elected president for life. He now set out for Colombia, where disaffection and party strife were at their height. In 1829 new disturbances arose, and in 1830 a convention was called for the purpose of framing a new constitution for Colombia. The proceedings were begun by Bolivar, who once more tendered his resignation. He was pressed to retain his position; but his resolution was already formed, and he bade adieu to public life, broken in mind and body. He retired to Carthagena, whence, in 1831, he sent an address to the Colombians, vindicating his conduct, and complaining of their ingratitude. This was his last act which had relation to public affairs; for by the end of another week he was no more.

Born at Caracas, 1783; died at San Pedro, near Carthagena, 1831.

BOLIVAR, a county of Mississippi, United States. The surface is level and swampy. Cotton is the chief product. The capital is Bolivia. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 18,652.

BOLIVIA, or UPPER PERU, bo-liv'-e-a, an independent republic of S. America, nearly inclosed by the states of Brazil, Peru, Chili, and the Argentine Republic. Nearly the whole of this country being within the tropics, it might be supposed that its climate would correspond with its geographical position; but from the centre of the country being composed of ramifications of the Andes, high table-lands and valleys, the air is, on this account, tempered; so that not more than one-half of its surface has a tropical climate. As a whole, therefore, the country is fertile in the valleys, whilst the region between the Pacific and the Andes is nearly barren. The plains of Chuquitos and Moxos are clothed with immense forests, and the lands between the various hill-ridges may be characterized as undulating plains covered with a coarse grass, on which vast herds of llamas are pastured.

Rivers.—The Beni, Mamore, Rio Grande, or Guapai. All these are affluents of the Madeira, which, in its turn, becomes an affluent of the Amazon. The Pilcomaya and Paraguay are other streams which are tributaries of the La Plata. These all come from the E. declivity of the Andes, whilst those on the W., except in the case of the Loa, do not reach the Pacific, but are lost in their course. The Desaguadero flows out of Lake Titiaco, and runs for 200 miles through Bolivia.

Lakes.—Titiaco, the largest in S. America. There are many other collections of water, formed principally in the rainy season, but which cannot properly be called lakes.

Pro.—Rice, barley, oats, maize, cotton, indigo, sugar-cane, Peruvian bark, cacao, medicinal drugs, potatoes, the choicest fruits, and timber.

Minerals.—Gold is found in all the rivers of the E. Cordillera of the Andes, and the "mines of Potosi" have been proverbial for their richness in silver, and lead, tin, sulphur, nitre, and salt are obtained. Copper-mines are abundant, although, from their distance in the interior, they cannot be successfully wrought.

Manf.—Limited; the natives principally occupy themselves with the pursuit of agriculture and the rearing of cattle; but the Indian population produce fine cloths, parasols, and fans; cotton goods and glass wares are manufactured at Cochabamba; cloths of llama and alpaca hair at La Paz; hats of wool at Atacania, and silver-wire vessels in the mining districts.

Area. 842,729 square miles.

Pop. 1,957,352. about 245,000 being of Indian race.

Political Divisions.—The state is divided into 9 provinces—La Paz, Cochabamba, Potosi, Chuquisaca, Santa Cruz, Oruro, Tarija, Veni, Atacama.

Towns.—Oruro (the capital), La Paz, Potosi, Sucre, Cochabamba, Santa Cruz, Tarija, Trinidad, and Colija.

History and Government.—Bolivia, under the name of Upper Peru, was formerly comprised in the Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, but on gaining its independence, it assumed the name of Bolivia. The whole executive power is vested in a president, elected for a term of four years; while the legislative authority rests with a congress of two chambers, called the Senate, and the House of Representatives, both elected by universal suffrage. The president is assisted in his executive functions by a president of the council, and a ministry. The ministers are liable to impeachment before congress.

BOLKENHAIN, bol'-ken-hane, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the left bank of the Neiss. Manf. Woollen, linen, and ribbons. Pop. 2,600.

BOLKHOFF, bol'-kof, a Russian town, government of Orel, on the Nougra. It is an old town built mostly of wood, and has more than 20 churches. Manf. Leather and worsted stockings. There is a large trade in hemp and tallow. Pop. 26,395.

BOLLENE, bol-la'ne, a French town, department Vaneluse, 23 miles N. of Avignon. Manf. Silk. There are good markets. Pop. 5,400.

BOLOGNA, bo-lone'-ya, a city of Italy, built in a plain at the foot of the Apennine Mountains, between the rivers Savena and Reno, in a rich and fertile valley. There are more than 70 churches, most of them possessing valuable pictures and sculptures, relics, and interesting monuments. The cathedral is dedicated to St. Peter. There are several splendid palaces, which are adorned in the interior with beautiful paintings. Among other public edifices may be noticed its palaces, the Registry, the Chamber of Commerce, and the two leaning towers, degli Asinelli and de Garisenda; the former 256 feet in height, the loftiest in Italy; the latter originally 130 feet in height, but now reduced to nearly 70. A famous university exists here, founded in the 5th century, which had the honour of first drawing the attention of Europe to the Roman law. Medicine is now chiefly studied, and, besides, an observatory, galleries of sculpture and painting, a school of music, cabinets, libraries, and a botanical garden.

Manf.—Cloth, silk stockings, and other stuffs; satins, damasks, taffeta, velvet, gauze, crape, linen, musical instruments, chemical products, paper, and sausages. The other products of Bologna and its environs are fruit, wine, cheese, oil, and honey.

Lat. 44° 30′ N. Lon. 11° 21′ E.

History.—This city, occupying the site of the ancient Felsona, has filled a considerable place in Italian history, from its having been the residence of many illustrious families, and from its having been the seat of the school of the Caracci, who restored a correct taste in painting, after Michael Angelo and Raphael. It was the birthplace of Aldrovani, Galvani, Malpighi, Massighi, the Zanoki, the painters Albani, Guido, Domenichino, and the three Caracci. In 1506 it was finally annexed to the Ecclesiastical States. In 1796 it was entered by Bonaparte, who expelled from it the papal authorities. After the revolutionary movements of 1848, an Austrian corps d'armee made it its head-quarters. This occupation of the Papal States by Austrian troops was for many years the fertile source of danger to the peace of Europe, France and Sardinia especially protesting against the Austrian occupation. In 1860 annexation to Piedmont was voted by universal suffrage, and Bologna now forms a part of the Italian kingdom.

BOLOR-TAGH, bo'-lor-taw, a mountain-chain of Central Asia, separating China on the E. from Koondooz and Kafristan on the W. Lat. extending from 35° to 45° N. Lon. between 70° and 75° E.—Its culminating point exceeds 19,000 feet in height. Lat. between 35° and 40° N.

BOLSENA, bol-sai'-na, an Italian town, on the north shore of the lake of the same name 20 miles N.N.W. of Viterbo. It was one of the most famous of the Etruscan cities. Pop. 2,000.

BOLSWARD, bol'-sward, a Dutch town in the province of Friesland. It is surrounded by an earthen rampart, now a public promenade. The streets are wide and clean, and there is a very fine church. Manf. Woollens and linen, pottery, and leather; shipbuilding is carried on, and there is a large trade in butter and cheese. Pop. 4,800.

BOLTON-LE-MOORS, bole'-ton, a town of Lancashire, situate on an affluent of the Irwell, 11 miles N.W. of Manchester, and consisting of two townships,—Great and Little Bolton. Among the public buildings are a noble market-hall, erected in 1855, at a cost of 100,000*l.*; a town-hall, with a tower 220 feet high; St. Peter's, the parish church, a new building in the decorated style, with a tower 150 feet high, and several other new and beautiful churches; a fine public library opened in 1853; a mechanics' institution (a handsome building, in the Romanesque style), the Church of England Institute, a dispensary and news-room, besides charitable and useful institutions, chapels of ease, and numerous dissenting places of worship, especially a Congregational chapel, with a spire 130 feet high, erected in 1863, and a Wesleyan chapel, a cruciform building, completed in 1863. There are also a theatre, an assembly-room, and a concert-room; a mechanics' institute, and some libraries. A new fish-market was opened in 1865. There is a cemetery at Tonge. Manf. Muslins, calicoes, quiltings, dimities, jeans, and fustians. In its neighbourhood are several coal-pits, and it has paper and flax-mills, besides chemical works. Pop. 105,422.—The prosperity of this town is to be attributed to the introduction of the mule-jenny, which was invented by Arkwright and Crompton, and gave such a wonderful impetus to the cotton manufacture of the country. A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

BOMARSUND. (See ALAND.)

BOMBAY, PRESIDENCY OF, one of the three presidencies into which British India is divided. It is bounded on the N. and N.W. by the dominions of the Gaekwar; on the W. by the Indian Ocean; on the S. by Goa, Mysore, and the presidency of Madras; and on the E. by the territories of the Nizam and Indore. To this extensive territory may be added the recently-acquired possessions of Scinde. This immense expanse of territory is necessarily diversified in its physical aspects, which, under the heads of the various districts of which it is composed, are, where necessary, described in this work; but, considering the many diversities which it presents, it may be viewed as an aggregate of barren hills, elevated table-lands, long valleys, and rugged mountain tracts. There are three geographical regions, having distinct characteristics, the two CONCANS, between the Western Ghauts and the Arabian Sea; the eastward slope of the Western Ghauts; and the alluvial tracts stretching to the mouths of the Taptee and the Nerbudda.

Rivers.—The principal are the Nerbudda, Mhye, Taptee, and Sabermutty, disemboguing themselves in the Gulf of Cambay. There are several other streams which have their sources in the presidency; such as the Godavery and the Kishna, which empty themselves into the Bay of Bengal.

Climate.—The heat is greatest in the Concans, where the rainfall is considerable; but on the eastern slopes of the Ghauts droughts are frequent.

Pro.—Rice and cotton are the chief objects of culture: sugar and indigo are produced in Candeish, and a vast quantity of fruits in the N. parts; dates and cocoa-palms are abundant.

Manf.—Sugar, indigo, and silk cloths, ornamented with gold and silver, and woven at Poonah. Within the last few years numerous cotton mills have been erected, fitted with English machinery, and a very profitable industry has been created.

Area, 197,875 square miles.

Pop. 23,395,663, of whom 18,000,000 are Hindoos.

Lat. between 14° and 24° N. Lon. between 72° and 76° E. (See INDIA and SCINDE.)

BOMBAY, ISLAND OF, on the west coast of India. It is about eight miles by three wide, and consists of two rocky ridges and a valley. The bay on the eastern side forms one of the finest havens in India, and anchoring ground of about 50 square miles is afforded. A little island to the south, known as Old Woman's Island, is connected by a causeway, overflowed at high water, and this again is continued to another rocky islet, Colaba, on which is a light-house 150 feet high. Another island to the north, Salsette, is also linked to Bombay Island by a causeway and an arched stone bridge. Lat. 18° 57′ N. Lon. 72° 52′ E.

BOMBAY, CITY OF, derives its name from the Portuguese Bom-bahia, signifying 'good harbour,' the capital of the above presidency, and is situate at the S. extremity of the island just described. The town is divided into two portions. The European part lies next to the sea, and is strongly fortified. Between that and the native, or Black Town, a mile distant, are the esplanade, barracks, and railway terminus. There are commodious docks, covering about 200 acres, to the south-east of the European town, and the harbour is about 13 miles long, and 4 to 6 miles wide. The streets in the European town are generally narrow, and the bazaars in the lower part of the town are crowded and dirty. The Old Fort, or castle, is a quadrangle, with numerous works, particularly towards the sea; and the whole is encompassed by a broad deep ditch, which can be flooded at pleasure. The Government House occupies one side of a square. In the centre of the town is the Green, a wide open space, which is surrounded with many large and well-built houses. Here is an English church, an extremely handsome edifice; on the right is the bazaar, or market-place; and at the entrance to this street stands the theatre, which is a fine building. There are several other English churches, a Scotch church, numerous temples for the worship of the Hindoos, mosques for the Mahometans, and a synagogue for the Jews. The Portuguese Roman Catholics have also several chapels. Among the public buildings most worthy of note are the town-hall, cathedral, custom-house, post-office, the university, the Jamsetjee hospitals, the Elphinstone college, banks, insurance and other offices. An equestrian statue of the Prince of Wales, presented by Sir Albert Sassoon, was unveiled in June, 1879.

Commerce.—From the situation of Bombay, it commands an extensive commercial intercourse with the countries situate in the Persian and Arabian Gulfs, with both the western and eastern coasts of India, as well as with the islands in the Eastern Ocean and with China. Of the trade to China, the principal commodity is cotton-wool; the other articles of which the trade of Bombay consists, are sandal-wood and pepper, the produce of Malabar and the other adjacent countries; gums, drugs, and pearls from Arabia, Abyssinia, and Persia; elephants' teeth, cornelians, and other produce from Cambay; sharks' fins, birds' nests, and other articles from the Maldive and Laccadive islands. With Europe also, and with different parts of America, Bombay carries on a considerable trade.

Pop. 773,196, composed of British, Portuguese, Armenians, Jews, Mahometans, Hindoos, and Parsees. The Parsees number about 50,000, and include some of the wealthiest and respectable members of the mercantile community.

Lat. of the Observatory, 18° 53′ 45″ N. Lon. 72° 51′ 14″ E.

Railways and Steam Communication.—Bombay is connected with the mainland by the Bombay and Baroda railway, which is carried across the channel to the island of Colobah, the south-western point of the harbour. There are regular lines of steam-vessels to Suez, Singapore, China, Mauritius, and Australia.

BOM-JARDIM, bom'-jar-dim, (good garden), a town in Brazil, province Ceara. Pop. 6,000.

BOMST, bomst, a Prussian town in the government of Posen, on the Ulva. A large trade in shoes is carried on. Pop. 2,600.

BOMMEL, bom'-mel, a Dutch town, province of Gelderland, on the Waal, 25 miles east of Dort, formerly an important fortress and port. Manf. Iron utensils, nails, leather, and soap. Pop. 3,600.

BONA, bo'-na, a seaport of Algeria, in the province of Constantine, with a commodious harbour. This place is surrounded by walls and defended by a fort. It has excellent markets and bazaars, cafés, and a theatre. Manf. Tapestry, saddlery, and native clothing; besides having a trade in corn, wool, hides, and wax. Pop. 21,974, of whom a third are natives. Lat. 36° 54′ N. Lon. 7° 46′ E.

BONA DEA, bo'-na de'-a, a name given to Ops, Vesta, Cybele, Rhea, by the Greeks; and by the Latins to Fauna or Fatua. This goddess was so chaste, that no man but her husband saw her after her marriage. Her festivals were celebrated only in the night, by the Roman matrons in their houses; and all the statues of the men were carefully covered with a veil where the ceremonies were observed.

BONAIRE, or BUEN AYRE, bone-air, an island in the West Indies, off the coast of Venezuela, belonging to the Dutch. There is a roadstead, protected by a fort, on the south-west side. The island is 20 miles long and 10 broad. Lat. 12° 2′ N. Lon. 68° 11′ W.

BONALD, LOUIS GABRIEL, bo-nald', French writer on jurisprudence and philosophy. At the outburst of the revolution he left France for Germany, but returned on the accession of Napoleon, and was appointed Minister of Instruction. After the fall of the emperor he was an active member of the Conservative party in the Chamber of Deputies, and in 1823 was elected to the peerage. After the revolution of 1830 he refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new dynasty, and retired into private life. His most important works are, "Theory of Political and Religious Power," "Primitive Legislation," and the "First Objects of Moral Cognizance."

Born at Monna, in Aveyron, 1753; died there 1840.

BONAPARTE, FAMILY OF, bo'-na-parte, a distinguished family, originally from Tuscany, but settled in Corsica for several generations previous to the close of the last century.

BONAPARTE, the EMPERORS. (See NAPOLEON.)

BONAPARTE, CHARLES, the father of Napoleon I., emperor of the French, and of a large family of sons and daughters, most of whom, under the patronage of their great brother, attained a considerable position and influence in Europe. He married, in 1767, Letizia Ramolin. He assisted General Paoli in defending Corsica against the French, but afterwards attached himself to the French interests, was one of the Corsican nobility created by Louis XV., and was appointed royal councillor and assessor at Ajaccio.

Born 1746; died at Montpellier, 1785.

Born at Ajaccio, 1750; died at Rome, 1836.

BONAPARTE, JOSEPH, eldest son of the above, after taking a prominent part in the events which happened during the Consulate and the Empire, was appointed, in 1806, by Napoleon I., king of Naples. Reigning over this kingdom two years, he was transferred, in 1808, to Madrid, and was nominally king of Spain till 1813. After the battle of Waterloo he retired to the United States, under the name of count of Survillers, then to England, and finally to Florence. In 1794 he married Julie Clary, daughter of a Marseilles merchant.

Born at Corte, Corsica, 1768; died at Florence, 1814.

BONAPARTE, NAPOLEON, second son of Charles and Letizia Bonaparte. (See NAPOLEON I.)

BONAPARTE, LUCIEN, third son of Charles Bonaparte, was, in 1799, president of the Council of the Five Hundred, and contributed greatly to the successful result of the Napoleon coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire. He was afterwards employed in a mission to the court of Spain, and in 1804 was made prince of Canino. On his way to America he was, in 1810, taken prisoner by the English, and detained at Ludlow, Shropshire, for three years. After 1814 he returned to Italy. Lucien was possessed of great boldness and talent; and, less docile than his brothers, Napoleon I. could not so effectually mould him to his purposes, being encountered, in all his demands on Lucien, by a haughtiness and intelligence equal to his own. He was twice married, the first time, in 1795, to Christine Boyer, the daughter of an innkeeper in Provence, the second time, in 1803, to Madame Jouberthon, the widow of a Parisian stockbroker. He was the author of two long epic poems of little value.

Born at Ajaccio, 1775; died at Viterbo, 1840.

BONAPARTE, ELIZA, eldest daughter of Charles Bonaparte. (See BACIOCCHI.)

BONAPARTE, LOUIS, fourth son of Charles Bonaparte, accompanied Napoleon in his expeditions to Italy and Egypt, was employed by the emperor in several capacities, and, in 1806, was proclaimed king of Holland. For four years he reigned over the Dutch; and although but a viceroy of his brother, yet his good and admirable qualities endeared him greatly to the people. In 1814 he retired to Rome; and afterwards, under the name of count de St. Leu, to Florence. Louis was fond of study and retirement, and it was only in obedience to the stronger mind of Napoleon that he undertook the burdens of administration and government. In 1802 he married Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of Josephine; but this marriage, although his wife was a most beautiful and accomplished woman, proved exceedingly unhappy, and they separated in 1810. Their first son, Napoleon Charles, whom the emperor fondly loved and adopted, died in 1807. Their second son, Charles Napoleon, died at Forli, in 1831, fighting for Italian independence. Their third son, Louis Napoleon, born in 1808, was elected president of the French republic, 1848, and emperor of the French, 1852. (See HORTENSE and NAPOLEON III.)

Born 1778; died 1846.

BONAPARTE, MARIE PAULINE, second daughter of Charles Bonaparte, was first married to General Leclerc, whom she accompanied to St. Domingo, where she displayed the greatest courage. Leclerc dying in the isle of Tortua, Pauline returned to France, and Napoleon married her in 1803 to Prince Camillo Borghese, duke of Guastalla, a wealthy Italian noble. This union, unlike the first, was not a happy one. Pauline was of a haughty but kind disposition, and possessed strong prejudices. She was never favourably inclined to Maria Louisa, and Napoleon exiled her from court in consequence of a public affront to that empress. After the emperor's downfall, however, Pauline thought no more of his resentment, but sent him some magnificent and valuable diamonds, the only offering she had in her power to make. She left no children.

Born 1780; died 1825.

BONAPARTE, CAROLINE, third daughter of Charles Bonaparte, married in 1800 Joachim Murat, grand duke of Berg, who was proclaimed in 1808 king of Naples. On the death of her husband in 1815, she retired to Italy, where she lived with the title of countess of Lipona.

Born 1782; died 1839.

BONAPARTE, JEROME, fifth and youngest son of Charles Bonaparte, after serving in the navy, in the West Indies, and performing various missions in the service of France, married, in the United States, a Miss Paterson, daughter of a rich Baltimore merchant. This marriage was afterwards dissolved, and Jérome, by Napoleon's desire, married, in 1807, the Princess Catherine of Wurtemburg, and in a few days afterwards he became king of Westphalia, which dignity he held till 1813. After the fall of Napoleon, he resided in Italy for some time, with the title of Prince de Montfort. When, under Louis Napoleon, the fortunes of the Bonaparte family were again in the ascendant, Jérome returned to Paris, and was appointed governor of the Hospital des Invalides and a marshal of France. He had, by his second wife, the Princess Mathilde, born 1820, who was married in 1841 to Prince Demidoff, and Prince Napoleon Joseph, born 1822. (See below.)

Born at Ajaccio, 1784; died near Paris, 1860.

BONAPARTE, CHARLES LUCIEN JULES LAMENT, prince of Canino and Musignano, eldest son of Lucien Bonaparte, acquired great reputation as an ornithologist. He continued the famous work on birds of Wilson, the American, and wrote other scientific works. He was a member of the principal academies of Europe and America.

Born at Paris, 1803; died 1857.

BONAPARTE, PRINCE LOUIS LUCIEN, third son of Lucien Bonaparte, is distinguished for his devotion to scientific and philological pursuits, and has written several works on chemistry, in French and Italian, and in 1857 published the "Bonaparte Polyglot," being the parable of the sower, from St. Matthew, in seventy-two European languages and dialects. He is likewise a proficient in that singular language, the Basque, of which he has published a grammar. Under Napoleon III. he was made a senator.

Born at Morngrove, Worcestershire, 1813.

BONAPARTE, PRINCE NAPOLEON JOSEPH CHARLES, son of Jérome Bonaparte, and Princess Catherine of Wurtemburg, was, on the recall of the Bonaparte family from their long exile, elected to the Constituent Assembly, and became one of the leaders of the extreme republican party. He subsequently, however, retired from this course, and attached himself to his cousin, Napoleon III. In 1854 he had a command in the expedition of the allies against Sebastopol, and fought at the battle of the Alma. In 1858 he was appointed minister of Algeria, but shortly afterwards resigned this post. In 1859 he married the Princess Clothilde, daughter of Victor Emmanuel, king of Sardinia.

Born at Trieste, 1822.

BONAVENTURA, bo'-na-ven-tu'-ra, Catholic bishop and saint. In 1248 he became a Franciscan monk, and soon exercised great influence in the church. He was created bishop of Albano in 1273. He exhibited great sanctity of life, and it is supposed that death was hastened by asceticism. Dante alludes to him with profound admiration; he was named the Seraphic Doctor. His theological writings are vague and impulsive in style. It was said that miracles were worked at his tomb, and he was canonized in 1482.

Born in Tuscany, 1221; died at Lyons, 1274.

BONAVISTA, or BOAVISTA, bo'-na-vees'-ta, the largest of the Cape de Verde islands, next to St. Jago. Circumference, 48 miles. Pop. 4,395. Lat. 16° 17′ N. Lon. 22° 59′ E.

BONAVISTA, CAPE AND BAY OF, lie on the east side of Newfoundland. The cape lies in Lat. 48° 42′ N.; Lon. 53° 8′ W.

BONCHAMP, CHARLES MELCHIOR ARTHUR, Marquis de, bon'(g)chan(g), a prominent leader of the Vendean party, after the French revolution. At an early age he served in the American war of independence, and on his return to France became leader of a party of royalists. He was shot in a fierce encounter with the republican army.

Born in Anjou, 1760; died 1793.

BONDOU, bon'-doo, a kingdom of Senegambia, West Africa, situate on the W. bank of the Faleme, with a healthy climate and a fertile soil. The king is absolute. The inhabitants generally profess Mahometanism, but there is a considerable amount of heathenism in their observances. A trade is carried on in slaves, gold dust, salt and butter. Pro. Corn, cotton, indigo, and tobacco; and a great number of cattle are reared. Pop. 1,500,000. Lat. between 14° and 15° N. Lon. between 11° and 13° W.

BONE, HENRY, English enamel painter, originally apprenticed to a manufacturer of porcelain, but his enamel paintings attracted attention and he rose to the highest honours of his profession. He was appointed enamel painter to the Prince of Wales in 1800, and a Royal Academician in 1811. His works now fetch a very high price.

Born at Truro, 1755; died 1834.

BONER, ULRICH, bo'-ner, German fabulist, a preaching friar. His collection of a hundred fables is one of the greatest of bibliographical rarities.

Lived in the 14th century.

BONGAY, or BANGAVI, bon'-gai, an island of the Indian archipelago. The name is also applied to a large group of adjacent islets. Lat. 2° 10′ S. Lon. 123° 53′ E.

BONHEUR, ROSA, bon-hur', a French artist, distinguished as a painter of animal and still life. Her father, being himself an artist, directed her studies, and taught her to study nature; and with this view he frequently took her into the country, where she could see it in all its aspects, and at the same time copy the living creation as she beheld it moving in its freest and most careless conditions, or in a state of labour. Her "Labourage Nivernais" (ploughing in the snow) fixed her reputation, and her "Horse Fair," which was exhibited in 1855, at the French Exhibition, in London, excited universal admiration, and subsequent productions have maintained her high reputation.

Born at Bordeaux, 1822.

BONI, bo'-ne, an independent state of the Celebes, in the South Pacific Ocean, with a town of the same name. This is the most powerful state in the island. The scenery is fine and the soil productive. Manf. Cotton, iron utensils, and gold ornaments. Pop. 200,000. Lat. between 4° 20′ and 5° 20′ S. Lon. between 119° 35′ and 120° 30′ E.

BONI, GULF OF, separates the two S. peninsulas of the Celebes, and is 200 miles in length by from 40 to 80 in breadth.

BONIFACCIO, bon'-e-fa'-che-o, a seaport-town of Corsica, on the S. coast, 44 miles S.E. of Ajaccio. It is neatly built, and has a good harbour. Pop. 3,400. Lat. 41° 23′ N. Lon. 9° 9′ E.

BONIFACCIO, STRAIT OF, is between the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, and at its narrowest part is 7 miles across. The small group of the Magdalen, or Bucinarie Islands, are at the eastern entrance of the strait.

BONIFACE, ST., bon'-i-face, "the apostle of Germany," a saint of the Roman calendar, and a native of England, who was sent by Gregory II. to convert the Germans. His real name was Winfried, and at an early age he became a monk. He travelled in Germany for about 15 years, preaching and destroying idols. In 732 he was made archbishop and primate of Rome, and in 738 legate for Germany. He founded many bishoprics. He perished in a massacre of Christians at Dokkum, in West Friesland.

Born in Devonshire, 680; died 755.

BONIFACE, the name assumed by nine Popes, the most famous of whom were—

BONIFACE VIII. (Benedict Cajetan), who, in 1294, terrified his predecessor Celestine into a resignation, by denouncing to him, at midnight, eternal damnation if he did not quit the pontifical chair. The credulous Pope, thinking this a supernatural voice, obeyed the command next day, and the crafty cardinal was elected and inaugurated with great pomp, the kings of Hungary and Sicily leading his horse and waiting on him at the banquet. He commenced his pontificate by imprisoning his predecessor, and laying Denmark under an interdict. He also behaved in a haughty manner towards the Colonnas, a distinguished Roman family, who protested against his election, and called a council to examine the charge. Boniface excommunicated them as heretics, and preached a crusade against them. He incited the princes of Germany to revolt against Albert of Austria; and also issued a bull, in which he asserted that God had set him over kings and kingdoms. Philip the Fair caused this bull to be burnt at Paris; on which Boniface laid France under an interdict. Philip appealed to a general council, and sent his army into Italy, which took Boniface prisoner. The pontiff's behaviour on this occasion was bold enough; for, putting on the tiara, and taking the keys and crosier in his hands, he said, "I am a pope, and a pope I will die." He was liberated after two days' captivity, during which he refused to taste food, and this deprivation caused his death a month afterwards. He wrote several works. He was charged with many crimes, and his persecuting qualities are alluded to by Dante in the 27th chapter of the "Inferno."

BONIFACE IX. (Peter Tomacelli), a native of Naples, who succeeded to the papacy in 1389. He was notorious for the shameless manner in which he sold ecclesiastical offices and benefices.

Died 1404.

BONIN, or ARZOBISPO ISLANDS, bo-nin', three groups in the North Pacific, known individually as the Parry, the Bally, and the Peel and Kater Islands. They was discovered in 1827, by Captain Beechy. On the Peel Islands there are a few English and other Europeans and some Sandwich Islanders settled, engaged in the whale-fishery; and there is a good harbour on the western side. Lat. between 26° 30′ and 27° 44′ N. Lon. between 142° and 143° E.

BONN, bon, a neat town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, 15 miles above Cologne. The cathedral is a fine edifice. There are four churches, a new town-hall, an observatory, a museum, a botanic garden, and a university founded in 1818, at which there are nearly 1,000 students, and among the professors have been some of the most eminent scholars of Germany. The late Prince Consort was educated at Bonn. It is the seat of a superior mining court. Manf. Cotton goods, earthenware, and soap. Pop. 31,514.—This town was formerly very strongly fortified, but was taken in 1703, by Marlborough, after a severe bombardment. It was the birthplace of Beethoven, to whose memory a monument has been erected.

BONNER, EDMUND, bon'-ner, who rose to be bishop of London, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards entered into the service of Wolsey, who bestowed upon him several benefices. Henry VIII., to whom he was chaplain, sent him to Marseilles, to appeal for the excommunicated monarch to a general council; and here his behaviour was so bold, that the pope threatened to burn him or throw him into a cauldron of boiling lead. In 1538 he was nominated bishop of Hereford, being then ambassador at Paris; but, before his consecration, he was translated to the see of London. Hitherto he had professed a zeal for the Reformed doctrines, but now that Henry was dead, and Edward VI. reigning in his stead, he scrupled to take the oath of supremacy, for which he was sent to prison; but, on making his submission, was released. His negligence, however, in complying with the laws, occasioned him a second imprisonment, and the loss of his bishopric. On the accession of Mary, he was restored to his episcopal functions, when he deprived the married priests in his diocese, set up the mass in St. Paul's, and, through the whole of this reign, evinced a most sanguinary spirit, bringing numbers of Protestants to the stake. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne he refused to take the oath of supremacy, and he was sent to the Marshalsea prison, where he was confined during the remainder of his life. His body was interred in St. George's churchyard, Southwark.

Born at Hanley, Worcestershire, at the close of the 15th century; died 1569.

BONNET, CHARLES, bon'-nai, a Swiss naturalist, whose studies were chiefly directed to the consideration of the conditions of insect life. He wrote several treatises of great value, in one of which he maintained the doctrine of a future life for all living creatures.

Born at Geneva, 1720; died 1793.

BONNETABLE, bon'-ne-tabl, a town of France, department Sarthe. There is a fine Gothic castle. Manf. Calico and woollen stuffs. There is a good trade in cattle and grain, and fruit. Pop. 4,800.

BONNEVAL, CLAUDE ALEXANDRE, count de, bon'-ne-val, a French military adventurer, who, after serving in the army and navy of his own country, transferred his allegiance to Austria, and subsequently became a Mussulman. In Turkey he attained high distinction, and, under the title of Achmet Pasha, introduced European tactics, and taught the Turks the management of artillery.

Born in Limousin, 1675; died at Constantinople, 1747.

BONNEVAL, a French town, department Eure-et-Loire. The church is noticeable for its lofty spire. Manf. Flannels, blankets, cotton goods, and leather. Pop. 2,500.

BONNEVILLE, bon'-ne-veel, a town of France, capital of the province of Faucigny, in Haute Savoie, 16 miles S.E. of Geneva, on the Arve, which is crossed by a good bridge. There are a handsome town-house and college. Pop. 2,300.

BONNIEUX, bon-nuh, a French town, department Vaucluse. Near it is a very fine bridge of Roman construction. Pop. 2,500.

BONNIVARD, FRANCIS DE, bon'-ne-var, Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," whose liberal opinions induced him to adopt the republic of Geneva as the most agreeable government for him to live under. For his defence of the rights of the republic against Charles III., duke of Savoy, he was twice imprisoned, the first time at Grolée, where he was immured for two years; and the second in the castle of Chillon, on Lake Geneva, where he remained six years.—Bonnivard wrote a history of Geneva, bequeathed his ecclesiastical possessions to the state, and to the town his books, which were the foundation of its public library. The harrowing picture which Byron has drawn of the sufferings of the two brothers of Bonnivard, while chained to the stone columns in the dungeon of Chillon, has no foundation in truth. "The eldest of the three" was the only one of his kindred confined there.

Born at Seyssel, 1496; died at Geneva, 1570.

BONNY, bon'-ne, an African town, on a creek of the river of the same name, forming one of the mouths of the Niger, in Upper Guinea. The town is a collection of mud huts in a most unhealthy situation. The river Bonny discharges into the Bight of Biafra. Lat. 4° 23′ N. Lon. 7° 5′ E.

BONOA. (See MOLUCCAS.)

BONONCINI, GIACOMO, bo-non-se'-ne, a musical composer, who, in conjunction with Handel and Ariosti, was engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London. His compositions were deficient in vigour, but were marked by much grace and tenderness.

Born at Bologna, 1660.

BONPLAND, AIMÉ, bonp-land, a botanist, and the companion of Humboldt in his South American explorations. In 1804 he became superintendent of the gardens of the empress Josephine at Malmaison, and when she died, in 1814, he resigned his situation. In 1816 he once more visited S. America, and after encountering considerable dangers, and suffering imprisonment in Paraguay for nine years, finally settled in the neighbourhood of San Borja, a small town on the banks of the Uruguay, in Brazil, where he continued to reside till his death. He was the author of several splendid works on botanical subjects.

Born at La Rochelle, 1773; died 1858.

BOODROOM, or BODRUN, bood'-room, a seaport town of Asiatic Turkey, in Anatolia, situate on the north shore of the Gulf of Cos, 96 miles S. of Smyrna. There is a good harbour, protected by a fort, built by the knights of Rhodes in 1402. It is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Halicarnassus. Vestiges of the ancient walls may be discerned; and above the town are the remains of a theatre, measuring about 280 feet in diameter, and which appears to have had 36 rows of marble seats. Pop. about 11,000. Lat. 37° N. Lon. 27° 25′ E.

BOOLAK, or BOULAC, boo-lak', a town of Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, and the port of Cairo, from which it is two miles distant. It is connected by railway with Alexandria and Suez. Pop. 20,000.

BOOLUNDSHUHUR, boo'-lund-shu'-hur, a district of British India, in the north-western provinces. Area, 1,910 square miles. Pop. 924,822.

BOOLUNDSHUHUR, or UNCHUGANJ, chief town of the above district, 40 miles S.E. of Delhi. Pop. 12,100.

BOOM, boom, a town of Belgium, province of Antwerp, 12 miles S. of Antwerp. It is a busy inland port. Manf. Leather, soap, sailcloth, rope, bricks, and tiles. Pop. 9,900.

BOONDEE, boon'-de, a town of Hindostan, capital of a principality of the same name, in the province of Ajmeer. It consists of an old and a new town, the former walled and fortified. There are numerous temples and fountains, and the appearance of the town, which is of great antiquity, is highly picturesque. The palace of the rajah, and the great temple of Krishna, are the most striking edifices. Lat. 25° 28′ N. Lon. 75° 30 E. Pop. 20,744.

BOONE, DANIEL, boon, a colonel in the United States service, and one of the earliest settlers in Kentucky, where he signalized himself by his many daring exploits against the Red Indians, and also by his extensive surveys and explorations of that state. In 1775 he built a fort on the south side of the Kentucky river, on the site of the present town of Boonesborough. About 30 other places in the United States preserve his name. In 1798, he removed to Upper Louisiana, then belonging to the Spaniards, and was named by them commandant of a district there.—Boone was one of the most successful of the enterprising American pioneers of the 18th century, and may be said to have explored, defended, and aided in the settlement of the country from the Alleghany mountains to the frontier of Missouri.

Born in Pennsylvania, 1735; died in Missouri, 1820.

BOONE, a county of Illinois, United States. The surface is undulating and the soil excellent. Area, 270 square miles. Pop. 11,508. The chief town is Belvidere.

BOONE, a county of Kentucky, United States. The soil is productive. Area, 300 square miles. Burlington is the capital. Pop. 11,996.

BOONE, a county in the central part of Missouri, United States. The district consists chiefly of timber and prairie land, and there is a rich soil. The chief town is Columbia. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 25,422.

BOONE, a county in the south of West Virginia, United States. The surface is mountainous, and there are extensive forests. Boone Court House is the chief town. Area, 525 square miles. Pop. 5,824.

BOONE, a county of Indiana, United States, near the centre of the State. The face of the country is generally undulating. Lebanon is the capital. Area, 408 square miles. Pop. 25,992.

BOONE, a county of Iowa, United States, divided into two nearly equal parts by the Des Moines river. The land is well-timbered and very fertile. Boonville is the chief town. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 20,838.

BOORHANPOOR, a town in India, the ancient capital of the province of Candeish, or Gwalior. It is situated on the right bank of the Tapta, and is a large and well-built city. The most remarkable edifice is the great mosque, built by Aurungzebe. Lat. 21° 19′ N. Lon. 76° 18′ E.

BOORO, boor'-o, an island of the Asiatic Archipelago. It is mountainous and fertile, producing sago, rice, fruits, cajeput-oil, and dye-woods. In this island are mounts Tamahoo and Dome, respectively 6,528 and 10,400 feet high. Area, 2,000 square miles. Pop. 18,000. Lat. between 3° and 4° S. Lon. between 126° and 127° E.

BOOROJIND, or BOOROOGIND, boo-roo-jind', a Persian town, in the province of Irak-Ajemi. There are a castle and several mosques. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 33° 43′ N. Lon. 48° 45′ E.

BOOTAN, or BHUTAN, boo-tan', an independent state of Northern Hindoostan, lying between Bengal and Tibet, having Sikkim on the W., Bengal and Assam on the S. and E., and the great Himalaya chain on the N. It is very mountainous, and in many parts extremely cold, but productive and highly cultivated, the slopes of the mountains being cut into terraces for this purpose. It is traversed by offshoots from the Himalaya chain, which here attains an elevation of 25,000 feet. In the lower part of the country the forests are both fine and extensive, notwithstanding that they are in a height of 8,000 or 10,000 feet above the sea. The largest river is the Manas, which flows into the Brahmaputra.

Pro.—Maize, wheat, barley, buckwheat, and rice.
Minerals.—Iron and copper, and other metals are said to be plentiful.
Manf.—Woven goods, hardware articles, arms, gunpowder, and paper obtained from bark.
Towns.—Tassimdon and Punakka.
Religion.—Buddhism.
Pop. 600,000.
Lat. between 26° 20′ and 28° N. Lon. between 89° and 93° E.

BOOTH, BARTON, booth, an English actor, a relative of the Earl of Warrington. At the age of 17 he ran away from Cambridge University, entered into a strolling company, and his reputation became so great that Betterton engaged him. When Addison's "Cato" was to be acted at Drury Lane theatre, he was selected to perform the principal part, and sustained it so well that one night a subscription of fifty guineas was collected in the boxes and sent to him. He afterwards became manager of the house, and continued to perform nearly to his death.

Born 1681; died 1733.

BOOTH, SIR FELIX, the owner of a large distillery, distinguished for the great liberality he showed, when sheriff of London in 1829, in paying all the expenses, amounting to £17,000, of Captain Ross's second expedition to the Arctic regions, and whose name will always be honourably connected with the history of maritime discovery. He was knighted by William IV., and received the thanks of Parliament.

Born 1755; died at Brighton, 1850.

BOOTHIA FELIX, boo'-the-a fé'-lix, peninsula of British North America, running into the Arctic Ocean, named in honour of Sir Felix Booth. This country was discovered by Captain John Ross, who here determined the position of the magnetic pole. Lat. between 69° 75° N. Lon. between 92° and 97° W.

BOOTON, boot'-on, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, lying to the S.E. of the Celebes. Area, estimated at 1,800 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing maize, rice, cloves, and tropical fruits in abundance. Pop., including Pangansane, another island, perhaps 300,000. Lat. 5° S. Lon. 123° E. The Dutch used formerly to despatch annually to this island an extirpator, to destroy the clove and nutmeg trees, in order that they might secure a monopoly of the trade.

BOPP, FRANZ, bop, German orientalist, who considerably facilitated the study of Sanskrit in Europe. His great work is a comparative grammar of Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, Latin, Lithuanian, Sclavonian, Gothic and German. He was made a knight of the French order of merit in 1842, and was professor of Oriental languages at Berlin.

Born at Mainz, 1791; died 1867.

BOPPART, or BOPPARD, bop'-part, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, 9 miles S. of Coblenz. It is walled, and a crowded, busy town, with some picturesque buildings. Pop. 4,500.—This town occupies the site of the Roman Baudobriga, and there are remains of a Roman fortress. In the middle ages Boppart was an imperial city.

BORABORA. (See SOCIETY ISLANDS.)

BORAR, bo'-rar, a Swedish town, 35 miles E. of Gottenburg. Manf. Spinning, weaving, and woodwork. The town was founded in 1632 by Gustavus Adolphus. Pop. 3,200.

BORBA, bor'-ba, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alemtejo. It is surrounded with walls and has an old castle. There is a good annual fair. Pop. 3,650.

BORDA, JEAN CHARLES, bor'-da, a French mathematician, who early entered the navy, and was employed on a voyage of discovery along the coasts of Europe and Africa, with a view of improving navigation and geography. The result of this expedition was published in two vols. 4to, 1778. In the American war he served under D'Estaing, with the rank of rear-admiral. Before this he had introduced uniformity into the architecture of the French ships of war. He contributed numerous papers to the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, chiefly relating to the construction of vessels and hydraulics. In 1787 he published the "Description and Use of the Circle of Reflection," in which he recommended the employment of the specular circles invented by Tobias Mayer. He was of great assistance to the commission for regulating weights and measures, and invented the mensuration-rod, for ascertaining the station lines. One of his last labours was the accurate determination of the length of the pendulum vibrating seconds at Paris.

Born at Dax, 1733; died at Paris, 1799.

BORDE, ANDREW, a physician and humorist, who wrote several medical works and humorous tales. He was in the habit of attending markets and fairs, and addressing his hearers in a strain of mixed bombast and comicality. It is supposed that the name applied to a buffoon, "Merry Andrew," was first given to him. He was originally a Carthusian monk, but soon quitted the order. He died in the Fleet prison.

Born near Cuckfield, Sussex, 1500; died 1549.

BORDEAUX, bor'-do, a seaport and commercial city of France, in the department of the Gironde, on the left bank of the Garonne, situate 60 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic. The old town is not very attractive, the streets being for the most part crooked, narrow, and badly paved; but it has a number of handsome edifices. The new town is finely built, possessing more than three miles of quays, and the bridge over the Garonne, nearly the third of a mile in length, is one of the finest in Europe. The most remarkable public buildings are the Exchange, the ancient Hôtel des Fermes, the palace founded by Bonaparte in 1810, an elegant theatre, the town-house (formerly the archiepiscopal palace), and the palace, first occupied by the dukes of Guienne, and afterwards by the Parliament. The cathedral, remarkable for its beautiful towers, dates from the 11th century; and still older is the Church of St. Croix. There are other interesting churches; but many of them were greatly injured during the Revolution. The institutions in literature are, a university, which was founded in 1441, and consists of two colleges, with a lyceum; an academy of arts and sciences, instituted in 1712; a public library, with 120,000 volumes; and an academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture, founded in 1670, and revived in 1768. Manf. Glass, earthenware, woollen stuffs, lace, cottons, woollens, printed calicoes, carpets, tobacco, chemicals, brandy, and liqueurs; and there are iron-foundries and a great number of sugar-refineries. Wine, including some of the finest clarets, and Sauterne and other white wines, and brandy are exported in great quantities. Vinegar, plums, raisins, chestnuts, walnuts, wood, turpentine, cork, honey, and hams, are also exported. Pop. 221,305. Lat. 44° 50′ 19″ N. Lon. 0° 34′ 32″ W.—This town was the Burdigala of the Romans, and was celebrated for its mines in the 4th century. Under the Normans it was the capital of the duchy of Guienne, and in 1152 passed by marriage into the hands of the English, who kept it till 1451. It is the birthplace of Ausonius, the Latin poet, Edward the Black Prince, and his son Richard II. of England, Pope Clement, the distinguished painter Charles Vernet, and the historian Montesquieu.

BORDEAUX, Duc de, Henri Charles Ferdinand Marie Dieudonné d'Artois, the son of Charles Ferdinand, duc de Berri. On the dethronement of Charles X. of France, his son the Dauphin, Louis Antoine, renounced his claim to the throne in favour of this prince; but he left France with the royal family in August, 1830. Louis Philippe then ascended the throne, and the duc de Bordeaux took the title of comte de Chambord. The French legitimists designate him as Henry V.

Born 1820.

BORELLI, or BOREL, Giovanni, bo-rel'-le, an eminent Italian professor of mathematics and medicine, who discovered and translated the lost books of Apollonius Pergæus, wrote the first theory of Jupiter's satellites, and endeavoured to apply mathematics to medicine. In 1666 he was called to the professor's chair at Pisa, where he lectured with great success, and wrote much in connection with the sciences he pursued. Being supposed to have favoured a revolt of the Messinians, amongst whom he had gone to live, he was invited by Queen Christina of Sweden to Rome, where she then was. Thither he immediately went, and lived under the favour of her patronage until his death. The work "De Motu Animalium" is that upon which the medical reputation of Borelli depends.

Born at Naples, 1608; died at Rome, 1679.

BORGHESE, bor-gai'-zai, a distinguished Italian family, amongst whom have been several cardinals, and other members who have taken distinguished positions in the public affairs of Italy.

BORGHESE, Prince Camillo, married the widow of General Leclerc, Marie Pauline Bonaparte, the sister of Napoleon I. (See Bonaparte.) In 1805 he was created a prince of the French empire, and, with the title of duke of Guastalla, became governor-general of the departments beyond the Alps, which embraced those former Italian states, and which were now annexed to France. Subsequently to the fall of the emperor, he fixed his abode at Florence, where, in a palatial structure, he lived in princely splendour. He had another residence at Rome, which he adorned with costly works of art.

BORGHINI, Vincenzio, bor-geen'-e, Italian ecclesiastic and antiquary. He became a Benedictine monk in 1532. The Grand Duke Cosmo I. appointed him vice-president of the Florence Academy of Art. He edited the Decameron of Boccaccio, and wrote on the history of the noble families of Florence, heraldry, and antiquities.

Born at Florence, 1515; died 1580.

BORGIA, Cæsar, bor'-je-a, a profligate son of Pope Alexander VI., on whose accession he was made archbishop of Valenza and cardinal; but being jealous of his brother Francis, who was most in favour, he contrived to have him drowned. He also dispatched a number of other persons to gratify his avarice and revenge. Having renounced the cardinalship, he was made duke of Valentinois by Louis XII. of France, with whom he entered into a league for the conquest of the Milanese. On the death of his father, he was sent prisoner to Spain, but made his escape, and died fighting as a volunteer in the service of his brother-in-law, the king of Navarre.

Died 1507.

BORGIA, Lucrezia, sister of the above, a woman of extraordinary beauty, has been represented as equally profligate with her brother, and charged with the most horrible crimes, a charge which is hardly credible, when we consider the characters of those who have been her panegyrists. Among these are the names of Ariosto, Strozzi, and several historians, who could not all have concurred in commending an embodiment of wickedness. She was thrice married, first to Sforza, lord of Pesare; then to Alfonso, duke of Biscoglia; and afterwards to Alfonso of Este, who became duke of Ferrara. She left several sons.

Died at Ferrara, 1520.

BORGO, bor'-go, 'a town,' the prefix of many of the names of places in Italy.

BORGO, a town of the Austrian Tyrol, in the valley of the Sugana, 12 miles S.E. of Trent, on the Brenta, over which there is a handsome stone bridge. Silk cultivation is carried on. Pop. 3,500.

BORGOGNONE, Jacopo Cortese, bor-go-no'-nai, painter, who became a Jesuit. His battle-pieces are famous.

Born in Burgundy, 1621; died at Rome, 1655.

BORGOMANERO, bor'-go-ma-nair'-o, an Italian town, province of Piedmont, 18 miles N.W. of Novara, on the left bank of the Gogna. It is walled and well built. Pop. 6,000.

BORINAGE, bor'-e-naj, a district of Belgium, in the province of Hainault. Pop. 32,000.—Almost its whole extent is covered with coal mines.

BORISSOGLEBSK, bo-ris'-og-lebsk, a Russian town, capital of a district of the same name, on the Vorona, 102 miles S.E. of Tambov. Pop. 12,250.

BORJA, bor'-ya, a city of Spain, province of Aragon, 38 miles W. of Saragossa. It is well-built, and has good public buildings. Manf. Cloth, blankets, hemp, and brandy. Pop. 4,300.

BORLASE, William, bor'-lais, antiquary, who in 1720 entered into orders, and two years afterwards obtained the rectory of Ludgvan, and afterwards that of St. Just, in Cornwall. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and, having presented a variety of fossils and pieces of antiquity to the university of Oxford, he received the thanks of that learned body, and the degree of LL.D. He also gave many curious ores and fossils to the poet Pope for his grotto at Twickenham. He wrote an essay on Cornish crystals, in the "Philosophical Transactions," "Antiquities of the County of Cornwall," folio, two editions; "Observations on the Scilly Islands," 4to; and "The Natural History of Cornwall," folio; all of them valuable.

Born at Pendeen, Cornwall, 1696; died 1772.

BORNEO, bor'-ne-o, an island of Asia, in the Eastern Archipelago, encompassed by the China Sea, the Sea of Java, the Sea of Celebes, and the Straits of Macassar. It is about 800 miles in length, by 700 in breadth, being the largest island, with the exception of Australia, in the world. The island is mountainous in the interior, and flat and marshy for 10 or 15 miles inland along the coast. To the north of the Krunbang Mountains, which form the S. boundary of Sarawak, are the Batang-Lupar and the Madi ranges, and between these and the Chinese Sea lies Borneo proper. Running in a N.W. direction from Lake Kini-Balu the highest point known in Borneo is reached. This is attained in Mount Kini-Balu, which is 13,698 feet above the level of the sea. Other ranges traverse the country, but their heights are not definitely ascertained.

Rivers.—The principal are the Borneo or Brunai, Batang-Lupar, Sarawak, Redjang, Baram, Sirabas, and Bintula, on the north side of the island; the Pontianak (or Kapuas-Bohang), Simpang, Sambas, Pawan, and Suecadana on the west; the Kutei (or Mahakkan), Bulungan, and Kuran (or Beru), on the east; and in the south-eastern part of the island the Barito (known as the river of Banjermassin), Kapuas-Murung, Kahaijan, Sampit, and Mendanei. The Borneo river is navigable for large vessels for about 15 miles; the others have bars at the mouth, which make them inaccessible to any but small vessels.

Lakes.—The only known one of importance is the Kini-Balu, which is 35 miles long by 30 broad.

Forests.—Very extensive, in which the gutta-percha tree is a conspicuous object; and there are teak, iron-wood, sandal-wood, ebony, various dye-woods, and timber well adapted for ship-building.

Climate.—In the higher parts, as temperate as it is in Europe; but in the lower, hot, moist, and unhealthy.

Zoology.—The elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, leopard, bear, deer, wild cattle, and monkey. The ourang-outang is thought to be peculiar to Borneo and Sumatra. There is a porcupine which is said to be a favourite food of the natives, and the only animal that can feed on the upas-tree with impunity. The peninsula of Unsoong, in this country, is supposed to be the most eastern point on the globe in which the elephant is found in its wild state. Birds are found in great variety, and are remarkable for their plumage. Among them are the swallows which make the edible nest so much liked in China. The butterflies and moths are very brilliant. Bees especially abound, and their wax is transported to China. The lac insect is also found. Crocodiles appear in the rivers, which are well supplied with fish. On the north and north-eastern coasts tortoises abound, and their shells are exported to China. There are also oysters, pearl-mussels, and trepang.

Pro.—Rice, sago, sugar, camphor, cassia, cotton, opium, pepper, nutmeg, cloves, betel-nuts, cocoa-nuts, areca-palm, banana, bread-fruit, cajeput-oil, benzoin, gums, and woods used for frankincense; indigo, safflower, turmeric, and fruits of every description.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, diamonds, antimony, iron, tin, platina, nickel, petroleum, sulphur, and coal. The principal diamond-mines are those of Landak, on the river of the same name, about 50 miles from Pontianak.

Area, 300,000 square miles.

Pop. about 2,000,000, consisting of Dyaks, Malays, Chinese, Javans, Arabs, and Bugis. The Dyaks, the aboriginal inhabitants, live chiefly in the interior; they are divided into numerous tribes, and are nearly all heathens. The Malays inhabit the coast districts, and make good sailors. The Chinese live mostly by trading, and mining in the interior. The Bugis (from the Celebes) combine trade with piracy.

Manf. and Commerce.—Cotton fabrics, earthenware, baskets, mats, and weapons are made. The exports consist chiefly of gold, diamonds, gutta-percha, cotton, wax, timber, dye-woods, sandal-wood, camphor, edible nests, coal, and ratan cane.

Lat. between 7° N. and 4° 20′ S. Lon. between 106° 40′ and 116° 46′ E.

Territorial Divisions.—The Dutch possess about two-thirds of the island, having residencies in the western and south-eastern parts of the island. The seat of government of the former is PONTIANAK; of the latter, BANJERMASSIN. The territories of the Sultan of Borneo and Sarawak (governed by an English independent rajah) are on the north and north-east; and on the west are the kingdoms of LANDAK, MAMPAWA, and SAMBAS. The small island of LABUAN, off the north-west coast, is a British colony.

Chief Towns.—BORNEO, Banjermassin, Pontianak, SAMBAS, and SARAWAK.

History.—Borneo was discovered by the Portuguese in 1521. Several of the European powers have endeavoured to establish colonial settlements in Borneo; but, with the exception of the Dutch, who established themselves in 1643, none of them had any permanent success, till Sir James Brooke, an English gentleman of independent fortune, landed on its coast in 1838. (See BROOKE, Sir James; SARAWAK, and LABUAN.)

BORNEO, a seaport and capital of the kingdom of Borneo, on the north-west part of the island, 10 miles distant from the sea, on the river Brunai. The houses which occupy the banks on both sides of the river are supported on piles, and ascended by ladders, the tide being freely permitted to flow under them. It is a place of considerable trade. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 4° 56′ N. Lon. 114° 44′ E.

BORNHOLM, born'-hawlm, a mountainous island of Denmark, in the Baltic, about 100 miles from the outermost point of Zealand; 30 miles long by 20 broad. Area, including three small neighbouring islands, 230 square miles. Pro. Flax, hemp, and oats. Minerals. Potter's clay, blue marble, and coal. Manf. Linens, wooden clocks, and earthenware. Pop. 29,000. Lat. between 54° 59′ and 55° 18′ N. Lon. between 14° 42′ and 15° 10′ E. The chief town is RÖNNE, or Rottum, on the western coast.

BORNOS, bor'-nos, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia, near the right bank of the Guadaleta, 28 miles N.E. of Cadiz. The streets are wide, and there are spacious squares. A palace, part consisting of an old Moorish castle, is a large and interesting building. The town is much resorted to by invalids. Manf. Linen, cotton, cloth, and soap. Pop. 4,800.

BORNOU, bor-noo', an extensive country in Africa, bounded on the N.W. by Fezzan, N. by the desert of Bilma, S.E. by Cashna, and S.W. by Nubia. The whole country may be regarded as a level, covered with a thick copse, high coarse grass, and closely-creeping and climbing plants. Around Lake Tchad, for a considerable distance, there is an alluvial marsh.

Rivers.—The Shary and the Yeou, both of which fall into Lake Tchad.

Climate.—This is characterised by an excessive though not by a uniform heat. Two seasons, one commencing soon after the middle of April, the other at the same period in October, divide the year. The first is introduced by violent winds, that bring with them, from the S.E. and S., an intense heat, with a deluge of sultry rain and such tempests of thunder and lightning as destroy multitudes of cattle and numbers of the people. At the commencement of the second season, the ardent heat lessens; the air becomes soft and mild, and the weather perfectly serene.

Zoology.—Horses, asses, mules, dogs, horned cattle, goats, sheep, and camels (the flesh of which is much esteemed) are the common animals. The game consists of partridges, wild ducks, and ostriches, the flesh of which is prized above all other kinds. The other animals are the lion, leopard, civet-cat, wolf, fox, elephant, antelope, giraffe, crocodile, and hippopotamus; and there are many snakes, scorpions, centipedes, and toads. Bees are so numerous that the wax is often thrown away as an article of no value.

Pro.—Maize, cotton, hemp, indigo, and all kinds of fruits. The india-rubber tree is found in abundance, but cultivation is imperfect, and the riches of the inhabitants chiefly consist in slaves and cattle.

Pop. about 8,000,000, mostly of negro race; but the ruling classes are of Arab descent, and profess Mahometanism.

Lat. between 10° and 25° N. Lon. between 12° and 28° E.

BORODINO, bo-ro-dé-no, a village in Russia, near the Moskwa, about 70 miles W. of Moscow, remarkable for the great battle gained on September 7, 1812, by the French over the Russians.

BOROUGHBRIDGE, bur'-ro-brij, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the banks of the Ure, 17 miles N.W. of York. The chief trade is in agricultural produce and hardware. In the vicinity are some remarkable stones, known as "the devil's arrows," supposed to be of Druidical origin. Pop. 4,942. A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

BOROVITSCKI-POROQUI, bo'-ro-vitch-ki-po-roke-ui', a Russian town, in the government of Novgorod, on the Msta, from the rapids in which the second part of the name of the town is derived. Pop. 8,700.

BOROVSK, bo-rofsk', a Russian town, in the government of Kalouga. A very rich convent, founded in the 15th century, is in the neighbourhood. Manf. Sailcloth, leather, flax, and hemp. Pop. 9,000.

BORROMEAN ISLANDS. (See MAGGIORE, LAGO.)

BORROMEO, CARLO, Count, bor-ro-mai'-o, Cardinal and Saint of the Church of Rome. He was of noble family, and nephew of Pope Pius V. He studied at Pavia, and at an early age was made cardinal and archbishop of Milan. He exercised great influence at Rome, and filled several high offices; but his endeavours to reform the discipline and morals of the clergy raised up enemies, and in 1569 an attempt was made upon his life. He was pious and liberal, a patron of literature and art. In 1570 he founded the Helvetic College at Milan, and induced an alliance of the seven Catholic cantons of Switzerland. His administrative talents, as exhibited in the terrible famine of 1570, and during the plague at Milan in 1576, were great. His exertions and austerities are supposed to have caused his death; and it was asserted that miracles were wrought at his tomb. He was canonized in 1616; and there is a statue to his memory on the western shore of Lake Maggiore, where his ancestral estates were situated.

Born 1538; died 1584.

BORROMEO, FREDERICO, Count, nephew of the preceding, was also a cardinal, and was in 1595 made archbishop of Milan, where he founded the Ambrosian library.

Born at Milan, 1564; died 1634.

BORROMINI, FRANCIS, bor-ro-mé-ne, an eminent architect, who, it is said, was driven mad by the reputation of Bernini, another architect, and stabbed himself. He built the church of La Sapienza at Rome, the college de Propaganda, and several other elegant structures.

Born in the district of Como, 1599; died 1667.

BORROW, GEORGE, an English author, remarkable for a talent for acquiring languages, whose singular spirit of adventure led him into the society of the gipsies, not only of England and Ireland, but those of the Spanish peninsula. Many of the scenes through which he has passed are supposed to be given in his works, "the Zincali," "the Bible in Spain," "Lavengro," and "Rommany Rye." He is also the author of "Wild Wales."

Born at Norwich, 1803. Died 1881.

BORROWSTOUNNESS, frequently abbreviated to Bo'ness, bo'-ness, a seaport-town of Scotland, county of Linlithgow, on the southern bank of the river Forth, 18 miles from Edinburgh. The town is irregularly built, but has a very good harbour. There are extensive collieries, which afford fuel both for home consumption and export, and have been wrought during centuries, and penetrate so far beneath the bed of the river as to meet those of Culross, on the opposite side. There is a considerable coasting trade. Manf. Malt, soap, salt, vitriol, and earthenware. Pop. 6,088. A station on the North British Railway.

BORSCHOD, bor'-shod, a county of Hungary, on the Theiss. Desc. Fertile, and producing wine, grain, and fruits in abundance. It also rears considerable numbers of cattle, has copper-mines, and its commerce is extensive. Pop. 216,500.

BORT, bort, a town of France, in the department Corrèze, 14 miles from Ussel. It trades in horses and cattle. Pop. 2,600.—This is the birthplace of Marmontel.

BORY DE SAINT VINCENT, JEAN BAPTISTE GEORGE MARIE, baw'-ree de sainn van-sahn', French traveller and naturalist. He travelled in Australia, and afterwards served in the French army. After the battle of Waterloo he was exiled, and remained at Brussels till 1820, when he returned to France, and contributed extensively to the scientific literature of the day. He was employed by the government in scientific missions in Greece and Algeria. His scientific works are of high value.

Born at Agen, 1780; died 1846.

BOSA, bo'-sa, a town and small port of Sardinia, 4 miles from Cagliari, near the mouth of the Terno. It is surrounded by old walls, has a castle, cathedral, and several monasteries and churches. It is one of the unhealthiest places in the island. A trade is carried on in wine, oil, grain, and cheese. Pop. 6,500.

BOSCAN-ALMOGAVER, JUAN, bos'-can-al'-mo-ga'-ver, Spanish poet. He was descended from a noble family, and was the tutor of the famous duke of Alva. He was the first to introduce the Italian metres into Spanish poetry.

Born at Barcelona, 1500; died 1544.

BOSCAWEN, EDWARD, bos-kó'-en, a distinguished English admiral, was the second son of Hugh, Viscount Falmouth. He early entered the navy, and was, in 1740, made captain of the Shoreham. He particularly distinguished himself at the taking of Porto Bello and the siege of Carthagena. On his return to England, he married the daughter of William Glanville, Esq., and was chosen M.P. for Truro, in Cornwall. He served in the West and East Indies and America with brilliant success, and twice received the thanks of Parliament, and had an annual pension of £3,000 conferred upon him. In 1760 he was appointed general of the marines, with a salary of £3,000 a year, which he retained until his death.

Born in Cornwall, 1711; died at Hatchfield Park, near Guildford, 1761.

BOSCOBEL, bos'-ko-bel, a small extra-parochial liberty in Shropshire, near White Ladies, in the parish of Tong, noteworthy only for its historical associations.—Its grove is noted for the oak in which Charles II. was hid, and where he saw the Parliament soldiers pass by in quest of him, after the battle of Worcester, in 1651.

BOSCO TRECASE, bos'-co-trai-ca'-sai, an Italian town, situated at the foot of Mount Vesu-vius. There are several churches and convents, and a royal manufactory of arms and gunpowder. Pop. 8,500.

Born at Ragusa, 1711; died at Milan, 1787.

BOSIO, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, Baron, bo-se-o, sculptor, who executed the figures for the column in the Place Vendôme, Paris. He was employed by Louis XVIII. and Charles X., the latter conferring on him the rank of baron. Many of the most beautiful public statues in Paris are by him, and he executed busts of many royal personages.
Born at Monaco, Sardinia, 1769; died 1845.

BOSJESMANS, boz-jes'-manz, literally "bushmen," is the designation applied by the Dutch colonists at the Cape of Good Hope to a nomadic people who skirt the colony on the north, and who neither rear cattle nor have tribal distinctions such as the Hottentots have.

BOSNA-SERAJO, bos'-na se-ra'-yo, a town of European Turkey, the capital of Bosnia, situate on both sides of the Migliazza, an affluent of the Bosna, crossed by four handsome stone bridges, 120 miles S.W. of Belgrade. There were about 150 mosques, and an ancient palace, but a large portion of the old town was destroyed by fire in 1879. The old citadel, which stands at some distance from the town, is surrounded with thick walls, turrets, and bastions, and defended by numerous cannon. Manf. Cutlery, arms, jewellery, leather, and woollen goods. There is a considerable trade with Dalmatia, Turkey, Croatia, and South Germany.—In the neighbourhood there are mineral baths and iron-mines. Pop. about 50,000.

BOSNIA, formerly an administrative division in the north-western part of Turkey in Europe, but now, in accordance with the Treaty of Berlin of 1878, administered by the Austrian government. The country is generally mountainous, but containing many fruitful fields and vineyards, especially in the north. Its mountains are offshoots from the Dinaric Alps, in some places attaining an elevation of 7,000 feet.

Rivers.—The Save and its tributaries, the Bosnia, Verba, and Drin; and the Narenta and the Boyana, falling into the Adriatic.

Pro.—Wheat, maize, barley, flax, hemp, tobacco, wines, olives, and fruits. A great number of cattle are reared, the pasturage being good. The sheep are celebrated for their wool, and skins of animals are exported.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, mercury, lead, coal, and iron.

Area, including Herzegovina, 23,570 square miles.

Pop. 1,158,440, consisting of Bosnians (or Bosniaks), Turks, Croats, Moriacks, Montenegrins, Illyrians, Dalmatians, and Germans. The Turks form about a quarter of the population; the others mostly belong nominally to the Greek church, and there are some Roman Catholics.

Lat. between 42° 30′ and 45° 15′ N. Lon. between 17° 40′ and 21° E.

History.—This country belonged to the ancient Pannonia, and, in the middle ages, was sometimes tributary to Hungary, and sometimes to Servia. In 1463 it became tributary to Turkey, and, in 1522, was united to that empire. The Bosniacs have frequently risen against their rulers; and, in 1850-51, Omar Pasha gained considerable reputation by suppressing a rebellion against accepting the Tanzimat, or reformed constitution of Turkey. An insurrection broke out in the Herzegovina in 1875. In 1878 Bosnia was virtually annexed to Austria.

BOSPHORUS, or BOSPORUS, bos'-fo-rus, two narrow straits, situate at the confines of Europe and Asia. One was called Cimmerian, and joined the Palus Mæotis to the Euxine Sea, and is called by the moderns the Strait of Caffa; and the other was called the Thracian, and by the moderns the Strait of Constantinople, which connects the Euxine Sea with the Propontis. It is so narrow that, in a calm day, persons could converse with each other from the opposite banks. The meaning of the name is "the ford of oxen," equivalent to the English Oxford.

BOSSUET, JACQUES BENIGNO, bos'-soo-ai, a celebrated French preacher, who, having obtained great eminence, especially for his controversial powers, was, in 1669, made bishop of Cordan, a dignity which he afterwards resigned, having been appointed tutor to the dauphin, for whom he composed his "Discourse on Universal History," which was printed in 1681. It was from this work that Voltaire conceived his opinion of Bossuet's great eloquence. In 1681 he was made bishop of Meaux, and in 1697 counsellor of state. Bossuet distinguished himself as a controversialist against the Protestants, and his "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church upon Matters of Controversy" was written with so much talent and ingenuity as to draw many persons over to Popery. It was translated into several languages, and procured for the author the thanks of the Pope. Several able Protestants attacked the bishop, who encountered them with great spirit. His funeral orations are splendid, affecting, and eloquent; but too dramatic in style to suit the English taste. His most famous work was his history of the diversities of the Protestant churches, and another elaborate treatise was on politics as founded on the Scriptures.
Born at Dijon, 1627; died at Meaux, 1704.

BOSTAN, EL, bos-tan', a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the pashalic of Marash, on the north side of Mount Taurus. A large trade in wheat is carried on. The town occupies the site of the ancient Commana, in Cappadocia. Pop. 8,500. Lat. 38° N. Lon. 36° 23′ E.

BOSTON, bos'-ton, a seaport-town and borough of Lincolnshire, on both sides of the river Witham, (crossed by an iron bridge of a single arch), 28 miles S.E. of Lincoln. This is an ancient town, supposed to be the Icanhoe where, in 654, an abbey was founded by St. Botolph, after whom the town was named, Boston being a contraction of Botolph's town. It was formerly rich in monastic and religious institutions, though scarcely a vestige is now left of the six friaries and three colleges which it once contained. The parish church, dedicated to St. Botolph, is a noble Gothic structure, one of the largest and finest churches in England, with a tower 300 feet high, and is justly admired for its elegance and simplicity. It was founded in 1309. Besides the church, there are places of worship belonging to Baptists of different denominations, to Unitarians, and Methodists; also a Quaker meeting-house. There is a Freemasons' hall in the Egyptian style. Manf. Canvas, ropes, leather, iron, brass, bricks, whiting, and hats. There is a great market for cattle and sheep, and a large quantity of corn is exported. Vessels of 300 tons can ascend the river into the centre of the town. The neighbouring sea yields great numbers of fish; and a considerable traffic is carried on in shrimps, immense quantities of which are sent to London. Pop. 14,932. A station on the Great Northern Railway.

BOSTON, the capital of Massachusetts, United States, stands on a peninsula at the western end of Massachusetts Bay, on an inlet which forms a noble harbour, protected by two headlands, between which is an insular barrier, so divided as only to allow three narrow entrances into the harbour, which has an extent of about 75 square miles, and depth for the largest ships. The old town occupied a peninsula of about 700 acres, but the present town has extended till it occupies an adjacent island and a considerable area on the mainland. It is divided into Old, East and South Boston, Boston Highlands, added in 1868, and Dorchester in 1870. These separate portions are connected by seven bridges and a long embankment, the Western Avenue. The streets are generally spacious and well built of red brick; but the surface on which they are laid being uneven, they have a somewhat irregular appearance. The principal edifices are the State-house, Faneuil-hall, the City-hall, Exchange, hospital, Custom-house, gaol, houses of industry and correction, an Athenæum, an Odeon, one of the finest concert-halls in the world, about 130 churches, and two theatres. There are a great many schools, literary, scientific, and charitable institutions, and the medical branch of the Harvard University is here. Literature flourishes in this town above, perhaps, any place in the United States. There is a beautiful park, the Common, comprising 50 acres, and forming a fine promenade.

Commerce.—This town being the great emporium of New England, it imports most kinds of European manufactures, E. and W. India produce, and flour, grain, cotton, tobacco, staves, and coal from most of the other states of the Union. The chief exports are beef, pork, lard, woollen and cotton manufactured goods, cordage, boots, shoes, paper, hardware, and furniture.

Lat. 42° 21′ N. Lon. 71° 4′ W.

Railway and Steamship communications.—Boston is connected with eight great railway systems, affording communication with almost every part of the United States, and is the transatlantic station of the Cunard line of steamers.

History.—Boston was founded about 1630, and was formerly called Tremont, from three hills, on and around which it is built. It was subsequently called Boston, in compliment to the Rev. John Cotton, who had been a clergyman at Boston, in Lincolnshire, and who had fled here from religious persecution. It is called the cradle of American independence, for it was here that the first efforts in the American War of Independence was made. In June, 1775, the battle of Bunker's Hill was fought in its neighbourhood, and there is a granite column, 221 feet high, commemorating the victory over the British. Water is brought into the town by a brick conduit from Long Pond, 20 miles distant, and 10,000,000 gallons are daily supplied. It was the birthplace of Franklin the philosopher.

BOSTON, THOMAS, a Scotch divine, minister of Simprin, and afterwards of Ettrick. He was the author of "The Fourfold State," "The Crook in the Lot," and an autobiography, all of which are popular works. He has been styled the "representative man" of Scotch divines. His style is quaint, but often exhibits fine flashes of thought.

Born at Dunse, 1676; died at Ettrick, 1732.

BOSWELL, JAMES, bos'-wel, the biographer of Dr. Johnson, was the son of Alexander Boswell (Lord Auchinleck), one of the justices of session. He was educated at the school and university of Edinburgh, and early distinguished himself by his love of poetry and the belles-lettres. Being, however, rather addicted to pleasure, and wishing to enter into the army, his father, who designed him for his own profession, would not allow him to adopt a military life. At his request he went to London, where he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Johnson and other men of literary eminence. Thence he went to Utrecht and studied the civil law; after which he travelled through Germany and Switzerland. In the latter country he was introduced to Rousseau, and at Ferney visited Voltaire. He next went to Italy, and passed over to Corsica, where, by means of an introductory letter which he received from Rousseau, he formed an intimacy with General Paoli. On his return he published an account of Corsica. About this time he was admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar. In 1773 he accompanied Dr. Johnson in a tour through the Highlands and the western isles of Scotland, of which tour he wrote an entertaining account, published in 1784. On the death of his father he removed to London, and was admitted at the English bar, but never attained any considerable practice. By the favour of Lord Lonsdale, however, he was chosen recorder of Carlisle. In 1790 he published a book of high value in biographical literature,—"The Memoirs of Dr. Johnson." It is upon this work that his fame rests. It has received the commendation of the highest authorities, has given gratification to thousands upon thousands of readers, and presents us with the best portrait of a great man that has ever been painted. He also wrote "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," and a life of Johnson. He is the most candid, as well as the most hero-worshipping of biographers, never attempting to conceal his own defects and amusing vanity.

Born at Edinburgh, 1740; died in London, 1795.

BOSWORTH, or MARKETBOSWORTH, bos'-worth, a market-town of Leicestershire, 12 miles W. of Leicester. The church is spacious, and has a beautiful spire. Pop. 6,409. Manf. Knitted worsted stockings.—About three miles from the town is Bosworth Field, where, in 1485, the memorable battle between Richard III. and the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., was fought.

BOTANY BAY, bot'-a-ne, a bay on the south-east coast of Australia, New South Wales, 5 miles from Sydney. It was, in 1770, discovered by Captain Cook, who named it Botany, from the great quantity of herbs which he found on its shores. In 1787 it became an English penal settlement, removed in the following year to Port Jackson, a larger harbour a little further north. In 1825 a column was erected on its shore to the memory of La Perouse, the French navigator. Lat. 34° S. Lon. 151° 15′ E.

BOTH, JOHN and ANDREW, both, Flemish painters, brothers, who worked together, John painting the landscapes and Andrew the figures. Their works fetch high prices. Andrew was accidentally drowned at Venice.

Born at Utrecht. Died, Andrew, 1650; John, at Utrecht, 1651.

BOTHNIA, both'-ne-a, (See FINLAND and SWEDEN.)

BOTHNIA, GULF OF, is that part of the Baltic Sea which separates Sweden from Finland. It begins at the island of Aland, and extends 360 miles in length and 135 in extreme breadth, to Tornea, between lat. 60° 20′ and 65° 50′ N.—This gulf receives nearly all the great rivers of Sweden and Finland; but its depth is not greater than that of the Baltic generally. (See BALTIC.)

BOTHWELL, both'well, in Lanarkshire, Scotland, 8 miles E.S.E. of Glasgow. Pop. 1,200. This village is famous for a battle fought, in 1679, between the Scottish Covenanters and the royal forces, wherein the former were completely routed. Bothwell Bridge (or Brig), was the scene of the action. The fine ruins of Bothwell Castle, built by the Normans, are near the village.

BOTHWELL, JAMES HEPBURN, Earl, succeeded his father, the third earl, in 1556. In 1561 he was one of the lords deputed to bring the young Queen of Scots to her kingdom. In 1562 he and the earl of Arran were imprisoned for conspiring to seize the Queen's person. He escaped and went to France. He returned to Scotland in 1565, and ingratiated himself with Mary, endeavouring to persuade her to obtain a divorce from her husband, Lord Darnley. When, in 1567, that unfortunate nobleman was blown up in the house where he slept, in the vicinity of Holyrood palace, suspicion fell strongly upon Bothwell and the queen. Bothwell was tried and acquitted. After this, he seized Mary near Edinburgh, and carried her prisoner to Dunbar Castle, where he first endeavoured, by soothing speeches and protestations of love, to prevail on her to marry him. That she did so at last is certain; but it is said, and seemingly with justice, that she was forced to it by the worst advantages being taken of her. During these iniquitous proceedings, Bothwell procured a divorce from his former wife, and Mary created him earl of Orkney. But a confederacy among the lords being formed against him, he retired to the Orkneys, and thence to Denmark, where he died in prison, it is said confessing his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the king's murder.

Born 1526; died in the Castle of Malmory, in 1576.

BOTTA, CARLO GIUSEPPE GUGLIELMO, bot'-ta, Italian poet and historian, who studied medicine at the university of Turin, and, in 1786, took a doctor's degree. He became a physician in the French army, and, in 1799, he and two others were appointed the provisional government of Piedmont. He was afterwards, under the first empire, a member of the French Corps Legislatif. In 1830 he returned to Italy, and received a pension, with the honour of knighthood, from Charles Albert, king of Sardinia. He wrote a "History of Italy," and a continuation of Guicciardini's history from 1490 down to 1814. He was also the author of a "History of American Independence," some books of travels, and an epic poem.

Born at San Giorgio, Piedmont, 1766; died at Paris, 1837.

BOTTA, PAUL EMILE, son of the above, became French consul at Mosul, and early distinguished himself as a naturalist and traveller. After spending some years in Egypt, and making a journey through a portion of Arabia, he settled at Mosul, and in 1843 disentombed an Assyrian palace in the mound of Khorsabad, 14 miles from the seat of his consulship. This was before the discoveries made by Mr. Layard; so that M. Botta may be considered the first who led the way in the path of discovering Assyrian remains.

Born at Paris, about 1800.

BOTTARI, GIOVANNI GAETANO, a learned Italian ecclesiastic, professor at the college of La Sapienza at Rome, and afterwards librarian of the Vatican. He edited a new edition of the famous Dictionary of the Della Crusca Academy, wrote a treatise on the Catacombs of Rome, edited Virgil, and wrote dissertations on Livy, Dante, and Boccaccio.

Born at Florence, 1689; died at Rome, 1775.

BOTTGER, or BOTTCHER, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, boett'-jer, was apprenticed to an apothecary at Berlin, but devoted himself enthusiastically to the search for the philosopher's stone. Being threatened with punishment, he fled to Saxony, where he found patronage at the court; but failing in his attempts to make gold, the king employed him to experiment upon clay, with the view to improving the manufacture of porcelain; and he succeeded in producing the famous Meissen ware. He was kept under strict surveillance so that he should not reveal the secret, but rewarded with considerable presents, which he wasted.

Born at Schleiz, in Reuss, 1681; died 1719.

BOTTIGER, KARL AUGUST, German archæologist. He studied at Leipsic, and in 1791 was appointed director of the Gymnasium and consistorial councillor at Weima, where he enjoyed the friendship of Schiller, Goethe, and other eminent men; and wrote numerous works on archæology. He was elected a member of the French Institute in 1832.

Born at Richenbach, 1760; died 1835.

BOTZEN, or BABRANO, bot'-zen, a town in the Austrian Tyrol, 32 miles N.N.E. of Trent. It is well built, and its situation makes it a great centre of trade. Manf. Silk, linen, hosiery, and leather. There are four large annual fairs. Pop. 10,000.

BOUCHAIN, bou-shai(h)n', a town of France, department of Nord, 12 miles S.E. of Douai, on both sides of the Scheldt. It is fortified, and has means of inundating the adjacent country, in case of an attack. Manf. Beetroot sugar and salt. Pop. 1,100.—The town was taken by the Duke of Marlborough in 1711, and recaptured by the French in 1712. It was ceded to France in 1713 by the Treaty of Utrecht.

BOUCHER, FRANCIS, boo-shair, French painter, famous for amorous, mythological, and pastoral subjects, "the Anacreon of painting." He was principal painter to Louis XV., and director of the French Academy.

Born at Paris, 1704; died 1770.

BOUCHES-DU-RHONE, a department of France, situated at the mouths of the Rhone. About one half only is under cultivation, there being considerable tracts of heaths, forests, and waste lands. Ranges of hills: The south-western termination of the Alpine ranges traverse the department, attaining in some parts an elevation of 3,400 feet. The principal river is the Rhone, which, near Arles, divides into two branches, forming the Isle of Camargue. The Durance, Toulobre, Are, and Huveaune, are smaller streams. The soil, with the exception of a few alluvial spots, is generally unproductive.

Prod.—Vines, almonds, figs, capers, and nuts; the laurel and myrtle, and many odoriferous plants, grow freely.

Min.—Coal, limestone, marble, alabaster, and gypsum, but not in large quantities.

Area.—1979 square miles.

Pop.—589,028.

Chief Towns.—MARSEILLES, LA VIGNOLE, ARLES, MARTIGUE, PORT DE BOUC, PONTEAU, CASSIS, and LA CIOTAT.

BOUCHIER, THOMAS, boo'-sheer, an archbishop of Canterbury, who is said to have introduced the art of printing into England in 1464, by bringing over a compositor from Haarlem, at his own expense. This is a matter of dispute.

Died 1486.

BOUFFLERS, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, Duc de, boof'-flai', a marshal of France, who early in life entered the army, and in 1669 became colonel of a regiment of dragoons, and distinguished himself in several actions under the gallant Turenne. In 1708, after the battle of Oudenarde, he defended Lisle against Prince Eugene, for which he was created a peer. At the battle of Malplaquet, he effected his retreat without losing any of his artillery or soldiers. This was his last public achievement.

Born 1644; died at Fontainebleau, 1711.

BOUGAINVILLE, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, boo'-gain-vil, French navigator. In 1756 he distinguished himself in Canada as aide-de-camp to the Marquis of Montcalm, and afterwards served in Germany. Between 1766 and 1769 he performed a voyage round the world, the first accomplished by a French navigator. He afterwards served in the French navy in the American war, and in 1780 was made a marshal of the army. He retired at the outbreak of the Revolution.

Born at Paris, 1729; died 1811.

BOUGAINVILLE BAY, Patagonia, on the north side of the Strait of Magellan, named after the preceding. Lat. 53° 25′ S. Lon. 70° 13′ W.

BOUGAINVILLE ISLAND, one of the Solomon group in the South Pacific. Lat. between 5° 30′ and 7° S. Lon. 155° E.

BOUGAINVILLE STRAIT, between the islands of Mallicollo and Espiritu Santo, and the New Hebrides, in the Antarctic Regions.

BOUGUER, boo'-goo-air, French mathematician and natural philosopher, author of treatises of great value on optics, light, the figure of the earth, and other scientific subjects. In 1735 he was sent to South America to measure a degree of the equator.

Born at Croisic, 1698; died 1758.

BOUILLÉ, FRANÇOIS CLAUDE AMOUR, Marquis de, boo'-yai, French general, who greatly distinguished himself against the English in the West Indies, his humanity and generosity being as marked as his courage and skill, and gaining him the respect of his opponents, shown by the manner in which he was received in this country on the occasion of a visit in 1784. He was a member of the Assembly of Notables, and in 1790 appointed commander of the army of the Meuse. He left France in consequence of having assisted the king in an attempt to escape. In 1791 he entered the service of Gustavus III. of Sweden. He afterwards resided in England. He was the author of a useful history of the French Revolution.

Born in Auvergne, 1739; died in London, 1800.

BOUILLON, boo'-ee-yawng, the chief town of a duchy of the same name, in Belgium, 50 miles from Namur. It is small, but neatly built, and has a castle. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 2,800.

BOUILLON. (See GODFREY OF BOUILLON.)

BOULAY DE LA MEURTHE, ANTOINE JACQUES CLAUDE JOSEPH, Count, boo'-lai-de-la-muhrthe, a moderate member of the Council of Five Hundred in the first French Revolution. Under Napoleon he was made president of the legislative section of the Council of State, and greatly assisted in the preparation of the famous Code. The emperor gave him the title of count. In 1815 he went to Germany, but returned to France in 1819, and lived in retirement. He was the author of an essay on the English Commonwealth, which had a great influence in preparing the way for Napoleon's assumption of supreme power. He also wrote a work on English history during the reigns of Charles II. and James II.

Born in the Vosges, 1761; died at Paris, 1840.

BOULAY, a town of Germany, in Lorraine, on the right bank of the Nied, 15 miles N.E. of Metz. There is a large market-place. Manf. Cloth, blankets, cotton yarn, leather, and hardware. Pop. 2,900

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER, boo'-loyne, an old seaport town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, at the mouth of the Liaune, 19 miles S.S.W. of Calais. The town is divided into Upper and Lower. The latter lies on the shore, and is better built, and considerably more populous, than the other, which, at a short distance, stands on an eminence, and was once fortified, but the ramparts have been converted into public promenades. In the upper town are the cathedral, the town hall, and other public buildings. In the lower town are the museum, theatre, gallery of art, hospital and several churches. There are large baths, and the fine sands afford great facilities for sea bathing. The inhabitants of Boulogne carry on an active trade in fresh and salt fish, especially herrings and mackerel, which are caught in great numbers off the coast; also in coal, salt, fresh and salted butter, soap, and earthenware. The harbour is large enough to admit large merchant vessels at high water; and there is a long pier. There are generally so many English visitors that the town has almost an English aspect. Manf. Linen, sailcloth, and cordage. Pop. 43,954. Lat. 50° 45′ N. Lon. 1° 36′ E.—There are lines of steamers to Folkestone and London, and direct communication with Paris by railway. A lofty monument marks the site of the great camp formed by Napoleon in 1804 in preparation for his proposed invasion of England.

BOULOGNE, a town of France on the Seine, about 4 miles from Paris. Pop. nearly 8,000. (See PARIS.)

BOULTON, MATTHEW, bold'-ton, an inventor and improver in the mechanical arts. In 1769 he entered into communication with Watt, the improver of the steam-engine; after which the Soho Works, near Birmingham, became famous for the mechanical skill displayed in the construction of its steam-engines. His coining-machinery was a triumph of its kind, and he, in conjunction with his partner, Watt, greatly contributed to give an impetus to British industry. Boulton was of a generous and ardent disposition, and is said to have expended 47,000*l.* in experiments on the steam-engine, before Watt had so far perfected it as to bring any return of profit. It has recently been proved that he to a great extent anticipated the discovery of photography.

Born at Birmingham, 1728; died 1809.

BOU-MAZA, boo'-ma'-za, an Arab chief, whose real name was Si Mahomet ben Abdallah. Like Abd-el-Kader, he acquired in early life a saintly reputation, and declaring himself invulnerable, promised heaven and riches to all who assisted in the expulsion of the French from Africa. In 1845, in connection with Abd-el-Kader, he obtained several advantages over the generals of France, but was subsequently, in 1846, defeated by Colonel (afterwards Marshal) St. Arnaud. Ultimately, on 10th January, 1847, General Herbillon completely routed his forces, and he surrendered in the following April to St. Arnaud. Brought to France, he had a handsome residence assigned to him in Paris, with a pension of 15,000 francs. In 1854 he quitted the French soil, commanded, during the Russian war, a body of Bashi-Bazouks, and was made a colonel in the Turkish service. (See ABD-EL-KADER.)

Born about 1820.

BOURBON, boor'-bawhn, a famous Royal family of Europe, descended from Hugh Capet, who founded the third French dynasty in 987. The Bourbons may now be considered as divided into five branches—1, the elder line, which has given eight kings to France; 2, the Orleans branch, descended from the brother of Louis XVI.; 3, the Bourbons of Spain, descended from Louis XIV. of France; 4, the Bourbons of Italy, descended from Philip V. of Spain; 5, the Bourbons of the ducal line of Parma, also descended from Philip V. of Spain.

BOURBON, CHARLES, Duc du BOURBONNAIS, constable of France, was the son of Gilbert, count of Montpensier. He distinguished himself at the famous battle of Marignan, in 1516, but soon after fell into disgrace, through the enmity of the mother of Francis I., whose offer of marriage he had rejected. On this he associated with Charles V. and Henry VIII. of England against his sovereign. The plot, however, was discovered, and he escaped into Italy, where he became lieutenant-general to the emperor Charles, and afterwards his commander-in-chief. He captured Francis at the battle of Pavia. Resolved to have a dominion of his own, he gathered a large irregular force and attacked Rome, being shot while attempting to scale the walls.

Born 1489; died 1527.

BOURBON, or BOURBON VENDÉE, a French town, capital of the department of Vendée, pleasantly situated on the right bank of the Yon. The public buildings are very handsome. It was named Napoleonville, until the fall of the first empire. Pop. 5,200.

BOURBON, or REUNION, an island in the Indian Ocean, about 400 miles east of Madagascar. The island, which is 45 miles long and 33 broad, is composed of two mountains; the smallest is the southern one, which is an active volcano. A great part of the surface of the island is a complete volcanic desert, destitute of every kind of vegetation. In other parts, however, the soil is fertile, the air pure, the climate delicious, and the sky always beautiful. Its volcanic peaks range from 7,218 to 10,100 feet above the level of the sea.

Pro.—Coffee, tobacco, sugar, rice, and cloves. The forests contain wood fit for shipbuilding; also aloe, ebony, palm, with a variety of trees that afford odoriferous gums and resins. Though earthquakes are unknown, the island is subject to violent hurricanes, which injure the crops, often throw down houses, root up trees, and occasion the destruction of shipping.

Towns.—ST. DENIS is the principal and capital.

Pop. about 170,518, inclusive of the inhabitants of some small neighbouring islands.

Lat. 20° S. Lon. 55° 30′ E.

History.—This island was, in 1545, discovered by the Portuguese, and in 1810 was occupied by the English, and restored to France in 1814. It is the only settlement now possessed by the French between Africa and India.

BOURBONNAIS, boor'-bawhn-ai, a rich district in the centre of France, formerly the duchy of Bourbon. (See ALLIER and CHER.)

BOURBONNE-LES-BAINS, boor'-bon-lai-baihn', a town of France, department of Haute-Marne, much resorted to for the hot saline springs. It is situated at the junction of the Borne and Aspance. Manf. Cotton, hosiery, and cutlery. Pop. 4,000.

BOURBOURG, boor'-boorg, an ancient town of France, department Nord, near the right bank of the Aar, 9 miles S.W. of Dunkirk. Manf. Lace, oil, and beer. Pop. 2,400.

BOURDALOUE, LOUIS, boor-da-lou'-ai, French preacher, a Jesuit, and professor of great Bourges. He was earnest, dignified, and vigorous, and his eloquence produced a remarkable effect.

Born at Bourges, 1632; died at Paris, 1704.

BOURDEILLES, PETER DE. (See BRANTOME.)

BOURG-EN-BRESSE, boorg'-ang-bras, a French town, capital of the department of Ain, on the left bank of the Reyssouse. It is well built, and there are handsome public fountains in the streets. The church, built in the 16th century, is handsome. There are a good market-place, museum, and public library. Outside the town are a beautiful Gothic church and a large hospital. Manf. Linen, cotton, hosiery and leather. There is a large trade in grain, wine, horses, cattle, and leather. Pop. 13,700.

BOURGELAT, CLAUDE, boorje-la', veterinary surgeon, the first to adopt it as a distinct profession. He was by profession a lawyer, but his love for horses led him to devote himself to the study of their diseases. He founded a school at Lyons, which was resorted to by students from all parts of Europe.

Born at Lyons, 1712; died 1799.

BOURGES, boorj, a large but ill-built town of France, in the department of Cher, 123 miles from Paris. It stands on a rising ground, between the rivers Eure and Auron, which here unite their streams. The only public buildings of note are the fine Gothic cathedral, and the great tower, formerly used as a state prison. It was formerly fortified, but the ramparts have been converted into promenades. Manf. Silk, woollen, and cotton stuffs, stockings, caps, and other articles of clothing. The chief articles of trade are corn, wine, cattle, wool, hemp, and cloth. Pop. 29,000.—This town in the time of Cæsar, was one of the strongest cities of Gaul. It was the birthplace of Louis XI.

BOURGOIN, boor'g-o-ahn, a town of France, department Isère, on the Bourbre. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and silk. There is a good trade in flour. Pop. 3,340.

BOURIGNON, ANTOINETTE, a religious visionary. She was the daughter of a merchant of Lille. Early in life she professed to see visions, and to receive special revelations. Having entered a convent, she gained over the nuns to a belief in her, and afterwards travelled through various countries making proselytes, settling down at last as head of a hospital in East Friesland. She was almost as remarkable for personal ugliness as for her spiritual pretensions. After her death Bourignianism, as her mystical teaching was named, spread rapidly, especially in Scotland, where a solemn renunciation of it is still required of every candidate for the ministry of the Established Church.

Born at Lille, 1616; died at Franeker, in Friesland, 1680.

BOURMONT, LOUIS AUGUSTE VICTOR DE CHAISNE, Marshal Count de, boor'-mawng, a French general, who, at the age of 15, entered the army, and fought with the Royalists in La Vendée, but under the empire of Napoleon I. rose to be one of his generals. On the fall of the emperor, he attached himself to the Bourbons, and in 1830 was appointed to the command of the army which was to reduce Algeria under the power of France. For his services he was made a marshal, but, the Revolution of 1830 breaking out, he was superseded in his command. After this he retired from public life, living in exile in Germany, Holland, and England, as his inclination led him, in 1833 he commanded the troops of Don Miguel, of Portugal. He afterwards retired to France, and settled on his estate in Anjou, where he lived in strict retirement to the time of his death.

Born 1773; died in 1846.

BOURNE, VINCENT, born, an English poet, usher of Westminster School, whose effusions show a classical taste and a fertile imagination. His Latin versification is unsurpassed for elegance.

Born about 1696; died 1747.

BOURNE, a town in Lincolnshire, 33 miles S. of Lincoln. The church is large and old. A trade is carried on in wool and corn. Pop. 3,098. A station on the Great Northern Railway.

BOURRIENNE, LOUIS ANTOINE FAUVELET DE, boor'-re-en, in his ninth year entered the military school of Brienne, where he became acquainted with the future emperor, Napoleon I., of France. From being schoolfellows they became acquaintances, and from acquaintances friends. Bourrienne was being educated for the French artillery, but was forced to relinquish the military profession when he found that he could not hold a commission in the French army unless he could give proofs of being of noble lineage. Directing his ambition into another channel, in his twentieth year he was attached to the embassy of the Marquis de Noailles, ambassador of Louis XVI. at the court of the emperor Joseph of Austria. In 1792 he returned to Paris, after two years of the study of international law at Warsaw, and a short stay at the Polish court of King Poniatowski. Napoleon was in Paris at this time, and the friendship of the two schoolfellows was renewed. The fortunes of neither of them were very bright, and they used to share the purses of each other, and wander about the streets of Paris without employment. On the fall of the Bourbons and the rise of Napoleon, Bourrienne became his private secretary, a post which he held from 1796 to 1802, when he was dismissed for some scandalous connection with the house of Coulon, the army contractors. In 1805 he was appointed chargé d'affaires of France for the circle of Lower Saxony, in which office he was charged with peculation, and forced to refund a million of francs. On the fall of Napoleon he attached himself to the Bourbon dynasty, and became a deputy for the department of Yonne in the representative chamber. In 1828 he was compelled to seek refuge from his creditors in Belgium, where he commenced writing his Memoirs of the emperor. This work was published in ten volumes in the course of 1829-30, and created an immense sensation. This was the greatest act of his life. The revolution of 1830 unsettled his reason, when he was put into a hospital for the insane in Caen, Normandy, where he ended his days.

Born at Sens, 1769; died 1834.

BOU SADA, or BU-SAADA, boo-sah-da, a town of Algeria, 160 miles S.W. of Constantine. There are five mosques. Manf. Arms and silk. Pop. 3,600.

BOUSSA, boos'-sa, a town of Soudan, Central Africa, on the Niger, east of Timbuctoo. Pop. estimated at 15,000. Lat. 10° 14′ N. Lon. 5° 20′ E.—Here Mungo Park, the traveller, was murdered.

BOUSSOLE STRAIT, boos'-sole, unites the Sea of Okhotsk with the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 46° 30′ N. Lon. 150° 20′ E.

BOUSSU, boos-soo', a town of Belgium, province of Hainault. There is a fine old castle. There are coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 3,300.

BOUTERWEK, FREDERICK, boo-ter-vek, German writer on philosophy and æsthetics, professor of philosophy at Göttingen. His most famous work is a history of modern poetry and eloquence.

Born near Goslar, 1766; died at Göttingen, 1828.

BOUVET, JOACHIM, boo'-vai, a French Jesuit, who laboured as a missionary in China for fifty years, and who presented to the king of France many valuable Chinese books. He wrote an interesting account of his travels.

Died at Pekin, 1732.

BOVINO, bo-vée-no, an Italian town, 20 miles S.W. of Foggia. It is fortified, and has a cathedral. Pop. 5,700.

BOWDICH, THOMAS EDWARD, bow'-dich, an English traveller and African explorer. He was the son of a Bristol merchant, and was for a short time a partner in his father's house. In 1814, he embarked for Cape Coast Castle, where his uncle was governor of the settlements belonging to the African Company. Returning to England in 1816, he was appointed the chief of a mission to the king of the Ashantees. The embassy was quite successful, and in 1819 he published an account of it, with the title "A Mission to Ashantee." He then went to Paris, where he resided about eighteen months, engaged in the study of natural science. In 1822, after having published several works, by which he made some money, he undertook another voyage to Africa, with the view of exploring that continent. He reached, with his wife, the mouths of the Gambia, and there being seized with fever, died.

Born at Bristol, 1790; died 1824.

BOWDITCH ISLAND, bo'-ditch, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, 8 miles long and 4 broad. Pop. 600. Lat. 5° 23′ S. Lon. 141° 12′ W. The American exploring expedition discovered this island in 1841.

BOWLES, WILLIAM LISLE, Rev., boles, poet, was educated at Winchester and Oxford, and received several preferments in the Church. In 1828 he became prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral. He is distinguished in the annals of literature, not only by a great many excellent publications, but by the "Pope and Bowles Controversy," which lasted from 1819 to 1828. This controversy originated in a proposition which Mr. Bowles thus laid down in his "Essay on the Poetical Character of Pope:"—"All images drawn from what is beautiful or sublime in nature are more beautiful and sublime than images drawn from art, and are therefore more poetical; and in like manner, the passions of the human heart, which belong to nature in general, are, per se, more adapted to the higher species of poetry than those which are derived from incidental and transient manners." Both Byron and Campbell entered the lists against him. He published a collection of sonnets, and several lengthy poems, and a life of Bishop Ker.

Born at King's Sutton, Northamptonshire, 1762; died at Salisbury, in 1850.

BOWRING, SIR JOHN, bow'-ring, a various and voluminous writer, who distinguished himself in the paths of philology, politics, poetry, and as a translator and reviewer. His knowledge of the principal European languages was not only extensive but accurate, which is proved by his translations from the poetry of different nations. These comprise "Specimens of the Russian Poets," "Batavian Anthology," "Specimens of the Polish Poets," "Ancient Poetry and Romances of Spain," "Specimens of the Magyars," and "Christian Anthology." In 1825 he was appointed to the editorship of the "Westminster Review," in which the principles of Jeremy Bentham received a large share of his exposition. The University of Groningen conferred on him the title of Doctor of Laws. In 1834-5 he was sent as a commissioner to France, to report on the actual state of commerce between that country and Great Britain. He also visited Switzerland, Italy, and Syria, studying their commercial relations, and reporting upon them to Parliament. In 1835 he became a member of the House of Commons, in which he sat till 1837. In 1841 he was again elected, and kept his seat till 1849. Between 1838 and 1839 he produced a complete edition of the works of Jeremy Bentham, edited by himself, and published at Edinburgh, in 11 volumes. In 1849 he was appointed British consul at Hong-Kong, and superintendent of trade in China. In 1853 he returned to London, and published his "Decimal System," and in 1854 was knighted and appointed governor of Hong-Kong. In November, 1856, in consequence of acts of hostility against the British, he ordered Admiral Seymour to bombard the city of Canton, and thus commenced the war with China, which ended in the treaty of Tien-tsin. He retired on a pension in 1859; but in 1861 was sent by Government to Italy to report on our commercial relations with that country.

Born at Exeter, 1792; died 1872.

BOWYER, WILLIAM, bo'-yer, an eminent printer and classical scholar. Both his father and grandfather were printers; so that the noble art may be said to have become hereditary in his family. In 1716 he was admitted a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he remained till 1722. From this period he commenced contributing to various learned works in the way of corrections, annotations, prefaces, &c., whilst, at the same time, he superintended his printing business. In 1763, his celebrated edition of the Greek Testament, with conjectural emendations appeared. This work has been much commended and been translated into German. It is, however, as an erudite and critically accurate printer of the works of others that Bowyer is celebrated. His bust in marble, with a portrait of his father, is to be seen in Stationers' Hall.

Born in London, 1699; died 1777.

BOXTEL, box-tel, a town of Holland, in the province of North Brabant, on the Dommel, which intersects the streets, 6 miles S. of Bois-le-Duc. Manf. Chiefly very beautiful diapers. Pop. 4,000. —In 1794, the Anglo-Dutch army, under the command of the Duke of York, was defeated here by the French.

BOYACA, bo-ya'-ka, one of the federated States of Colombia, S. America, including the whole of the E. Andes. It is watered by the Magdalena, Sogamozo, Zulia, Cazanare, and Metor, and produces coffee, cotton, indigo, tobacco, caiva, and wheat. Pop. 702,000.—The chief town is Tunja, 70 miles N.N.E. of Bogota.

BOYCE, WILLIAM, boice, musical composer. He wrote operatic and other secular music, but his fame rests on his ecclesiastical compositions. For a great part of his life he was afflicted with almost complete deafness. In 1749 he received the degree of Doctor of Music from the University of Cambridge, and in 1755 was appointed master of the king's band.

Born in London, 1711; died 1779.

BOYD, ROBERT, Lord, boid, a Scotch nobleman, was the son of Sir Thomas Boyd, of Kilmarnock, who was killed in 1439, in revenge for having murdered Lord Darnley. The son acquired great popularity with King James II. and the people. The former created him a peer by the title of Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock. On the death of that monarch, in 1460, he was appointed justiciary of the kingdom, and one of the lords of the regency during the minority of James III. He and his family engrossed almost all the public offices to themselves, and went so far as to carry off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, where Lord Boyd got himself declared sole regent. He also effected a marriage between the king's sister and his son, afterwards earl of Arran. In 1469 the king, at the instigation of some of his nobles, called a parliament to examine into the conduct of Boyd, who fled to England.

Died at Alnwick, 1470.

BOYD, ZACHARY, a Scotch divine, three times rector of the University of Glasgow, to which he bequeathed a valuable collection of books and manuscripts. He wrote many religious works in prose and verse, more remarkable for quaintness than for any other quality.

BOYD TOWN, a seaport of New South Wales, Australia, recently founded, but already much resorted to by shipping, and carrying on a good trade. Lat. 37° 10' S. Lon. 149° 57' E.

BOYDELL, JOHN, boi'-del, was brought up as a land-surveyor under his father; but seeing some landscapes which greatly pleased him, he apprenticed himself to an engraver. In 1745 he published some small landscapes for the use of learners, and the encouragement he received induced him to persevere in engraving and publishing. He also sought out English artists, to whom he was a liberal patron, particularly to Woollet. But Mr. Boydell did not confine himself to prints. He had the honour to establish an English school of historical painting, which received the name of the Shakspeare Gallery. He also presented to the corporation of London some fine pictures for the council-chamber in Guildhall. In 1791 he was made lord mayor. By the French revolution, and the consequent war, this worthy man experienced such losses as to be under the necessity of procuring an act of parliament for the disposal of the Shakspeare Gallery, and his pictures and prints, by way of lottery.

Born at Dorrington, 1719; died 1804.

BOYER, JEAN PIERRE, bwoi'-yai, a mulatto of Hayti, who was educated in France, and on his return, fought against the British, and at first assisted Christophe (see CHRISTOPHE), but afterwards aided in the establishment of an independent republic in the western part of the island. After the death of Christophe he united all the island under his presidency, and for 15 years ruled with considerable ability, but in 1843 was deposed by an insurrection of the negroes, and fled to Jamaica, and afterwards went to Paris.

Born at Port-au-Prince, 1776; died at Paris, 1850.

BOYLE, ROBERT, boil, the Hon., a learned writer and philosopher, the seventh son of Richard, first earl of Cork. He early devoted himself to the study of natural science; was frequently present at Oxford, where a philosophical society was held, which afterwards became the famous Royal Society, of which he was one of the earliest members. In 1654 he fixed his residence at that town, for the sake of enjoying the company of his learned friends. Here he remained till 1668, applying himself principally to experimental philosophy, and contriving a more perfect air-pump than that which had hitherto been in use. Natural philosophy, however, was not the only subject which engaged his attention at this period of his life. He cultivated an acquaintance with the learned languages, and devoted so much time to the study of theology and sacred criticism, that at the restoration of Charles II. he was pressed to enter into orders, with a view of being raised to the episcopacy. A natural diffidence, however, induced him to decline this and every other offer of preferment. He particularly exerted himself in advancing designs of charity and schemes of improvement. As a director of the East-India Company, he was the principal instrument in procuring their charter; for which he only required, as a return, that they would do something towards propagating Christianity in their settlements. With this view he caused to be printed at Oxford 500 copies of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles in the Malay tongue. He was also at the expense of printing, in Arabic, "Grotius de Veritate." In 1678 he declined the high honour of the presidency of the Royal Society. Three years afterwards he was engaged in promoting the propagation of the gospel among the Indians of North America. By his will he founded an annual lecture at St. Paul's, on the principal truths of natural and revealed religion.

Born at Lismore, Ireland, 1620; died 1692.

BOYLE, a town in Roscommon county, Ireland, on both sides of the river Boyle near its expansion into Lough Key, 8 miles N.N.W. of Carrick-on-Shannon. There are the remains of an abbey built in the 12th century. A large trade in corn and butter is carried on. Pop. 3,161.

BOYNE, boin, a river of Ireland, rising in the Bog of Allen, near Carbery, flowing through Kildare, King's county, Meath and Louth, and falling into the Irish Sea, four miles below Drogheda. On the banks of this river, 3 miles to the west of Drogheda, the "battle of the Boyne" was fought and won by William III. over the forces of James II., July 1, 1690.

BOZRAH, boz'-ra, 'tribulation,' a famous city of Idumea, on the frontiers of Edom and Moab.

BOZZARIS, MARCO, boz-za'-ris, Greek patriot, who distinguished himself by his devotion to his country in defending it against the Turks. He fell in the August of 1823, in a night attack upon a body of Albanians, who were advancing with a view of taking Missolonghi, which he had successfully defended for a considerable time. He was buried in Missolonghi with every mark of honour, when the Greek executive government issued a decree, in which they styled him the Leonidas of modern Greece.

BOZZOLI, bot-zo'-le, a town of Northern Italy, on the right bank of the Oglio, 16 miles S.S.W. of Mantua. There are remains of old fortifications. Manf. Silk-weaving. Pop. 4,500.

BRA, brah, a town in the province of Cuneo, Northern Italy, 25 miles S.E. of Coni. Manf. Metal castings and silk. There is a good trade in cattle, grain, and wine. Pop. 12,500.

BRABANT, DUCHY OF, bra-bant', (Fr. brab'-a), formerly one of the most important provinces of the Netherlands, but now divided into the provinces of Antwerp and South Brabant in Belgium, and North Brabant, which still forms a part of Holland. (See BELGIUM and HOLLAND.)

BRABANT, NORTH, a province of the Netherlands. It is a uniform level, without much fertility, bare of wood, and in some parts forming large marshes. It is watered by the Aa, Maese, Dommel, Donge, and Dintel. Pro. Wheat, rye, oats, lint, and fruit. Sheep and cattle rearing is the chief branch of rural industry. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton fabrics, earthenware, and leather. Area, 1,977 square miles. Pop. 491,023.

BRABANT, SOUTH, a province of Belgium, occupying a central position in that kingdom. It is hilly in the south, well watered, and fertile. The principal rivers are the Meuse in the north, and the Scheldt in the south, and the country is intersected by canals. Pro. Corn, hemp, flax, hops, and oil-seed. Cattle and sheep rearing is extensively pursued, and a considerable portion of the soil is occupied by wood. Minerals. Iron and stone. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen fabrics; lace, soap, leather, and chemicals. Area, 1,276 square miles. Pop. 880,000.

BRACCIO, ANDREA, brat'-che-o, count of Montone, Italian soldier of fortune, who was a very prominent figure in the Italian wars of the 14th century. In 1416 he attained supreme power at Perugia, and in the following year obtained for a short time possession of Rome. In 1420 he was appointed high constable of Naples, by Queen Joanna, who created him count of Foggia, and prince of Capua. He attempted to seize the crown of Naples, but was wounded at the siege of Aquila, and taken prisoner. He died three days afterwards.

Born at Perugia, 1368; died 1424.

BRACCIOLINI, FRANCIS, brat'-che-o-le'-na, an Italian poet, whose poem, entitled "La Croce Riaquistrata," published in 1605, is esteemed next to Tasso's "Jerusalem."

Born at Pistoia, 1566; died 1645.

BRADFORD, brad'-ford, a manufacturing town, and municipal and parliamentary borough, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles W. of Leeds. This is the principal seat of the woollen yarn manufactories of England. In its vicinity are both coal and iron-works, whilst it is connected with both the North and Irish Seas by means of the Leeds and Liverpool Canal. It has seventy churches and chapels; an academic establishment, called Airedale College, at Undercliffe; a free grammar school, a mechanics' institution, St. George's Hall (a splendid building, capable of accommodating 5,000 persons, erected in 1854), the Exchange (of which the first stone was laid by Lord Palmerston, in 1854), the town-hall (a splendid building, recently erected, in front of which is a statue of Cromwell) cloth-hall, court-house, a noble covered market, gaol, a dispensary, infirmary, and several other charitable institutions. The Victoria Hotel, adjoining the railway station, is a noble edifice, erected in 1867 at a cost of 130,000*l*. There are fine banks, and many of the warehouses are almost palatial in character. In the vicinity is Saltaire, the great seat of the alpaca manufacture, covering more than six acres, and the largest manufacturing establishment in England. Manf. Worsted yarns, alpacas, and cotton goods. Pop. 183,032. A station on the Great Northern, Midland, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western and Manchester, and Sheffield and Lincolnshire railways.

BRADFORD-ON-AVON, a market-town 6 miles S.S.E. of Bath, Wiltshire, divided by the river Avon. There are the remains of a monastery founded in the 7th century. Manf. Fine broadcloths, kerseymeres, and India-rubber. Pop. 4,871.

BRADFORD, a county in Pennsylvania, U.S. Area, 1,170 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing wheat, oats, potatoes, Indian corn, and butter. Minerals. Coal, iron, and sandstone. It has a number of different kinds of mills, driven by water-power. Pop. 58,541.

BRADLEY, JAMES, brad'-le, an eminent astronomer, who entered the Church, but, in 1721, becoming Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, he resigned his livings. In 1741 he succeeded Dr. Halley as astronomer-royal, and, at the same time, the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. In the fifth year of his office he addressed a letter to the earl of Macclesfield, on the apparent motion of the fixed stars, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Society. In 1748 he obtained a grant of 1,000*l.* to procure instruments for the Greenwich Observatory, and subsequently obtained a yearly pension of 250*l.* He was a careful observer, and Newton gave him the character of being the best astronomer in Europe. He left behind him in MS. a vast number of valuable observations, which were subsequently published, and which are computed at about 60,000 in number.

Born at Sherborne, Gloucestershire, 1692; died 1762.

BRADSHAW, JOHN, brad'-shaw, an eminent Puritan, who studied the law, and who, in 1649, was named "President of the High Court of Justice," which sat in judgment on Charles I. For discharging the duties of this office, the Parliament rewarded him with a present of Summer Hill, a seat of the earl of St. Alban's, the deanery house at Westminster, and 5,000*l.* to furnish it, and he was made President of the Council of State and Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He submitted reluctantly to the supremacy of Cromwell, and even engaged in plots against him. He was buried with great pomp in Westminster Abbey, but at the Restoration, his body, after being hung at Tyburn with the bodies of Cromwell and Ireton, was buried under the gallows.

Born 1586; died 1659.

BRADWARDINE, THOMAS, brad-ward'-ine, an English schoolman, who obtained the name of the "profound doctor." He was chaplain to Edward III., and in 1349 was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. He produced some erudite theological and mathematical works.

Born at Hartfield, in Sussex, about 1295; died at Lambeth, 1349.

BRADY, NICHOLAS, brā'-de, a divine and poet, who is well known by his version of the Psalms of David, which he executed in conjunction with Tate, the poet laureate. He was rector of Richmond and Clapham in Surrey.

Born at Bandon, Ireland, 1659; died 1726.

BRAGA, brā'-ga, a city of Portugal, capital of the province of Minho, 35 miles N.E. of Oporto. This place, which is surrounded by walls and defended by a castle, is the residence of the Primate of Portugal, and has a magnificent cathedral and palace. Manf. Linen, cutlery, jewellery, and fire-arms. Pop. 19,500. This is an ancient town, the Bracara Augusta of the Romans, and is supposed to have been founded by the Carthaginians.

BRAGANZA, or BRAGANCA, bra-gan'-sa, a city of Portugal, in the province of Tras-os-Montes, on the Fervença, 26 miles from Miranda. The city is surrounded by walls, and there are two ruined castles, one of which was the residence of the Dukes of Braganza. Manf. Silk and velvet. Pop. 5,600.

BRAGANZA, HOUSE OF, dates from the commencement of the 15th century, and is now represented in the reigning dynasty of the kingdom of Portugal. Its originator was a natural son of King John I., named Alfonso, who was, by his father, created duke of Bragança, and lord of Guimaraens. He married Beatrix, daughter and heiress of the count of Barcellos and Ouren, from which union sprang the dukes of Bragança. The present line ascended the Portuguese throne in 1640, when that people revolted against the yoke of Spain, and when the then duke of Bragança was proclaimed, and assumed the title of John IV. From that period the crown has continued in the same line. This family also gave an emperor to Brazil.

BRAGANCA, a seaport of Brazil, at the mouth of the Caite, which enters the Atlantic 100 miles E.S.E. of the Amazon. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 1° S. Lon. 47° 20′ W.

BRAGANCA, an inland city of Brazil, 200 miles west of Rio de Janeiro. Pop. 10,000.

BRAHAM, JOHN, brā'-ham, English vocalist. He first appeared in public at the age of 10, and afterwards studied in France and Italy. On his return he attained immense popularity as a tenor singer, and maintained his reputation in sacred, operatic, and ballad music. He composed several songs, which were greatly admired. He was of Jewish extraction, and his real name was Abrahams.

Born in London, 1777; died 1856.

BRAHE, TYCHO, brah-ai', a famous astronomer, descended from a noble Swedish family. He studied philosophy and rhetoric, with a view of making the law his profession. The solar eclipse, however, which happened whilst he was at the university of Copenhagen, in 1560, directed his attention to astronomy, to which he applied himself with the greatest assiduity, while professedly studying the law at Leipsic. In 1565 he returned home, and in a quarrel with a Danish nobleman lost his nose, which he supplied with an artificial one made of gold, so naturally formed and painted, that the defect was hardly to be perceived. About this time he ardently entered upon the study of chemistry, in hopes of finding the philosopher's stone. After this he travelled for some years, and on his return to Denmark, resided with his uncle, who furnished him with the means of making celestial observations; and here it was that, in 1573, he discovered a new star in the constellation Cassiopea. Shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of his relations by a marriage which was deemed imprudent on account of the humbleness of the connection; and the quarrel was so great, that the king was obliged to interfere to effect a reconciliation. At the command of his sovereign, Frederick II., he was somewhat reluctantly, on account of his rank, made to read lectures on astronomy at Copenhagen. The king, however, was so delighted with the pursuits of Brahe, that he gave him the isle of Hven or Hoene, where, in 1576, he laid the foundation of an observatory, to which he gave the name of Uraniburg, or the City of the Heavens. Besides this he had an observatory sunk in the ground, to which he gave the name of Stelberg, or the City of the Stars. The king added to the donation a pension and some lucrative places. In this situation he resided about twenty years; but on the death of the king he lost his pension, and in 1597, in the time of Christian IV., he was driven from his country by the united influences of ignorance, envy, and detraction. The emperor, Rudolph II., pressed him to come to his dominions, and in 1601 he settled at Prague, with a pension of 3,000 ducats. In 1600 he was joined by the celebrated Kepler, and these illustrious men pursued their studies together until the death of Tycho. He was a man of great genius, but superstitious, being addicted to judicial astrology and attentive to omens. His works show him to have been an accurate observer. The "Rudolphine Tables" and the "Historia Cœlestis" are the best.

Born at Knudsthorp, Denmark, 1546; died at Prague, 1601.

BRAHILOV, or IBRAIL, bra-e-lof', a fortified seaport town of Wallachia, on the left bank of the Danube, 14 miles S. of Galatz. It is the chief shipping port of the principality, and large quantities of grain, seed, timber, spirits, and petroleum are exported. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 45° 15' N. Lon. 27° 54' E.

BRAHMAPUTRA or BRAHMAPOOTRA, brá'-ma-poo'-tra, a river of Asia, rising in Tibet, in the eastern part of the Himalayas, about lat. 28° 30' N., and lon. 97° 20' E., and after a course of about 200 miles uniting in Assam with the Sanpoo, a larger river coming from the north-west. The former stream is for a considerable distance the boundary between British India and Tibet. About 90 miles from the sea the Brahmapootra unites with the Ganges. Area, 21,414 sq. miles. Pop. 2,249,185.

BRAIDWOOD, a township of New South Wales, Australia, 186 miles S.S.W. of Sydney. It is a thriving town, the centre of the southern goldfields. Pop. 1,200.

BRAINTREE, a market-town of Essex, on the river Braine, 49 miles N.E. of London. There are a good corn exchange and mechanics' institute. St. Michael's church, a large edifice in the Perpendicular and Early English styles, has been recently restored. Manf. Silk and crape. Pop. of town about 5,182. A station on the Great Eastern railway.

BRAMAH, JOSEPH, brá'-ma, the son of a Yorkshire farmer, who, from being a carpenter and joiner, went to London, and adopted the profession of engineer and machinist. In 1784 he patented the lock which goes by his name, and which is considered one of the most ingenious that has ever been invented. He also made numerous improvements in pumps, fire-engines, water-cocks, and the hydrostatic press. His inventions in connection with this last he patented in 1796. His whole life was directed to mechanical improvements, and his last patent was obtained for discovering a mode of preventing dry-rot in timber, by covering it with a thin coating of Parker's Roman cement.

Born at Flamborough, in Yorkshire, 1749; died in 1814.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, DONATO LAZZARI, bra-man'-ta, a celebrated Italian architect, who executed several great works for the popes Alexander VI. and Julius II. His fame, however, rests on his being the first architect of St. Peter's, at Rome, of which magnificent cathedral he drew the plans, and laid the foundations in 1506, but did not live to see it completed, leaving the execution of it at his death to Michael Angelo Buonarotti.

Born in the duchy of Urbino, in 1444; died at Rome, 1514.

Died about 1530.

BRAMBANAN, bram-ba-nan', a district of Java, in the province of Soora Karta. It is famous for the remains of magnificent Brahminical temples, of which there are nearly 300.

BRAMPTON, bramp'-ton, an old town in Cumberland, 8 miles N.N.E. of Carlisle. Manf. Cotton goods. There are coal-mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,617.

BRAN, bran, the son of Llyr, and father of Caradog, or Caractacus, king of Britain, is classed with Prydain and Dynwall, as having consolidated the form of elective monarchy in Britain. When his son was delivered up to the Romans, Bran and his family were carried to Rome, where they embraced the Christian religion, and at their return introduced it among their countrymen.

Died about 80.

BRANDENBURG, bran-den-boorg, province of Prussia, including the districts of Berlin, Potsdam, and Frankfort. The surface of the county is generally flat, with a sandy soil, and comparatively unfruitful.

Rivers.—The Elbe and the Oder, which are connected by canals; the Spree and the Havel.

Pro.—Buckwheat, rye, hemp, flax, tobacco, hops, and potatoes.

Minerals.—Iron, alum, gypsum, and vitriol.

Manf.—Silk, cotton, wool, linen, sugar, leather, paper, and metals.

Area.—15,505 square miles.

Chief Towns.—BERLIN, POTSDAM, BRANDENBURG, and FRANKFORT.

Pop.—3,389,155.

(See PRUSSIA.)

BRANDENBURG, an old town of the above province, on the Havel, which divides it into the old and new towns, and a third portion is on an island in the river. There are an old cathedral and a castle, 37 miles S.S.W. of Berlin. Manf. Cloth and fustian, woven and knitted stockings, linen, hosiery, and paper; and there are breweries, tanneries, and a boat-building yard. Pop. 26,000.

BRANDENBURG, MARK OF, an old state of Germany, now comprised in the Prussian province of Brandenburg. (See PRUSSIA.)

BRANDENBURG, NEW, a handsome walled town of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, 18 miles from Strelitz. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, damasks, leather, paper, and chemicals. Pop. 7,300.

BRANDON, bran'-don, a town of Suffolk, on the Lesser Ouse, 78 miles N.N.E. of London. It has a trade in corn, malt, coals, and timber, and there are large rabbit-warrens in the neighbourhood. Pop. 10,850. A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

BRANDON, CHARLES. (See SUFFOLK, Duke of.)

BRANDT, SEBASTIAN, brant, a German poet and Imperial counsellor, who wrote a number of works, the most celebrated of which is the "Ship of Fools," a burlesque poem, in which he satirises the writings of his age. It met with great success, and found translators in several countries. (See BARCLAY, Alexander.)

Born at Strasburg, 1458; died 1520.

BRANDT, NICHOLAS, a Hamburg chemist, who, in 1669, accidentally discovered phosphorus whilst making experiments in search of gold. He received a pension from the elector of Hanover.

Died about 1692.

BRANDIS, CHRISTIAN AUGUSTUS, bran'-dis, a German scholar, professor of philosophy at Bonn. He spent years in editing a critical edition of the works of Aristotle. In 1847 he went to Greece, where he was appointed cabinet councillor. He wrote a work on the Greek and Roman philosophy, and other books, displaying great scholarship.

Born at Hildesheim, 1790; died 1867.

BRANTOME, PIERRE DE BOURDEILLES, SEIGNEUR DE, brahn'-tome, French memoir writer and chronicler, an amusing, witty, and elegant writer. He travelled as chamberlain to Charles IX. and Henry III., and saw military service in Barbary and Malta.

Born at Périgord, 1527; died at Richemonte, 1614.

BRANTOME, a town in France, department Dordogne. An old abbey, said to have been founded by Charlemagne, still exists, and annexed to it is a remarkable old church. Manf. Woollen stuffs and leather. There are dyeworks, and a large trade is done in the export of truffles. Pop. 1,400.

BRASIDAS, bras'-i-das, a Spartan general, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and in 426 B.C. made himself master of Amphipolis. He was killed in a battle with Cleon, the Athenian general, who was endeavouring to retake that place. His memory was especially honoured by yearly sacrifices and games. Thucydides and Plato speak of him in the highest terms.

BRANDYWINE CREEK, bran'-de-wine, a river of the United States, rising in Pennsylvania, and falling into Christiana Creek, at Wilmington. —At Chadd's Fort, on this river, a determined battle was fought on September 11th, 1777, between the British and American forces, when the former gained a complete victory.

BRATSLAV, brats'-laf, a Russian town, government of Podolia, on the Bug. It is fortified and has been several times besieged. Pop. 2,600.

BRAUNA, broun-a, a fortified town of Austria, at the confluence of the Salza and the Inn. There are an old Gothic church, a town-hall, and arsenal. Manf. Cloth, paper, and beer. Pop. 2,000.

BRAUNSBERG, brouns'-bairg', a walled town of Prussia, in the government of Konigsberg, on the Passarage, 35 miles from Konigsberg. Manf. Woollen and linen; a considerable trade is done in yarn, grain, and timber. Pop. 10,500.

BRAVA, bra'-va, an island of Africa. (See CAPE VERD ISLANDS.)

BRAVA, a town of East Africa, on the Zanzibar coast. A large trade is carried on with India and Arabia. Lat. 1° 7′ N. Lon. 44° E.

BRAVO DEL NORTE, bravo-del-nórté. (See RIO GRANDE.)

BRAVO MURILLO, DON JUAN, bra-vo moo-reel'-yo, a modern Spanish statesman, who has been an active participator in the numerous changes in the government of his country. He held office in 1836 under the Isturitz ministry, and in 1840 was compromised in a conspiracy formed against the regent Espartero, being obliged to take refuge in France for three years. In 1847 he was minister of justice under the duke of Sotomayor, and afterwards served under Narvaez, as minister of commerce, public works, and finance. When that minister resigned, in 1850, Bravo Murillo remained at the head of affairs; but just as he seemed all-powerful, he, in 1852, lost the favour of the queen, and fell. He was a Conservative, opposing all reform.

Born 1803.

BRAY, SIR REGINALD, brai, an eminent statesman, who assisted in placing Henry VII. upon the throne, and with whom he was in great favour. Besides being a politician, he possessed a genius for architecture, as Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster, and St. George's chapel at Windsor, were built under his direction.

BRAY, a maritime town of Ireland, 12 miles S.E. of Dublin, on both sides of the river Bray which here divides the counties of Dublin an Wicklow. A new parish church has been erected, and there are Roman Catholic and other places of worship. A broad esplanade has been formed, and there are two large new hotels, and there is a large trade in brewing and malting. Pop. 6,535. A station on the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway. The scenery in the neighbourhood of this town is remarkably fine.

BRAZIL, bra-zil, an immense empire of South America, occupying nearly one-half of the continent. The greatest breadth from E. to W., near the 8th degree of S. latitude, from the boundary of Peru to Cape Augustin, is 2,630 miles; and the greatest length from N. to S. 2,540 miles. On the E. is the Atlantic Ocean; on the N. French, Dutch, and English Guiana, and Venezuela; on the W. and S.W. Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Paraguay, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay. The coast-line is upwards of 3,700 miles in length, and broken by few indentations, and generally low and marshy or sandy, but rising between lat. 22° and 27° S. to a considerable elevation. The chief capes or headlands are Capes Orange, Norte, and Magoray, on the northern coast, and, farther south, Capes St. Rogue, St. Augustine, Point St. Antonio, St. Thorne, and Fio. The principal bays, reckoning from the northern extremity of the empire, are Oyapok, Pinzon, St. Jose, St. Marcos, St. Salvador, Rio Janeiro, and Ilha Grande. Brazil may be viewed as divided into two kinds of country, an upland and a lowland, occupying nearly equal portions. The upland extends over the central and eastern part, and the lowland chiefly stretches along both sides of the river Amazon, occupying likewise a smaller portion of the shores and the south-west border of the country. Towards the interior the land rises by gentle gradations to the height of from 3,000 to 5,000 or 6,000 feet above the level of the sea; and in these temperate regions European fruits and grain are reared in abundance, while the intermediate valleys are found extremely favourable for the raising of sugar, coffee, and generally for all sorts of tropical produce. There are no mountains of very great elevation. The country is from N. to S. traversed by two parallel ranges, from which others diverge, and inclose extensive plains and low-lying tracts. In the province of Minas Geraes, the peak of Itambe attains an elevation of 8,426 feet above the level of the sea. The culminating points of the Serro de Espinhaco chain are Itacolami and Piedade, which respectively attain an elevation of 5,750 and 5,830 feet. The Serra dos Orgaos, or Organ Mountains, so called from the resemblance of their peaks to the tubes of an organ, reach their culminating point in the Morro dos Canados, which has an elevation of 4,476 feet. These are the loftiest peaks of the Brazilian mountains. The table-lands occupy more than half the empire, and have an elevation of from 2,000 to 2,500 feet; whilst the plains of Silvas, equal to six times the size of France, occupy the shores of the Amazon and its affluents, and afford provender to innumerable herds of wild animals.

Rivers.—Unequalled for number and extent in any other part of the globe. The AMAZON, the largest, though not the longest in the world, and its tributaries the Rio Francesco, Negro, and Madeira; the Branco, a tributary of the Rio Negro; the Tapajos, and Xinju; the Araguay, Maranhao, Paranahyba, and Toncantins; the Vazabarris, Itapicuru, Paraguassu, and the Belmonte; in the interior, the Uruguay, Yguazu, Tietaz, Para, Paraguay, and Parana, with many other streams of smaller dimensions meandering through the country. Many of the rivers are impeded by cataracts and shallows.

Lakes.—Comparatively few of great extent. The Lagoa dos Platos, in the province of Rio Grande Sao Pedro, is the largest, being 150 miles long, and 33 in its broadest part. There are some others of from 20 to 30 miles in length in the W. provinces, requiring no particular description.

Forests.—Immense. Humboldt says, "If the name of primeval forests can be given to any forests on the face of the earth, none can claim it perhaps so strictly as those that fill the connected basins of the Orinoco and the Amazon." All travellers concur in stating that the interior of Brazil forms in general a vast and impenetrable forest, the trees of which are closely interwoven with brushwood, and with innumerable shrubs and creeping plants, which cling round them to their summits, and which, being generally adorned with the most beautiful flowers, give a peculiar and rich appearance to the scenery. These forests also abound in the greatest varieties of useful and beautiful woods, well adapted for dyeing, for cabinet-work, or for ship-building. There are some of these which have the property of hardness in a superior degree, and others which are very heavy, and have a peculiar fragrance. Among them may be noticed the cocoa-nut, mahogany, logwood, rosewood, Brazil-wood, and the caoutchouc tree; all of which are found in abundance. The variety and the beauty of the flowers of this favoured land are not the least remarkable features in its vegetable productions. In some parts, the whole country is like a vast flower-garden, and almost overpowers the senses by the intensity of its loveliness.

Climate.—In the northern parts, and in the neighbourhood of the Amazon, great heat prevails: in the higher parts, and towards the south, the climate is more temperate, and even cold, the thermometer falling as low as 40°. On the whole, however, the climate is delightful.

Zoology.—The forests afford a haunt to innumerable apes, and other wild animals, such as the jaguar, the wolf, the saratu (which has the appearance of a fox, but is ferocious), the opossum, the sloth, the porcupine, the ounce, the tapir, the wild boar, the squirrel, rats; and several kinds of bats, vampires, and quanchrii, which in the night fasten on domestic animals and suck their blood. The birds of Brazil are of wonderful variety and beauty. The largest is the American ostrich, or emu. There are many varieties of eagles, hawks, and kites; besides toucans, parrots, woodpeckers, and humming-birds. Pigeons are caught by grain steeped in the juice of the mandioc-root, and the lakes in the south abound with water-fowl. Insects and reptiles are numerous in most parts; in the southern parts especially the serpents attain an enormous size. White ants are numerous and destructive, and the scorpions are of unusual size. Of domestic animals, immense herds of horses, sheep, goats, and pigs are reared; whilst the extensive thinly-wooded plains literally swarm with horned cattle, whose tallow, hides, and horns form the articles of a large export trade.

Pro.—The land in Brazil almost everywhere yields an abundant produce. Maize, beans, cassava-root, which is generally used as bread by all ranks, are very generally cultivated; also wheat and other European cerealia; cotton is extensively grown, and where the farmer has a sufficient supply of provisions, and has the means, he grows coffee, and prepares for cultivating and manufacturing sugar, manioc, cocoa, rice, tobacco, maize, bananas, ginger, yams, cloves, cinnamon, lemons, oranges, figs, and other kinds of fruits.

Minerals.—These are considerable, and comprise gold, silver, iron, diamonds, topazes, and other precious stones. Gold and diamonds, for which Brazil has been so long celebrated, abound in almost all the higher regions of the interior; and they are chiefly found in the beds of the mountain torrents, where the stream is most rapid. Through the country of Minas Geraes, which is one of the eastern provinces of Brazil, runs a ridge of mountains, in which those streams have their rise, which, running to the S.W., fall into the Parana, or, turning to the S.E., are carried by the Rio Francesco into the Atlantic. All those streams, more especially near their sources, have been found rich both in gold and diamonds; and almost all the towns in the interior were originally mining stations. On the river Cuiaba, about 1,000 miles into the interior, are situated the most western mining stations that are to be found in Brazil. Diamonds, however, have mostly been found in the beds of rivers. The largest was found in the Rio Abasté, in 1791: it weighed 138¾ carats. In the diamond mines about 20,000 negroes are employed. The district of Cerro do Frio, or of the Cold Mountains, in which the diamond-works are established, consists of a range of rugged mountains, which have a northerly and southerly direction, and are generally estimated to rise 4,000 or 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. The tract of country termed the diamond-ground extends about 50 miles from north to south, and about 25 from east to west.

Commercial Products.—The chief exports are raw cotton, unrefined sugar, coffee, hides, cabinet and dye-woods, drugs, gums, and diamonds.

Area, 3,275,326 square miles.

Pop. 12,000,000, of whom more than 1,500,000 are slaves, Brazil being the only country in America where slavery legally exists. A law for the gradual emancipation of the slave population passed the Senate and Congress in the session of 1871. The law, which received the imperial sanction on the 28th of September, 1871, taking effect from this date, enacts that children henceforth born of slave women shall be "considered of free condition." Such children are not to be actually free, however, but are bound to serve the owners of their mothers for the term of 21 years under the name of apprentices. The free population consists of Europeans or persons of European descent, mulattoes, native Brazilians, Indians, and mixed races. In the northern provinces the Indian element preponderates, while in Pernambuco, Bahia, Rio de Janeiro, and Minas the negroes are numerous. At the seaports, the chief part of the population is of European descent.

Provinces.—The empire is divided into 20 provinces:—Minas Geraes, Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, Pernambuco, San Paulo, Ceará, Maranhão, Parahyba, Pará, Alagôas, Rio Grande do Sul, Rio Grande do Norte, Sergipe, Goyaz, Pianhy, Santa Catharina, Matto Grosso, Paraná, Espirito Santo, and Amazonas. (See each province under proper heading.)

Chief Towns.—Rio de Janeiro (the capital), Bahia, Pernambuco, Para, Maranhao, and San Paolo.

Political Constitution.—The emperor is a constitutional monarch. The constitution bears date March 25, 1824. It establishes four powers in the state—the legislative, the executive, the judicial, and the "moderating" power, or the royal prerogative. The legislative power is vested, for the affairs of the empire, in a general legislative assembly, and for provincial affairs in the provincial assemblies. The general legislative assembly consists of two Houses, the Senate and the Congress. The members of both houses are elected by the people, but under different forms. Senators are chosen for life at electoral meetings, expressly convened, each of which has to nominate three candidates, leaving the choice between them to the sovereign or his ministers. The ministers are assisted by a council of state, consisting of twelve ordinary and twelve extraordinary members, all named by the emperor for life. At the head of each province is a president appointed by the central government. Each province has also its local parliament or provincial chamber, and a general council, called the legislative assembly of the province.

Religion.—The established religion of the empire is the Roman Catholic, but according to Article 5 of the constitution, all other religions are tolerated, "with their domestic or private form of worship, in buildings destined for this purpose, but without the exterior form of temples.' No person can be persecuted for religious acts or motives. The Roman Catholic clergy are maintained by the state; funds, however, are voted for the construction of chapels and for the subsistence of ministers of different religions. Brazil constitutes an ecclesiastical province, with a metropolitan archbishopric, the seat of which is at Bahia, 11 suffragan bishops, 12 vicars-general, and 1,297 curates. For the private instruction of the clergy there are 11 seminaries, in general subsidized by the state.

Education.—Public Education is divided into three distinct forms, or classes, namely, primary; secondary, or preparatory; and scientific, or superior. The primary instruction in the capital is under the charge of the General Assembly, and in the provinces under the Provincial Assemblies. According to the constitution it is gratuitous, and it "will become compulsory as soon as the government considers it opportune." Notwithstanding the efforts of the legislature in recent years for the spread of education, it is still in a very backward state, and the public schools were frequented in 1868 by only 107,483 pupils.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 800 miles of railway are open, and there are about 3,500 miles of telegraph lines.

History.—Brazil was discovered in 1500 by Pinçon, one of the companions of Columbus, and was subsequently taken possession of by Pedro Alvarez-Cobral, a Portuguese navigator; but it was not till about the year 1549 that the court of Portugal sent a governor to regulate and superintend the affairs of the new colony. The possession of Brazil was long contested by the Portuguese and the Dutch, the latter being, however, at last driven from the country. In 1808 King John VI., having been driven from Europe by Napoleon I., took up his residence in Brasil. Returning in 1821, Brazil was lost to Portugal; for in 1822 it declared itself an independent state, electing the son of John VI., Don Pedro, its emperor. In 1825 its independence was acknowledged by Portugal. In 1831 the throne was abdicated in favour of the emperor, Don Pedro II., who was then only in his sixth year, and who, in 1841, in his fifteenth year, was forced to do away with the regency and assume the reins of government. Under his sway Brazil has materially advanced in all the arts of civilization. In 1851, the war which had been carried on between Brazil and Buenos Ayres led to the fall of Rosas and the opening of the Parana. From 1865 till 1870, Brazil was engaged in an arduous and exhausting war with Paraguay.

BRAZOS DE DIOS, bra'-zos de(r) dé-os, one of the largest rivers of Texas, U.S., which rises in that state, and, after a course of 900 miles, falls into the Gulf of Mexico, 58 miles W.S.W. of Galveston.

BRAZZA, brat'-sa, an island in the Adriatic, belonging to Austria, opposite to Spalatro, in Dalmatia, from which it is separated by a channel 12 miles wide, which affords good anchorage. The island is about 25 miles long, and from 6 to 9 broad. It is mountainous, and produces corn, figs, almonds, oil, saffron, cheese, and wine. Great attention is paid to the rearing of bees and silkworms. The chief town is S. Pietro di Brazza. Pop. 14,100.

BREADALBANE. (See PERTHSHIRE.)

BRECHIN, brech'-in, royal and parliamentary burgh in Forfarshire, Scotland, on the side of a hill rising from the N. bank of the South Esk, which is here crossed by a good bridge of two arches, 8 miles west of Montrose. A bishop's see was founded at Brechin about the year 1150, and well endowed by King David I.; and there is an ancient cathedral, originally Gothic in style, but much disfigured by modern repairs and additions. A remarkable tower, of unknown origin, is near the cathedral. On a rock overhanging the river is Brechin Castle. Manf. Linen and paper. Pop. 10,499.

BRECKNOCK, or BRECON, brek'-nok, a county of S. Wales, bounded N. by Radnor, W. by Cardigan and Carmarthen, S. by Monmouth and Glamorgan, and E. by Hereford and Monmouth. Area, 719 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and about a third of the whole entirely waste and uncultivated. Rivers. Wye, Usk, Irvon, Tawe, and the Taaf. Minerals. Copper, lead, abundance of iron, and great quantities of coal and limestone. Manf. Woollen cloth, wool, worsted stockings, and iron; and there is a trade in timber, iron, cattle, sheep, swine, butter, and cheese. Pop. 57,735. In this county are Brecknock Beacon, which is the loftiest hill in S. Wales, being 2,862 feet, and Cradle Mountain, 2,545 feet above the level of the sea.

BRECKNOCK, or BRECON, brek'-on, the county-town of Brecknockshire, situate at the confluence of the rivers Uske and Honddu, or Hondey, 14 miles from Builth. It is irregularly built, consisting principally of three streets. There are three parish churches, St. John's (the priory church, restored in 1862), St. David's, and St. Mary's, within the precincts of the ancient wall, and several other places of worship, and a handsome town-hall. Christ's College was rebuilt in 1864, and there is an Independent College. A mineral spring was discovered in 1861, and a pump-room and baths have been erected. Manf. Chiefly cloth and cotton stockings. Pop. 6,291. A station on the London and North-Western, Midland, Cambrian, Mid Wales, Neath and Brecon, and Brecon and Merthyr Railways.

BREDA, brai'-da, a fortified town of North Brabant, Holland, on the Mark, near the influx of the Aa, having an easy communication with the sea, and 24 miles from Bois-le-Duc. It has a church with a spire 362 feet high, a town-hall, magnetic observatory, Latin school, and several Roman Catholic and Protestant places of worship. The town is of a triangular form, with a gate at each angle. Its natural position, being in the midst of a marsh, contributes materially to its defence; and the adjoining country can be laid under water by means of sluices which communicate with the Mark. It is further protected by a large castle, constructed by William, prince of Orange, afterwards William III. of England. Manf. Breda was in former times a commercial town, and had extensive cloth-manufactories; but there are now only a few manufactories of stockings, carpets, hats, musical instruments, and several breweries. Pop. 15,300. Before the revolt of the Netherlands against the matchless severity of Philip II. of Spain, this was a favourite residence of William I. of Orange. In 1566 Louis of Nassau and Count St. Aldegonde first proposed the famous league of the nobles, called "the Compromise of Breda," in this town; and Charles II. of England resided in it during part of his exile. Several congresses have sat here—in 1575, 1667, and 1746. That of 1667 led to the peace of Breda between England and Holland, by which the Dutch ceded to Great Britain, New York and New Jersey states, then called New Belgium.

BREDA, JAN VAN, Dutch painter, who resided several years in England, and was patronized by the king and nobility. In 1725 he was appointed director of the Academy of Antwerp. His pictures are much esteemed.

Born at Antwerp, 1683; died 1750.

BREE, MATTHÆUS IGNAZIUS VAN, brai'-a, a Flemish painter, who was employed by Napoleon, and who produced several historical works of great repute. He was director of the Academy of Fine Arts at Antwerp.

Born at Antwerp, 1773; died 1839.

BREDERODE, HENRY, Count, brai'-dai-rod, a Dutch patriot, who joined with the counts Egmont and Horn in opposing the tyranny of Cardinal Granvelle, the Spanish governor of the Netherlands. In 1566 he presented to Margaret of Parma, who had succeeded Granvelle, the famous "Request," which gave rise to the insurrection of the "Gueux" or "Beggars." Under the grinding oppression of the duke of Alva's administration in the Low Countries he retired to Germany.

Died 1598.

BREGENZ, brai'-gantz, an Austrian town in the Vorarlberg, 77 miles N.W. of Innspruck, beautifully situated near Lake Constance. There are an old and new town. Manf. Wooden framework and fittings for buildings, saltpetre and iron. There is a trade in corn, cattle, wine, fruit, and butter. Pop. 4,500. The town is the ancient Brigantium.

BREHAT, brai-ha', a small French island, off the coast of Brittany, separated by a channel a mile wide. It is three miles long, has three harbours, a lighthouse, and is fortified. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 48° 55′ N. Lon. 3° 5′ W.

BREISLAK, SCIPIO, brees-lak, Italian geologist, professor of mathematics at Ragusa and Rome, and appointed by Napoleon inspector of saltpetre and gunpowder works. His works on geology obtained for him a high reputation, and he was a member of the chief learned societies of Europe.

Born at Rome, 1768; died 1826.

BREMEN, brem'-en, a free city of Germany, and one of the states of the German empire. It stands on the Weser, 50 miles from its mouth. The state has an area of 176 square miles. The town is divided into the old town, which, with its suburbs, is on the right bank of the river, on the opposite side of which is the new town, communication being afforded by three bridges. The streets of the old town are narrow and crooked; the new town is regularly built. The buildings most deserving of notice are the cathedral, erected in the 12th century, the church of St. Ansgarius, which has a steeple 150 feet high, the old Gothic town-house, the two exchanges, and the merchants' house. There are several open places, a pleasant promenade on the site of the old ramparts, and a large public park.

Manf.—Tobacco, machinery, sugar, sailcloth, cotton, woollen cloths, and dye stuffs. Bremen is, next to Hamburg, the chief seat of the export trade of Germany, the value of the exports being over £21,000,000 annually. Pop. 163,884.

Constitution.—The free city of Bremen is governed, under a constitution proclaimed March 5, 1849, and revised Feb. 21, 1854, by a Senate of eighteen members, forming the executive, and the Bürgerconvent, or convent of burgesses, of 150 members, invested with the power of legislation. The convent is returned by the votes of all the citizens. Two burgomasters, the first elected for six years and a half, and the second for four years, direct the affairs of the Senate, through a ministry.

History.—In 788 Bremen was made the seat of a bishopric by Charlemagne, and afterwards raised to the dignity of an archbishopric. In 1241 it was one of the towns forming the Hanseatic League. It was held by Sweden from 1648 till 1712, when it was taken by Denmark, and sold to Hanover in 1731. Napoleon annexed it to the French empire in 1810; but after his fall it recovered its independence and all its old franchises. It became a member of the North German Confederation in 1866, and of the German empire in 1871.

BREMERHAVEN, brem'-er-ha'-fen, the port of Bremen, at the mouth of the Weser. There are docks capable of receiving the largest vessels. It is a great emporium of German trade, and the chief port for emigration on the Continent. Pop. 10,500. Lat. 53° 49′ N. Lon. 8° 9′ E.

BREMER, FREDERIKA, bre'-mer, an eminent Swedish novelist, well known to English readers by her novels of "Neighbours," "The President's Daughter," "Life in Dalecarlia," and several other works, mostly translated by Mrs. Mary Howitt. She travelled in Europe and America, and wrote descriptions of her travels.

Born at Åbo, in Finland, 1802; died 1865.

BRENNER, brain'-ner, one of the culminating points of the mountains of the Tyrol. It rises between the Inn, the Aicha, and the Adige, to a height of 6,778 feet; and the mountain to which it belongs is traversed at an elevation of 4,650 feet on the way from Germany to Italy. (See TYROL.)

BRENNUS, bren'-nus, a general of the Galli Senones, who, 390 B.C., invaded Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The greater number of the Romans fled into the Capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of the enemies, who massacred the priests, ex-consuls, and other aged men who had collected in the forum, and such of the inhabitants as remained in the houses. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and according to the popular legend, the Capitol would have been taken, had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of geese which were before the doors, and immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and destroyed the Gauls.

BRENO, brai'-no, a town of Italy, province of Bergamo. There are an ancient Gothic church, an old castle and a town-house. In the vicinity is a beautiful stalactite grotto. Pop. 2,500.

BRENTA, brain'-ta, a river of northern Italy, having its source in Lake Caldonazzo, in the Tyrol, and, after a course of 112 miles, falling into the Adriatic, through the canal of Brenta-nova, or Brentono, at Brondolo.

BRENTANO, CLEMENS, bran-ta'-no, German poet and romance writer. He was of a restless disposition, and possessed a vivid but morbid imagination, and his writings, which attained considerable popularity, are tinged with mysticism and eccentricity. He was brother to Elizabeth von Arnim, Goethe's "Bettina."

Born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1777; died at Aschaffenberg, 1842.

BRENTFORD, brent'-ford, a market-town, and the county town of Middlesex, on the Thames, 7 miles W. of London. It derives its name from the Brent, a little stream which falls into the Thames at this point. The town is divided into Old and New Brentford. Pop. 11,808. A station on the Great Western and London and South-Western railways.

BRENTWOOD, a market-town of Essex, on a hill, 11 miles S.W. of Chelmsford. Manf. Bricks and beer. The church, a plain brick building, was erected in 1835. There is a free grammar-school founded in 1557 by Sir Anthony Browne, chief justice of the Common Pleas. There are two annual fairs. Pop. 3,737. A station on the Great Eastern railway.

BRENZ, JOHANN, brants, a German Reformer, educated at Heidelberg. His opinions brought him into trouble, and for some years he led a wandering life. In 1552 he found an asylum at Stuttgard, where he passed the remainder of his days. He drew up the Confession of Wirtemburg for presentation at the Council of Trent.

Born in Suabia, 1499; died at Stuttgard, 1570.

BRESCIA, brai'-sha, a large city of Northern Italy, capital of the province of the same name, 34 miles from Parma. It is surrounded by walls, ditches, and bastions, and the ramparts are lined with trees. It contains several handsome squares and streets, a cathedral of white marble, begun in 1684, but not completed till 1825, numerous churches, remarkable for beautiful frescoes and decorations; the Palazzo della Logia, built of the richest marbles in the 15th and 16th centuries; and the old Broletto, or palace of the republic, a massive and striking building, with a great tower, erected about the end of the 12th century. There are a college and museum, a public library, several educational establishments, a corn exchange, a theatre, and seventy public fountains. There is a cemetry outside the town. Manf. Arms, leather, silk, flax, wool, linen, paper, oil, and wine. Pop. 43,354. This place is celebrated for its Roman remains. In 1822 an entire edifice was excavated, and now forms a museum of antiquities. In 1796 the town was taken by the French, and by the treaty of Vienna, in 1815, was assigned to Austria. In 1849 it was involved in the commotions which then distracted continental Europe, and although barricaded, the Austrians, under General Haynau, carried it at the point of the bayonet. Its fortifications were, afterwards, greatly strengthened.

BRESLAU, bres'-lou, the capital of Silesia, the third city in Prussia, is situate on the Oder, at the influx of the small river Ohlau. It consists of the old and new towns, divided by the Oder, contiguous to which are five suburbs, one standing on an island in the Oder, over which there are no fewer than 120 bridges. The streets of the new town are broad, and there are handsome buildings and public squares. The old fortifications have been converted into a public promenade, and the ditch into an ornamental lake. There are a great many places of worship, belonging to different denominations, and the cathedral of St. John, built in the 12th century, on the island, has seventeen chapels. The town-hall, dating from the 14th century, is an interesting Gothic structure. The university, transferred here from Frankfort-on-the-Oder in 1811, has a public library of 250,000 volumes. The town has several other libraries, gymnasia, schools of industry and arts, several Protestant colleges, and it is the seat of a mining board. The number of hospitals and other charitable institutions is considerable, and there are several establishments for poor students. In one of the squares is a colossal statue of Marshal Blucher.

Manf.—Linen, printed cottons, calico, chintzes, woollen stuffs, silk, Turkish yarn, thread, needles, plate, earthenware, jewellery, starch, snuff, and sealing-wax. There is a trade in timber, flax, hemp, corn, oxen, madder, and mining produce.

History.—Breslau was an independent duchy from 1163 to 1335; was ceded to Austria in 1527; taken by Frederick the Great of Prussia, 1741; bombarded by the French and the fortifications destroyed, 1807.

BRESLAU, a district of Prussia, in the province of Silesia. Area, 3,870 geographical square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the S., but level in other directions. Rivers. The Oder, with its tributaries the Stober and the Weide. Pro. The usual cereals, with flax, madder, hops, and tobacco. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, zinc, and arsenic. Cornelians, opals, agates, and garnets, are frequently found. Pop. 1,544,292.

BRESSAY, brest'-sai. (See SHETLAND ISLES.)

BREST, brest, a seaport city of France, one of the chief stations of the French marine, and one of the best harbours in Europe, is situate on a bay on the west coast of Brittany, in the department of Finisterre, 320 miles S.W. of Paris. The greater part of the town is built on a hill, and consists of narrow, steep, winding, and dirty streets; in the suburb of Recouvrance, however, these are broad and regular, and the houses very handsome. On a steep rock at the entrance of the harbour stands the citadel, which is defended towards the land by strong outworks. Opposite to it is a stately tower, which serves, with the citadel and several batteries, to protect the harbour. The principal public buildings and objects of curiosity in the town are the barracks, rope-walks, cloth-manufactories, forges, and foundries; the immense naval arsenal and dock-yard; a prison, called Le Bagne, built on a hill, and capable of accommodating 4,000 convicts; the two quays which encompass the harbour; the house of correction; the hospital, theatre, two marine academies, and the fine walk called Le Cours. Its commerce is principally limited to the supplying of provisions to the town and port. Pop. 66,110. Lat. 48° 24′ N. Lon. 4° 29′ W.—Cardinal Richelieu was the first to take advantage of the situation of Brest and convert it into a naval station. Vauban extended and improved its fortifications. It was at Brest that Mary queen of Scots landed when on her way to St. Germain. In 1694 it was attacked by an English fleet under Admiral Berkeley; but the expedition failed. As a naval school and port of construction, it ranked before both Cherbourg and Toulon, until the vast extensions and improvements made by Napoleon III. at Cherbourg placed the latter in advance of all the other ports of France.

BRETAGNE, or BRITTANY, brit'-a-ne, one of the provinces into which France was divided before the Revolution. It now forms the departments of FINISTERRE, CÔTES DU NORD, MORBIHAN, and LOIRE INFERIEURE. It takes its name from the Britons, and is supposed to have been peopled by the natives of Great Britain, at the time of the Roman dominion, and after the Saxon invasion.

BRETEUIL, brai-tu(r)ll, a French town, department Oise, 16 miles N.E. of Beauvais. There are remains of ancient walls, and a large abbey, built in the 17th century. Manf. Shoes, shawls, woollen goods, paper, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 2,500.

BRETIGNY, bre-teen'-ye, a village of France, department of the Eure and Loire, 6 miles S.E. of Chartres.—This place is memorable for a treaty concluded there in 1360. By it the French king, John, recovered his freedom after being a prisoner since the battle of Poictiers.

BRETON, CAPE, an island of Canada.

BRETON, DE LOS HERREROS, MANUEL, DON, a popular Spanish poet, who began to write for the stage in his 17th year, and has written or adapted more than 150 pieces, besides several volumes of poems, mostly humorous or satirical. Born at Quel, 1800.

BREUGHEL, broi'-gel, the name of a Flemish family of painters, who originally came from a village of the same name near Breda. The first who adopted the name, Pieta, was named "the droll," from his choice of humorous rustic subjects. One of his sons, PIETER, was nick-named "Hell Breughel," from his peculiar taste in selecting subjects. Another son, Jan, assisted Rubens in the backgrounds of some of his large pictures.

Flourished in the 16th and 17th centuries.

BREWSTER, SIR DAVID, broo'-ster, a distinguished experimental philosopher, whose discoveries in reference to the properties of light have led to great improvements in the illumination of lighthouses. In 1815 he received the Copley medal for his paper on the "Polarization of Light by Reflection," and in the following year, for his discoveries in physics, received from the Institute of France 1,500 francs, which was the half of their prize. In 1816 he invented the kaleidoscope, in 1818 received the Rumford medal of the Royal Society, and in 1830 was presented with the medal of the Royal Society for his further researches on the properties of light. In the same year, with Davy, Herschel, and Babbage, he originated the British Association, the first meeting of which was held at York, in 1831. In the following year he was knighted by William IV., and decorated with the Hanoverian Guelphic order. In 1841 he became principal of St. Leonard's College at St. Andrew's. In 1849 he was elected president of the British Association, and in the same year had the high honour of being chosen, in the place of Berzelius, one of the eight foreign associates of the French Academy of Sciences. In 1859 he was chosen principal of the university of Edinburgh, and held that office until his death. His writings on scientific subjects are very numerous, and for twenty-two years he edited the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." Of the "Edinburgh Philosophical Jourral," he was also one of the editors, as well as of "Edinburgh Journal of Science," and author of a Life of Newton, and "More Worlds than One."

Born at Jedburgh, Scotland, 1781; died near Melrose, 1868.

BRIAN BOROIMHE, or BORU, brí'-an-boru', an Irish chieftain, son of the king of Munster. He conquered the Danes, and defeated Malachi, succeeding him as king of the whole island. He was an able ruler, as well as a brave warrior. He was killed in a battle with the Danes.

Died 1014.

BRIANÇON, bré'-an-sawng, a fortified town of France, in the department of Hautes Alpes, on the right bank of the Durance, near the Italian frontier. It occupies an elevated position, and has been called the Gibraltar of the Alps. It is of great antiquity. Manf. Cutlery, cotton goods, and lead pencils. Pop. 3,600.

BRIANSK, bre-ansk', a Russian town, in the government of Orel, on the right bank of the Desna. It is surrounded by an earthen rampart, and contains 16 churches and a monastery. Manf. Arms, and woodwork for building purposes. A large trade is carried on with St. Petersburg, Riga, and the large commercial towns on the Black Sea. Pop. 14,000.

BRIARE, bre-ai're, a French town, department of the Loiret, on the right bank of the Loire, 43 miles S.E. of Orleans. The canal which unites the Loire and Seine at this point was the first constructed in France. There is a good trade in wine, wood, and charcoal. Pop. 3,800.

BRIAREUS, bri-air'-e-us, according to mythological legend, a famous giant, son of Cœlus and Terra, who had a hundred hands and fifty heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods Briareus.

BRIDGEND, bridg'-end, a market-town of Glamorgan, S. Wales. There are large iron-works in the town and neighbourhood. Pop. 4,151. A station on the South Wales railway.

BRIDGENORTH, bridg-north, a market-town and parliamentary borough of Shropshire, on the Severn, 19 miles S.E. of Shrewsbury. It is divided by the river into the high and low town, the former reaching an elevation of nearly 200 feet above the water, the ascent of the acclivity being made by winding roads and flights of steps. A handsome bridge of six arches spans the river. The parish church, St. Leonard's, was rebuilt in 1862. There are a new market-hall and a new agricultural-hall. Manf. Carpets. Pop. 5,890. A station on the Great Western Railway.

BRIDGEPORT, a city and seaport of Fairfield, county Connecticut, United States, on an arm of Long Island Sound, at the mouth of the Pequonnock river. The city is handsome in appearance. There is a good harbour crossed by a bridge 1,237 feet long. Manf. Chiefly sewing-machines. There is a large coasting trade, and many vessels of the port are engaged in the whale fishery. Pop. 27,642. rapidly increasing. Lat. 41° 10′ N. Lon. 73° 12′ W.

BRIDGET, or BRIGITTE, ST., bridg'-et, was the daughter of a prince of the royal family of Sweden. She married the prince of Nericia, but after eight children had been born they separated by mutual consent and adopted the religious life. In 1344 she founded a monastery at Wadstenu, in East Gothland, and afterwards a hospice for pilgrims and Swedish students at Rome. She died on her return from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. She was canonized in 1391. One of her daughters, Catherine, was also canonized, and is the patron saint of Sweden.

Born in Sweden, 1302; died at Rome, 1373.

BRIDGET, or BRIDE, an Irish saint, who was very beautiful, but prayed to be made ugly. The prayer was granted, and then she founded the monastery of Kildare.

Lived at the end of the 5th century.

BRIDGETON, a city and port of New Jersey, United States, the capital of Cumberland county, 40 miles S. of Philadelphia. It is situated on both sides of Cohansey Creek, 20 miles from its point of discharge into Delaware Bay. Manf. Iron. There is an active shipping trade. Pop. 8,722.

BRIDGETOWN, bridg'-town, the capital of the island of Barbadoes, extending for about two miles along the Bay of Carlisle, on the south-west coast of the island. It is a handsome town, and in an open space named Trafalgar Square is a statue of Lord Nelson. The large market-place is shaded by trees. Pop. 21,500. Lat. 13° 4′ N. Lon. 59° 37′ W.—Bridgetown was made a city in 1842, and has suffered, at different times, both from fires and hurricanes. It was burnt down in April, 1668. The greatest part of it was again destroyed by fire in 1756, 1766, and 1767. It had scarcely recovered from the effects of the dreadful conflagrations of these years, when it was torn from its foundations by the storm of 10th October, 1780, in which above 4,000 of the inhabitants miserably perished. In 1845 another fire destroyed the greater part of the town.

BRIDGEWATER, bridg'-waw-ter, a town, parliamentary borough, and port of Somersetshire, on the river Parret, 12 miles from the sea. The river divides the town into two nearly equal parts, connected by a neat iron bridge. The streets are wide and well paved, but the houses are irregularly built. Besides the parish church, St. Mary's, a spacious and ancient building, with a lofty spire, there are places of public worship for various other denominations. It has also a fine town-hall, in the Venetian style, erected in 1845, a school of art, and other good public buildings. Vessels of considerable size can reach the town, and there is a considerable shipping trade. Manf. Bath bricks, earthenware, leather, and railway stock. Pop. 12,101. A station on the Great Western and Midland Railway. Bridgewater was formerly a parliamentary borough, but was disfranchised in 1870.

BRIDGEWATER, FRANCIS EGERTON, duke of, was the youngest son of Scroop, fourth earl, and first duke, of Bridgewater, and succeeded to the title in 1748, on the death of his brother. He has been styled the "Father of British Inland Navigation," being mainly instrumental in the cutting of the first navigable canal in England. This was from Salford, near Manchester, to Worsley, and succeeded so well, that another was executed to pass from the river Worsley, over the Irwell, to Manchester. The duke afterwards extended his canal to the Mersey. He was assisted in his projects by Brindley, the famous engineer. (See BRINDLEY.) He spent prodigious sums upon these projects, to accomplish which he lived on the simplest fare, and with scarcely a servant to attend him. By them, however, he ultimately realized an immense fortune.

Born 1736; died 1803.

BRIDGEWATER, earl of, FRANCIS HENRY EGERTON, eighth earl of Bridgewater, ninth Viscount Brackley, and Baron Ellesmere, was the younger son of the bishop of Durham. He was a person of learning, and published an edition of the "Hippolytus" of Euripides, with scholia, various readings, and copious notes in Latin. He is noticed here chiefly on account of bequeathing £8,000 to be applied to the publication of one thousand copies of a work "On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation, &c." This bequest elicited a series of separate works, known as the "Bridgewater Treatises," written by some of the most distinguished religious and scientific men of the time. The earl also bequeathed £12,000 to the British Museum, the annual income of which was to be applied to the purchase of MSS., and the taking proper care of them for the use of the public. —In his latter years this earl fell into singular eccentricities; among which was a great partiality for canine company, which he carried so far as to dress some of his favourite dogs in the garments of men, and have them at table to dine with him.

Born 1758; died in Paris, 1829.

BRIDLINGTON, or BURLINGTON, brid'-ling-ton, a town of Yorkshire, on the sea-coast, 37 miles N.E. of York. The parish church is a portion of an ancient priory. There is a large trade in corn. Pop. 8,363. About a mile to the south-east is Bridlington Quay, a fashionable watering-place, with a good harbour.—A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

BRIDPORT, brid'-port, a seaport and market-town of Dorsetshire, in a valley between the Bride and Asher rivers, 14 miles W. of Dorchester, and one mile from its own harbour. It consists principally of three spacious streets, which, from time to time, have been greatly improved. The church, dedicated to St. Mary in 1362, is a large Gothic edifice, in the form of a cross, and its tower is 72 feet high. It was restored in 1865. There are alms-houses, an endowed charity-school, besides other benevolent institutions, a handsome market-house, a town-hall, and a prison. Manf. Cordage, sailcloth, nets, and twines of all descriptions. Pop. 6,790.

BRIEG, breeg, a well-built and populous town of Silesia, Prussia, on the Oder, over which there is a stately wooden bridge, 26 miles S.E. of Breslau. It is surrounded by old fortifications, partly converted into public walks, and entered by five gates. There are a gymnasium, a library, and various work-houses and establishments for the poor. Manf. Linen, cotton, woollen fabrics, ribbons, lace, and leather. Pop. 15,400.—It is a station on the Vienna and Breslau Railway.

BRIELLE, or BRILL, breel, a town of the Netherlands, province of South Holland, on the island of East Voorne, not far from the mouth of the Maese, 15 miles W. of Rotterdam. It has a good harbour, and is a handsome, well-built town, and strongly fortified. Pop. 4,500, chiefly engaged in the fisheries. Lat. 51° 54′ N. Lon. 4° 10′ E.—The capture of this place by William de la Marck, at the head of the "beggars of the sea," in 1572, was the first important event which took place in the struggle between Holland and Spain, and laid the foundation of the Dutch republic. It was the birthplace of De Witt, the famous statesman, and Van Tromp, the great admiral of Holland.

BRIENNE, JOHN DE, bré-en, a Crusader, who, having married the granddaughter of Amaury, king of Jerusalem, was elected king of Jerusalem in 1210. The emperor Frederick II. married his daughter, having the kingdom of Jerusalem as a dowry. He was afterwards elected emperor of Constantinople, which he defended with great bravery against the Greeks and Bulgarians. On one occasion, says Gibbon, he made a sally at the head of his cavalry, and out of forty-eight squadrons of the enemy, no more than three escaped from the edge of his invincible sword.

Born 1148; died 1237.

BRIENNE, GAUTIER DE, descendant of the counts of Brienne, a noble family of France. Having distinguished himself by military achievements, he, in 1341, was chosen by the Florentines to govern their city, threatened by the Pisans. His shameless cruelty and extortions, his treachery to the republic, and his great profligacy aroused general indignation, and he was expelled in 1343. He then went to France, where he became Constable. He was killed at the battle of Poictiers.

BRIENNE-LE-CHATEAU, bré-en-le(r)-sha'-to, a town of France, in the department of the Aube, 14 miles from Bar-sur-Aube. Pop. 2,000.—Here Napoleon I. and Bourrienne received the rudiments of their military education, and here, in 1814, the emperor gained an advantage over the allies.

BRIENZ, bré-entz, town of Switzerland, canton Bern. It is situate on the lake of Brienz, which is 800 feet above the level of the sea, and surrounded by lofty mountains, whose numerous torrents and waterfalls are sublimely picturesque. Among these the fall of the Giesbach is the principal. The church was built in 1215. A good trade in cheese is carried on. Pop. 3,200.

BRIES, brees, a royal free town of Hungary, on the Gran. The cheese made in the town is extensively exported. Pop. 3,500.

BRIEUC, or BRIEUX, ST., bré-a(r), a well-built town of France, in the department of Côtes-du-Nord, a mile above the mouth of the Gouët, in the Bay of St. Brieuc. There are an ancient cathedral, a public library, and various educational institutions. The port is the village of Légué, at the mouth of the river. On a height near are the remains of an old tower. There is a trade in grain, flax, thread, linen, woollen, cattle, honey, wax, paper, leather, and iron, and it has manufactures of earthenware, and thriving fisheries. Pop. 15,400. Lat. 48° 31′ N. Lon. 2° 45′ W.

BRIGGS, HENRY, brigs, an English mathematician, who, in 1596, was appointed Gresham professor of geometry, which he resigned in 1619, on being made Savilian professor at Oxford. It is claimed (but not without dispute) that he was the first improver of logarithms, after Napier, the original inventor, whom he visited twice, and each time resided with, in Scotland. He published, in 1624, a work of stupendous labour, entitled "Arithmetica Logarithmica," containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. He also wrote some other valuable books on mathematical subjects.

Born near Halifax, 1556; died at Oxford, 1631.

BRIGHT, JOHN, brite, English politician. He was the son of a cotton-spinner and manufacturer of Rochdale, in Lancashire, and became an active member of an association called the Anti-Corn-Law League, when it was formed in 1838, and in conjunction with Mr. Cobden, proved himself one of the warmest advocates of the repeal of the corn laws. In 1843 he unsuccessfully contested the representation of the city of Durham; but in the next election which took place, he was returned for that city, and sat for it till 1847, when he was elected member for Manchester. In 1854 he formed one of the deputation who made a journey to Russia for the purpose of persuading the emperor Nicholas to adopt a peace policy, his advocacy of which for a time impaired his popularity. In 1858 he was returned member for Birmingham, and retained the position at subsequent elections. In 1868 he accepted office in the Gladstone administration as President of the Board of Trade, but retired in consequence of illness in 1870, subsequently to which date he, for the most part, refrained from taking a very prominent part in public affairs. Mr. Bright's name is memorably associated with reforms in Ireland, the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Acts having been adopted mainly or entirely at his suggestion; but he emphatically opposed Home Rule from its first suggestion. Mr. Bright, who has been one of the most eloquent speakers of his time, is a member of the Society of Friends.

Born near Rochdale, 1811.

BRIGHTON, brí'-ton, a municipal and parliamentary borough on the coast of Sussex, 51 miles S. of London. It is the most fashionable and best attended of English watering-places, and, being the nearest point to London at which the sea can be reached, is a great holiday resort. The names of "The Queen of watering places," and "London-super-Mare," have been given to it by popular writers. The old name was Brighthelmstone, and the original village occupied a site long since covered by the sea, the further encroachment of which is prevented by a massive sea wall. Towards the end of the last century attention was directed to the healthful situation of the little fishing village, and the selection of it as a marine residence by the Prince of Wales, afterwards George the Fourth, quickly made it a fashionable resort. It is situated on the seaward slope of the South Downs range, and with its suburbs stretches for about four miles along the coast. The sea wall mentioned is 60 feet high and 23 feet thick at the base, and was built at the cost of £100,000. There are about 600 streets, terraces, and squares, and the King's Road, facing the sea, with shops rivalling in size and splendour those of the metropolis, affords a fine promenade, which is continued to the Steyne, formerly a large open green, now occupied by handsome mansions and hotels. Beyond the Steyne the Marine Parade extends for about a mile along the cliff to Kemp Town, a fine and fashionable suburb. There are two piers, the old chain pier, 1134 feet long, erected in 1826; and a larger and very handsome one further to the west, 1,115 feet long, and with a breadth varying from 55 feet to 140, built in 1865. Cliftonville is a very fashionable suburb on the west, between Brighton and Hove. The most conspicuous building is the Pavilion, a large and fantastic building, began for the Prince of Wales in 1784, but not completed till 1827. The building, with its pleasure-grounds of seven acres, is now the property of the corporation of Brighton. The large stables have been converted into a noble assembly and concert-room, which will hold 3,000 persons; the saloons, with the splendid decorations restored to their original beauty, are used for balls, assemblies, and entertainments; one of the wings is a museum of natural history; and the riding-school is a corn-exchange and drill ground for volunteers. Opposite the east front of the Pavilion, on the Steyne, is a statue of George IV., by Chantrey. A great attraction is the magnificent Aquarium, opened in 1872. It is 715 feet in length, and contains an unrivalled collection of living specimens of the inhabitants of the ocean, and, as an excellent band is provided, it is one of the most popular resorts. Some of the hotels are among the finest in England. The new town hall, the concert hall, the market house, and the theatre, are noticeable public buildings. There are more than 70 places of worship, about 30 belonging to the established church. St. Peter's, in the northern part of the town, is a good specimen of the Gothic style. A fine Roman Catholic church was completed in 1864. A very handsome new synagogue was opened in 1875. Among the educational establishments Brighton College is perhaps the most prominent, and there are various training schools and other institutions. The number of private boarding schools is very large, owing to the salubrity of the air. The pleasure-grounds are the Steyne enclosure, the Level, and the Queen's Park. There are no manufactures carried on, the town being essentially a place of resort for pleasure-seekers and invalids, in accommodating whom the resident population are chiefly employed; but mackerel and herring fisheries are extensively carried on. Pop. 107,528. a great proportion being visitors. A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast railway.

BRIGHTON, NEW, a fashionable watering-place in Cheshire, on a peninsula between the Mersey and the Irish Sea, 3 miles N.W. of Liverpool.

BRIGHTSIDE BIERLOW, brítd'-side beer'-lo, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, adjoining Sheffield. Pop. 56,721.

BRIGNOLES, breen'-yol, a town of France, in the department of Var, 20 miles from Toulon. It is beautifully situated and famous for its salubrity. There are several squares planted with trees and ornamented with fountains. Manf. Cloth, silk, soap, wax candles, and leather. It has a trade in brandies, wines, prunes, and olives. Pop. 4,700.

BRILLAT-SAVARIN, ANTHELME, bree'-ya-sav-a-rahn', French author, who wrote some political and historic works, but is best known by his "Physiologie du Goût," an erudite, witty, and genial work on the pleasures of the table.

Born at Bellay, 1755; died 1825.

BRIL, PAUL, breel, Italian painter, famous for his frescoes, one of the finest of which is in the Vatican, and for improvements in landscape painting. His brother Matthew was also a painter of some eminence.

Born 1556; died 1626.

BRILON, bree'-lon, an old town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, on the Mönne. The great church is said to have been built by Charlemagne. Manf. Linen, tinware, and nails. There are iron and lead mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,300.

BRINDISI, brin-de'-se, an ancient fortified city and seaport of Italy, on the Adriatic, 45 miles E.N.E. of Taranto. Its harbour was nearly choked up; but, since 1843, when a lighthouse was erected on the mole, it has been greatly improved; and the establishment of a weekly line of steamers to Alexandria in 1870 has made it a place of great and growing importance in connexion with the overland route to India and Australia. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 40° 39' N. Lon. 17° 58' E.—This is the ancient Brundusium, and was the place whence the Roman generals almost invariably sailed in their wars with Greece, Macedonia, and Asia. In consequence of its situation, it has been the scene of many remarkable historical events. Virgil died in it. Horace, in one of his satires, has immortalized it. Octavius assumed the name of Cæsar in it, and Agrippina landed on its shores with the ashes of Germanicus, her husband. On the fall of the Roman empire, it shared in the general calamities which befell Roman cities. In the 11th century it was occupied by the Normans, and became one of the chief ports of embarkation for the Crusaders.

BRINDLEY, JAMES, brind'-le, an eminent engineer, who, after serving his apprenticeship to the trade of a millwright, and exhibiting his skill in the erection of several mills, was employed by the duke of Bridgewater on his famous canal from Worsley to Manchester, which he afterwards extended to the Mersey. He was next employed to construct a canal from the Grand Trunk, near Haywood, Staffordshire, to the river Severn, near Bewdley, by which means Bristol obtained a communication with Liverpool. In consequence of the success of his undertakings, his reputation stood very high, and he was engaged in a variety of similar plans in different parts of the kingdom. He was a self-taught man, and seldom prepared models or drawings; but, when any difficulty presented itself, went to bed, and remained there until he had formed in his mind a satisfactory plan for overcoming it. (See BRIDGEWATER.)

Born near Chapel-le-Frith, Derbyshire, 1716; died at Turnhurst, Staffordshire, 1772.

BRINKLEY, JOHN, brink'-le, bishop of Cloyne, mathematician and astronomer. Educated and took high honours at Cambridge. In 1792 he was appointed professor of astronomy at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1826 received the bishopric of Cloyne. His writings are voluminous and of great value.

Born at Woodbridge, Suffolk, 1763; died 1835.

BRINVILLIERS, MARIE MARGUERITE, marchioness of, brā-veel'-e-ai, a notorious poisoner. In 1651 she was married to the marquis, and formed an improper attachment to St. Croix, a young cavalry officer. The latter was imprisoned in the Bastille, and there learnt from Exili, an Italian, the composition of poisons, which art he afterwards taught to his mistress. They then commenced a series of poisonings, the first victim being the marquis's father, then his two brothers and his sister, with a view to the ultimate possession of their fortunes. These crimes were not discovered until the death of St. Croix, in 1676, when there were found on him some papers which cast suspicion on the marchioness. She fled, but was arrested at Liège, brought to Paris, and beheaded, her body being afterwards burned.

Born 1630; died 1676.

BRIONES, bré-on-es, a walled town of Spain, province of Logrono, near the right bank of the Ebro. Manf. Linen, hemp, and brandy. Pop. 2,800.

BRIOUDE, bré-ood, a French town, department of Haute-Loire, on the left bank of the Allier, 29 miles N.W. of Le Puy. The college and church of St. Julien, on the site of the martyrdom of that saint, was erected in the Byzantine style in the 9th century. Manf. Linens and woollens. Pop. 5,000.

BRISACH, or BREISACH, OLD, bri-sak, a town of the Grand Duchy of Baden, near the east bank of the Rhine, 30 miles S. of Strasburg. It was formerly considered a place of great importance. The old minster of St. Stephen is famous for its carved altar screen. New Brisach, on the opposite side of the river, was strongly fortified by Vauban. Pop. 3,300.

BRISBANE, bris'-bain, an episcopal city, and the capital of Queensland, Australia, is situated on the river Brisbane, about 25 miles from its debouchment into Moreton Bay, one of the largest bays on the coast of Australia, and after which for a long time the district was called. It lies about 500 miles north of Sydney. Brisbane is divided into four portions: North Brisbane, South Brisbane, Kangaroo Point, and Fortitude Valley. There are four principal streets running about north and south, about half a mile long; these are crossed by four others about a quarter of a mile in length. The public buildings comprise several churches and chapels. St. John's church is the largest Episcopal church. The Roman Catholic cathedral (St. Stephen's) is a fine building. The town hall in Queen-street, which is the main business thoroughfare; the Houses of Legislature, in George-street, which rank as the finest buildings in the city, and cost £100,000 in their erection; the Post Office, the new Government Printing Office, the Vice-regal Lodge, a very fine building; the Custom House, and the School of Arts, are among the other public buildings. The business of the banks, insurance, and other societies is carried on in buildings worthy of the city. The Union Bank, the Commercial Bank, and the Bank of New South Wales are the most notable among them. The shops and numerous stores are quite equal to the similar class of buildings to be found in an English town. A magnificent iron swing bridge, the Victoria, upwards of a quarter of a mile in length, connects North and South Brisbane. A line of steamers runs twice a week to Sydney; other steamers ply to the northern ports. There is also regular communication with London by sailing ships. There is ample wharf accommodation. The city has a good general hospital, a lying-in hospital, and several other institutions of a charitable character. The Botanical Gardens are laid out with great taste. The town is lighted with gas, and well supplied with water from a large artificial lake in the ranges near the heads of the Enoggera creek, 7 miles distant from the city, whence it is conveyed by iron mains into every street. The waterworks for supplying the city cost upwards of £100,000. The town is in connection with other parts of the colony by railway. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 27° 28' S. Lon. 153° 6' E.—Brisbane was settled in 1825, as a penal station; but the colony being opened to free settlers in 1842, a rapid increase of population took place. When the Moreton Bay district, as it was previously called, was made a separate colony, with the name Queensland, in 1859, Brisbane became the capital.

BRISBANE, THOMAS MACDOUGAL, SIR, soldier, administrator, and astronomer. He entered the army at the age of 16, served in Flanders, the West Indies, the Peninsula, and North America, and very highly distinguished himself. In 1821 he was appointed governor of New South Wales, which position he held to the great advantage of the colony for four years. While in Australia he devoted great attention to astronomical studies, and published a catalogue of 7,385 stars, for which he received the Copley medal of the Royal Society. On his return he established an astronomical and magnetic observatory at his residence at Makerstoun, in Scotland, and was elected to succeed Sir Walter Scott as president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

Born near Largs, Ayrshire, 1773; died 1860.

BRISEIS, bri-sé'-is, in Greek legendary history, a girl of Lyrnessus, called also Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, she fell to the share of Achilles in the division of the spoils. Agamemnon afterwards took possession of her, and Achilles thereupon made a vow to absent himself from the field of battle at Troy. This incident Homer makes one of the chief features of his Iliad.

BRISGAU, brees'-go, a fertile district of the Grand Duchy of Baden, between the Rhine and the Black Forest. Area, 1,275 square miles. Pop. 298,893.

BRISSOT, JEAN PIERRE, bree'-so, one of the leading men in the French revolution, the son of a pastrycook, and bred to the law, which he never followed. An acquaintance with English books gave him a turn for politics; when, for a time, he settled at Boulogne, and edited the Courrier de l'Europe. On the suppression of this journal, he went to Paris, where he soon afterwards published his "Theory of Criminal Laws," 2 vols. 8vo. He began, also, a book entitled "A Philosophical Library of Criminal Laws," and wrote a volume on "Truth; or Meditations on the Means of reaching Truth in all Branches of Human Knowledge." Finding little encouragement in France, however, he went to London, where he conducted a periodical journal called "Universal Correspondence on all that concerns the Happiness of Men in Society." This journal was designed to disseminate in France such political principles as were based on reason. It therefore gave offence to the French government, and was seized and suppressed. On his return to Paris, in 1784, he was sent to the Bastille on the charge of having assisted in the publication of a libel, but obtained his release by the interest of the duke of Orleans, whose ambitious projects on the government he laboured, by his talents, to advance. His political pamphleteering activity forced him to flee from France, when he went to Holland, and thence to America. After a time he returned to France, and became a warm advocate of republican principles during the revolutionary period. By his exertions he created a party called Brissotines and Girondists, from the members of the department of Gironde, of which it chiefly consisted. He was, however, adverse to the execution of the king, which he proposed to be deferred till the perfection of the constitution. The ascension of Robespierre to power was the signal for the downfall of Brissot and his party. He and they were denounced, arrested, and guillotined.

Born near Chartres, 1754; died 1793.

BRISTOL, bris'-tol, a city, municipal and parliamentary borough, on both sides of the rivers Avon and Frome, about 8 miles from the mouth of the Avon, in the Bristol Channel, and partly in the county of Gloucester and partly in the county of Somerset. For ecclesiastical and military purposes, it is a portion of the former county, but otherwise it is a county in itself. The town is built upon seven hills, the highest being 200 feet above the level of the lower parts of the town. The old town, the centre of the modern city, is on a narrow hill, which has the Avon on the south, and the Frome on the north and west. In this part of the city there are many old houses, and the streets are narrow and irregular. The new part, including St. Michael's Hill, Kingsdown, Redcliffe Hill, and Cotham, is more regularly laid in terraces, squares, and crescents, and there are many handsome residences. The most fashionable suburb is CLIFTON, on a lofty hill overlooking the Avon. Amongst the most interesting of the older buildings is the cathedral (originally forming a portion of St. Augustine's Abbey), a fine specimen of Early English architecture, founded in 1142, partially rebuilt in the 14th and 16th centuries, and recently restored. St. Mary Redcliffe is one of the finest churches in England. It is cruciform, with beautiful porches, and an interior greatly admired for its elegance. The church was founded in 1294; restored after damage by lightning, by the famous William Canynge, merchant, and five times mayor of Bristol; and recently restored (with a new nave), to its original beauty. (See CHATTERTON.) The Temple church is remarkable for a leaning tower. There are about 150 places of worship, 57 belonging to the Church of England. Other prominent public buildings are the exchange, town-hall, guildhall, assize court, Colston Hall, Victoria Rooms, a large central railway station, Colston hospital, banks, and other public offices; and among the numerous charitable institutions are an hospital, asylums for the blind, the deaf and orphans, and the Ashley Hall Asylum, where 2,000 orphans are maintained entirely by unsolicited contributions. In 1809 a large harbour was constructed by damming up a portion of the waters of the Frome and Avon, and cutting a new channel, at a cost of half a million. The harbour will now accommodate a thousand vessels, and about 4,500 vessels annually clear outwards. The quay is a mile long. The new channel of the river is crossed by two handsome cast-iron bridges of great elevation; and across the Avon at Clifton is a beautiful suspension-bridge 702 feet in span and 245 feet above high water. The bridge formerly crossed the Thames, between Waterloo and Westminster bridges, and was known as Hungerford suspension-bridge. It was removed in 1862, to make way for the extension of the South-Eastern Railway to Charing Cross. A mile below the city, on the banks of the Avon, is the Hot Well, the water of which resembles the mineral water of Matlock, and possesses valuable medicinal properties.

Lat. 51° 27′ N. Lon. 2° 35′ W.

Pop., within the municipal boundary, 2:6,503. and steadily increasing.

Manf.—Glass, pottery, cotton goods, oilcloths, sugar, tin-plate; brass, copper, and zinc articles, chemicals and leather; and there are large engineering works and shipbuilding yards.

Trade.—Chiefly with the United States, Canada, West Indies, Mauritius, South America, Portugal, France, Russia, Turkey, the Mediterranean, and West Coast of Africa. Manufactured goods to the value of nearly half a million are annually exported.

History.—The ancient Britons had a settlement here named Caer Oder, or the frontier city. The Saxons named the town Brightstowe, or Bricstowe, a pleasant place, from which the present name is derived. Robert, Earl of Gloucester, in the 12th century, erected a castle, destroyed by Cromwell. Charters were granted by John and Henry III.; and Edward III., in 1373, constituted Bristol a city and county in itself. It was made the seat of a bishopric in 1542. During the Parliamentary wars the town suffered considerably; and at the Restoration a new charter was conferred. It afterwards became the principal port for trade with the West Indies, and engaged extensively in the slave trade, and in the tobacco trade with America. During the Reform Riots of 1831, the Bishop's palace and several other public buildings were destroyed.

Railway Communication.—Bristol is in direct communication with nearly every part of England by the Great Western, Midland, London and North-Western, Bristol and Exeter, Somerset and Dorset, and South-Western railways.

BRISTOL, a county of Rhode Island, United States. Area, 96 square miles. The chief town is of the same name. Pop. 11,394.

BRISTOL, a seaport, capital of the above county, 56 miles S.S.W. of Boston. There is a good harbour, and a considerable trade is done, chiefly with the West Indies and Europe. Pop. 6,000.

BRISTOL, a county of Massachusetts, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 139,040.

BRISTOL BAY, a large bay in the North Pacific Ocean, on the west coast of North America, immediately to the north of the peninsula of Alaska. Lat. 54° N. Lon. 160° W.

BRISTOL CHANNEL, an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, on the coast of Great Britain, lying between the S. coast of Wales and the counties of Somerset and Devon. It is about 81 miles long, and from 5 to 48 broad. The Severn flows into it, and it contains, on the N., the bays of Carmarthen and Swansea; on the S., the bays of Barnstaple and Bridgewater. The rapidity with which its tide flows forms the singular phenomenon called the "bore," when it meets with the currents of the Severn. Lat. between 50° and 51° 40′ N. Lon. between 3° and 5° 3′ W.

BRITAIN, GREAT, brit'-an, the largest of the British isles, is bounded N. by the North Sea, E. by the German Ocean, S. by the English Channel, and W. by St. George's Channel and the Atlantic Ocean. It constitutes the larger portion of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and includes ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, the ISLE OF MAN, and the CHANNEL ISLANDS. (See under the respective headings.)

Ext.—From N. to S. 587 miles in length; its greatest breadth from E. to W. is about 360.

The following are the area and population:—

	Square miles.	Inhabitants.
England and Wales	58,320	25,968,286
Scotland	30,685	3,734,370
Isle of Man	281	53,492

BRITANNIA, brit-an'-i-a, the Roman name of the island Albion, the modern Great Britain. It was conquered by Vespatian and made a Roman province about 50 A.D. In the 4th century it was divided into five provinces—Britannia Prima, south of the Thames and the Bristol Channel; Britannia Secunda, Wales; Flavia Cæsariensis, in the centre of England, including what we now know as the Midland Counties; Maxima Cæsariensis, between the Mersey and Humber and the Tyne; and Valentia, between the Tyne and the Wall of Antoninus, which extends between the Clyde and the Frith of Forth. The name Britannia is, according to Camden, derived from the Celtic name "Prydhain;" but it has been suggested that it may have been taken from the Celtic "brit," or "brith," meaning painted, the ancient Britains being in the habit of painting the bodies.

BRITANNIA ISLAND, or UEA, in the South Pacific, N.W. of New Caledonia. On the west side the soil is good, and abundant crops of bananas, sweet potatoes, and sugar cane are raised. Pop. about 4,000, savage and suspected of cannibalism. Lat. 21° 26′ S. Lon. 168° 10′ E.

BRITAIN, NEW, an archipelago in the Eastern seas, consisting of several islands of different dimensions. Lat. 1° 30′ to 6° 50′ S. Lon. 148° 5′ W.

BRITISH EMPIRE, THE, is the most powerful on the face of the globe, embracing within its extent an immense aggregated area and population. It ranks second, both in point of population and extent, among the states of the world, the Russian empire surpassing it in extent, and the Chinese empire in population. It includes the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Asian, American, African, Australasian, and other colonies and dependencies. In 1876, a Bill was brought into Parliament to empower the Queen to assume the title of "Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith and Empress of India." The superficial extent and population of the empire will be best seen by the following table. The native, feudatory states of India, more or less under the control of the Indian government, are included. The figures are approximative, and represent the best estimates made in 1885 four years after the taking of the last census:—

	Area in sq. miles.	Population.
Great Britain and Ireland	121,115	35,246,562
Indian Possessions, &c.	2,574,000	256,000,000
Other Eastern Possessions	30,000	4,000,000
Australasia	3,270,000	3,500,000
North America	3,600,000	4,300,000
Africa	476,000	2,600,000
West Indies	7,532	1,170,000
European Possessions	120	170,000
Various Settlements	116	255,000
Totals	10,078,883	307,441,562

The following are the leading dates connected with the establishment of the empire:—

Wales annexed to England	1536
Union of England and Scotland, under the name of Great Britain	1707
Canada became a British possession by treaty	1763
First Australian colony (New South Wales) established	1788
Ireland united to Great Britain	1801
The government of India passed from the East India Company to the Imperial Government, and the Queen proclaimed	1858

BRITISH COLUMBIA. (See COLUMBIA, BRITISH.)

BRITISH ISLES, THE, include Ireland, Anglesea, Man, the Channel, Scilly, Orkney, and Shetland Islands, and the Hebrides, all of which will be noticed under their respective headings.

BRITTANY, or BRETAGNE. (See BRETAGNE.)

BRITTON, JOHN, brit'-ton, an architectural, antiquarian and topographical writer. He was the son of a small farmer and shopkeeper in Wiltshire. He came to London in 1787, and was for several years first as a cellarman at a tavern, and afterwards as attorney's clerk, occasionally singing at a theatre and compiling song-books. He wrote some articles descriptive of localities in his native county, which brought him into notice, and he was afterwards engaged on various works illustrative of topography. His most important undertakings were the "Architectural Antiquities of England," and the "Cathedral Antiquities of England." Altogether he produced about 80 valuable illustrated works, which, at the time of their publication, had the effect, in no small degree, of improving the public feeling in reference to our national antiquities.

Born near Chippenham, Wiltshire, 1771; died 1857.

BRIVE, brecve, a French town, department of Corrèze, 15 miles S.W. of Tulle. It is pleasantly situated in the midst of vineyards. Manf. Woollens and cotton yarn, wax candles, and pottery. Pop. 8,000.

BRIVIO, bre'-ve-o, a town of Lombardy, about 20 miles from Milan, where, in 1799, the French were defeated by the Austrians. Manf. Silk, linen, lace, and paper. Pop. 1,950.

BRIXEN, brix'-en, a fortified town of the Tyrol, 40 miles from Innspruck. Pop. 3,000.—This town lies in the route of the Brenner Pass, between Germany and Italy.

BRIXHAM, brix'-ham, a market-town and seaport of Devonshire, at the south point of Tor Bay, 23 miles S. of Exeter. The parish church is an old structure in the perpendicular style. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fishing trade, and have a considerable number of vessels, which carry their cargoes to London, Bristol, and elsewhere. Pop. 7,664.—Here William III. landed in 1688, and a monument with an inscription commemorates the event.

BRIXTON. (See LONDON.)

BROACH, or BAROACH, broche, a town of Guzerat, in Hindostan, on the Nerbuddah. A large trade is carried on in raw cotton, grain, and seeds; but the town is in a ruinous state, and the most remarkable place in it is the Hindoo hospital for beasts, birds, and insects, ranging from horses, dogs, and monkeys, to fleas and lice. Near the town is the famous banian-tree, or rather grove, which has been renowned for centuries. Pop. 37,281.

BROADHAVEN, a bay of the Atlantic, on the W. coast of Ireland, 11 miles from Bangor; average length and breadth 4 miles.

BROAD RIVER, an arm of the sea, on the E. coast of N. America, which extends along the W. and the N.W. sides of Beaufort or Port Royal Island, on the coast of South Carolina, and receives the river Coosa from the N.W.—Another river in Georgia, running into Savannah river, between Petersburg and Lisbon.

BROADSTAIRS, a seaside resort of Kent, in the isle of Thanet, much resorted to for sea-bathing, 2 miles from Ramsgate. Pop. 4,362. It is a station on the South-Eastern Railway.

BROCARIO, ARNALDO GULIELMO, bro-ca'-re-o, a celebrated Spanish printer, whose greatest work was the famous Polyglot Bible of Cardinal Ximenes.

Lived in the 16th century.

BROCKEN, brok'-ken, or the BLOCKSBERG, the culminating point of the Harz Mountains, in Prussia, in the province of Saxony, cultivated nearly to its summit, which is 3,740 feet above the level of the sea. The phenomenon called the Spectre of the Brocken is here occasionally seen at sunset and sunrise. It is caused by the perpendicular rising of the mists from the valley opposite to the sun, at the same time leaving the top of the mountain clear. The effect produced is a wonderful enlargement of every object reflected by this dense mass of vapour ascending from the valley.

BROCKVILLE, brok'-veel, a town of Upper Canada, 48 miles N.E. of Kingston, on the left bank of the St. Lawrence. Pop. 5,000.

BROD, brod, a fortified town of Austria, on the military frontier, on the left bank of the Save, opposite a Turkish town of the same name. Pop. 2,500.

BROD, or UNGARISCH-BROD, a walled town of Moravia, Austrian empire, on the right bank of the Olsawa. Manf. Cloth. A good trade is carried on in hides and fruits. Pop. 3,400.

BRODIE, SIR BENJAMIN COLLINS, bart., bro'-de, an eminent surgeon. In 1811 he was presented, by the Royal Society, with the Copley medal, for his papers on physiology; and in 1814 produced his "Experiments and Observations on the Influence of the Nerves of the Eighth Pair on the Secretions of the Stomach." In 1832 he was appointed sergeant-surgeon to the queen. In 1834 he was created a baronet; and in 1850 received the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. He was a member of several scientific societies, and produced various works connected with his profession.

Born at Winterslow, Wiltshire, 1783; died 1862.

BRODY, bro'-de, a town of Austrian Galicia, in the circle of Brody or Zloczow, 58 miles E.N.E. of Lemberg. Manf. Leather and linen. There is a large trade in the agricultural produce of the country. Pop. 23,000.—On account of the great number of Jews in this town, it has been nicknamed the German Jerusalem. It was made a free commercial town in 1779.

BRODZINSKI, KAZIMIERZ, brod-zins'-ke, Polish poet, who served with the patriots at Cracow in 1809. He was taken prisoner at Leipsic, but was released and became professor of æsthetics at Warsaw, until the suppression of the university in 1831. His poems, in the romantic style, are very popular.

Born at Krowlowsko, 1791; died 1835.

BROEK-IN-WATERLAND, brook, a village of Holland, 6 miles from Amsterdam, remarkable for its neatness and cleanliness, every part of the streets and the houses being almost spotless. No beast is permitted to come within its precincts, and the tiles with which its streets are paved are undergoing an almost constant ablution. Pop. 1,500.

BROGNI, JEAN ALLARMET, Cardinal de, brone'-ye, son of a peasant, who rose to high positions in the Church, and was president of the Council of Constance. He pronounced the sentence which sent Huss the reformer to the stake.

Born near Annecy, in Savoy, 1342; died at Rome, 1426.

BROMBERG, brom'-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Posen, 70 miles N.E. of Posen. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, tobacco, Prussian blue, sugar, beer, pottery, and chicory. Pop. 28,000. —The Bromberg Canal, by uniting the rivers Netz and Brahe, connects the Oder and Elbe with the Vistula.

BROMLEY, brum'-le, a market-town and parish of Kent, 10 miles S.E. of London. It occupies an elevated position, and on account of the salubrity of the air is a favourite residence of opulent persons. The little river Ravensbourne, which falls into the Thames at Deptford Creek, divides the parish of Bromley from the adjoining parish of Beckenham. There is a well endowed college for the widows of clergymen. A handsome town-hall was erected in 1865. Pop. 15,153.—A station on the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway.

BROMPTON, brump'-ton. (See LONDON and CHATHAM.)

BROMSGROVE, broms'-grove, a market-town of Worcestershire, situate near the rise of the river Salwarp, 13 miles S.W. of Birmingham, Worcester. There is a fine old parish church with a lofty tower. Manf. Buttons, nails, and railway stock. Pop. 12,000. It is a station on the Midland Railway.

BROMWICH, WEST, brum'-idg, a town and parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Wednesbury, with mines of iron and coal in the neighbourhood. A new town-hall and public buildings, including a free library and baths, opened in 1875. Pop. 56,299.

BRONGNIART, ALEXANDRE, bronge'-ne-ar, director of the porcelain manufactory at Sèvres, where he revived the art of painting on glass. He wrote an essay on reptiles, and first established the four divisions now generally accepted. He also wrote on mineralogy, fossils, and the ceramic art.

Born at Paris, 1770; died 1847.

BRONI, bro'-ne, an Italian town, 11 miles S.E. of Pavia, at the foot of the Apennines. There is a remarkable church dating from the 10th century. Pop. 7,000.

BRONN, HEINRICH GEORG, bron, German naturalist, author of several important scientific treatises. His work on "Universal Geology" is a work of great research and grasp of thought.
Born at Ziegelhausen, 1800; died 1862.

BRONNITZY, bron-nit'-ze, a Russian town, 30 miles S.E. of Moscow, on the Msta. In the neighbourhood is a lofty council hall, in which stood a heathen temple, believed to possess an oracle which was consulted by the old Sclavonic chiefs. Pop. 3,500.

BRONTE, or BRONTI, bron'-te, a market-town in the island of Sicily, province of Catania, at the foot of Mount Etna, bestowed, with its territory and an income of 3,750*l.*, by the Neapolitan government, on Lord Nelson, in 1799, under the title of a duchy, in reward for his naval exploits. Pop. 16,524.

BRONTÉ, CHARLOTTE, was the daughter of the Reverend Patrick Brontë, curate of Haworth, in Yorkshire. With her two sisters, under the assumed names of Currer, Acton, and Ellis Bell, she became widely known to the readers of light literature. Charlotte, as an authoress, was the most successful of the three, and, by the production of her "Jane Eyre," "Shirley," and "Villette," acquired a large reputation. She married the Rev. Mr. Nichols, her father's curate, but died about a year afterwards.
Born 1824; died 1855.

BROOKE, Sir JAMES, brook, rajah of Sarawak, an enterprising Englishman, who early entered the Indian army, and served in the Burmese war, in 1826. He was severely wounded at Rungpoor, and soon after quitted the service. On the death of his father, who had been in the East-India Company's civil service, he found himself possessed of a large fortune. Having in 1830 made a voyage to the Malay archipelago, he, in 1835, purchased a yacht of 140 tons, and getting together an expert crew, set sail for the East, with the avowed purpose of destroying the Malay pirates. Landing at Sarawak, a province in the N.E. of Borneo, he gained the affection of Muda Hassim, uncle of the sultan of the island, and having assisted in suppressing a rebellion of the Dyaks, he received the title of rajah of Sarawak,—a title reluctantly confirmed in 1841 by the Bornean sultan. He now devoted all his energies to the extinction of piracy, in which he was very successful. But the sultan having caused Muda Hassim, and other supporters of the English, to be massacred, Sir James, with the assistance of Admiral Cochrane, led an expedition against the capital, defeated the sultan's army, and obtained the cession to England of the island of Labuan, destined by its position to become an important commercial station. On his return to Great Britain in 1847, the rajah was received with great honours, obtaining the decoration of the Bath, and the title of governor of Labuan, with a salary of 2,000*l.* a year. He returned to the East, but went, in 1851, a second time to England, to defend himself against the fierce attack made in the House of Commons upon his pirate-killing propensities. The charges against him were not proved. In February, 1857, at Sarawak, an insurrection of the Chinese population broke out, threatening destruction to all the European settlers, who were obliged to fly and take refuge in the neighbouring swamps, until, aided by the Dyaks, they were placed in safety at Sabong. An English steamer entering the river Sarawak, it was placed at Sir James's disposal, and a severe retribution overtook the treacherous Chinese, nearly 3,000 perishing, principally in the guerilla contest carried on against them by the Dyaks.
Born at Bandel, Bengal, 1803; died at Baraton, Devonshire, 1868.

BROOKE, HENRY, an Irish author, who, after a poetical effort on "Universal Beauty," which gained the approbation of Pope, produced his "Gustavus Vasa," which the government would not permit to be acted, on account of the boldness of its language. This opposition increased his fame, and the play had a great sale. The prince of Wales became his friend; but though every prospect of advancement was presented to him, he relinquished all and returned to his native country of Ireland, where he continued the remainder of his days in privacy. He wrote some pieces for the Irish stage, which were successful, and the novel known as the "Fool of Quality," which was greatly admired by John Wesley, and republished in 1859, with a preface by the Rev. Charles Kingsley.
Born at Rantavan, Ireland, 1708; died in Dublin, 1783.

BROOKHAVEN, a township of Long Island, United States, including twelve villages within its compass. Area, 215 square miles. Manf. Woollen and cotton factories. Pop. 11,544.

BROOKLYN, brook'-lin, a city and seaport of the State of New York, United States, at the western extremity of Long Island, opposite New York, from which it is separated by the East River, three quarters of a mile wide. It is a large city, standing on uneven ground, with a vast number of churches, a city-hall of white marble, reading-rooms, libraries, and literary institutions, several banks, a naval yard comprising 40 acres, and the Atlantic, the largest dock in the United States. Pop. 566,663.—Brooklyn was founded by the Dutch in 1625. In 1776 this part of Long Island was the principal locality of the War of Independence. Lat. 40° 42′ N. Lon. 73° 59′ W.

BROOME, WILLIAM, broom, an English poet, who was employed by Pope in writing notes on the Iliad, and translating part of the Odyssey, for which he received 500*l.* and one hundred copies. Afterwards, however, Pope gave him a place in the Dunciad. In 1728 he was created LL.D., and obtained the rectory of Pulham, in Norfolk, and the vicarage of Eye, in Suffolk.
Born in Cheshire; died 1745.

BROOME, a county of New York State, United States. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing Indian corn and the usual cerealia. It has both iron-foundries and woollen factories, and contains a great many churches. Pop. 49,483.

BROSCHI, CARLO, bros'-ke. (See FARINELLI.)

BROSELEY, brose'-le, a market-town of Shropshire, on the Severn, 13 miles S.E. of Shrewsbury. It has a fine Gothic church and town-hall. Manf. Iron, fire-bricks, tiles, and tobacco pipes. Pop. 4,639.—A station on the Great Western Railway.

BROSSES, CHARLES DE, bros, French historian, who wrote an account of voyages to the lands of the southern seas, a history of the Roman republic in the 7th century, and other works showing great research. He was president of the Parliament of Burgundy.
Born at Dijon, 1709; died 1777.

BROTHERS, THE, a group of islets at the entrance of the Red Sea, 10 miles S. of Perim Island, varying from 300 to 350 feet in height. Lat. 12° 28′ N. Lon. 43° 22′ E.

BROTHERS, RICHARD, broth-ers, an enthusiast, who professed to be inspired with a spirit of prophecy and appointed to lead the Hebrews to the land of Canaan. He was in early life a lieutenant in the navy. He prophesied the death of the king and the destruction of the monarchy, and the establishment of the New Jerusalem, in 1795. He was once imprisoned, and at another time sent to Bedlam as a dangerous lunatic. Among those who believed in him were several persons of education and ability.

Born 1760; died 1824.

BROUGHAM, HENRY, Baron Brougham and Vaux, broo'-ham, or bro'-ham, received his education at the High School and university of Edinburgh, early distinguishing himself by his mathematical studies. He was designed for the legal profession; but, previous to his settling down as a practitioner, he travelled for some time on the continent, storing his mind with such useful knowledge as came within the scope of his observation. On his return he was admitted a member of the Edinburgh Society of Advocates; and, having made the acquaintance of Horner, Jeffrey, and several other talented young men, a "Speculative Society" was formed, in which Brougham soon distinguished himself as an extemporaneous debater. In 1802 the "Edinburgh Review" was started, and Brougham, after the third number, was admitted as a contributor to its pages. Whilst he was devoting his energies to the "Review" he was also writing "An Enquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers," which in 1803 was published in Edinburgh in two volumes, and was considered a remarkable work for so young a man to produce. Finding the practice of the Scottish bar but a limited field for such ambition as his, he went to London, where, in 1807, he qualified himself for the English bar. In 1808 he began to practise as an English barrister at the court of King's Bench, and on the northern circuit. Here he soon became distinguished by his eloquence; and, as an ally of the Whig party, was returned for Camelford to the House of Commons, by the earl of Darlington, who was the patron of the borough. His maiden speech was delivered on the 5th March, 1810; and although not remarkable for any quality beyond its general ability and appropriateness, still it was sufficiently striking to fix attention upon the man as likely to prove an able auxiliary to his party. When he spoke, he delivered himself with a daring vehemence, and an unexampled fluency. There was no hesitation, no confusion, no timidity in his utterance. On rolled the stream of his eloquence, strong from conviction, vehement from passion, and burning with invective as the occasion demanded. He soon stood all but alone in the house, Canning being the only one, in the opposition lists, that dared to oppose him. From 1812 to 1816 he was out of parliament, but in that year was returned for Winchelsea, again under the patronage of the earl of Darlington. The splendour and versatility of his talents were now universally acknowledged, and, in 1820, he was called upon to undertake the defence of Queen Caroline against her husband, George IV.; and this trial greatly increased his popularity. From 1830 to 1834 he was lord-chancellor, under the administration of Earl Grey, and carried with persistent energy some important measures of law reform. Throughout his whole career he was on the side of reform, and into whatever question he entered, he pursued it with an ardour and a perseverance which could only have been sustained by the most powerful conviction of its necessity. In 1821 he took a prominent part with Dr. Birkbeck in the establishment of literary and scientific institutions throughout the country, and was the principal founder of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. He was the unwearied advocate of slave emancipation, and has strenuously laboured in the cause of popular education. Amid the multifarious and exciting duties which devolved upon the legal politician and statesman, he ever remembered the sweets of literature and the pleasures of science, pursuing them both with the fervour of a devotee. In 1858 his speech at the inauguration of a monument to the memory of Newton, in Lincolnshire, was a masterpiece of its kind, and at the meeting of the British Association in the same year he delivered an address, which showed how well he was fitted to digest masses of materials into succinct forms, and to make subservient to his purposes every kind of knowledge, to the acquirement of which a long and industrious life enabled him to devote himself. During the last year of his life he resided chiefly at Cannes, in the South of France, where he occupied himself with researches in physical science, especially with regard to the nature of light. He was at various times Lord Rector of Glasgow University, president of University College, member of the Institute of France, Chancellor of the university of Edinburgh, and was also a D.C.L. of Oxford.

Born at Edinburgh, 1778; died at Cannes, 1868.

BROUGHTON, LORD. (See HOBHOUSE.)

BROUGHTY-FERRY, brow'-te, a town and watering-place of Scotland, in the county of Forfar, on the north shore of the estuary of the Tay, 3 miles E. of Dundee. It is well-built, and there are many handsome villas. Pop. 6,487. A station on the Caledonian railway.

BROUSSA, broos'-sa, a large manufacturing town of Asia Minor, at the foot of Mount Olympus. It is the ancient Prusa, and was the capital of the Turkish empire, previous to the taking of Constantinople in 1453. The town is beautifully situated, and has a great number of fine mosques. Silk is extensively manufactured, and the mixtures of silk and cotton known as Broussa goods are made here. An eastern suburb is separated from the town by a deep valley, crossed by several bridges, on which shops are built. A railway to the port of Moudanieh was constructed at a great expense, but has been allowed to fall into decay. The town has suffered greatly from earthquakes. Pop. 35,704.

BROUSSON, CLAUDE, broos'-ohn, a French advocate, who vehemently denounced the persecution of the Protestants by the government, and the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He took refuge at Lausanne, but returned to France, and at the hazard of his life preached in the Cevennes. In 1693 he went to Holland, and then travelled through Europe pleading the Protestant cause. Venturing to return to France, he was arrested and executed by being broken on the wheel.

BROWN, ROBERT, the founder of the sect called Brownists, was descended of a good family, and educated at Cambridge. Having formed, about 1580, a religious society at Norwich, he was imprisoned, but by means of treasurer Burleigh, to whom he was related, he obtained his liberty. After a life of difficulties, on account of religious principle and zeal, he ended his days in Northampton gaol, where he had been imprisoned for an assault on a constable. He may be considered as one of the founders of the English Independents.

Born 1550; died 1630.

BROWN, THOMAS, M.D., one of the most distinguished of modern metaphysicians, who studied in Edinburgh, first for the law, and afterwards for the profession of medicine, which he adopted. Dugald Stewart, professor of moral philosophy, being indisposed in the winter of 1808-9, engaged Dr. Brown to read lectures for him in his class. In this capacity his success was so complete that, in 1810, he was induced to resign his practice, and accept the appointment of colleague to Dugald Stewart in the chair of moral philosophy, in the university of Edinburgh. His lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind were published after his decease, and they have been pronounced masterpieces of their kind. His style is certainly the most captivating that has ever been employed to convey a knowledge of philosophy. He was the author of several poems which are now forgotten, and one of the young men whose talents contributed to the popularity and establishment of the Edinburgh Review.

Born at Kirkmabreck, Kircudbrightshire, 1778; died at Brompton, London, 1826.

BROWN, ULYSSES MAXIMILIAN, a field marshal, of Irish origin, in the Austrian army, who rendered great services to the empress Maria Theresa, gaining in 1746 the battle of Placentia, and taking Genoa. In 1756 he defeated Frederick the Great, who had invaded Bohemia, and won the battle of Losowitz. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Prague.

Born at Bâle, 1705; died 1757.

BROWN, CAPTAIN SIR SAMUEL, R.N., a naval officer, who rose to the rank of commander, but in 1842 accepted a retired captaincy. He devoted much of his time to civil engineering, and may be regarded as the first to introduce the use of chain-cables and suspension-bridges. Telford adopted his principle in constructing the Menai Bridge. In 1821 Captain Brown constructed the Trinity suspension pier at Newhaven, near Edinburgh, and subsequently several other bridges and piers, especially the one at Brighton. He was knighted in 1835.

Born in London, 1776; died 1852.

BROWN, ROBERT, D.C.L., F.R.S., an eminent botanist, was the son of a Scottish Episcopalian clergyman, and educated for the medical profession, accompanying, in 1795, a Scottish fencible regiment to Ireland. His peculiar aptitude for botanical study had, however, already developed itself; and on his friend Sir Joseph Banks's recommendation, he threw up his commission, and, in 1801, embarked as naturalist in the expedition under Captain Flinders, for the survey of the Australian coasts. Thence he returned to England, in 1805, bringing with him nearly 4,000 species of plants, a large proportion of which were entirely new to science, and also an inexhaustible store of new ideas in relation to the characters, distribution, and affinities of the singular vegetation which distinguishes the great continent of Australia from every other botanical region. To work out these ideas, both in relation to the plants of New Holland and in their comparison with those of other parts of the world, with wonderful sagacity, with the utmost minuteness of detail, and, at the same time, with the most comprehensive generalization, was the labour of many succeeding years. Honours were showered on him from all lands. His illustrious friend Alexander Von Humboldt justly called him "Botanicorum facile Princeps;" and after the death of Dryander, in 1810, he received the charge of the noble library and splendid collections of Sir Joseph Banks, who bequeathed to him their enjoyment for life. At a later period these were, with his assent, transferred to the British Museum, where, for 30 years, he was keeper of botany, receiving also a pension of £200 per annum, in recognition of his distinguished merits. He was for four years president of the Linnæan Society.

Born at Montrose, 1773; died in London, 1858.

BROWN, a county of Illinois, United States. Chief town, Mount Sterling. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

BROWN, a county of Indiana, United States. Nashville is the capital. Area, 320 square miles Pop. 10,264.

BROWN, a county of Ohio, United States. The chief town is Georgetown. Area, 502 square miles. Pop. 32,911.

BROWN, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Depere is the chief town. Area, 525 square miles. Pop. 34,078.

BROWNE, SIR THOMAS, an eminent physician and philosophical writer, who, having taken his degrees in arts, went to Leyden, where he became an M.D., and in 1642 published his famous book, the "Religio Medici," which excited uncommon attention at home and abroad. In 1636 he settled at Norwich as a physician, and acquired a good practice. In 1646 appeared his book on "Vulgar Errors," in folio. Charles II. honoured him with knighthood in 1671.

Born in London, 1605; died at Norwich, 1682.

BROWNE, SIR WILLIAM, an English physician, who left a sum for two prize medals, to be given annually at Cambridge for the best odes; and wrote several ingenious poems, miscellaneous tracts, speeches, and a work entitled "Opuscula." He also translated Dr. Gregory's "Elements of Catoptrics and Dioptrics," from Latin into English, with additions.

Born 1692; died 1774.

BROWNE, WILLIAM, a charming English poet, author of "Britannia's Pastorals." He was educated at Oxford, and studied for the bar, but preferred literature.

Born at Tavistock, 1590; died 1645.

BROWNING, ROBERT, brown'-ing, a distinguished modern English poet. In 1836 he published "Paracelsus," which was favourably received; and in 1837 produced "Strafford," a tragedy, in which Mr. Macready, the actor, personated the hero. His other works are "Sordello,"—"Pippa Passes,"—"Men and Women,"—"The Blot in the Scutcheon,"—"King Viator and King Charles,"—"Dramatic Lyrics,"—"Return of the Druses,"—"Columbe's Birth-day,"—"Dramatic Romances,"—"Balaustion's Adventure,"—"The Inn Album," and other works. He is a writer of great intellectual power; but his style is often painfully rugged and obscure.

Born at Camberwell, 1812.

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT, originally Miss Barrett, wife of the above, gave early indications of genius, and was educated with the utmost care. At the age of seventeen she published "An Essay of Mind, with other poems;" and in 1838 appeared her "Seraphim," which was succeeded by "The Romaunt of the Page,"—"The Drama of Exile,"—"Isabel's Child,"—"Casa Guidi Windows," and several miscellaneous pieces, all of which occupy a very high place in our poetical literature. Besides those original works, she had translated the "Prometheus Bound," of Æschylus, and contributed a series of papers to the London Athenæum on the Greek Christian poets. In 1856 appeared her "Aurora Leigh," which may be described as a novel of modern life cast in a metrical form.

Born in London, about 1809; died 1861.

BROZAS, bro'-zas, a Spanish town, province of Caceres. It occupies the summit of a lofty hill. Manf. Linen and woollens, leather, soap and earthenware. Medicinal baths in the neighbourhood are much resorted to. Pop. 7,100.

BRUCE, ROBERT, brooce, king of Scotland, one of the bravest and wisest of the Scottish monarchs. When quite a young man he swore fealty to Edward I. of England, but shortly afterwards took up arms against him. Through a long series of years he struggled against hardship and danger in endeavouring to recover the independence of his country. In a quarrel with John Comyn, "Red Comyn," a rival claimant to the throne of Scotland, he stabbed him in a church at Dumfries, in 1306, and two months afterwards was crowned king at Scone. He completely defeated the English at the battle of Bannockburn, in 1314, and that victory established his sovereignty over his country, and another victory gained over the English in 1327 led to the consolidation of his power, and a formal recognition of the independence of Scotland. Bruce died from leprosy at Cardross Castle, on the Firth of Clyde. His heart was embalmed, and carried by Douglas to the Holy Land, and his remains were interred in the abbey church of Dunfermline.

BRUCE, EDWARD, brother to the above, in 1315 assisted the chief of Ulster, in Ireland, to defeat the English in that province, and was chosen and crowned king of Ireland. He was killed at the battle of Dundalk.

Died 1317.

BRUCE, MICHAEL, a Scottish poet, the son of a weaver. He studied for the ministry, and showed great poetic ability, but died too early to have written much; but his descriptive poem of "Lochleven," based upon the model of Thomson, makes us regret that he was so early taken from us. His "Elegy," however, is his finest poem, describing in the most touching pathos his feelings in anticipation of his own early dissolution.

Born at Kinnesswood, Kinross-shire, 1746; died 1767.

BRUCE, JAMES, a celebrated traveller, descended from the royal house of Bruce, and educated first at Harrow, and next at Edinburgh, where he studied the law, which profession, however, he did not follow. On leaving Edinburgh he went to London, and entered into partnership with a wine-merchant, whose daughter he married; but after a few months she died, when he went on a journey through Portugal, Spain, France, and the Netherlands. Meanwhile his father dying, he returned to England, and took possession of the patrimonial estate. In 1761 he dissolved partnership with his father-in-law, and in 1763 was appointed consul-general in Algiers. In the following year he arrived there, but in 1765 was superseded in his office. He now set out upon his travels, and visited Asia Minor, where he made drawings of the ruins of Palmyra and Balbec. In 1768 he departed on his tour to explore the source of the Nile. From Alexandria he went to Cairo, and crossed the desert to the Red Sea, after which he spent a considerable time in Arabia Felix. In 1770 he arrived at Gondar, in Abyssinia, and in that country rendered himself a favourite by his skill in physic and his splendid horsemanship. In the same year he discovered the sources of the Abawi, which was then considered the principal stream of the Nile. Having accomplished this object, he returned to Abyssinia, where he served in the army under the reigning king, and it was with difficulty he obtained leave to quit the country, after residing there two years. He was nearly thirteen months in travelling to Cairo, during which he endured many hardships. He returned to England in 1773, and retired to his seat at Kinnaird. In 1790 he published the long-expected history of his travels, in five quarto volumes, which contained much curious information. His veracity was called in question; but more recent travellers have confirmed most of his statements. He died from a fall down the stairs of his own house.

Born at Kinnaird, Stirlingshire, 1730; died 1794.

BRUCHSAL, brook'-sal, a town of Baden, on the Salzbach, 12 miles N.N.E. of Carlsruhe. It is an ancient walled town, with an old castle, and the palace of the Grand Duke of Baden. Pop. 9,800.

BRUCK, brook, a town of Austria, government of Vienna, on the Leitha, 22 miles S.E. of Vienna. It is divided into the old and new towns. Manf. Cotton. Pop. 2,600.

BRUCKNEAU, brook'-no, a village of Bavaria, on the Sinn, 36 miles N.E. of Wurzburg. The baths, which are picturesquely situated, make the place a favourite fashionable resort. Manf. Paper. Pop. 1,500.

BRUGES, broozh, a large and opulent city of Belgium, capital of the province of West Flanders, about 8 miles from the German Ocean, with which it is connected by three canals. The name is derived from the numerous bridges in the town. It is encompassed by walls, and the principal public buildings are the town-hall, with a lofty tower, and a famous belfry, of which Longfellow sings in his "Belfry of Bruges:"—

"In the market-place of Bruges stands the belfry old and brown, Thrice consumed and thrice rebuilded, still it watches o'er the town."

The church of Notre Dame has a spire 450 feet high, and contains some very beautiful paintings, sculpture, and monuments; the cathedral of St. Sauveur, also containing many fine paintings; the court of justice, where there is a famous carved chimney-piece. Besides these, there are an academy of painting and sculpture, a seminary of theology, a school of surgery, and a number of charitable institutions.

Manf.—Woollens, linens, cottons, lace, tobacco, soap, leather, sugar, and cordage; and several distilleries, dye-works, and ship-building yards.

Pop. about 47,000, one-fourth, it is stated, being paupers.

Lat. 51° 12′ N. Lon. 3° 14′ E.

History.—Bruges is a very ancient place, and in the 7th century was the capital of Flanders; in the 13th century it was one of the greatest commercial cities in Europe, the central mart of the Hanseatic League, and the residence of many foreign ministers, the inhabitants numbering 200,000, but when the cruel persecutions of Philip II. compelled its inhabitants to flee into England, it began to decline. Charles II. of England lived here some time during his exile. In 1815, the town was made a part of the kingdom of the Netherlands, and in 1830 was included in the Belgian monarchy.

BRUHL, brool, a Prussian town, 9 miles S.W. of Cologne. It is surrounded by old walls, and has a fine palace, erected by the elector of Bavaria, in the early part of the 18th century. There is a Roman Catholic seminary, formerly an old Franciscan convent. Pop. 2,300.

BRUHL, HEINRICH, Count von, a reckless and dishonest minister of Augustus III. of Saxony. King and minister alike robbed the national finances, and the latter maintained the most splendid establishment in the kingdom. At the outbreak of the Seven Years' War Augustus and Bruhl fled to Warsaw, but returned to Dresden after the peace. Bruhl's library of 62,000 volumes now forms a portion of the Royal Library, Dresden.

Born at Weissenfels, 1700; died at Dresden, 1763.

BRUMMEL, GEORGE BRYAN, brum'-mel, a famous man of fashion of the time of the regency, generally known as "Beau Brummel." He was for many years the ruling authority on all points of dress and deportment. He ran through a large fortune, but at last was glad to accept the appointment of consul at Caen. The office was abolished, and he died in poverty.

Born in London, 1770; died at Caen, 1840.

BRUN, CHARLES LE. (See LEBRUN.)

BRUNCK, RICHARD FRANÇOIS PHILIPPE, broonk, French philologist and critic, who aided greatly the study of Greek literature. He took the popular side when the French Revolution broke out, and was imprisoned by Robespierre. His editions of some of the standard Greek authors are highly valued.

Born at Strasburg, 1729; died 1803.

BRUNDUSIUM, brun-dū'-se-um, a city of Calabria, on the Adriatic Sea, where the Appian road was terminated, founded by Diomedes, or, according to Strabo, by Theseus. It is famous for being the birthplace of the poet Pacuvius, and the scene of the death of Virgil. (See BRINDISI.)

BRUNE, GUILLAUME MARIE ANNE, broon, a French marshal, who was brought up to the law, but who, when the Revolution broke out, took up arms and served under Dumourier. He rose rapidly, and in 1795 became a general of brigade under Napoleon I. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army which invaded Switzerland, after the peace of Campo Formio; and also of that of Italy after the fall of Berne. In 1805 he was made a marshal of the French empire, and in 1807 he became governor of the Hanseatic towns, but fell into disgrace for omitting the titles of Napoleon in the text of the convention which procured for France from Sweden the surrender of the island of Rugen. He now went into retirement till the first abdication of Napoleon, when he submitted to Louis XVIII., who gave him the cross of St. Louis. In the "Hundred Days," he joined Napoleon, but after the battle of Waterloo, proclaimed the king. Leaving his corps and proceeding to Paris, he entered an inn at Avignon, where he was attacked by an infuriated mob, who accused him of having been a terrorist, and taken part in the massacres of 1792. At that time, however, he said he was fighting on the frontiers of his country against the enemy. Nevertheless they immediately shot him, dragged his body through the streets, and threw it into the Rhone.

Born at Brives, 1763; killed 1815.

BRUNEHILDE, brune-hild, a Visigothic princess, married to Siegebert I., king of Austrasia. She was a woman of unscrupulous ambition, and was put to death by Clothaire II., king of Soissons, on the charge of having murdered ten kings and royal princes.

Died 613.

BRUNEL, Sir MARK ISAMBARD, broo-nel', engineer, discovered from his boyhood a decided predilection for mechanical studies. His parents, who were respectable French agriculturists, discountenanced these pursuits; and he was induced to enter the mercantile marine, in which he made several voyages to the West Indies. Whilst employed in this service, he continued to give specimens of his mechanical ingenuity, and actually constructed a pianoforte whilst his ship was lying at Guadaloupe. The French revolution of 179- drove him from his country, and, landing in New York, he resolved to endeavour to turn his engineering skill to some account. Accordingly, he surveyed the ground for the canal which now connects the river Hudson at Albany with Lake Champlain. Desirous, however, of returning to Europe, he came in 1779 to England, where he married, and became a naturalised British subject. He produced several inventions, and submitted to the government a plan for making block-pulleys for ships, by machinery. This was carried into execution in the dockyard at Portsmouth, and proved a wonderful success. Brunel was now a made man: he continued to exercise his talents in constructive works at Woolwich, Chatham, and other places, and in 1825 commenced excavating for the Thames Tunnel, a work of vast design, but commercially a failure. This extraordinary work was opened to the public in 1843. In 1832 he was appointed vice-president of the Royal Society, and in 1841 the honour of knighthood was conferred upon him.

Born at Hacqueville, near Rouen, 1769; died 1849.

BRUNEL, ISAMBARD KINGDOM, son of the above, finished his education at the college of Henri IV. at Caen, in France, and commenced the study of civil engineering under his father. He was the resident engineer of the Thames Tunnel, and was the designer and civil engineer of the Great Western, which was the first steamship built to cross the Atlantic. He was also the constructor of the magnificent iron steam-ship, the largest ever constructed, the Great Eastern, which was built at Millwall. In 1833 he was appointed engineer to the Great Western Railway, and all the tunnels and works connected with that line and its branches were constructed under his direction. He also superintended the erection of many bridges; among which may be mentioned the Hungerford suspension-bridge across the Thames, and the bridge of the Cornwall Railway, crossing the Tamar at Saltash. This latter is supported by a central pier from a depth of 80 feet of water, which is the deepest yet achieved in civil engineering. It was opened in May, 1859, by Prince Albert, after whom it was named, and is the greatest undertaking of its kind in the world. His death is supposed to have been hastened by the anxieties and exposure incident to the difficulties attending the launch of the Great Eastern. He was elected on the council of the Royal Society in 1844; was vice-president of the Institute of Civil Engineers and the Society of Arts; fellow of several scientific societies, and a chevalier of the French Legion of Honour.

Born at Portsmouth, 1806; died 1859.

BRUNELLESCHI, PHILIP, broo-nel-les'-ke, an Italian architect, who erected the dome of the cathedral at Florence; the largest dome in the world, which Michael Angelo pronounced a work of uncommon beauty, and adopted as model for the dome of St. Peter's at Rome. He was patronized by the Medici family, for whom he built some magnificent structures. He was also an excellent engineer, and skilled in architecture. He is considered to be the originator of the beautiful Tuscan palace architecture of the 15th century.

Born at Florence, 1377; died 1444.

BRUNI, LEONARDI, broo'-ne, frequently styled "Aretino," from his birthplace, Italian scholar and historian. He filled several offices at the papal court, and was afterwards state secretary at Florence. He wrote a history of Florence, lives of Dante and Petrarch, and contributed greatly to a revival of Greek learning in Italy.

Born at Arezzo, 1369; died at Florence, 1444.

BRUNI ISLAND. (See TASMANIA.)

BRUNN, broon, the capital of the Austrian province of Moravia, at the confluence of the Schwarza, and the Zwittawa, 70 miles N.E. of Vienna. It is strongly fortified, and ranks among the most important manufacturing towns of the Austrian empire. There are a cathedral and a Gothic church (St. James's), which has a tower 276 feet high, and there are several fine residences palatial in character. Near the city is the castle of Speilberg, a state prison, where Silvio Pellico was confined. Manf. Woollens, cottons, silk, ribbons, yarns, soap, glass, tobacco, leather-factories and machinery. It is the centre of a trade between Austria and Bohemia, and the countries to the N. and E. of the Carpathian mountains. Pop. 82,660. Lat. 49° 12′ N. Lon. 16° 37′ E.—Brunn was the headquarters of Napoleon I. before the battle of Austerlitz.

BRUNNEN, broon'-nen, a village of Switzerland, in the canton of Schwytz, near the mouth of the Muotta, on Lake Lucerne. Here the basis of the Helvetic republic was laid by the three original cantons, Uri, Schwytz, and Unterwalden, in 1315.—In Germany the name of the "Brunnens" is applied to watering-places collectively.

BRUNNOW, ERNEST PHILIP VON, Count, broon'-no, diplomatist. He was a Saxon by birth, and studied at the university of Leipsic, but at an early age entered the Russian service, and assisted at the congress of Laybach and Troppau. After being engaged in various important positions in England, Turkey, Germany, and his own court, he was sent as ambassador to Great Britain in 1840, and remained in that post till the breaking out of the Russian war in 1854. In 1856 he was at the congress of Paris, and in 1858 returned to the court of St. James's. He represented Russia at the London conferences of 1864 and 1871, and in the latter year was raised to the rank of count.

Born at Dresden, 1797; died at Darmstadt, 1875.

BRUNO, GIORDANO, broo-no, pantheistic philosopher. He was born in the kingdom of Naples, and at an early age he entered the order of the Dominicans, but his expression of doubts as to some of the doctrines of the church necessitated his flight from the convent. He went to Geneva, and then to France and England, lecturing and writing. In this country he remained two or three years, enjoying the friendship of Sir Philip Sydney and other eminent men. He then went to Paris, Wittenberg (where he became a professor), and, after some further wanderings, to Venice, where he was arrested by order of the Inquisition, taken to Rome, and, after an imprisonment of two years, burned as an obstinate heretic. Descartes and Spinoza were indebted to the writings of Bruno, and the influence of his works is visible in modern German and American speculative literature.

Born 1550; died 1600.

BRUNO, archbishop of Cologne and duke of Lorraine, surnamed "the Great." He was the brother of Otto I., emperor of Germany. He was considered the wisest, most learned and eloquent man of his time, and was appointed lord high chancellor of the empire. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, and lives of various saints.

Born 928; died at Rheims, 965.

BRUNO, ST., founder of the Carthusian order of monks. He studied at Rheims, and was appointed director of all the schools in the diocese. At the age of 35 he, with a few companions, retired from the world and founded, near Chartreuse, the most austere of all the monkish orders. Three years afterwards the pope summoned him to Rome, a call he reluctantly obeyed; but in 1094 he established another Carthusian monastery in a lonely spot in Calabria, where he remained until his death. He was canonized in 1628.

Born at Cologne, 1051; died 1101.

BRUNSWICK, DUCHY OF, bruns'-wik, a state of the German empire, consisting of eight distinct parts, and divided for administrative purposes into six circles, Brunswick, Helmstedt, Wolfenbuttel, Blankenburg, Gandersheim, and Holzminden. The country is mountainous, especially in the S. portion; and, on the whole, indifferently watered. It is partly traversed by the branches of the Harz mountains.

Rivers.—The Ocker, Leine, and Wesser.

Pro.—The usual cerealia, with flax, seed-oil, tobacco, chiccory, hops, and fruits. Cattle-rearing is carried on to a great extent, and the sheep are esteemed as composed of excellent breeds.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, litharge, lead, iron, copper, sulphur, vitriol, and alum.

Manf.—Linens and woollens, stockings, paper, soap, lacquered wares, glass, and beer.

Pop.—350,000, mostly Lutherans.

Constitution.—The legislative power is vested in one chamber of 46 members; the executive is represented by a responsible ministry.

History.—Under the empire of Charlemagne, Brunswick was a part of Saxony. It was made a duchy in 1252.

BRUNSWICK, capital of the above, on the river Ocker, 35 miles S.E. of Hanover. Its principal public buildings are its churches, large wine-cellars, exchequer, meeting-house of the diet, mint, opera-house, town-hall, museum, arsenal, and cathedral of St. Blasius, with the tombs of deceased members of the royal family. Manf. Wool, yarn, linen, porcelain, pasteboard, paper-hangings, beet sugar, tobacco, and chemical preparations. The duke's palace is a handsome new structure at the termination of a fine avenue of lime trees. The old fortifications have been turned into public promenades. Pop. 58,000.

BRUNSWICK, a post township of Cumberland county, Maine, U.S., on the S.W. side of the Androscoggin. The falls of the Androscoggin furnish very great facilities for mills and manufactories. Bowdoin College, one of the richest and most celebrated of American institutions, and so called from Governor Bowdoin, its most liberal patron, was founded in this town in 1794. Its library contains 20,000 volumes. Pop. 5,384.

BRUNSWICK, a county of North Carolina, United States. The chief town is Smithville. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 9,389.

BRUNSWICK, a county of Virginia, United States, bordering on North Carolina. Lawrenceville is the capital. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 16,707.

BRUNSWICK BAY. A bay on the north-west coast of Australia. It receives Prince Regent river. Lat. 15° S. Lon. 125° E.

BRUNSWICK, NEW, a province of the dominion of Canada, in N. America, bounded S. by the Bay of Fundy, W. by the United States and part of Lower Canada, N. by Chaleur Bay, E. by the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It is fertile in general, but much of it still lies in a state of forest, which supplies vast quantities of timber for exportation. This, in fact, constitutes the principal wealth of the colony. Rivers. The St. John, Miramichi, and Ristigouche. Pro. Wheat, oats, maize, barley, and potatoes. The fisheries are a considerable source of wealth, and the rearing of cattle is becoming more an object of interest. Minerals. Iron, coal, and manganese. Area, 27,105 square miles. Pop. 321,233. Lat. between 45° and 48° N. Lon. between 63° 48′ and 67° 30′.

BRUNSWICK, NEW, a city of New Jersey, on the south-west bank of the Raritan, 30 miles S.W. of New York, United States. It contains, a court-house, gaol, college edifice, and several places of public worship. Pop. 17,166.

BRUNSWICK, HOUSE OF, one of the oldest German families, deriving its descent from Albert Azo I. margrave of Este, in Italy, who died in 964. Her majesty Queen Victoria is a descendant of one of the branches of this family. Several distinguished commanders have sprung from this house.

BRUNSWICK, CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, Duke of, was educated a soldier, and, after having fought in many campaigns, was defeated at Jena and Auerstadt, where he was wounded, and died shortly afterwards.

Born 1735; died 1806.

BRUNSWICK, WILLIAM FREDERICK, Duke of, son of the preceding, fell at Ligny, on June 16, 1815. It is to the gallantry of this prince that Byron, in the third canto of his "Childe Harold," dedicates a stanza in his description of the battle of Waterloo.

BRUSA. (See BROUSSA.)

BRUSSELS, brus'-sels (Fr. BRUXELLES, broox'-el), a large and important city, the capital of the kingdom of Belgium, situate in Brabant, on the river Senne, or Sienne, 20 miles from Antwerp. Its circumference is said to be 7 English miles, and its ramparts are planted with trees, and form most beautiful walks. It is built partly on the slope of a hill, and partly on the plain at the foot. The upper town, or the hillside, is the newer and more fashionable, and there the royal palace and the mansion of the foreign ministers are situated. The lower town is less healthy, but contains most of the older buildings and churches and public edifices of architectural and historical interest. The town has extensive suburbs, consisting of various villages, joined to the city by a continuity of streets. It has, besides, several public squares, of great beauty and elegance. Its chief ornaments, however, are its public promenades; no city in Europe possessing one superior to that which is called the Allée Verte, or Green Alley (leading to the palace of Laeken, the suburban residence of the royal family, three miles from the city), or to the great interior square called the Park, or the upper town, a beautifully laid-out area of 17 acres, surrounded by the king's palace, the palace of the prince of Orange, the house of representatives, and other public buildings. In the great market-place stands the hôtel-de-ville, an old but handsome edifice in the Gothic style. Its turret is 364 feet in height, and surmounted by a gigantic figure of St. Michael, in copper, 17 feet high. The cathedral of St. Gudule is a magnificent structure, containing no less than sixteen chapels, adorned in the interior with beautiful paintings and sculptures, and celebrated for its finely-carved pulpit. It dates from the 12th century, is built in the pointed Gothic style, with two towers 264 feet high. The chapel of Notre Dame is likewise an elegant building. There are, besides, several elegant mansions, belonging to noblemen. The palace of the fine arts includes a picture gallery, containing many of the finest specimens of the Flemish school, and a public library, rich in valuable manuscripts. There is also a very fine observatory. The opera-house is a stately edifice, in the Italian style, built in the year 1700. The public fountains are numerous, and are all embellished with sculptures. A statue to Godfrey de Bouillon was inaugurated in 1848. Belgium has many charitable foundations, and establishments for public instruction. There are, besides, a university, founded in 1834, a polytechnic, an academy of painting, sculpture, and engraving, and numerous primary and industrial schools. There are several literary and scientific establishments, an academy of Belles-Lettres, and a botanical garden.

Manf.—Lace, damasks, ribbons, carpets, carriages, jewellery, mathematical and musical instruments, tickling, various kinds of cotton and woollen stuffs, silk stockings, galloons, earthenware, &c. It carries on considerable trade by means of the canals which bring it into communication with the Scheldt.

Pop.—With suburbs, 403,389.

Lat. 50° 51′ N, Lon. 4° 21′ E.

History.—This city is supposed to have been founded at the commencement of the 7th century; Otho II. held his court here in the 10th century, and it was fortified in the 11th century. Its palace, which was built in 1300, and had been the residence of the dukes of Brabant since the time of John II., Charles V. of Spain abdicated his crown in favour of his son, Philip II., on Oct. 25, 1555; and, twelve years afterwards, the tyranny of the duke of Alva, Philip's bloodthirsty governor, drove 10,000 of its citizens to seek refuge and to settle in England. Under the French Empire, it was the capital of the department of the Dyle, and previous to 1830 it was one of the capitals of the kingdom of the Netherlands.

BRUTE, or BRUTUS, in the legendary history of Britain, the first king. He is said to have been the great grandson of Æneas of Troy, and to have landed in Devonshire and destroyed the giants who dwelt there.

BRUTON, broo'-ton, a town in Somersetshire, 7 miles S.E. of Shepton Mallet, on the river Brue. The church of the Virgin Mary is a handsome large building, in the late style of English architecture. There is a grammar school, originally founded in 1520. Manf. Hosiery and horsehair seating. Pop. 1700. A station on the Great Western railway.

BRUTUS, LUCIUS JUNIUS, bru'-tus, a hero of early Rome. His real history is almost obscured by legendary mists. It is said that his father, with his eldest son, having been murdered by Tarquin the Proud, he was called Brutus on account of his stupidity, which, however, was only feigned. He expelled the Tarquins from Rome, condemned to death his own sons Titus and Tiberius for conspiring against their country, and fell fighting for the liberties of the people.—His body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was spoken over it, and the Roman matrons showed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic.

Lived in the early part of the 5th century B.C.

BRUTUS, MARCUS JUNIUS, the son of Servilia, Cato's sister, and Decimus Junius Brutus, was lineally descended from the above. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar not only spared the life of Brutus, but made him one of his most faithful friends, and appointed him governor of Cisalpine

Gaul. He however was induced by Cassius and other Roman citizens to conspire against Cæsar, and stabbed him in Pompey's Basilica. Antony having taken up arms to avenge Cæsar, Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himself many friends by his arms, as well as by persuasion; but he was soon after pursued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi, and Brutus, being defeated, committed suicide. His second wife, Portia, was the daughter of Cato.

Born 85 B.C.; died 42 B.C.

BRUX, breux, a town of Bohemia, on the Bila, 14 miles N. of Saatz. In the neighbourhood are coal mines, and the famous mineral springs of Püllna and Seidlitz. Pop. 6,400.

BRUYERE, JOHN DE LA, broo'-yair, a French writer of eminence, whom Bossuet employed as a teacher of history to the duke of Burgundy. He was admitted a member of the French Academy. His "Characters in the manner of Theophrastus" acquired great popularity, as they were drawn from real persons, and exposed the prevailing follies in a bold yet delicate style.

Born at Dourdan, Normandy, 1644; died at Versailles, 1696.

BRUYERES, a French town, department Vosges, on the Aventelle, in the midst of the Vosges mountains. Manf. Calico, linen, thread, and cutlery. There is a considerable trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,300.

BRYANT, WILLIAM CULLEN, brī'-ant, one of the best of the American poets. He exhibited, at a very early age, a taste for poetry, but was educated for the law, and practised the profession for ten years; but in 1825 he assisted to establish the New York Review and Athenæum Magazine. He next began the publication of an annual called the "Talisman," which extended his popularity as a poet. Seeking, however, either a more extended sphere of usefulness or excitement, he became editor of the New York Evening Post. To this paper he has devoted his energies for the greater part of a long life.

BRZESC LITEWSKI, ber-chesc'-li-tev'-ski, a town of Russia, government of Grodno, on the right bank of the Bug. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 37,981.

BRZEZANY, ber-ché-zan-e, an Austrian town, in the province of Galicia, 47 miles S.E. of Lemberg. Manf. Sailcloth and leather. Pop. 7,300.

BRZEZYN, ber-ché'-zin, a Polish town of Moravia, on the Pilica, 61 miles S.W. of Warsaw. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 3,200.

BUA, ISLE OF. (See DALMATIA.)

BUBAON, boo'-ba-on, a Spanish town, in the province of Andalusia, 35 miles S.E. of Granada. There is an ancient Gothic church. Pop. 2,700.

BUCCINO, buc-ché-no, an Italian town, province of Salerno, on the Botta (crossed by an old Roman bridge), 14 miles E. of Campagna. There are quarries of fine marble in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5,500.

BUCER, MARTIN, boo'-sair, one of the Protestant reformers. At an early age he became a Dominican monk. An acquaintance with Erasmus gave him a tendency towards Protestantism, which he subsequently adopted. He was at first united with Luther, but afterwards inclined to Zuinglius, though he laboured much to bring the two parties to a union. He came to England in 1549, and was made divinity professor at Cambridge.—In the reign of Mary, his body was taken up and burnt. His writings are very numerous.

Born in Alsace, 1491; died 1551.

BUCH, LEOPOLD VON, book, German geologist, who studied under Werner, and afterwards travelled extensively, examining the strata and fossils of different parts of Europe. He stands in the very first rank of geologists.

Born at Stolfe, Prussia, 1774; died at Berlin 1853.

BUCHAN, WILLIAM, buk'-an, a physician, who, after studying medicine at Edinburgh, became physician to the Foundling Hospital at Ackworth, Yorkshire. He continued there till the institution was dissolved, and then returned to Edinburgh, where he practised several years with success. In 1770 he published his popular book, entitled "Domestic Medicine; or, a Treatise on the Cure and Prevention of Diseases," which attained to a sale of 80,000 copies during the author's lifetime. He then removed to London, where he obtained considerable practice.

Born at Ancram, in Roxburghshire, Scotland, 1729; died in London, 1805.

BUCHAN, the north-eastern district of ABERDEENSHIRE.

BUCHAN-NESS, 3 miles S. of Peterhead, in the easternmost point of Scotland. There is a lighthouse 130 feet high. Lat. 57° 28′ N. Lon. 1° 46′ W.

BUCHANAN, GEORGE, bu-kan'-an, an eminent writer, who studied at Paris and St. Andrew's University, Scotland. During his residence on the continent, he embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and was employed by James V. as a tutor to his natural son, the Earl of Moray. At the same king's command he attacked the Franciscans in a satirical poem, for which his life being threatened, he fled to England, and thence to France, where he obtained a professorship in the college of Guienne, in Bordeaux, and subsequently held the regency in the college of Cardinal Le Moine, from 1544 to 1547. He next went to Portugal, and became a teacher of philosophy in the university of Coimbra; but expressing some free opinions, he was confined in a monastery, in which he translated the Psalms of David into Latin. This is generally considered to be the finest Latin version of the book of Psalms. In 1551 he obtained his liberty, and after residing some time in France and England, returned to his native country, where he was appointed principal of the college of St. Leonard, in the university of St. Andrew's. This favour he obtained from Queen Mary, which he ill requited by writing a book called a "Detection of her Doings," designed to prejudice the minds of her subjects against her. The Scottish nobility now nominated him tutor to James VI. In this capacity he laboured to imbue the Scottish Solomon with wisdom, but succeeded only in making him a pedant, because, as he said, he could make nothing else of him. In 1570 he was made keeper of the privy seal. The last years of his life were employed in the composition of a history of Scotland, in elegant and powerful Latin.

Born at Killearn, Stirlingshire, 1506; died at Edinburgh, 1582.

BUCHANAN, JAMES, president of the United States for the years 1857 to 1861, was bred a lawyer, and at 23 years of age was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of Pennsylvania. In 1820 he was chosen a member of Congress, and kept his seat for eleven years. He then entered upon diplomacy, concluded an important commercial treaty with Russia, and was minister plenipotentiary at the court of St. Petersburg till 1833. Returning to America, he gained a seat in Congress, and was subsequently secretary of state under President Polk. In 1853 he was appointed by President Pierce ambassador to England, and remained there till 1856, when, being recalled, he was chosen by the democratic party as their candidate for the presidency, and was successful in the election. He represented the singular alliance between democratic progress and the retention of the "peculiar institution" of slavery; but, when the civil war broke out, heartily supported the policy of President Lincoln.

BUCHAREST, BUKHAREST, or BUKHOREST, boo'-kar-est, ("city of joy") capital of the principality of Roumania, situate on the Dumbovitza, in a swampy plain. It is irregularly and, in general, meanly built, but there are some handsome hotels, and rather picturesque churches. There is a fine corso, or public promenade. The cafés and gaming tables are numerous. The town is a great entrepôt of the trade between Turkey and Austria, grain, wool, timber, cattle, wax, and honey being among the chief articles of commerce. Pop. 220,000.

BUCHEN, a town of Baden, on the Morrebad, 1,130 feet above the level of the sea. There is a large Gothic church, built at the end of the 15th century. Manf. Weaving. There are large stone quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,400.

BUCHEZ, PHILIPPE JOSEPH BENJAMIN, boo-chai', French physician and writer, founder of the well-known journal L'Européan, in which he expounded his doctrines of progress, which he believed led to a belief in orthodoxy. He was strongly democratic in his political opinions, and after the revolution of 1848, was for a short time president of the National Assembly. He wrote a history of the establishment of the French nationality.

Born in the Ardennes, 1796; died 1865.

BUCKEBERG, beuk'-e-burg, capital of the principality of Lieppe-Schaunberg, on the Aue. It is a well-built walled town, and contains the palace of the prince. Pop. 3,300.

BUCKFASTLEIGH, buk'-fast-lea, a market-town of Devonshire, 3 miles S.W. of Ashburton. The church is a handsome building in the Anglo-Norman style. Manf. Woollens, blankets, leather, paper, and malt. Pop. 1,500.

BUCKINGHAM, buk'-ing-ham, a parliamentary borough and the county town of Buckinghamshire, situate on the Ouse, over which there are three stone bridges. The buildings, which are principally of brick, are scattered over a considerable surface. The church, which occupies an elevated site, was built in 1781. Its tower and spire are 150 feet high, and an elegant Gothic chancel was added in 1866. It has a town-hall, prison, and workhouse. The principal occupation of the inhabitants is the making of bobbin lace. Pop. 3,585.

BUCKINGHAM, a county in Lower Canada, chiefly in the district of Three-Rivers, on the S. side of the river St. Lawrence.

BUCKINGHAM, a county of Virginia, U.S., on James river. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Undulating, producing the usual cerealia, tobacco, and live stock. Rivers. The Willis and Slate. Pop. 15,540.

BUCKINGHAM, a county of Tasmania. Hobart Town is the capital.

BUCKINGHAM, Duke of, GEORGE VILLIERS, was the son of Sir George Villiers, a knight, who had lands in Leicestershire. He became a favourite of James I., was knighted in 1616, and in the following year was appointed master of the horse, made a Knight of the Garter, and received the titles of Baron of Whaddon and Viscount Villiers, and soon afterwards raised to the dignities of marquis and duke, and appointed to various important and lucrative offices. In 1621 he married the daughter of the earl of Rutland, the richest heiress in the kingdom. He commanded an expedition to Spain, which proved unsuccessful. In 1627 he made an attack upon the island of Rhé, near Rochelle, in which he lost 2,000 men, displaying his incapacity for such enterprises, and returned to England discredited both as an admiral and a general, and bringing no praise with him, as Hume says, "but the vulgar one of valour and personal bravery." Being intrusted with the command of a large force to relieve La Rochelle, he went to Portsmouth to superintend the necessary preparations, previous to his departure, when he was stabbed by a half-madman of the name of John Felton.

Born at Brookesley, Leicestershire, 1592; assassinated at Portsmouth, 1628.

BUCKINGHAM, GEORGE VILLIERS, second Duke of, son of the above, was as distinguished by his wit as his profligacy. He served in the royal army at the outbreak of the Parliamentary War, in consequence of which his estates were confiscated, and he went into exile. He returned privately in 1659, and married the daughter of Fairfax, the parliamentary general, to whom the estates had been assigned. He was imprisoned by Cromwell, but liberated at the Restoration, when his estates were restored to him, and he was made Master of the Horse. He engaged in plots against the king, but was forgiven, and in 1670 was sent on an embassy to France. In 1671 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. After the death of Charles he retired to his manor of Helmsley, Yorkshire. He was a man who had made "the whole body of vice" his study, and even had the heartlessness to propose the removal of the wife and queen of his sovereign to a West-Indian plantation, to quiet his apprehensions of her interfering with some of his infamous intrigues. His name contributes a letter in the anagram of the "Cabal" ministry, of which he was a member. This is the nobleman who furnished Pope with a subject for a few satirical lines in one of his moral essays, and also sat for Dryden's portrait of Zimri, in his "Absalom and Achitophel." Scott introduces him in "Peveril of the Peak." He himself was an author of considerable wit, and produced several pieces which, in their day, enjoyed some reputation. His "Rehearsal" especially was popular, on account of the severe ridicule which it bestowed upon Dryden, under the character of Bayes, as well as on account of the wit with which it sparkled.

Born at Westminster, 1627; died at Kirkby Moorside, 1688.

BUCKINGHAM, JOSEPH SILK, an enterprising traveller, a lecturer, and a social reformer. He was the son of a Cornish farmer, went to sea when a boy, and was afterwards apprenticed to a printer, at which trade he worked for several years. He went to India, and in 1816 established a journal, but, from the freedom of his criticisms upon the administration of public affairs, he was expelled from the presidency of Bengal, and ruined in his fortunes. On his return to England he started the Oriental Herald and the Athenæum. He travelled in the United States, and afterwards represented Sheffield in the House of Commons from 1832 to 1837. To make some amends for the treatment he had received the East-India Company, a few years before his death, allowed him a pension. In 1843 he was the chief agent in establishing the "British and Foreign" Institute, of which he was appointed secretary, but which preserved a languid existence only for three years. He subsequently became a pensioner on the civil list to the extent of 200*l.* a year. His books of travel are extremely interesting.

Born at Flushing, near Falmouth, Cornwall, 1786; died in London, 1855.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, Duke of, JOHN SHEFFIELD, was the son of Edmund, earl of Mulgrave, and served under Marshal Turenne, and took an active part in the revolution of 1688. In 1694 he was created Marquis of Normanby, and in 1703 Duke of Buckinghamshire. Buckingham House, in St. James's Park, now the royal palace, was erected by him. He wrote some poems, which, we imagine, in his time were presumed to evince genius, rather than to be in the actual possession of it, notwithstanding that he received the praises of Pope and Dryden.

Born 1649; died 1721.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, or BUCKS, buk'-ing-ham-sheer, a county of England, having Northampton on the N.; Bedford, Hertford, and Middlesex on the E.; Berks on the S.; and Oxford on the W. Ext. About 45 miles in length, by 18 in breadth. The Chiltern Hills and other chalk ranges traverse the county from the west to the north-east, attaining an elevation in some parts of 900 feet. The other parts, particularly the vale of Aylesbury, are noted for fertility. Rivers. The Thames, Ouse, Thane, and Colne. Pro. Corn and cattle, for which it enjoys a high reputation: large plantations of beech are grown. Manf. Paper, lace, and straw-plait. Area, 738 square miles. Pop. 176,000.

BUCKLAND, WILLIAM, D.D., buk'-land, dean of Westminster, and a distinguished geologist and mineralogist. In 1813 he was appointed reader in mineralogy, and in 1818 reader in geology, at the university of Oxford. In 1822 the Royal Society awarded him the Copley medal for "An account of an assemblage of fossil teeth and bones of the elephant, hippopotamus, bear, tiger, hyæna, and sixteen other animals, discovered in a cave at Kirkdale, Yorkshire." He published several works in connection with his favourite science, including one of the Bridgewater Treatises. In 1845 he was made dean of Westminster. He was a member of several scientific societies, and a trustee of the British Museum.

Born at Axminster, 1784; died 1856.

BUCKLE, HENRY THOMAS, historical and philosophical writer. By his own exertions he attained a great amount of scholarship, and being of independent means was enabled to gratify his literary tastes. In 1857 he published the first volume of his "History of Civilization in England," and was at once recognized as a writer and thinker of great originality and power. In 1861 he undertook a journey to the East, but was attacked with fever, which ended fatally, while crossing the Syrian desert.

Born at Lee, in Kent, 1823; died at Damascus, 1862.

BUCKS, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Delaware. It is fertile, producing the usual cerealia, and having a great many streams driving a considerable amount of mill-machinery. Minerals. Iron, limestone, sandstone, and plumbago. Manf. Paper and woollen fabrics. There are some foundries, distilleries, and several grist and saw-mills. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 65,000. This was one of the three original counties formed by William Penn.

BUCKSPORT, a maritime town of Maine, United States, on the left bank of the Penobscot river. There is a fine harbour, with depth of water for the largest vessels. Pop. 3,100.

BUDA, boo'-da, (in German OFEN) a city of the Austrian empire, on the west bank of the Danube, opposite Pesth, with which it is connected by a suspension bridge. Buda and Pesth united form the capital of Hungary. It is 130 miles S.E. of Vienna. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the side of a hill, and its castle was chosen by the emperor Louis I. as his place of residence. Above the castle are the citadel, the palace, and an old Gothic church. The fortifications have been recently greatly strengthened. It is a place of considerable trade, especially in wine, and is celebrated for its baths. Manf. Silk, velvet, cotton, leather, iron castings, and printing-types. Lat. 47° 29′ N. Lon. 19° 3′ E.—In 1526 this place was taken by Soliman the Magnificent, but retaken in the following year by Ferdinand I., king of Bohemia. In 1529 it was again taken by Soliman, and held by the Turks till 1680, when it was taken by the duke of Lorraine, who blew up the castle. During the civil war of 1849, it was bombarded by Georgey, and suffered severely.

BUDE, or BUDÆUS, GUILLAUME, bood, French scholar of the highest rank, royal librarian, and one of the founders of the Royal College of France.

Born at Paris, 1467; died 1540.

BUDINGEN, bood'-ing-en, a town of Hesse-Darmstadt, 25 miles N.E. of Frankfort, containing a royal palace. Manf. Paper and pins. There is a stone-quarry in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,900.

BUDGELL, EUSTACE, budj'-el, an English writer, who received his education at Christ-church, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple, for the purpose of following the profession of the law. Mr. Addison, to whom he was related, took him to Ireland as one of his clerks, and he was appointed secretary to the earl of Wharton, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He wrote several papers for the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian; "Lives of the Family of the Boyles," and translated Theophrastus's Characters from the Greek. He committed suicide in the Thames, having previously written on a scrap of paper, "What Cato did, and Addison approved, cannot be wrong." It is almost unnecessary to say that the supposition that Addison approved of suicide because he wrote the play "Cato," was a lamentable error.

Born at Exeter, 1685; died 1736.

BUDRAWUR, bood'-ra-wa, ("stronghold of Budda,") a town of the Punjaub, Hindostan, beautifully situated on the south slope of the Himalayas, 5,000 feet above the sea level. The fort is large and built of stone. Manf. Cashmere shawls. Pop. 2,000.

BUDWEIS, boot'-vise, a mining town of Bohemia, the capital of a circle of the same name, situate on the Moldau, 77 miles S. of Prague. There is an old cathedral. Manf. Cloth, machinery, lead pencils, and saltpetre. Pop. 17,500.

BUENAVENTURA, boo-ai'-na-van-tu-ra, a seaport of New Granada, South America, on a small island at the mouth of the Dagua. It is the port of Bogota. Lat. 3° 56′ N. Lon. 76° 42′ W.

BUENOS AYRES, boo-ai'-noss, i'-ress, the principal province of the Argentine republic, S. America, is bounded N. by extensive tracts of desert country, E. by Brazil and the Atlantic Ocean, S. by Patagonia, and W. by Peru and Chili. Its length may be estimated at upwards of 1,600 miles, and its breadth at nearly 1,000. In the N. large portions of it are covered with swamps and lakes, and it is in general flat. In the S. and S.E. it is, for the most part, mountainous, the Sierra del Vulcan and the Sierra Ventana occupying large portions of its area.

Rivers.—The Quequin, Salta, and Saldana.

Climate.—Variable and moist. Some years the droughts are excessive; but usually the rains are sufficient to serve all the purposes of a healthy and productive vegetation. In the N. the dry kind of wind, characteristic of the sirocco in Italy, prevails; and in the S. the pamperos or hurricanes, accompanied by fierce peals of thunder, are sometimes terrific.

Pro.—Though an immense portion of the province is adapted for agriculture, yet is it affirmed that not one thousandth part of it is under cultivation. A considerable quantity of corn, however, is raised; but the inhabitants are averse to settled pursuits, and devote by far the greater portion of their lives to the rearing of cattle, horses, mules, and asses, and fishing and navigation. Immense flocks of sheep are raised, and the cattle-farms, or estancias, as they are called, are upon a vast scale. Horses, mules, and asses; hides, horns, hair, tallow, wool and wheat are exported. A large coasting trade in fruits is also done.

Area, 63,000 square miles.
Pop. 2,830,000.

BUENOS AYRES, 'good air,' the capital of the above province, is situate in a plain about 150 miles from the mouth of the river La Plata, on its southern shore, where the river is 36 miles broad. The streets are wide, and laid out according to a regular plan. The cathedral is spacious and elegant, and is surmounted by a large and lofty dome. The church of St. Francis and that of the Convent of Mercy are also worthy of notice. The church of St. John, which is on the skirts of the town, is appropriated to the Christian Indians. The town-hall, which stands on one side of the great square, or Plaza de la Vittoria, is a large and handsome building; and there are several convents and nunneries; also an hospital for men, and one for women; a foundling hospital, and an hospital for orphans. All these edifices are built of a fine white stone, which is found in a small plain not far from the town. The castle or fort is very insignificant as a military position: it contains a house for the military governor, and a royal chapel. The port of Buenos Ayres is a great outlet for the produce, not only of the extensive country which lies to the east of the Andes, but also for that of Peru and Chili. The most valuable commodities are sent here to be exchanged for European goods, such as vicunha wool from Peru, copper from the mines of Coquimbo, gold from Chili, and silver from Potosi. Pop. 300,000, about a fourth being of European birth or descent. Lat. 34° 36′ S. Lon. 58° 23′ W. —Buenos Ayres was founded in 1535 by Don Pedro de Mendoza, and was taken possession of by the British in 1806. It was retaken, six weeks after, by the inhabitants; and a new attempt to take it by the British, after they had received reinforcements, failed, with great loss.

BUFFALO, buf'-a-lo, the capital of Niagara county, New York, at the east end of Lake Erie, 16 miles from Niagara Falls. It is regularly built with wide streets, and has, besides the usual public buildings, a university, courthouse, lyceum, four churches, and a Roman Catholic cathedral in the Gothic style. Manf. Iron and wool are the most important. It is one of the most rapidly rising towns in the United States. Improvements in the Niagara and St. Lawrence have enabled sea-going ships to reach the city, which possesses a good harbour, and the Erie and other canals afford communication with the Hudson and Ohio, and, by the latter river, with the Mississippi. Pop. 155,135! Lat. 42° 53′ N. Lon. 78° 55′ W.—It was burnt by the British during the war of American Independence, but was subsequently rebuilt.

BUFFALO, a river of Niagara county, New York, running into Lake Erie, at Buffalo. Another in Pennsylvania, running into the W. branch of the Susquehannah, above Louisburg. Another, which runs into the Mississippi, 2 miles above Fort Adams.—There are several other smaller rivers of the same name in the United States.

BUFFALO LAKE, the name of three lakes in British N. America, between Lat. 52° and 66° N. Lon. between 112° 10′ and 113° 45′ W.

BUFFALORA, boof'-fa-lor'-a, a small town of Italy, about 25 miles N.N.W. of Pavia, on the Ticino, here crossed by a bridge. The place is chiefly notable as the spot where the Austrians invaded Italy in 1859.

BUFFON, GEORGE LOUIS LECLERC, Count de, boof'-fawng, an illustrious French naturalist, was the son of a counsellor of the parliament of Dijon, where he studied for the law. His inclination, however, led him into the paths of science, and he paid much attention to astronomy and geometry. At the age of twenty he made the tour of Italy, after which he visited England, and, in 1735, published some translations from the English. In 1739 he was admitted into the Academy of Sciences, and appointed superintendent of the royal garden and cabinet, which, by his care, were considerably enriched and improved. Profiting by the resources of the establishment over which he presided, he devoted himself entirely to the study of natural history. In 1749 appeared the first part of his great work, "Natural History, general and particular," which was not completed till 1767. In 1771 appeared his "History of Birds," and in the same year he was created a count. In 1773 he began his "History of Minerals."

Born at Montbard, Burgundy, 1707, died 1788.

BUG, or BOG, boog, two rivers of Russian Poland. The first, rising in Galicia, joins the Vistula 18 miles from Warsaw, after a course of 300 miles. It is connected by a canal with the Dnieper. The second is the ancient Hypanis, and after a course of 340 miles, falls into the estuary of the Dnieper, 30 miles from Kherson.

BUGEAUD DE LA PICONNERIE, THOMAS ROBERT, boozh'-o, duke of Isly, a marshal of France, who, in 1804, entered the army as a private, went through all the campaigns of Napoleon I., and rose to the rank of colonel by his valour in the field. Even after the decisive defeat of the emperor at Waterloo, he held his ground in Savoy; and on the 28th June, 1815, at L'Hôpital-sous-Conflans, made the last stand against the allies, defeating with 1,700 men a body of 8,000 Austrians. After Napoleon's abdication, he busied himself with agricultural pursuits. In 1830 he was recalled from his retirement, and under Louis Philippe, energetically repressed the insurrections in Paris. In 1836 he was sent to Algeria, where he defeated Abd-el-Kader on the Sikkah, but made a treaty with the Arab chief at Tafna, which unfortunately gave that formidable opponent of France many advantages. In 1840 he was made governor of Algeria, and displayed in that capacity considerable administrative talents. He was incessant in his pursuit of Abd-el-Kader, who was again in arms at the head of a large force; and after several minor successes, General Bugeaud, who was made a marshal in 1843, met the Arab army at Isly, and there gained, with 10,000 men against 40,000, a decisive victory. This battle gave him the title of duke of Isly. In 1847 he retired, discontented that his plans for colonizing Algeria were thwarted. Summoned to the aid of Louis Philippe on the night of the 23rd and 24th of February, 1848, the command of the army was, a few hours afterwards, taken from him, just as he had adopted decisive measures to save the monarchy. After the election of Louis Napoleon, in the December following, as president of the republic, Bugeaud was taken into favour, and received the command of the army of the Alps, but died of cholera soon afterwards.

Born at Limoges, 1784; died at Paris, 1849.

BUGENHAGEN, JOHANN, boo'-gen-ha'-gen, surnamed Pomeranus, reformer and friend of Luther, whom he assisted in the translation of the Bible. He established several churches in Germany, and in 1537 was invited to Denmark, where he effected great reforms in church management. He returned to Wittenburg in 1542.

Born near Stettin, 1485; died 1558.

BUGULMA, boog-ul'ma, a Russian town in the government of Orenburg. The town is well-built, and a large trade is carried on in woollen and cotton goods. There are two important annual fairs. Pop. 4,700.

BUHL, beul, a town of Baden, 20 miles N.E. of Strasburg. Manf. Stockings, and there are large dye-works. Pop. 2,800.

BUILTH, bilth, a town of Wales, in Brecknockshire, 12 miles from S. Radnor, S. Wales. Pop. 1,059.—Here are the remains of an ancient castle, which seems to have stood on several acres of ground.

BUITENZORG. (See JAVA.)

BUJALANCE, boo-ja-lan'-ce, a city of Spain, in the province of Andalusia, 20 miles E. of Cordova. It is surrounded by a wall, and has the remains of a Moorish castle. A large fair is held annually. Manf. Woollens, glass, and pottery. Pop. 9,000.

BUKOWINA, boo'-ko-veen-a, a province of Austria, bounded N. by the Dniester, E. and S. by Moldavia, W. by Transylvania, Galicia proper, and Lodomeria. It is a well-watered productive country, enjoying a trade in cattle, horses, wool, hides, honey, and wax. Mining affords employment to many of the inhabitants. Area, 3,981 square miles. Pop. 571,671.

BULACAN, bu-la-can', a town of Luzon, one of the Philippine islands, 20 miles N.W. of Manilla. Manf. Silk, mats, and sugar. Pop. 9,500.

BULGARIA, bool-gair'-e-a, a principality of south-eastern Europe, formerly a province of Turkey, but erected by the treaty of Berlin of 1878 into a tributary principality, under the suzerainty of the sultan. The prince is elected by the population, and there is political and religious freedom. The Danube forms the northern frontier; the Black Sea the eastern; and the southern is for the most part marked by the main chain of the Balkans. The soil is rich and well-wooded.

Rivers.—The Danube, with its affluents the Isker, Vid, Jantra, and Osma; and the Pravadi and the Kamtchik. This last falls into the Black Sea.

Pro.—Hemp, flax, cattle, hides, horns, timber, and attar of roses. The usual cerealia of Europe are raised, but not in great quantities.

Manf.—Woollens, leather, and rifle-barrels; but as a large proportion of the inhabitants devote themselves to rural occupations, manufactures are not actively pursued.

Area, 24,360 square miles.

Pop. 2,000,000.

Political Divisions.—There are nine provinces: Widdin, Sistova, Rustchuk, Varna, Tirnova, Sofia, Philippopolis, Slivno, and Skobolia.

History.—The Bulgarians, a people from the banks of the Volga, established themselves here in the 7th century. The country was subdued by Turkey in 1392.

BULGRAD, or BOLGRAD, bol'-grad, a town, formerly of Bessarabia, situate not far from the river Yalpack, and memorable as the principal subject of dispute at the conference held, in 1857, at Paris, after the Russian war, to settle the boundary line between Russia and Turkey.

BULL, JOHN, Dr., bool, a famous musician, who, in 1591, was created doctor, and appointed organist of the royal chapel. He was the first professor of music in Gresham College. He is popularly considered to be the composer of the national anthem, "God Save the King;" but he probably only adapted it from an older air.

Born at Wells, Somersetshire, 1563; died at Lubeck, 1622.

BULL, OLE BORNEMANN, a celebrated Norwegian violinist, whose father destined him for the church. He was educated at the university of Christiana, but made little progress until he had an opportunity of showing his great natural musical talents. He then became an object of enthusiasm with his countrymen, for he was the first musical genius Norway had produced. In 1829 he set out for Germany; but neither here nor in France had he, at first, any success. After meeting with much misfortune, however, he achieved everywhere great triumphs, and performed in most of the cities of the continent, and England. He ultimately settled in the United States, where he founded a Scandinavian colony, called Olebullia, which resulted in a failure.

Born at Bergen, 1810.

BULLAS, bool'-as, a Spanish town, province of Murcia. Manf. Linen, earthenware, and brandy. Pop. 5,000.

BULLER, the Right Hon. CHARLES, bool'-ler, was the son of a gentleman in the civil service of the East India Company, and was returned M.P. for West Looe, Cornwall, in 1830. In 1832 he became member for Liskeard, for which town he sat until his death. In 1847 he was appointed president of the Poor-law Commission, and was an extensive contributor to the Edinburgh and the Westminster Reviews, as well as to the newspaper press.

Born at Calcutta, 1806; died in London, 1848.

BULLINGER, HENRI, bul'-ling-er, Swiss reformer. He studied at Cologne, and assisted Zwingle to establish the reformed doctrines in the canton of Bern in 1528. The following year he married a nun, by whom he had 11 children. In 1531 the Catholic party drove him from Bern, and he took up his residence at Zurich. He took an active part in establishing a relation between the Swiss and Anglican churches. He was distinguished for piety and moderation. His chief work was a history of the Reformation.

Born in the canton of Aargau, 1504; died 1575.

BULOW, FRIEDRICH WILHELM VON, boo'-lo, a distinguished Prussian general, who, in the campaign of 1813, saved Berlin by the victories he gained at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz, for which latter he was rewarded with the title of count of Dennewitz, and an estate worth 30,000*l.* a year. He took a prominent part in the battle of Leipsic, and also in the final defeat and pursuit of the French at Waterloo.

Born 1755; died at Königsberg, 1818.

BULSAR, a town in India, in the district of Surat, 169 miles N. of Bombay, at the mouth of a small stream, discharging into the Gulf of Cambay. It is a thriving town. Manf. Cloth and sugar. Pop. 7,000.

BULWER, Sir E. LYTTON.—(See LYTTON, Sir E. BULWER.)

BULWER, Sir HENRY LYTTON EARLE, bool'-wer, a privy councillor, a diplomatist, and an author. In 1830 he entered Parliament, and between then and 1837 represented Wilton, Coventry, and Marylebone. He was afterwards connected with diplomatic missions to Berlin, Vienna, the Hague, Paris, Brussels, Constantinople, and in 1843 was despatched to Madrid as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. In 1848 he was dismissed from the Spanish court, on account of his opposition to the arbitrary conduct of the government of that country, but he was supported by his own government, and Spain was, for two years, without a British representative at her court. In 1849 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the United States, and in 1851 became envoy extraordinary to Tuscany. In 1851 he was made Knight Grand Cross of the order of the Bath, and, in 1858, succeeded Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as ambassador at the Ottoman Porte. He was raised to the peerage as Lord Dalling and Bulwer in 1871. His literary performances are "An Autumn in Greece;" "France, Social and Literary;" "The Monarchy of the Middle Classes," and a life of Byron.

BULWUDUN, bool-wood'-doon, a town of Asiatic Turkey, Natolia, 220 miles from Smyrna, containing many antiquarian remains. It is the ancient Polybotum.

BUNCOMBE, bun'-kum, a county of North Carolina, U.S. In this county are Black, Bald, and Smoky mountains, lofty peaks of the Blue Ridge. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 21,909.

BUNDELCUND, boon-del-koond', an extensive district of Hindostan, in the division of Allahabad, in the north-west provinces. It is mountainous, crossed by the Vindhyan range, and watered by several tributaries of the Jumna. There are some woodlands and extensive jungles. It is supposed that there are large deposits of iron ore, and that coal fields exist. Area, 18,000 square miles. Pop. 2,500,000. Lat. between 24° and 26° 26′ N. Lon. between 78° and 81° 39′ E. Chief Towns. CALPEE, JHANSI, CALLINGER, Banda, Jalun, and Chaturpoor.

BUNGAY, bun'-gai, a market-town of Suffolk, on the Waveney, 30 miles N.E. of Ipswich. St. Mary's church is an elegant structure, with a fine steeple, and an interesting old church is Holy Trinity, with a round tower. A handsome cross is in the market-place. There are an assembly-room, theatre, and bath-house; and there are also the ruins of a Benedictine monastery. There is a considerable trade carried on in agricultural produce, coal, and corn; and there is a large printing-office in the town. Pop. 3,503.

BUNKER'S HILL. (See BOSTON, U.S.)

BUNOL, boo'-nol, a Spanish town, province of Valencia. There are remains of ancient fortifications. Manf. Cloth, paper, and woollens. Pop. 2,500.

BUNSEN, CHRISTIAN KARL JOSIAS, baron, boon'-sen, diplomatist, theologian, and philologist, was educated at the university of Göttingen, where he greatly distinguished himself as a classical scholar. He subsequently went to Copenhagen, where he acquired the Icelandic language, and to Paris, to study eastern languages under Sylvestre de Sacy, the orientalist, with a view of going to India. Having been introduced to the celebrated Niebuhr, he became his secretary at Rome, but in 1818 obtained a higher position as secretary to the Prussian embassy in the Roman capital. Here he pursued his classical studies with Niebuhr, and, at the same time, took a deep interest in the hieroglyphical researches of Champollion. In 1822 the king of Prussia visited Rome, and soon became aware of the abilities of his secretary of legation. This was the prelude to his rise in the world of diplomacy. When Niebuhr retired from the embassy at Rome, Bunsen was appointed to fill his place. In 1839 he became ambassador to the Swiss confederacy, and, in 1841, was appointed Prussian ambassador to England. Here he remained, esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, till 1854, when his opinions of Prussian policy relative to the Russian war led either to his resignation or recall. He wrote many works; but he is, perhaps, best known in England by "Egypt's Place in History," and "God in History."

Born at Korbach, in the principality of Waldeck, 1791; died at Bonn, 1860.

BUNSEN, ROBERT WILHELM, German chemist, professor at Cassel, Marburg, and Breslau, and in 1852 appointed to the chair of chemistry at Heidelberg. In 1860 he invented the magnesian light, and he was associated with Kirchhoff in discovering the spectrum analysis.

Born at Göttingen, 1811.

BUNYAN, JOHN, bun'-yan, one of the most celebrated English writers, was originally a travelling tinker, and, having neither been taught to read nor to write, led a wandering life for some years, serving for some time in the parliamentary army. He took part in the siege of Newark in 1645. At length his attention was happily drawn to higher subjects, and he began to study the Scriptures, of which he acquired a great knowledge. About 1655 he became a member of, and was accustomed to address, a Baptist congregation at Bedford. On this account, he was, after the Restoration, confined in the gaol of that town for twelve years and a half, supporting himself and family by tagging laces. Here he wrote the famous "Pilgrim's Progress," probably the most widely read religious allegory ever written, and which has been translated into many languages. On his release from prison, he became teacher of the Baptist congregation at Bedford, often travelling into different parts of England to visit the people of that persuasion, and was consequently called Bishop Bunyan. He wrote the "Holy War" and "Grace Abounding." He was buried in Bunhill Fields burying-ground, London, where a handsome monument has been recently erected. In 1874 a commemoration statue was erected at Bedford.

Born at Elstow, Bedfordshire, 1628; died in London, 1688.

BUNZLAU, boonts'-lou, a Prussian town, in the province of Silesia, on the Bober, 25 miles N.W.

of Liegnitz. It is surrounded by a double line of walls. In the market-place is an obelisk commemorating the Russian general Kutusow, who died in the town in 1813. Manf. Woollens, linen, hosiery, and earthenware. Pop. 8,800.

BUNZLAU JUNG, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the left bank of the Iser, 32 miles N.E. of Prague. There is a circle of the same name of which the town is the capital. Manf. Cotton, woollens, leather, and soap. Pop. 8,700.

BUOL-SCHAUENSTEIN, Count de, boo'-ol-shohn-stine, an Austrian diplomatist, who commenced his career as chargé d'affaires for Austria at the Hague. In 1792 he was appointed chamberlain; and, a short time afterwards, went to Bâle as envoy extraordinary, and afterwards presided at the diet of Ratisbon, where his efforts were used to maintain the union of the allied princes against France. He was afterwards employed at Hamburg on a diplomatic mission. In 1815 he represented Austria at the diet of Frankfort; and, up to 1822, filled the high position of president of the Germanic confederation. He then retired from public affairs till 1850, when he again presided at Frankfort, and was afterwards prime minister of Austria. He was at the head of affairs when war was declared against Sardinia in April, 1859, but resigned in May following, being succeeded by Count Rechberg.

BUONAROTTI (See MICHAEL ANGELO.)

BUONCONVENTO or BONCONVENTO, boo'-on-con-ven'-to, a town of Northern Italy, 16 miles S.E. of Sienna. It is walled and flanked with towers, and there is a large church containing valuable works of art. Manf. Silk. Pop. 2,750.

BUONTALENTI, BERNARDO, boo'-on-ta-lan'-te, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect. He was named "Dalle Girandole," from his skill in making fireworks.

Born at Florence, 1536; died 1608.

BURANO, boo-ra'-no, an Italian town, on an island in the Adriatic, 5 miles N.E. of Venice. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in fishing and in the cultivation of vegetables for consumption in Venice. Pop. 8,000.

BURCHIELLO, DOMENICO, boor-ke-ail'-o, a humorous poet of Florence. He was a barber, but became a great favourite of Duke Cosmo, and his shop was the meeting-place of the wits of the city. His satires are now mostly obscure in their allusions, and are coarsely licentious.

Died 1418.

BURCKHARDT, JOHN LEWIS, boork'-hart, a Swiss traveller, who, in 1806, arrived in London with a letter from the celebrated Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks. Having succeeded in making an engagement with the African Association to endeavour to penetrate into the interior of Africa from the north, he sailed from Portsmouth in 1809. He passed two years and a half in Syria, and made two journeys through Nubia, which occupied him down to 1814. He next passed a considerable time in Arabia, visited the cities of Mecca and Medina, where he fell ill; but, on recovering, set out for Cairo, where he arrived after an absence of upwards of two years. The plague having broken out in 1816 at Cairo, he departed for the desert of Senai. In 1817 we find him again in Cairo, where he was taken ill of dysentery, of which he never recovered. The works of this traveller comprise "Travels in Nubia," "Travels in Nubia and the Holy Land," "Travels in Arabia," "Notes on the Bedoweens and Wahabees," and "Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians." He so completely mastered the Arabic language, that, disguised as a merchant, he was everywhere received as a genuine Mussulman, and even passed an examination exhibiting an acquaintance with the Koran, which completely satisfied those who had doubted his orthodoxy. When he died, he was interred in the Turkish burying-ground with all the honours due to a pious and learned sheik. His fine collection of Oriental manuscripts is now at Cambridge.

Born at Lausanne, 1784; died at Cairo, 1817.

BURDETT, SIR FRANCIS, bart., bur-det', a distinguished political reformer, who, for nearly the first half of the nineteenth century, filled a large space in the public eye. Having published a letter attacking the House of Commons, in which he sat as member for Westminster, he was in 1810 committed to the Tower, his arrest causing a riot, in which several lives were lost. In 1819, having denounced the conduct of the magistrates and yeomanry of Manchester, in the famous Peterloo affair, he was imprisoned for three months in the King's Bench, and fined £1,000. In 1835 he attached himself to the Conservative party, deserting his old friends on the Liberal side of the House. In 1793 he married the daughter of Thomas Coutts, the wealthy banker, and was the father of Lady Burdett Coutts.

Born 1770; died 1844.

BURDWAN, or BARDWAN, boord-wan', a division or commissionership of India, in Lower Bengal, divided into five districts—Burdwan, Hoogly, Midnapur, Bankura, and Birbhoom. Area, 13,855 square miles. Pop. 7,393,954 of whom 85 per cent. are Hindoos.

BURDWAN, a district of the above division. It is chiefly a flat plain, intersected by several streams, but only one navigable river, the Bhagarathi. Wheat, pulses, sugar-cane, tobacco, and indigo are cultivated. Minerals. Coal, abundant and extensively worked; iron, copper, lime, and sandstone. Manf. Silk, cotton cloth, gold and silver ornaments, brass utensils, sugar, and indigo. Area, 3,523 square miles. Pop. 1,391,823.

BURDWAN, the chief town of the district, a well-built, busy town, with palaces and handsome buildings furnished in the European manner. There is a large public school, supported at the sole cost of the Maharajah. Pop. 34,080. Lat. 23° 14′ N. Lon. 87° 54′ E.

BUREN, MARTIN VAN, bu'-ren, president of the United States from 1837 to 1841. He was again nominated in 1848 and 1856, but was defeated first by Mr. Polk, and then by General Taylor.

Born at Kinderhook, state of New York, 1782; died 1862.

BURFORD, bur'-ford, a town of Oxfordshire, 17 miles from Oxford. The church is spacious. Manf. Saddlery and rugs. Pop. 2,000.—In the neighbourhood of this place is Edgehill, where, in 1649, the Parliamentarian troops, under General Fairfax, defeated the Royalists.

BURGER, GOTTFRIED AUGUST, buhr'-gur, German poet. He studied theology at Halle, and then jurisprudence at Göttingen; but becoming acquainted with Shakspeare and the English ballad literature, he made that style of poetry his especial study, and produced the famous "Lenore," the "Wild Huntsman," and other ballads, which became immensely popular, and some of which were translated by Scott. His domestic life was unhappy, and having lost a considerable sum of money by speculation, he passed the last years of his life in poverty.

Born in Prussian Saxony, 1748; died 1794.

BURG, boorg, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the river Ihle, 13 miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Woollens, linen, steel, leather, potash, and dyeing-works. Pop. 15,200.

BURGEO ISLAND. (See NEWFOUNDLAND.)

BURGHAUSEN, burg-how'-sen, a town of Bavaria, 27 miles N.W. of Salzburg, on the Salzbach. Manf. Gunpowder, bells, and leather. Pop. 2,500.

BURGKMAIR, HANS, burk'-mair, German painter and wood engraver. His engravings, about 360 in number, illustrating the career of the Emperor Maximilian, are highly valued.

Born at Augsburg, 1473; died 1559.

BURGOS, boor'-gos, a city of Spain, the capital of a province of the same name, in Old Castile, 112 miles N. of Madrid. It is a place of great antiquity, standing on the right bank of the river Arlanzon, formerly defended by a strong castle, now in ruins. The town is built in the form of a crescent, and the streets are for the most part narrow, winding, and gloomy. Of the squares, there is one of considerable elegance, with a fine piazza. The public fountains are numerous. It has a college, a school for the fine arts, and a surgical institution. Among the public buildings are the town-hall, a theatre, a museum, and some hospitals. The cathedral (a splendid Gothic edifice founded in 1221, and restored, with no great architectural advantage,) is of such extent, that divine service can be simultaneously performed in eight of its chapels, without causing confusion. In it are the tombs of the Cid Rodrigo (who was a native of Burgos), and Don Fernando, celebrated throughout Spain for their achievements against the Moors. There are other churches, containing splendid mausoleums. About a mile from the town is the convent of Santa Maria de las Huelgas, founded in 1180, by Alfonso VIII. The church of the convent is a very interesting building. Manf. Woollens, linen, and hats. Pop. 29,683. Burgos was taken by the French in 1808 and 1809. In 1812 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the British, but in the following year it surrendered, without resistance.

BURGOS, a province of Spain. It is both fertile and productive, yielding corn, vegetables, and fruit in abundance. Minerals. Gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, quicksilver, sulphur, marble, and stone. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and linen fabrics, earthenware, leather, paper, cutlery, and brandy. Area, 7,082 square miles. Pop. about 337,074.

BURGOYNE, JOHN, bur'-goin, an English general, who, having been educated at Westminster, entered the army at an early age. He ran away with Lady Charlotte Stanley, daughter of the Earl of Derby, and in consequence retired to the continent until the bride's family were reconciled to the match. In 1760, he took part in an expedition to Belle Isle. In the following year he was returned to Parliament for Midhurst, but shortly afterwards went to Portugal with Lord Loudon, and greatly distinguished himself. In 1763 he was appointed governor of Fort William. In 1776 he was despatched to America, and captured Ticonderoga, but was subsequently forced to surrender, with his whole army, in 1777, to General Gates, and to sign the capitulation of Saratoga, which decided France to recognize the independence of the United States. On his return to England, he held the appointment of commander-in-chief in Ireland for two years. Afterwards he devoted himself to English literature, especially the drama, and wrote the "Maid of the Oaks," "Bon Ton," the "Heiress," and the "Lord of the Manor," which had their day of success upon the stage. He was one of the managers for conducting the impeachment of Warren Hastings.

Born 1722; died 1792.

BURGOYNE, SIR JOHN FOX, early entered the army as one of the corps of Royal Engineers, and, in 1800, was made a lieutenant, and, in 1805, a captain. He served under Sir John Moore in Sweden and Portugal, and was present at the sieges of San Sebastian and Burgos, and was twice wounded. In 1814 he was commanding engineer of the expedition to New Orleans; and in 1845 he received the appointment of inspector-general of fortifications in England, and, in 1851, attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and the following year was created a Knight Grand Cross. In 1854 he was dispatched to Turkey, and was chief of the engineering department of the British army in the Crimea until recalled and replaced by Sir Harry Jones in 1855. In the same year the sultan bestowed on him the order of the Medjidie, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the honorary degree of D.C.L. He was made a general in 1855, created a baronet in 1856, and appointed constable of the Tower in 1865.

Born 1782; died 1871.

BURGUETE, EL, boor-gai'-tai, a town of Spain, in Navarre, 20 miles from Pampeluna. It stands in the valley of Roncesvalles, where, in 778, the nephew of Charlemagne, the famous Roland, fell in a battle against the Moors, who cut to pieces the rear-guard of the French army.

BURGUNDY, or BOURGOGNE, bur'-gun-de, an old province in the E. of France, now divided into the departments of Saône and Loire, Côte d'Or, Ain and part of Yonne. The capital was DIJON.—In 1032 Burgundy was made a duchy of the German empire. In 1363, Philip the Bold, fourth son of King John of France, had the duchy conferred on him, and it was a powerful and practically independent state till the death of Duke Charles, in 1477, when it was incorporated with France.

BURIDAN, JEAN, boo'-re-dan, French schoolman and metaphysician, who wrote several ingenious treatises on logic and commentaries on Aristotle. Of his personal history little is authentically known.

Lived in the 14th century.

BURKE, EDMUND, burk, an illustrious writer and statesman, whose father was an attorney, and who received his education under Abraham Shackleton, a Quaker, at Ballytore, near Carlow, and in the university of Dublin. The first performance which brought him prominently into notice was the "Vindication of Natural Society," followed by the essay on the "Sublime and Beautiful," published in 1757. This philosophical piece of criticism, written in a fine and elegant style, procured the author a great reputation, and the esteem of the first literary characters of the age, the principal of whom was Dr. Johnson, who says "it is an example of true criticism;" although a critic equally acute has dissented from the theory it seeks to establish. In 1758 he suggested to Mr. Dodsley, the bookseller, the plan of the "Annual Register," the historical part of which he wrote for several years. In 1761 he went to Ireland as the companion of his friend Mr. Hamilton, secretary to the earl of Halifax, then lord-lieutenant. On his return, he was made private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham, first lord of the Treasury, who, in 1766, brought him into parliament for Wendover. He subsequently was returned for Malton, in Yorkshire, and gained great popularity by his introduction of a bill for a reform in the national expenditure, on which he spent prodigious labour, but it was unsuccessful. When the marquis of Rockingham returned to power, on the resignation of Lord North, in 1782, Mr. Burke obtained the post of paymaster-general of the forces, and a seat in the privy council; but on the death of his patron in the same year, Lord Shelburne became first lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Burke, with several of his friends, resigned their places. The principal acts of his political life after this were the share he took in the impeachment of Warren Hastings for his mal-administration in India; his opposition to Mr. Pitt's design of forming a limited regency on the king's illness, in 1788; and the strong part he took against the authors and defenders of the French revolution. In the house he avowed his detestation of the revolutionists with such force that a separation between him and Mr. Fox, and many more of his old friends, took place. In 1790 he published his famous "Reflections on the Revolution in France," which attracted great attention, and produced a surprising effect upon the public mind. After this, he published a variety of pamphlets in support of the positions he had taken up. His zeal on this occasion, as well as his extraordinary talents, recommended him to the royal favour, and he obtained a large pension, which gave room to those who had been galled by his arguments to reproach him; and some illiberal animadversions were made upon him in the senate, which drew from him that admirable defence, his "Letter to a noble Lord" (Earl Fitzwilliam), in which he retaliates upon a celebrated duke (duke of Bedford) in a strain of keen irony and dignified remonstrance. Mr. Burke withdrew from parliament in 1794, being succeeded in his seat for Malton by his son, an accomplished young man, who died shortly afterwards. This melancholy event hastened his own end. Mr. Burke was an amiable man, and a faithful friend, charitable and pious. He had a fine taste for the arts, and was fond of gardening and architecture. Dr. Johnson considered him the greatest man in England, and Fox declared that he was indebted to him for all the fame he possessed. Gibbon said that he admired his eloquence, approved his politics, adored his chivalry, and almost forgave his reverence for church establishments. His oratory was fervid and ornate, and produced a wonderful effect on his hearers. "That great master of eloquence, Edmund Burke!" exclaims Lord Macaulay, "in aptitude of comprehension and richness of imagination, superior to every orator, ancient or modern." He was one of the first to advocate the abolition of the slave trade; he attacked the greediness and injustice committed by the English in India, and he exerted himself strenuously in favour of a policy of conciliation towards the Americans.

Born in Dublin, 1730; died at Beaconsfield, 1797.

BURKE, ROBERT O'HARA, Australian explorer, who in 1860 crossed the continent from Melbourne to the Gulf of Carpentaria, but, with his companion Wills, died after suffering terrible privations on the return journey.

Born at St. Cleram, Ireland, 1812; died 1861.

BURKE, a county of North Carolina, United States, on Catawba river, among the mountains of the Blue Ridge. The surface of the county is generally elevated. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 12,800.

BURKE, a county of Georgia, United States, on the Savannah river. Area, 1,040 square miles. Pop. 27,128.

BURLEIGH, WILLIAM CECIL, lord, bur'-le, a secretary of state under Edward VI. and Elizabeth, and grand treasurer of England. In 1588 parliament was assembled, and, by his advice, a plan of religious reform was laid before it. In this he had a considerable share; and he also took the greatest part in the establishment of the Thirty-nine Articles of faith, which form the basis of the Reformed religion. To him is also due the regulation of the coinage, which had been altered since Henry VIII.'s time. He was created Baron Burleigh in 1571, and in 1588 concluded an advantageous treaty with the Netherlands.

Born in Lincolnshire, 1520; died 1598.

BURLINGTON, bur'-ling-ton, a county in New Jersey, United States, on the Atlantic, and extending N.W. to Delaware river. Pop. 55,402.

BURLINGTON, a city, port of entry, and capital of the above county, New Jersey, on Delaware river, 20 miles above Philadelphia. There is an episcopalian college, founded in 1863. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 40° 5′ N. Lon. 72° 52′ N.

BURLINGTON, the largest town in Vermont, United States. It is beautifully situated on the eastern side of Lake Champlain. The Vermont University is on the summit of the slope on which the city stands. Pop. 11,365.

BURMAH, or BIRMAH, bur'-ma, a country occupying a portion of the Indo-Chinese peninsula, Asia, and formerly called the Burmese empire, sometime the kingdom of Ava, and once the most extensive and powerful in that peninsula. It is bounded on the N. by Upper Assam and the Nagos territory, E. by the Chinese province of Yun-nan and the Laos country, W. by Munipoor and Aracan, and S. by the British province of Pegu. Burmah may be considered to be encompassed by mountains, attaining an elevation of between 2,000 and 5,000 feet. Its centre forms the basin of the Irrawady, abounding in lagoons, but consisting of a soil fertile in the highest degree.

Rivers.—The Irrawady and its tributaries; the Pegu, and the Salween.

Climate.—Healthy; from September to March the weather is delightful, the heat being moderate and agreeable; but in April and May the heat becomes excessive, and continues so until the commencement of the rainy season, which takes place in May, and continues till the middle of September.

Zoology.—The wild animals are the elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, leopard, wild cat, bear, otter, deer, hog, and buffalo. Elephants are numerous in the lower provinces, but they are often tamed and greatly in use as beasts of burden. There is a race of small white elephants, which are made use of by royalty. Of birds, parrots are numerous, and the woods teem with peacocks. The jungle-fowl is generally spread over the country, and pheasants, partridges, quails, geese, ducks, and snipes are plentiful. Many of the land-birds are remarkable for the splendour of their plumage, and the feathers of the blue jay are taken to adorn the state dresses of the Chinese mandarins. Of reptiles there are numbers, and serpents of nearly all kinds are used for food after their heads are cut off. Alligators are found in the deltas of the great rivers, and lizards, tortoises, and turtles are plentiful. Bees fly wild in the woods, and in such swarms that their wax makes a staple article of commerce. The domestic animals consist of elephants, horses, oxen, sheep, goats, dogs, and cats; of poultry, only a few common fowls and ducks are reared.

Pro.—Rice, Indian millet, pulses, maize, sesamum, yams, sweet potatoes, gourds, cotton, capsicums, indigo, tobacco, oil-plants, sugar, onions, garlic, a kind of tea, bananas, and other fruits. Notwithstanding the general fertility of the soil, much of the country is left to lie in a state of waste, or is very imperfectly tilled. The sesamum is largely grown, and its oil is employed as a substitute for butter. The forests abound with teak, oak, the wood-oil tree, and other woods, whilst the palm and the bamboo attain a large size. It is in the Burman forests that the varnish is found which is generally used in the manufacture of lacquer-ware. Stick-lac is also obtained in large quantities and of excellent quality.

Minerals.—Gold (in mines and in auriferous sands), silver, iron, copper, lead, tin, amber, serpentine, marble, rubies, sapphires, and other gems; sulphur, natre, antimony, petroleum, and coal.

Manf.—In the useful as well as ornamental arts, the Burmese are very backward. They build boats, and cast bells; weave silk and cotton fabrics, and dye them in the most fanciful colours; work in gold and silver, and manufacture paper, coarse earthenware, lacquered goods, and other articles. Most of their manufactured wares are imported from other countries.

Religion.—Buddhism; neither the Mahometan nor the Christian religion has made much progress.

Gov.—Formerly a despotism, now under Great Britain.

Area, 188,000 square miles.

Pop. 3,500,000.

Lat. between 19° and 27° N. Lon. between 93° and 100° E.

History.—For several centuries the adjoining kingdoms of Ava and Pegu contended for the mastery. About the middle of the 18th century, Aloung Pra rose to power, subdued the Peguans, and established the Burman empire. In 1822, 1824, and 1852, the country was at war with England; the lower part was consequently annexed during the latter year. After various evidences of misgovernment of Upper Burmah, it also was annexed in 1885.

BURMAH, LOWER, three maritime provinces of India beyond the Ganges, extending along the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal from lat. 20° 25′ to 10° 50′ N. Pop. enumerated, 3,736,771. (See Aracan, Pegu, and Tenasserim.)

BURN, Richard, burn, an English divine, and celebrated law-writer, who, on taking orders, obtained the vicarage of Orton, in his native county, and became a justice of the peace. This circumstance led him to form a digest of the common law necessary to be known by magistrates. This work was published at first in 2 vols. 8vo; but its success was such, that every new edition received considerable additions; so that "Burn's Justice" became a standard book. He also compiled the "Ecclesiastical Law," a book of merit, for which he was made chancellor of Carlisle; and Burn wrote part of the history of his native county.

Born at Winton, Westmoreland, 1720; died at Orton, in the same county, 1785.

BURNES, Sir Alexander, a Scotch officer, (a second cousin of Burns the poet), who served with distinction in India, and surveyed the mouths of the Indus and mapped the lower parts of its course. He made a journey to Balkh and Bokhara across central India, full of peril, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society, and the royal premium of fifty guineas. The French Geographical Society also awarded him their silver medal. These honours were conferred on him during a visit to this country in 1833-4. In 1835 he again embarked for India, and having been engaged in several missions of importance, he was knighted in 1838. In 1839 he was appointed political resident at Cabul, which office he held until the breaking out of the insurrection in that city, when, with his brother Charles and some others, he was slain.

Born at Montrose, 1805; died 1841.

BURNET, Gilbert, bur'-net, an eminent divine, who, in 1664, went to Holland, where he studied the Hebrew language, and on his return was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. In 1669 he was appointed professor of divinity at Glasgow, but resigned in 1674. He came to London, and remained until the accession of James II., when he went to Holland, returning with the Prince of Orange. He subsequently became bishop of Salisbury, and is known principally by his "History of the Reformation," and by that of "His own Times," the last of which appeared in 1724, and is very entertaining, though far from being impartial.

Born at Edinburgh, 1643; died in London, 1715.

BURNET, Thomas, a learned divine and philosopher. He is best known by a strange but eloquent work, "The Sacred Theory of the Earth."

Born at Croft, Yorkshire, 1635; died in London, 1715.

BURNETT, James. (See Monboddo, Lord.)

BURNEY, Charles, bur'-ne, Mus.D., commenced his musical studies at Chester, under Mr. Baker, who was organist of the cathedral of that city. His talents were further developed under the instructions of the celebrated Dr. Arne, in conjunction with whom he subsequently composed the music of three pieces for the theatre of Drury Lane. These were entitled "Alfred," "Robin Hood," and "Queen Mab." He brought forward some other pieces on the stage, and, in 1769, received the degree of Doctor of Music from Oxford university. In 1770 he travelled on the continent to procure materials for his "General History of Music," which appeared in 4 volumes, between 1776 and 1789. He wrote several other works, and contributed most of the musical articles to Rees's Cyclopædia, for which he received 1,000*l*. In 1806 he was granted a pension of 300*l*. a year, and in 1810 was elected a member of the Institute of France.

Born at Shrewsbury, 1726; died at Chelsea College, 1814.

BURNEY, Frances, daughter of the above, an eminent English novelist, authoress of "Evelina," "Cecilia," and other works which achieved great popularity. She was for several years attached to the household of Queen Charlotte; and afterwards married M. D'Arblay, a French refugee. Her "Diary" is a very amusing book.

Born 1752; died 1840.

BURNLEY, burn'-le, a town and parliamentary borough of Lancashire, 24 miles N. of Manchester. There is an ancient, but modernized, church, and several new and handsome churches, and an old Saxon cross is an object of interest. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics and machinery. There are iron and brass founderies, rope-walks, and tanneries. Pop. 58,882.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

BURNS, Robert, burns, the national poet of Scotland, was the son of a small farmer settled in Ayrshire. He received a common education, during the progress of which he was employed in rustic labour. By application, however, he added to his mental acquirements some knowledge of the French language and the mathematics, besides cultivating an acquaintance with a few of the English poets. On the death of his father, he went into partnership with his brother Gilbert in a small farm, in which he was unsuccessful. An illicit amour at the same time rendered his circumstances still more perplexing, and he was about to emigrate to the West Indies, when the publication of a volume of his poems was suggested to him. This appeared in 1785, at Kilmarnock, and had a wonderful success. The poems were in the popular language of his country, and on subjects familiar to the common people. Dr. Blacklock, of Edinburgh, was charmed with the genius exhibited in them, and invited

Burns to that city. His reception there was triumphant, and a new edition of his poems produced him 500*l*. He then commenced again as a farmer, and obtained a place in the excise, before which, however, he married the young woman whose affections he had won, and whose personal charms he has celebrated in the beautiful song entitled "Bonnie Jean." The union of his occupations as excise-officer and farmer, however, only served to embarrass him, and at last he settled in Dumfries only as an exciseman. Here his habits of conviviality led him too frequently into excesses as unworthy of his great genius as they were destructive of that independent manliness of character which he had ever endeavoured to cultivate, maintain, and advocate. He still continued to write, however, and kept up his correspondence with numerous friends and admirers. Many of his letters are as remarkable for the vigour of their style of composition as for the originality of the sentiments which they contain. By general consent Burns stands in the very first rank of lyric poets. The centenary of his birth was celebrated in 1859 in every land where the British language is spoken.

Born in the parish of Alloway, near Ayr, 1759; died 1796.

BURNTISLAND, brunt'-i-land, a royal burgh and seaport of Fifeshire, Scotland, one of the Kircaldy district of parliamentary boroughs, on the N. shore of the Frith of Forth. It has a good harbour, with pier and breakwater, and is shut in towards the N. by steep hills. In the summer it is resorted to as a watering-place. Pop. 3,422, principally employed in the fisheries. A station on the North British Railway.

BURRIANA, boor-e-an'-a, a Spanish town, province of Castellon de la Plana, on the left bank of the Seco, about ¾ mile from the Mediterranean. Pop. 6,200, chiefly engaged in the fisheries.

BURRITT, ELIHU, bur'-rit, an American linguist, whose father was a village shoemaker, and he himself a blacksmith. He had a great facility, however, in the acquirement of languages, and whilst serving his apprenticeship to his trade, he laboured at self-instruction, and made considerable progress in the Latin and French languages. When his term of apprenticeship had expired, he had six months' education at the school of his brother, where he made further advancement in these languages, and also gained some knowledge of the mathematics. On returning to his trade, he assiduously pursued his studies, and made himself acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, and Danish languages. In 1842 he translated some of the Icelandic Sagas, and contributed to the "American Eclectic Review" translations from the Samaritan, Arabic, and Hebrew. In 1843 he commenced the study of the Persian, Turkish, and Ethiopic languages, and, in the following year, started a newspaper called "The Christian Citizen." Since then, he has edited several journals, and lectured throughout Europe and America, advocating temperance, and endeavouring to form a "League of Universal Brotherhood," and establish an ocean penny postage. He has also produced several works advocating these schemes, and others of a kindred nature. He resided for many years in England, and was for some time consul for the United States at Birmingham.

Born in Connecticut, 1811; died 1879.

BURROUGH, STEPHEN, bur-ro', an English navigator, who endeavoured to find a north-eastern passage to the Indies by way of the north coast of Russia, hoping to find the mouth of the Obi. He was unsuccessful, but advanced farther than any previous navigator.

Lived in the 16th century.

BURSLEM, burs'-lem, a municipal borough of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. Manf. Principally earthenwares, for the production of which it has been celebrated since the early part of the 17th century. Its potteries are very extensive. Pop. 26,521.—A station on the North Staffordshire Railway.

BURTON-ON-TRENT, an ancient town of Staffordshire, on the Trent, 21 miles from Stafford. It consists principally of one spacious street, parallel to the river, which is crossed by another at right angles. The river is crossed by a bridge of 29 arches, which in 1864 replaced one which was erected about the 10th century. It has a neat town-hall, a free grammar-school, several charitable institutions, two churches, and numerous dissenting establishments. The town is famous throughout the world for its breweries, especially those of Messrs. Bass and Allsopp. The India pale or bitter ale is made here in immense quantities. Pop. 39,285. A station on the Midland, London and North-Western, and North Staffordshire Railways.—The Mersey and the Trent are connected by the Grand Trunk Canal, and the Trent is navigable up to this town from the Humber.

BURTON, ROBERT, an English writer, who became a student of Christ-church, and was presented first to the vicarage of St. Thomas's, Oxford, and next to the rectory of Segrave, in Leicestershire. Here he wrote his "Anatomy of Melancholy," a work which has achieved a great and deserved reputation. It is learned, humorous, discursive, and witty. He styled himself "Democritus Junior." It is the only book that ever took Dr. Johnson two hours out of his bed before he wished to rise. It supplied Sterne with much of his wit, and Byron declares "it is the most amusing and instructive medley of quotations and classical anecdotes he ever perused." Burton was a believer in astrology, and it is said that he predicted he would die on or about the day when that event occurred. There is a monument to his memory in Christ-church, Oxford.

Born at Lindley, Leicestershire, 1576; died at his rectory, 1640.

BURTSCHEID, or BORCETTE, boort'-shide, a Prussian town, half a mile from Aix-la-Chapelle. There are sulphur springs and baths. Manf. Cloths and cassimeres. Pop. 10,000.

BURY, bur'-e, a town and parliamentary borough of Lancashire, on the Irwell, 9 miles N.W. of Manchester. Besides the parish church, there are several places of worship for different denominations; public libraries, a mechanics' institution, horticultural society, and news-room. In the market-place there is a bronze statue of Sir Robert Peel, who was a native of the town. Manf. Cottons, woollens, calico-printing, and machinery. There are bleaching establishments and iron-works. In the neighbourhood there are extensive coal-mines and quarries of freestone. Pop. 51,582.—A station on the Midland, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS, a town and parliamentary borough of Suffolk, on the Larke, 26 miles N.W. of Ipswich. It has two parish churches, St. Mary's and St. James's, both of which are old and contain numerous monuments. There are other places of worship for dissenters of various denominations, a mechanics' institute, a botanic garden, an assembly-room, a theatre, a shire-hall, a guild-hall, a corn exchange, a large hospital, an old free grammar school, and a wool-hall. A fine Gothic gate and a quadrangular tower remain of a splendid Benedictine abbey, originally founded by Canute, and which rose to be one of the wealthiest and most important in England. Great quantities of wool are brought yearly, and exposed to sale in the hall; and it has a trade in corn, butter, and cheese. Pop. 16,211. A station on the Great Eastern railway. The town derives its name from Edmund, the Saxon king and martyr, who was crowned here on Christmas Day, 856. Parliament was held here in 1272, 1296, and 1446.

BUSACHINO, or BUSAQUINO, boo-sa-ki'-no, a town of Sicily, in the province of Palermo. Manf. Linen. Pop. 8,000.

BUSBY, RICHARD, bus-be, head master of Westminster School from 1640 till 1695. He was a most successful schoolmaster, learned, assiduous, with a great capacity for teaching, and also for inflicting the birch. He has the credit of having trained "the greatest number of learned scholars that ever adorned any age or nation." Many stories are told respecting his mode of managing his pupils. One is that Charles II. having paid a visit to the school, Dr. Busby kept his hat on in the royal presence, but afterwards apologised, telling the king that if the boys thought that anybody in the world was greater than their master he should never be able to manage them.

Born at Lutton, Northamptonshire, 1606; died 1695.

BUSCA, boos'-ca, a town of Piedmont, 9 miles N.W. of Coni, on the Maira, an affluent of the Po. Excellent wine is made in the neighbourhood. Pop. 9,400.

BUSCHETTO, DA DULICHIO, boos-kat'-to, a Greek architect, who built the cathedral at Pisa, where he died, and had a monument erected to his memory.

Lived in the 11th century.

BUSCHING, ANTOINE FRIEDRICH, bus'-shing, German geographer. Studied theology at Halle, and in 1754 was appointed professor of philosophy at Gottingen; but his heterodox views on theology offended the authorities, and in 1761 he became minister to a Protestant congregation at St. Petersburg. He returned to Germany in 1765, and became director of an academy at Berlin. His geographical writings were among the first to teach the science in a systematic manner.

Born at Schaumberg-Lippe, in 1724; died at Berlin, 1793.

BUSEMBAUM, HERMANN, boo'-sem-bowm, a Jesuit who wrote the "Theologiæ Moralea," a standard book in the Jesuit colleges. As it advocated the right of regicide it was publicly burnt in France, when Damiens attempted to kill Louis XV. in 1757. In the same year a new edition of it by the famous Jesuit, Alfonso de Ligorio, appeared.

Born in Westphalia, 1600; died 1668.

BUSHEAB, or KHOSHAUB (good water), boo-she-ab', an island in the Persian Gulf, 11 miles from the coast. It is about 18 miles long, with a town and harbour at the western end. Lat. 26° 50′ N. Lon. 53° 12′ E.

BUSSY D'AMBOISE, boos'-se-dam-bwoise', an infamous Frenchman of the 16th century, who took part in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, killing one of his own relations, by whose death he hoped to profit. He was killed by the count of Montsoreau, whose wife he had tried to secure. We read that the whole of the province of Anjou was overjoyed at his death.

BUSSY RABUTIN, ROGER, Count de, boos'-se ra-boo-tahn, French song and letter writer, an officer under the command of Turenne. A scandalous publication was the cause of his suffering a year's imprisonment in the Bastile.

Born at Epiry, 1618; died 1693.

BUTE, Earl of, JOHN STUART, bute, statesman, who was indebted for the honours which were showered upon him rather to the dignity of his manners than the splendour of his talents. On the accession of George III., in 1760, he became a privy councillor and groom of the stole. In the following year he was made a secretary of state. In 1762 he became first lord of the Treasury, and was made a knight of the Garter. After effecting the termination of the war by the peace of Paris, he resigned in 1763; so that his administration did not last a year; yet he was, from the influence he exercised over the young king and his mother, and from his advocacy of the supremacy of the royal prerogatives, very unpopular. He was attacked by Wilkes, and popularly known as Jack Boot. He retired to a seaside residence in Hampshire, and devoted himself to botanical pursuits, his studies resulting in a work of 9 vols. of which only 12 copies were printed, at an expense of 10,000*l.*!

Born in Scotland, 1713; died 1792.

BUTE, an island of Scotland, lying at the mouth of the Frith of Clyde, and separated by a narrow channel, the Kyles of Bute, from the coast of Argyleshire. It is 16 miles in length, and nowhere above 5 in breadth. The island is mountainous in the N., but fertile in the S., and with a climate so salubrious that it is the resort of many invalids. The chief town is Rothesay. Area, 60 square miles. Pop. 10,998, mostly devoted to agricultural pursuits. Lat. between 55° and 56° N. Lon. between 4° 58′ and 5° 10′ W.

BUTLER, JOSEPH, but'-ler, a learned prelate. He first studied for the Presbyterian Church, but in 1714 entered Oriel College, Oxford, and soon afterwards was ordained in the Church of England.

For several years he was preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and there preached the sermons on "Human Nature," which obtained such celebrity. In 1725 he received the living of Stanhope, in the county of Durham, and in 1736 he was made clerk of the closet to queen Caroline, who delighted much in his conversation. Two years afterwards he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, and in a short time, made dean of St. Paul's, on which he resigned the rectory of Stanhope. In 1746 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and, in 1750, translated to the see of Durham. His greatest work is entitled "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature." This treatise is a masterpiece of reasoning,—clear, profound, simple, yet grand.

Born at Wantage, Berkshire, 1692; died at Bath, 1752.

BUTLER, SAMUEL, a celebrated English poet, who for some time resided with Sir Samuel Luke in Bedfordshire, a gentleman very zealous in behalf of the Covenant and puritanical principles. Here he became acquainted with the characters of the leading men of this party, and formed the plan of his famous burlesque poem, "Hudibras," the principal person of which was, unquestionably, Sir Samuel. "Hudibras" is unique in literature, for wit, humour, and a marvellous fertility of ideas. After the Restoration, Butler became secretary to the earl of Carberry, who appointed him steward of the court held at Ludlow Castle. About this time also he married Mrs. Herbert, a lady of family, but whose fortune was lost to him by being invested in bad securities. It is said, that although Butler lived in good society, he was suffered to die in extreme indigence. He was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent Garden. In 1721, Alderman Barber, the printer, erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Strensham, Worcestershire, 1612; died in London, 1680.

BYBLIS, bib-lis', an ancient city of Phœnicia, about half way between Beyrout and Tripoli. It is the Giblah of Scripture, and the modern Jubeil.

BYNG, GEORGE, bing, Viscount Torrington, a brave English admiral, entered the navy early in life, and after passing through different ranks of his profession, was, in 1703, made a rear-admiral. In 1715, George I. created him a baronet. In 1717, an invasion being intended by Sweden, in favour of the Pretender, he was sent into the Baltic, where he remained till that project was abandoned. In 1718 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, where he defeated the Spanish fleet, off Sicily. For this victory he had the honour to receive letters of thanks from George I., the emperor Charles, and the queen of Denmark. It was owing to his exertions that Sicily was saved from the Spaniards, and he displayed as much skill as a politician and negotiator as he did valour and prudence as a commander. He represented Plymouth in the House of Commons from 1706 to 1721. In 1721 he was created Viscount Torrington, and in 1725 knight of the Bath. He was afterwards appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which office he held till his death.

Born at Wrotham, Kent, 1663; died 1733.

BYNG, JOHN, an English admiral, fourth son of the above. He served under his father in most of his expeditions, and was always esteemed a good seaman and brave man. He was promoted to the rank of admiral in 1748. He was sent in 1756 to relieve Minorca, then besieged by the French, under the Marquis de la Galissonière; but after a partial action he was forced to bear away, and the place was taken. On this account the public clamour rose high against the ministry, who had not supplied him with a properly-manned fleet, but who, in order to save themselves, threw a great part of the blame upon Byng, and caused him to be tried by a court-martial. He was sentenced to be shot, though the court recommended him to mercy, which, however, was not granted, and he suffered with great fortitude at Portsmouth. Voltaire satirically said he was "shot to encourage the others."

Born in Kent, 1704; died 1757.

BYNKERSHOEK, CORNELIUS VAN, bin'-kers-ho'-ak, Dutch lawyer and writer on jurisprudence. He was a member of the supreme court, wrote several legal works of great value, and made a digest of the laws of Holland and Zealand.

BYRGIUS, JUSTUS, beer'-ge-us, Swiss mechanist and astronomer, who went to Hesse to superintend the observatory erected by the Landgrave. He is said to have anticipated the invention of logarithms, and Kepler described him as a man of extraordinary abilities, but reserved and indolent.

Born at Lichtenstein, 1552; died 1632.

BYROM, JOHN, bi'-rom, an English poet, who wrote the beautiful pastoral to Phœbe in the Spectator, and the letters in the same work signed "John Shadow." He supported himself chiefly by teaching short-hand, of which he invented an improved system. In 1724 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society.

Born at Kersal, near Manchester, 1691; died at Manchester, 1763.

BYRON, the Hon. JOHN, bi'-ron, a distinguished British admiral, and the grandfather of the illustrious poet. He sailed round the world in the years 1764, 1765, and 1766, and encountered some severe storms off the coast of Patagonia. In 1769 he was appointed governor of Newfoundland, and in 1778 commanded the fleet destined to serve in the West Indies. It is in allusion to the sufferings of this seaman in his enterprises, that the poet thus sings in the second canto of his "Don Juan:"—

> "His sufferings were comparative
> To those related in my grandad's narrative."

Born 1723; died in London, 1786.

BYRON, GEORGE GORDON, lord, poet, was the only child of Captain John Byron, of the Guards, and Miss Catherine Gordon, of Gight, in Aberdeenshire. His father and mother separated, and some of the earliest years of Byron's life were passed in Aberdeen in a very humble position. When 11 years old he succeeded to the title of his grand-uncle, and the family estate at Newstead Abbey, Nottinghamshire. He was sent first to a private school at Dulwich and then to Harrow. In 1807 he published his "Hours of Idleness," a volume of juvenile effusions, which were severely criticised in the "Edinburgh Review." Two years later appeared his reply, with the title of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," a satire which obtained immediate celebrity, although its merit is far inferior to the efforts of both Dryden and Pope in the same path. Byron afterwards calls it himself "a miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony," and did all he could to suppress it. He now went to the continent, and, in 1812, gave the world the fruits of his travels in the first two cantos of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." The effect of this poem was electric, and "Childe Harold" became the theme of every tongue. In 1815 he married Miss Anne Isabella, the only daughter of Sir Ralph Milbank, with whom he received 10,000*l*. Dissipation on his part, and, perhaps, an utter absence of congeniality of feeling and sentiment between them, soon parted the poet and his young wife. She returned to her father's in the January of 1816. Ada, afterwards countess of Lovelace, was the only offspring of this unhappy union. In April, 1816, Byron left his country with the avowed intention of never seeing it again. After travelling through a great portion of the continent, he took up his abode at Venice, then at Pisa, and then passed a short time in Genoa. Meanwhile his pen was in continual exercise. Writing had become such a habit with him, that he could not be idle; and the activity as well as the splendour of his genius was such, that nothing could restrain the strength and magnificence of its flight. During this period he produced "The Corsair," "The Giaour," "The Siege of Corinth," "The Bride of Abydos," "Parisina," "Beppo," "Mazeppa," "Manfred," "Cain; a Mystery," "The Lament of Tasso," cantos III. and IV. of "Childe Harold," and many more effusions, as remarkable for the beauty of their diction as the originality by which they are all more or less characterized. He also continued to issue cantos of his "Don Juan," which, notwithstanding its moral defects, is the most wonderful of all his poems. At the end of December, 1823, he sailed for Cephalonia, to take part with the Greeks in the cause of their independence. He reached Missolonghi on January 10, 1824. On February 15 he was seized with a convulsive fit, which rendered him both senseless and speechless for some time. On April 9, he got wet, took cold, and fever; on the 11th he got worse, on the 14th he was in danger, and on the 19th he died, at the age of 36. His body was conveyed to England, and buried in the village church of Hucknell-Torkard, near Newstead.

Born in Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, 1788; died at Missolonghi, 1824.

BYRON ISLAND, an island in the Mulgrave Archipelago, Pacific Ocean, about 12 miles in length. Lat. 1° 18′ S. Lon. 177° 20′ E.

BYSTROM, JOHN NIKOLAUS, best'-troem, Swedish sculptor, who in 1800 obtained the highest prize in the Swedish Academy of Arts, and in the following year went to Rome. He executed colossal statues of several of the Swedish monarchs, and many groups marked by great elegance and delicacy.

Born at Philippstadt, 1783; died at Rome, 1848.

BYTOWN. (See OTTAWA.)

BYZANTIUM, bi-zan'-ti-um, a town situate on the Thracian Bosphorus. It was founded in 667 B.C., and became a great seat of commerce. The pleasantness and convenience of its situation were observed by Constantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eastern Roman empire, A.D. 330, and called it Constantinopolis, i. e., the city of Constantine. (See CONSTANTINOPLE.)

C

CABAGAN, ka-ba-gan', a town at the N. extremity of the island of Luzon, Philippine islands. Pop. about 12,000.

CABANIS, PIERRE JEAN GEORGES, ca-ban'-e, French physician and philosophical writer. At the outbreak of the Revolution he took to the popular side, and was one of the Council of Five Hundred, and member of the senate. His chief work, on the physical and moral nature of man, is remarkable for the extent to which it carries physiological materialism.

Born at Cosnac, Seine Inférieure, 1757; died 1808.

CABARRUS, ka-bar'-rus, a county of the United States, in the S. of North Carolina. The district is undulating and fertile, yielding cotton, corn, and cattle. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 14,964.

CABATUAN, ca-ba'-tu-an, a town on the island of Panay, Philippine islands, on the river Tiguin, which is sometimes nearly dry, but at other times causes destructive inundations. Rice is cultivated, and cocoa-nut oil made. Pop. 23,000.

CABAZERA, cab-a-ze'-ra, a town of Luzon, Philippine islands. Manf. Tobacco. Pop. 15,000.

Born at Ryswick, 1631; died 1695.

CABELL, ka-bel', a county of the United States, in the W. of Virginia, on the Ohio river. Area, 680 square miles. Pop. 13,744.

CABENDA, ka-ben'-da, a seaport town on the W. coast of Africa, situate a little N. of the river Zaire. Lat. 5° 40′ S. Lon. 12° 30′ E.

CABES, kab'-bees', Gulf of, an inlet of the Mediterranean, on the N.E. of Africa. Lat. 34° N. Lon. from 10° to 11° E. This is the ancient Syrtis Minor.—There is a town of the same name at the head of the gulf.

CABESTAN, or CABESTAING, WILLIAM DE, ka'-bes-ta, a Provençal poet, whose fate was remarkable. He served the wife of Raymond de Seillans, and became so great a favourite of that lady as to excite the jealousy of her husband, who killed him, and tore out his heart, which the barbarian caused to be dressed and served up to his wife. After she had eaten it, he informed her what it was, on which she died of grief, about 1213. This shocking incident has frequently been made the subject of ballads and legendary tales.

CABET, ETIENNE, ka'-bai, a leader of the French Communists, was trained to the bar, but failing to obtain sufficient practice, adopted the profession of a littérateur, and for several years conducted "The Journal of Jurisprudence." In 1831 he was elected a deputy for the Côte d'Or. His ultra-democratic principles, however, led him into difficulties, and in 1834 he was condemned to two years' imprisonment for some strictures in a newspaper, Le Populaire, upon the conduct of the king, but escaped to London. He returned to Paris in 1839, under the provisions of the amnesty. In 1840 he published his "Voyage en Icarie," in which he unfolded his socialist views, and found many to embrace them. He obtained a grant of land on the Red River, in Texas, and in 1848 a goodly number of his followers embarked for this land of promise, which their own fervid imaginations had too fondly pictured to themselves. It was soon found, however, that the new Canaan was not filled with milk and honey, and they were compelled to quit the country. They wandered through the United States, and hearing of the city of Nauvoo, which had been abandoned by the Mormons, on the banks of the Mississippi, Cabet took possession of it. In 1850 he returned to Paris, but Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1852, caused him to again repair to America.

Born at Dijon, 1788; died at St. Louis, Missouri, 1856.

CABEZA, DEL BUEY, ka'-bai-za-del-boo'-ai, a Spanish town, province of Badajoz. Manf. Woollens and linens. There is a trade in cattle and agricultural produce. Pop. 7,451.

CABEZON DE LA SAL, ka'-be-zone, a town of Spain, province of Valladolid, on the Pisuerga, 7 miles from Valladolid. Pop. 2,000. Here, in 1808, one of the first battles of the Peninsular war was fought.

CABO FRIO, ka'-bo fré-o, a seaport town of Brazil, about 80 miles from Rio Janeiro, with an insalubrious climate. Pop. about 4,000.

CABOT, SEBASTIAN, kab'-ot, a celebrated navigator, whose father was likewise a navigator and a mathematician, with whom, before he was twenty, he made several voyages. In one of their voyages for a north-west passage, they fell in with Newfoundland, the coasts of which Sebastian afterwards explored, but in the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. he sailed again, with a design of pro-seeding to the East Indies; but owing to some disappointment, he went no farther than the Brazils, whence he shaped his course for Hispaniola and Porto Rico, and returned. In 1516 he entered the Spanish service, but, after one voyage to America, he returned to England, and settled in his native city. In 1517 he commanded an expedition to Labrador, and reached Hudson's Bay, but failed in the chief object of his voyage, and again entered the Spanish service, and surveyed and attempted to colonize the coast of Brazil. In 1548 he returned to England. Edward VI., to whom he was introduced by the duke of Somerset, the lord protector, delighted in his conversation, and allowed him a pension of £166 13s. 4d., as grand pilot of England. A new company, called Merchant Adventurers, had been formed, and Sebastian was placed at the head of it. By his means a voyage was made to the north in 1552, and a trade commenced with Russia, which gave rise to the Russian Company.

Born at Bristol, 1477; died 1557.

CABRA, ka'-bra, a town of Spain, province of Cordova, 30 miles S.E. Cordova. It is clean and well paved. Manf. Woollens, linen, soap, and earthenware. Its neighbourhood produces a superior quality of wines. Pop. 13,741.

CABRAL, or CABRARA, PEDRO ALVARES, ka'-bral, a Portuguese navigator, descended from a noble family of Portugal. In 1500 he commanded the fleet sent to the East Indies by Emanuel, king of Portugal. In this voyage he accidentally discovered Brazil, being driven by a storm on its coast, where he landed, and called the spot Santa Cruz. Thence he crossed to the coast of Africa, and afterwards proceeded to Calicut, where he established a factory, and made a commercial treaty. In 1501 he returned to Portugal richly laden, after which his history ceases to have any interest.

CABRERA, DON RAMON, ka-brair'-a, one of the most prominent Carlist leaders in Spain, first became known to fame in 1834. In that year he concerted measures with Don Carlos for the promotion of his cause, to advance which he committed cruelties to a degree far beyond such as we have been accustomed to see exercised by the most stern of partisan chiefs. The opposite party, or the upholders of Queen Christina, were incensed to ungovernable wrath against him; and as they were unable to lay their hands on him, they seized his mother, and sentenced her to be shot. The sentence was carried into effect, and Cabrera commanded the wives of thirty officers to be massacred, and the war became one of the most atrocious kind. He continued it with success for several years. The political changes which subsequently took place drove him, in 1840, to seek refuge in France; but in 1848 he returned to recommence the war in Spain. In 1849 he was forced to fly to France again, after which he came to England, where he married, and removed to Naples. In 1875 he reappeared in Spain with an offer to become a mediator in the Carlist war then raging, but soon sank into obscurity.

Born at Tortosa, 1810; died in England, 1877.

CABRERA, one of the Balearic islands, 10 miles from Majorca. It is used by the Spanish government as a place of exile. Ext. About 4 miles long by 3 broad.

CABUL, CAUBUL, or CABOOL, ka-bool' or kaw'-bul, a province of Afghanistan, situate between lat. 33° and 35° N. It comprises an area of 10,000 square miles, and has for its principal cities Cabul, Jellalabad, Ghuznee, and Istalif. Its chief river is the Cabool, a tributary of the Indus, which it joins, after a course of 320 miles, nearly opposite Attock.

CABUL, CAUBUL, or CABOOL, a very ancient and fortified city, the capital of Afghanistan. It stands at an elevation of more than 6,000 feet above the sea level, near the Hindu Kush Mountains, on the Cabool river, which is here crossed by three bridges. The houses are built of rough stones and clay, and have but a mean appearance. There are, however, four good bazaars or markets. The citadel, called Bala-Hissar, or the "Palace of Kings," contains the palace and other public buildings, the royal gardens, an inner fort, and a town of 5,000 inhabitants. The Kuzzilbashes, or Persians, have a strongly fortified quarter on the south-west. It is a place of great traffic, and persons of every country of the East are here to be met with. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 34° 30' N. Lon. 69° 6' E. (See AFGHANISTAN.)

CACCAMO, kak-ka'-mo, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo. Pop. 6,400.

Born at Montabone, near Casale, in 1568; died 1625.

CACERES, ka'-cer-es, a Spanish town, capital of the province of the same name, 25 miles W. of Truxillo. The town dates from the time of the Roman occupation, and contains many fine specimens of mediæval architecture. Manf. Woollens, linen, leather, and soap. There are dye-works and flour-mills, and a large trade in agricultural produce. Pop. of the province, 314,861; the town, 14,816.

CACERES, NEUVA, or NEU, a town of Luzon, in the Philippines, on the river Naga. Pop. 12,000.

CACHAO, or KACHEO, katch'-a-o, a city of Anam, and the capital of the province of Tonquin, on the river of the Tonquin, about 80 miles from the sea. It is of great extent, and is an open and defenceless place. Many of the houses are built of brick, though the larger proportion are constructed of mud and timber, and thatched with leaves, straw, or reeds. It is a city of great commercial resort. Gold is obtained in abundance; many beautiful silks are manufactured; and the lacquered ware, which, together with these, is exported, is deemed superior to any in the East. The imports are long cloths, chintz, arms, pepper, and other articles. Both English and Dutch factories were formerly established here. Pop. estimated at 100,000. Lat. 22° 36' N. Lon. 105° 15' E.

CACHAR, katch'-ar, anciently Hairumbe, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. It is mountainous, and mostly uncultivated. In some parts, however, it is relieved by fertile plains. The Barak, an affluent of the Brahmaputra, is the principal river. Pro. Cotton, sugar, tea, and rice: and it exports iron ore, ivory, and limestone. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 92° and 93° 30′ E.

CACONGO, or MALLEMBA, ka-kon'-go, an independent state of South Guinea, Africa, extending along the coast.

CACUS, kai'-cus, in mythology, a famous robber, son of Vulcan and Medusa. He is represented as a three-headed monster, and as vomiting flames. Hercules strangled him in his arms, and this combat forms one of the finest passages in the eighth book of Virgil's "Æneid."

CADE, JOHN, kaid, an Irishman, commonly called "Jack Cade," who, in 1450, headed an insurrection in Kent, and on the 17th of June, with nearly 20,000 followers, encamped at Blackheath. He assumed the name of Mortimer, and gave out that he was the rightful heir to the throne, pretending that he was a bastard relation of the duke of York. He defeated a detachment of the king's forces which had been brought against him at Sevenoaks, and re-encamped on Blackheath. On the 1st July he entered London, and with his sword struck the old London stone and exclaimed, "Now is Mortimer lord of this city." His followers, on the third day after his entrance, began to plunder the city, and he, himself, it is said, robbed the very house in which he had dined. Measures were now taken to expel the rebels, and a pardon offered to those who would return to their homes. This had the desired effect. The followers of Cade melted away, and he fled on horseback to Lewes, in Sussex. Here he was killed by one Alexander Iden, on the 11th July, and his head transported to London, and stuck upon the old bridge.

CADEMOSTO, LEWIS, ka-de-mos'-to, a Venetian navigator, engaged in the service of the king of Portugal. In 1455 he sailed to the Canary Islands, and thence to the coast of Africa, where, it is said, he discovered Cape Verd Islands. He left an account of his voyages, which was afterwards published.

Born 1422; died at Venice, 1464.

CADER IDRIS, kai'-der i'-dris, a mountain in Merionethshire, 5 miles from Dolgelly, 2,914 feet high.

CADIZ, kai'-diz (Sp. ka'-deeth), anciently GADES, a fortified city of Spain, capital of the province of the same name, and the principal trading port in the south of that country. It is situate at the extremity of a long tongue of land projecting from the island of Leon, the isthmus of which forms a vast bay, one of the finest in the world, and affording excellent anchorge for shipping. Its lighthouse of St. Sebastian is 172 feet high. The town is surrounded by the sea on the north-east and west, and its form is nearly a square of 1½ English mile. The houses are high, the streets in some parts narrow, but there are some pleasant public walks, the most frequented of which is the Almeda. The chief buildings are the hospital, custom-house, two cathedrals (neither being architecturally interesting), the churches, convents, and a bull-ring. The private houses are, in general, built of white stone. A graving dock, 500 feet long, was opened in 1878.

Manf.—Glass, woollen cloth, leather, hats, and soap. The trade of Cadiz has fluctuated greatly, but there are few large seaports in Europe that are not occasionally connected with it. There are productive salt-pits; and a dependency, St. Mary, is the centre of the trade in Sherry wine.

Lat. 36° 32′ N. Lon. 6° 17′ W.

History.—A town named Gaddir was built on this site by the Phœnicians, 1100 B.C. The Carthaginians afterwards possessed it, and it was captured from them by the Romans, who called it Gadez, obviously the origin of the present name. The Spaniards took it from the Moors in 1262. It was taken and pillaged in 1596 by the English. In 1626, an unsuccessful attempt was made on it by Lord Wimbledon; and in 1702 by the duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke. In 1800 it was bombarded by the British, and in 1808 the French fleet off Cadiz surrendered to the Spaniards. It was afterwards blockaded by the French, who did not leave it till after the battle of Salamanca, in 1812. In 1829 it was made a free port, but it did not enjoy this advantage till 1832.

CADIZ, a province of Spain, in the ancient division of Andalusia, bounded N. by the provinces of Seville and Huelva, S. and W. by the Straits of Gibraltar and the Atlantic, and E. by Malaga. It is traversed by the Rond mountains in the E., but fertile in general, and yielding the usual cereals, with fruits of almost every kind. The chief rivers are the Guadiaro and the Guadelete, with their tributaries. Area, 3,905 square miles. Pop. 428,352. This province is one of the three into which the ancient kingdom of Seville has been divided.

CADIZ, BAY OF, a large inlet of the Atlantic, on the S.W. coast of Spain. On its E. side is the islet La Caracca, where are the most important shipbuilding-yards and arsenals in the kingdom. Lat. 36° 30′ N. Lon. 6° 15′ W.

CADMEA, kad-me'-a. (See THEBES.)

CADMUS, kad'-mus, in Greek legend, son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, was ordered by his father to go in quest of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. His search led him to Bœotia, where, although unsuccessful in the object of his journey, he founded the city of Thebes. He is said to have been the first to introduce the use of letters into Greece from Phœnicia. It is almost hopeless to attempt to discriminate between legend and fact in the story.

CADMUS, the Milesian, was the first Grecian who wrote history in prose. He composed the history of Ionia, which is lost.

Lived in the 6th century B.C.

CADOG, kai'-dog, son of Brychan, a saint and founder of some churches in Wales in the 5th century. He died in France.

CADOG, commonly called the Wise, a bard, and the first who collected the British proverbs together. There are some churches dedicated to him in South Wales. Flourished in the 6th century.

CADOGAN, WILLIAM, ka-dug'-an, the first earl of Cadogan, was trained to a military life, and rose, by merit, to the rank of brigadier-general, in which capacity he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Blenheim, fought 1704. He took part in most of the battles in which the duke of Marlborough gained his renown; and succeeded that great general as commander-in-chief, and master of the ordnance.

Born 1680; died 1726.

CADORE (PIAVE DI), ka-dor'-ai, a town of Austrian Italy, 24 miles from Belluno. Pop. about 2,000. This place stands on the Piave, and is distinguished as the birthplace of Titian. In 1797 the French here obtained a victory over the Austrians.

CADOUDAL, GEORGE, ka-doo'-dal, a distinguished Chouan chief, the son of a miller of Brittany. He took up arms against the Republic, and soon acquired great influence. In 1794 he was taken prisoner and sent to Brest, from which he escaped. In 1800 Bonaparte offered to make him a lieutenant-general in his army, but he refused the offer, and also a pension, and an attempt being made to arrest him, fled to England. In 1802 he united himself with Pichegru to overthrow the French government, and, in the following year, made his way secretly to Paris, where he lay concealed for six months, waiting the denoûment of events that would enable him to carry out his design. Meanwhile, the police of Paris were on his track, and on the 4th March, 1804, he was taken in a cabriolet near the Luxembourg. In the struggle which ensued at his capture, he wounded one man and killed another. The character of this resolute chief was highly estimated by Napoleon I.

Born 1769, near Auray, Lower Brittany; died on the scaffold, 1804.

CADWALADYR, kad-wal'-a-dir, son of Cadwallon ab Cadvan, succeeded to the nominal sovereignty of Britain in 660; but, disheartened with the progress of the Saxons, he went to Rome in 686, where he died. With him ceased the title of king of the Britons. He was called one of the three blessed kings, on account of his charity to distressed Christians.

Died 703.

CADWALADYR CESAIL, a Welsh poet, many of whose pieces yet remain in manuscript. There was another of the same name and age whose works are to be met with, but unpublished. Both flourished in the 16th century.

CADWALLON, kad-wal'-lon, prince of North Wales, who, being defeated by Edwin, king of Northumberland, went to Ireland in 620, and remained there several years. On his return he assumed the title of king of the Britons, which he supported through a series of years of continual warfare against the Saxons. He was a great patron of the bards, and in his youth had been admitted among them.

Lived in the 7th century.

CADWGAN, kad'-oo-gan, son of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, became prince of a part of Powys in 1073, and, for some time, had part of South Wales. In 1107 he gave a banquet at Aberteivi, which almost ruined him, on account of his son Owain being captivated with the charms of Nest, the wife of Gerald, whom he carried off. In consequence of this, both he and his father were obliged to fly to Ireland. He returned the year after, but was assassinated by his nephew.

CAEDMON, seed'-mon, the reputed father of English song, and the first metrical author in our vernacular language. His composition is a kind of religious hymn, celebrating the praises of the Creator, and is preserved in the translation of Bede by Alfred. Besides this there is a long Saxon poem attributed to him, but upon doubtful authority. It is supposed to be a later production, and was published by the Society of Antiquaries, in 8vo, 1832. It consists of a paraphrase of some parts of the Scriptures.

Died about 680.

CAEN, ka, a large and well-built town of France, the capital of the department of Calvados, and formerly the capital of Lower Normandy, situate at the junction of the small river Odon with the larger stream of the Orne, 9 miles from the English Channel. Its streets are less narrow and crooked than in most towns of France; and the houses, being generally built of a white stone, have a fine appearance. It contains a number of parish churches, amongst which the most remarkable is that of St. Etienne, one of the finest in Normandy, founded by William the Conqueror, and which contained his monument, destroyed by the Huguenots in 1562. La Nimté, or the Abbaye aux Dames, founded by Matilda, William's wife, is also interesting. The castle, built by the Conqueror, was partially destroyed in 1793. Besides these, there are several hospitals, a palace of justice, an hotel-de-ville, a museum, public library, a botanical garden, and a custom-house. Manf. Linen, lace, cutlery, stockings, caps, blonde, crape, and Angora gloves. In these commodities, as well as in cider, dye-stuffs, skins, and in the cattle and horses reared in the surrounding country, an active trade is carried on. There are quarries of the well-known Caen stone, and a maritime canal connects the town with the sea. Pop. 34,460. This town was greatly adorned by William the Conqueror and his wife Matilda, and became the capital of Lower Normandy. In 1346 it was taken and plundered by Edward III. of England. It was again taken in 1417, and held till 1450, when it was retaken by Dunois. On this occasion, the duke of Somerset, with 4,000 troops, were made prisoners. Till 1793, Caen was the seat of a university founded by Henry VI. of England. It was the birthplace of Malherbe, the father of French poetry, and Auber the composer.

CAER, the Celtic word for "castle," employed as a prefix to several places in Wales and Scotland.

CAERLEON, kar'-le-on, an ancient town of Monmouthshire, on the Usk, which is here crossed by a handsome modern-built stone bridge, 2 miles N.E. of Newport. Pop. 1,300.—The name of this place signifies "Castle of the Legion," and is the ancient Isca Silurum. It was the capital of Britannia Secunda (modern Wales), and was a place of importance, until ruined by the wars between the Welsh and the Anglo-Normans.

CAERMARTHEN, or CARMARTHENSHIRE, kar-mar'-then, a county of S. Wales, bounded N. by Cardiganshire, E. by Brecknockshire, S. by Glamorganshire and the Bristol Channel, and W. by Pembrokeshire. It is about 53 miles in length by 33 in breadth, and consists of alternate hills and valleys; the former being generally of black and dreary aspect. Caermarthen Van, or Beacon, 2,596 feet high, is the greatest elevation. The coast is marshy. Nearly a third of the county is waste land. Quantities of oats and barley are raised; but wheat, except partially, is not successfully cultivated. Numbers of black cattle and horses are bred on the hills. These, together with grain, oak bark, coals, tinned iron plates, and lead, are exported.

Rivers.—The Towey, of which 50 miles run in the county, more than half being through the famous Vale of Towey; the Cothy, the Taff, and the Teify.

Area.—974 square miles.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, copper, coal, slate, marble, and lime.

Manf.—Principally woollen stockings and tinned iron plates.

Pop.—124,861.

CAERMARTHEN BAY, a large inlet of the Bristol Channel, lying between St. Goggan's Point, Pembrokeshire, and Worm's Head, Glamorganshire. The Taff, Towy, and Llychwr rivers fall into it. There is an island in it called Caldby, with a lighthouse 210 feet above the sea.

CAERMARTHEN, or CARMARTHEN, a seaport-town of South Wales, capital of the above, on the right bank of the river Towy, which is here crossed by a fine stone bridge, 14 miles N.W. of Llanelly. The town is of considerable extent, but the streets are steep and irregular. St. Peter's Church is ancient, and has some curious and interesting monuments. There is a county gaol, built on the site of an ancient castle. It is the seat of the county assizes, and, with Llanelly, returns one member to Parliament. There are shipbuilding docks, and an active trade is carried on in timber, tin-plate, cast-iron, lead ore, bricks, bark, corn, and slates. Pop. 10,512.—A station on the Great Western, London and North-Western, and Cambrian Railways.

CAERNARVON, or CARNARVONSHIRE, kar-nar'-von, a county of N. Wales, bounded N. by the Irish Sea, E. by Denbighshire, S. by the county of Merioneth and Cardigan Bay, and W. by Caernarvon Bay and the Menai Strait. It is 51 miles in length, by 22 in greatest breadth, and is the most mountainous county of Wales, being traversed by some of the loftiest ranges in Britain. The greatest elevation is SNOWDON. Many lakes and pools are among their recesses, and the climate, owing to the elevation of the ground, is cold and piercing. Oats and barley are cultivated, but cattle is the chief feature in the rural industry of the county. A diminutive breed of sheep is pastured upon the mountains. Very little more than half the county is under cultivation.

Rivers.—The Conway, which forms a part of the eastern boundary, is the principal; but there are numerous small streams mostly running through small lakes.

Area.—544 square miles.

Minerals.—Lead, copper, and zinc mines are wrought, but there are extensive slate-quarries. Yellow ochre, excellent hones, and other minerals, are also found.

Pop.—119,195.

CAERNARVON, or CARNARVON, the chief town of the above county, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and seaport, on the shore of the Strait of Menai, about 8 miles from Menai Bridge. The town is well built, and the streets, which are narrow, are at right angles, corresponding with the position of the gates. The church stands half a mile distant, and there are chapels for various denominations. At the west end of the town is the castle built by Edward I. It was of great size and strength, as shown by the massive ruins, the walls enclosing a site of three acres. In the town there are both hot and cold baths, and it is a favourite resort of visitors. Considerable trade is carried on with London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Ireland. Copper ore and slates are exported. Pop. 10,237—A station on the London and North-Western and Cambrian Railways. Caernarvon was the residence of the native princes of North Wales till the latter end of the 9th century. The first Prince of Wales was born in the castle, 1284, and ten years afterwards the Welsh, under Madoc, burned the town and massacred the English inhabitants. Near the town are the remains of the Roman station Segontium.

CAERNARVON BAY washes the W. coast of the counties Caernarvon and Anglesea. Its entrance is about 35 miles wide, and it communicates through the Menai Strait with the Irish Sea.

CAERPHILLY, kar-fil'-le, a market-town of South Wales, in the county of Glamorgan, 7 miles from Cardiff. Manf. Shirting, checks, and linsey-woolseys. In its neighbourhood are iron-works and collieries. Pop. 3,000. A station on the London and North-Western Railway.—Here are the ruins of a castle, which belonged to the younger Spencer, the favourite of Edward II., and which he defended against the nobles in 1326.

CAERWYS, or CAER AR WYS, kar'-wis, 'the Fort over the Waters,' a town of N. Wales, in the county of Flint, 5 miles from Holywell. It stands on a rising ground and consists of four spacious streets, intersecting each other at right angles. Pop. 947.—Here met for many centuries the Eisteddfod, or sessions of the Welsh bards and minstrels.

CÆSAR, sē'-sar, the surname of a distinguished patrician family of the gens Julia, which claimed descent from Ascanius, or Iulus, the son of Æneas. The name was adopted as a title by several of the Roman emperors, and by the modern German emperors of the Holy Roman empire.

CÆSAR, CAIUS JULIUS, descended from the Cæsar family, was the son of the prætor of the same name, and of Aurelia, a daughter of Aurelia Cotta, but lost his father when young. He married (83 B.C.) the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, and was designed for the office of high priest to Jupiter, but was deprived of it by Sylla, who was Cinna's inveterate enemy. Sylla carried his revenge so far as to confiscate the property of Cæsar, and even issued a proscription against him, when he retired from the capital and went to reside with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. On the death of Sylla (78 B.C.) he was recalled to Rome, when he distinguished himself as an orator in impeaching Dollabella for misgovernment in the affairs of Greece. He now joined the party of Marius, and united with Cicero in promoting the Manilian law, which gained him the friendship of Pompey. The first dignity he obtained was that of military tribune, after which he served the offices of quæstor and ædile. In these offices his profusion procured him great popularity, but at the sacrifice of the independence of his circumstances, which were much embarrassed by them. On the death of his wife Cornelia (67 B.C.), he married Pompeia, from whom he obtained a divorce on account of her receiving Clodius into her house at the time of celebrating the rites of the bona Dea. He did not, however, prosecute Clodius, and when asked why he had dismissed Pompeia, his answer was, that "Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion." In 63 B.C. he was elected pontifex maximus, and shortly afterwards prætor. On the expiration of his prætorship, he was appointed governor of the farther Spain, where he realized sufficient property to pay his debts, which are said to have amounted to a million and a half sterling. He afterwards formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Crassus; the former of whom married his daughter Julia, and he himself married Calpurnia, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, and shortly afterwards set out for Gaul. Here he distinguished himself as a military commander, obtaining numerous and decisive victories over the Helvetii, the Veneti (the inhabitants of Brittany), and the German tribes. In 53 B.C. he crossed over to Britain, but did little more than reconnoitre the coast. On his next expedition he crossed the Thames, and ravaged a great part of the country, taking several of the inhabitants as hostages. Having completely reduced Gaul to the condition of a Roman province, and acquired prodigious wealth, Pompey became jealous of him, and the senate deprived him of his government. This being considered by him as a declaration of war, he crossed the Rubicon, a small river which parted Cisalpine Gaul from Italy, with a determination of revenging himself upon his enemies. His army was zealously attached to him, and success attended him everywhere on his march. Rome was filled with fear and confusion. Pompey and the magistrates withdrew on his approach, when Cæsar entered the metropolis without his troops, in an affected style of moderation; yet he seized the public treasury, which enabled him to complete the subjugation of the people. The civil war which had begun, now raged with fury throughout the empire. Cæsar, however, by himself or his lieutenants, was everywhere triumphant, except in his blockade of Dyrrachium, where Pompey gained an advantage, and whence he retired to Macedonia, followed by that general, whom he defeated on the plains of Pharsalia. He next embarked for Alexandria, where the head of Pompey being brought to him, he burst into tears, and caused it to be solemnly interred. Here he became acquainted with Cleopatra, who bore him a son, and chiefly at her instigation entered into a war with Ptolemy, in which the famous Alexandrian library, containing 400,000 volumes, was accidentally destroyed. This war was attended with various success, but Cæsar's good fortune prevailed; the Egyptians were defeated, and Ptolemy was drowned. On the news of the death of Pompey, the Roman senate proclaimed Cæsar consul for five years, and created him dictator; thus placing the executive power in his hands. He next (46 B.C.) conquered Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates, the Great, in Asia Minor; on which occasion he wrote his well-known laconic letter, "Veni, vidi, vici,"—I came, I saw, I conquered. After settling the affairs of Greece, he proceeded to Rome, where he showed his clemency by pardoning all who had conspired against him in his absence. He next made an expedition into Africa, in the course of which he displayed his usual address in quelling a mutiny which had broken out in his favourite legion. In this war he defeated Scipio, Labienus, and Juba, and drove Cato to the extremity of putting himself to death at Utica. On his return to Rome he behaved with great liberality to the people, and enacted several good laws. Among other reforms which he introduced, was that of the calendar, which bears the name of the Julian calendar. The two sons of Pompey having excited a revolt in Spain, Cæsar marched against them, and after a bloody battle, succeeded in completing the subjugation of that country. His return to Rome was crowned with a triumph. He now assumed the imperial dignity, which roused the jealousy of several of his friends, who joined with the republicans in a conspiracy against his life. It is recorded of him, that a soothsayer bade him beware of the ides of March, and that his wife, Calpurnia, was so apprehensive that danger awaited him, as to dissuade him from going to meet the senate. The remonstrances, however, of Decimus Brutus, one of the conspirators, overruled his reluctance, and Cæsar went to the senate-house, where he was assassinated. Thus fell Julius Cæsar, one of the greatest men of antiquity. His talents were of the first order; and he might have shone as an orator if he had devoted himself to that profession, as Cicero himself acknowledges. He was also a mathematician, and understood architecture, and during his brief intervals of leisure at Rome designed many public works of great importance. His literary powers appear to great advantage in his Commentaries, written in the true spirit of historical faithfulness; but by far the greater part of his writings have been lost.

CÆSAREA, the modern KAISARIYEH, see-a-ré-a, an ancient place in Palestine, on the east coast of the Mediterranean Sea, 37 miles N. of Jaffa. It was at the commencement of the Christian era a splendid city, in the Grecian style, and is celebrated as being the scene of several events recorded in the New Testament. Here king Agrippa was smitten for neglecting to ascribe to God the glory, when flattered by the people; and here Paul continued a prisoner for two years before he was conducted to Rome, after he had appealed to Nero. Here, also, Cornelius the centurion was baptized by Peter; and here the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul that he would be bound at Jerusalem. It received its name in honour of Augustus, 22 B.C., and, under the Romans, was the residence of a proconsul. In the year 65, 21,000 Jews of Cæsarea were massacred by the Syrians. It was ruined during the Crusades, and its remains still bear testimony to the greatness of its former extent; but the present town is a miserable place, chiefly inhabited by fishermen.

CAFFA, or KAFFA, kaf'-fa. (See THEODOSIA.)

CAFFA, MELCHIOR, kaf'-fa, an able sculptor and designer. He adorned many churches at Rome with his works, which occasioned him to be compared to the celebrated Bernini.

Born at Malta, 1631; died at Rome, 1687.

CAFFIAUX, D. JOSEPH, kaf'-fe-o, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, who wrote, in conjunction with Grenier, the "History of Picardy;" and an essay towards a "History of Music," 4to; but his principal work is the "Genealogical Treasure," full of curious researches.

Born at Valenciennes, 1712; died at St. Germain des Pres, 1777.

CAFFRARIA. (See KAFFRARIA.)

CAFIRESTAN. (See KAFIRISTAN.)

CAGAYAN, ka-ga'-yan, a province in the island of Luzon, in the Eastern seas, comprising 20 towns and villages. Pop. about 60,000.

CAGAYAN-SOOLOO, ka-ga'-yan soo'-loo, a well-wooded island of the Asiatic archipelago, in the Sooloo Sea, with a circumference of 20 miles. Lat. 6° 58′ 5″ N. Lon. 118° 28′ E.

CAGLIARI, kal-ye-ar'-e, the capital of the island of Sardinia, situate on the S. coast, on the north-east shore of the Gulf of Cagliari. Its streets are narrow and miserably paved. It has many monasteries, nunneries, and churches, a handsome theatre, and a spacious and secure harbour with a dockyard and road. The old town comprises the citadel, cathedral, and vice-regal palace. Manf. Gunpowder, soap, furniture, leather, cotton fabrics, and cake-saffron. It is the chief emporium of all the Sardinian trade, and from 1798 to 1814 was the residence of the kings of Sardinia. Pop. 35,588. Pop. of the province of same name, 434,002.

CAGLIARI, BAY OF, is on the S. coast of the island of Sardinia, between capes Carbonara and Pula, in the Mediterranean Sea. At its entrance it is about 30 miles broad.

CAGLIARI, PAOLO, an Italian painter. (See VERONESE.)

CAGLIOSTRO, kal'-ye-os-tro, ALESSANDRO DI, Count, a famous impostor, whose real name was Guiseppe Balsamo; but he assumed the name of Cagliostro from his godmother. When a young boy he ran away from school, and was afterwards sent to a monastery at Cartagiore, where he assisted the apothecary, and picked up some knowledge of chemistry and the nature of drugs. He returned to Palermo, and led a life of profligacy, and cheated a goldsmith out of a considerable sum under the pretence of discovering to him some hidden treasure. On this occasion he was obliged to quit Sicily. At Messina he became acquainted with a Greek, named Althotas, who pretended to a knowledge of chemistry. With him he visited the Archipelago and Egypt, and, on their return, touched at Malta, where they worked in the laboratory of the grand master, Pinto. Here Althotas died, and Balsamo going to Naples, assumed the title of Marquis Pelligrini. He also visited Rome and Venice, where he married Lorenza Feliciano, a woman of great beauty, who assisted him greatly in his roguish enterprises. He professed to have discovered the elixir of life, and to be 150 years old, and his wife also claimed to be of great age, but to have preserved her youthful appearance by occult means. Cagliostro went to St. Petersburg, but the Empress Catherine was not to be duped, and he retreated rather ignominiously. He professed to be able to raise spirits; also to understand the secrets of Egyptian freemasonry, and he founded lodges. He styled himself the Great Koptha, who could reveal the secrets of futurity. He visited some other countries of Europe, but being implicated in France with the Cardinal Rohan in the affair of the diamond necklace purchased for the Queen Marie Antoinette, he was sent to the Bastile, but was liberated, and paid a second visit to England, where he met with great success, pretending to wonderful skill in medicine, and to a knowledge of the occult sciences. At last he returned to Italy, and was seized at Rome, where he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and died in the castle of St. Leo, near Rome. His deceptions were mostly played upon the opulent and noble, whose credulity he excited by pretensions the most extravagant, and, in several cases, the most impious.

Born at Palermo, 1743; died 1795.

CAGNOLA, LUIGI, Marquis, kan-yo'-la, an eminent Italian architect, who was intended for the profession of the law, but whose tastes led him to devote himself to quite an opposite kind of study. In 1812 he was engaged by the government of Milan to check the progressive ruin of the sixteen Corinthian columns which form the chief remains of the ancient baths of Maximian. Previous to this, however, he had signalized himself by several designs. In 1807 the first stone was laid of the Arco della Pace, a beautiful arch, originally constructed of wood, to celebrate the marriage of the viceroy, Eugène Beauharnais, with the Princess Amelia of Bavaria, in 1806. Political changes put a stop, for some time, to the progress of this work; but it was finally completed by Francis I. of Austria. With the exception of the Arc de l'Etoile at Paris, it is the most magnificent structure of the kind of which modern times can boast. A great many other works, evincing a high order of genius and taste, were executed by Cagnola, who also held an official post in the civil government of Milan.

CAGNANO, kan-ya'-no, a town of Italy province of Capitanata, 25 miles from Foggia. Pop. 4,500.

CAGSANA, kag-sa'-na, a town of Philippines, near the S. extremity of the island of Luzon. Pop. with district, 13,000.

CAGUA, ka-gu'-a, a town of Venezuela, South America, 50 miles S.W. of Caraccas. Pop. 5,200. Lat. 10° 18′ N. Lon. 67° 58′ W.

CAGUAN, ka-gu'-an, a town of New Granada, South America, with a church, containing an image of San Roque, to which numerous pilgrimages are made. Lat. 2° 50′ N. Lon. 74° 30′ W.

CAHETE, or VILLA DA RAINHA, ka-he'-te, an old town of Brazil, in the province of Mina Geraes. It is well built, with broad streets. Cattle-rearing, mining, and agriculture are the chief occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. 6,000.

CAHIR, ka'-her, a town of Tipperary, Ireland, beautifully situated on the Suir, 8 miles N.W. of Clonmel. Near the town is a large Norman castle, besieged by the Earl of Essex in 1599, and by Cromwell in 1650, and lately restored. The cavalry barracks are large. There are extensive flour mills in the town. Pop. 2,900.

CAHIRCIVEEN, ka'-her-ki-veen, a town of Kerry, Ireland, 3 miles from Valentia. Pop. about 2,000.—Here Daniel O'Connell was born, 1775.

CAHOOS FALLS, ka-hoos', in Mohawk river, U.S., 3 miles above its mouth. The river is here 1,000 feet wide, and the rock over which it pours extends across, in a direct line, from S.W. to N.E., and is 70 feet high. From the bridge, three quarters of a mile below, the falls are in full view.

CAHORS, ka'-or, a town of France, department of Lot, on the river Lot, here crossed by three bridges, 60 miles N. of Toulouse. The streets are steep and narrow, and there are many very old houses, a fine cathedral, and a monumental obelisk to Fenelon, who was a student in the town. There are remains of an aqueduct and other Roman structures. Manf. Cotton, woollens, leather, paper, and glass. Wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 11,564.

CAHUSAC, LEWIS DE, ka-hoo'-sak, a French writer, who, in 1736, produced his tragedy of "Pharamond," which obtained great success. He was made secretary to the count de Clermont.

Born at Montauban, 1700; died at Paris, 1759.

CAIAPHAS, kai-ă-făs, high priest of the Jews, who condemned Christ, and was afterwards dismissed his office by Vitellius, on which he put an end to his life.

CAICOS, CAYOS, or KEYS, kai'-kos, a cluster of small islands in the Atlantic, between the island of St. Domingo and the Bahamas. Lat. between 21° and 22° N. Lon. 72° W. Pop. about 2,000, principally freed negroes, and engaged in the cultivation of sugar and cotton.

CAIFA, CAIPHA, or, HAIFA, kai'-i-fa, a seaport town of Syria, situate on the S. side of the Bay of Acre. It is irregularly built, and is defended by walls on the land side. The anchorage is good, and the trade is increasing, a large portion of the business formerly transacted at Acre having been transferred to it. Consular agents of the chief European countries reside there, and there are some buildings in the western style. Beautiful gardens and orchards surround the town. Pop. 2,000, consisting of Mahomedans, Christians, and Jews. Lat. 32° 44′ N. Lon. 35° 10′ E.

CAILLE, NICHOLAS LEWIS DE LA, kail, an eminent mathematician, who became the friend of Cassini, and was associated with M. de Thury in projecting the meridian line. In 1739 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the college of Mazarine, and, in 1741, elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. In 1750 he went to the Cape of Good Hope, to examine the stars of the southern hemisphere. His writings are greatly esteemed, particularly his "Elements of Astronomy."

Born at Rumigny, 1713; died at Paris, 1762.

CAILLIAUD, kail'-e-o, a celebrated French geologist, who spent a considerable portion of his time in travelling. After visiting Holland, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Sicily, he passed into Egypt, and, under the auspices of Mahomet Ali, explored a portion of the Nile. He afterwards went into Nubia, and discovered, on Mount Zabarah, the emerald mines which had been worked in the reigns of the Ptolemies, and was enabled, by his own exertions, to transmit to the pasha ten pounds weight of the precious stones which he found in the vast excavations of the mountain. He visited Thebes, and returned to Paris in 1819; but, before the expiry of the same year, he once more set out for Egypt, to prosecute his travels. He now visited the remains of the temple of Ammon, other oases in the desert, and subsequently discovered Assour, above the confluence of the Taccazze with the Nile. In 1822 he returned to Paris, and afterwards took up his residence in Nantes. The results of his travels and discoveries have been given to the world in various volumes.

Born at Nantes, 1787.

CAILLIE, RENÉ, kaïl'-le-ai, a French traveller, who, in 1828, reached Timbuktu, having started from Sierra Leone. He then crossed the Sahara to Tangier. For this expedition he received the reward of 10,000 francs (4,000*l*.), offered by the Geographical Society of Paris to the first traveller who should reach Timbuktu. He published an account of his journey, and was attacked, but very unjustly, for want of veracity.

Born at Mauzé, 1799; died near Paris, 1838.

CAIN, kain, the eldest son of our first parents, who, according to the record of the book of Genesis, slew his brother Abel and became an outcast, travelling east of Eden, where he built a city, and had a son, named Enoch. The Jewish tradition is, that he was slain by Lamech. There was a sect of Gnostics in the 2nd century, called Cainites, who entertained great respect for this murderer, and for another of equal reputation,—Judas Iscariot.

CAIRNGORM, kairn'-gorm, or "Blue Mountain," a mountain of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 30 miles from Fort Augustus, and remarkable for its beautiful quartz, or rock crystal, called "Cairngorm stones." (See SCOTLAND.)

CAIRNS, the RIGHT HON. HUGH M'CALMONT, Lord, a lawyer of brilliant talent and great debating power, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and after keeping his terms at the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1844. He represented Belfast from 1852 to 1866, having served as solicitor-general under Lord Derby in 1858, when he was knighted. On Lord Derby's return to power in 1866 he became attorney-general, and in 1867 he was made lord chancellor, and raised to the peerage as Baron Cairns of Garmoyle. He retained office until the retirement from office of the Conservative administration, but was re-appointed on the return of Mr. Disraeli to power in February, 1874. He received the degree of LL.D. from Cambridge in 1862; was made D.C.L. by Oxford, 1863; and was elected Chancellor of the University of Dublin, 1867.

Born at Cultra, County Down, Ireland, 1819.

CAIRO, or GRAND CAIRO, kï'-ro, the El Kahireh, "the victorious," of the Arabs, is the metropolis of modern Egypt. It is situate on the right bank of the Nile, on a sandy plain, 5 miles from the origin of the Delta, 120 miles from Alexandria, and 84 from Suez, with both of which places it is connected by railway. BOULAC is the harbour. The new city, which is properly called Cairo, stands at about a mile from the river, and is built on a slope of one of the lowest ridges of the mountain-chain of Jebel Mokkatam. It occupies an area of about 3 square miles, but its streets are, in general, winding and narrow. The widest street is one which goes the whole length of the city, but would be looked upon only as a lane in Europe. The others are so narrow, that a slight covering is frequently thrown across them, to exclude the rays of the sun. The city is divided into several distinct quarters, appropriated to the different races or religious sects which make up the inhabitants; and each has a gate, which is shut as soon as it is dark. There are several small streets, or squares, consisting wholly of shops. The part occupied by European, American, and Jewish merchants was handsomely built, after a destructive fire in 1863. A handsome Coptic church was erected in 1867. The chief square, El-Esbekiah, is a large space, laid out as a garden in the centre, and surrounded by palaces and fine mansions. In the square is a monument of General Kleber. The interior of the houses is generally elegant and commodious. One of the features is a large hall, rising the whole height of the house, and covered with a small dome. Here everything is arranged with a view to coolness, as rain very seldom falls, although there are abundant dews. The floor is inlaid with coloured stone and earthenware, and fountains spring up into marble basins. The floor and walls are also suitably adorned. Of the public edifices, the mosques, of which there are 400, are the chief objects of architectural decoration. In the minarets, of which several are attached to every mosque, the Arabian architecture is preserved almost pure. These edifices are always neat, and generally elegant. The most famous mosques are that of the Sultan Tayloon, built in 879, and that of the Sultan Hassan about 1362. There are 36 synagogues and Greek, Coptic, and Armenian churches, and there are 80 public baths. The tombs of the califs, which are on the outside of the walls, are also beautiful. They are of white marble, and, for the most part, have carved, painted, or gilded domes. There is a large Mahometan university, attended by about 2,000 students from various Mahometan countries. The education is gratuitous, and there is a large library. There are various other schools. Cairo is the official residence of the Khedive, or the viceroy of Egypt, and the residence of the consuls-general. The obelisk of Heliopolis lies to the N.E. of the city; and in the island of Rhodah is the Nilometer, a column which indicates the height of the water during an inundation of the river. The castle of Cairo, built on a hill to the south of the city, is about a mile in circumference, but the greater part of it is in a dilapidated state. The grand saloon, now partly unroofed, is called Joseph's Hall; it is adorned with large and beautiful pillars of red granite. Above it, is a terrace, commanding a most delightful prospect of Cairo, the Pyramids, and all the surrounding country. One of the objects which has most attracted the attention of travellers, is the well in the castle, commonly called Joseph's Well. It is about 276 feet deep, and sunk in the solid rock. The passage down is by steps carried round the well, about two feet thickness of rock being interposed between them and the well. The water never fails, and is raised by a wheel turned by oxen.

Manf.—Cotton, cloth, iron, and arms. There are cotton printing, dyeing, and bleach-works.

Pop.—365,108, consisting of Turks, who form the ruling class; Arabs, who are the most numerous, and are chiefly employed in trading and agriculture; Copts, descendants of the ancient Egyptians; Jews, Armenians, Syrians, Africans, and Europeans.

Lat. 30° 2′ 4″ N.; Lon. 31° 15′ E.

History.—Cairo was founded by the Arabs in 969, and the fortress was erected by Saladin, in 1176. Till 1507 Cairo was the capital of the Egyptian sultans, but since that time it has only been the residence of governors or pachas of the province in which it is situate. In 1798 it was taken by the French under Napoleon, and in 1801, by the British, who restored it to the Porte. Within its walls, on the 1st March, 1811, the massacre of the Mamelukes took place.

CAIRO, OLD, is situate about 2 miles to the south of New or Grand Cairo. It is mostly inhabited by Copts. The Jews have a synagogue in it, said to have been built 1,600 years ago. In Old Cairo are the granaries, which, like many other ancient buildings, are dignified with the name of Joseph's. They are merely square courts, surrounded by walls, 15 or 20 feet high, and without any roof. They are used for depositing the grain collected as tribute in Upper Egypt.

CAIRO, formerly CANTON, a post township of the United States, in Green county, New York, 10 miles from Catskill. Pop. about 3,000.

CAIRO, ka'-e-ro, a town of Piedmont, duchy of Montferrat, on the Bormida, 18 miles from Acqui. Pop. 3,500.—Here the French defeated the Austrians in 1794.

CAITHNESS, kaith'-ness, the most northern county of the mainland of Scotland, bounded N. by Pentland Frith, E. by the German Ocean, S. and W. by Sutherlandshire. It is 30 miles in its greatest breadth, and 40 in greatest length. The surface of the county is generally rugged and mountainous. There are many bays and promontories on the coast; and in some parts the shore is penetrated by deep caverns, which afford shelter to numerous seals. Two prominent headlands on the northern coast are Dunnet Head and Duncansby Head. Near the latter is the spot so widely known as John o' Groat's, being the place where, in the 15th century, John de Groot, or Groat, built a house. The county contains a great number of small lakes, and its rivers are the Thurso, the Water of Wick, Dunbeath river, and Water of Wester, none of which are navigable. The coast and the salmon river fisheries employ a great proportion of the inhabitants, and are the principal branch of trade. WICK is the chief seat of the British herring fishery. Cattle-rearing is pursued to a considerable extent, and agriculture has recently improved.

Minerals.—Limestone, shale, sandstone; and lead-ore has been found.
Pop.—About 38,845.
History.—The early inhabitants of Caithness are supposed to have been Celts, who gave way to the Danes and Norwegians, whose sovereigns held dominion over this part of the country in the middle ages. The personal appearance of the people shows their Scandinavian origin. There are many ruins of castles to be seen, and the traditions of war and bloodshed are still numerous among the inhabitants of the various localities in which these are to be found.

CAIUS, KAYE, or KEY, JOHN, kai'-us, a physician, who was educated at Gonville-hall, Cambridge, but took his degree of M.D. at Padua, in 1541, where he was Greek lecturer and reader in physic. On his return to England, he was appointed anatomical lecturer to the London company of surgeons, and afterwards physician to Edward VI., and continued to serve Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth in the same capacity. He left his estate for erecting Gonville-hall into a college, now called Caius, of which he became master, and wrote the "History of Cambridge," and some medical works, which do honour to his learning.

CAJAMARCA, ka'-zha-mar-ka, a province of Peru. Pop. 213,391.

CAJAZZO, ka-zhat'-zo, an Italian town, 10 miles N.W. of Capua. It is very ancient, has a fine cathedral, and is protected by an old citadel. Pop. 3,900.

CAJETAN, THOMAS DA VIO, ka-zhé'-tan, a Dominican monk, who rose to be general of his order, and was sent by Leo X. into Germany to endeavour to counteract the influence of Luther, but his mission failed. On his return he was appointed bishop of Gaeta. He was taken prisoner at the sacking of Rome in 1527, and only released on paying 5,000 crowns. He wrote several theological works.
Born at Gaeta, 1469; died 1534.

CALABAR, kal-a-bar', a district of Upper Guinea, between the river Benin and New Calabar. The surface is low, and the climate unhealthy. Sugar-cane, yams, and palm-oil are the chief products.

CALABAR, OLD, or BONGO, a large river in the above district. It forms, at its mouth, a species of estuary, opening into the Bight of Biafra. The principal towns on its banks are Acoono, Coono, and Omun, or Bosun, on an island of the same name. There are also places called Duke Town and Creek Town, the seats of missions.

CALABAR, NEW, a river about 80 miles to the west of Old Calabar. It is a branch of the Niger, and falls into the Bight of Biafra, in lat. 4° 30′ N., and lon. 7° 7′ E.

CALABOZO, kal-a-bo'-zo, a town of Venezuela, province of Caraccas. Pop. 5,000.

CALABRIA, ka-lai'-bre-a, a district of Italy, forming a peninsula, separated from the island of Sicily by the Strait of Messina. Its greatest length is about 165 miles, with a varying breadth of from 18 to 70. It is traversed in its whole length by the last ridge of the Apennines, which attain an elevation of from 3,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. A branch of the chain crosses the province in the direction of east and west, dividing it into Calabria Citeriore or Inferiore, to the north, and Calabria Ulteriore, or Alta, to the south. Both divisions are extremely fertile.

Pro.—Abundant; consisting of fruit, oil, wine, grain, rice, hemp, cotton, flax, wood, saffron, liquorice, manna, and honey.
Minerals.—Salt, sulphur, alabaster, talc, and rock-crystal, with a few mines of lead, iron, and even of gold and silver.
Pop.—1,292,330.
Provinces.—For purposes of administration, Calabria is divided into the provinces of COSENZA, CATANZACO, and REGGIO, the chief towns of which have the same names.

CALAHORRA, ka-la-hor'-ra, a town of Spain, in the province of Logrono, near the junction of the small river Cidacas with the Ebro. There is an old cathedral. The trade is chiefly in the agricultural product of the district. Pop. 6,000.

CALAIS, kal'-ais (Fr. ka'-lai), a seaport-town of France, situate in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, 19 miles N.E. of Boulogne, and 26 from Dover, to which it is opposite. It is surrounded with a moat and wall, defended by a very large citadel, and, by means of sluices, the neighbouring country can be laid under water. The streets are wide and regular. Its form is that of an oblong square, and it has two gates, one towards the sea, erected in 1685 by Cardinal Richelieu, the other towards the land. Most of the houses are built of brick. The harbour, which is shallow, is defended by several small forts, and consists of a large quay, terminated by two long wooden piers which stretch into the sea. There is a cathedral. Manf. Hosiery, tulle, bobbin-net, hats, and gloves. It has distilleries, carriage-factories, and shipbuilding-docks, and carries on a considerable traffic in brandy, Bordeaux wine, and cured fish. To England it exports eggs in large quantities. Pop. 12,446. Lat. of lighthouse, 50° 57′ 45″ N. Lon. 1° 51′ 18″ E.—Calais surrendered to Edward III. of England in 1347, and in 1558 was retaken by the duke de Guise. It has communication with Dover by submarine telegraph, also by steam with London, Ramsgate, and Dover. With St. Omar it is connected by canal.

CALAIS, PAS DE. (See PAS DE CALAIS.)

CALAIS, a town in Maine, United States, on the right bank of the St. Croix, the falls of which are made available for saw-mills and other purposes. Vessels of the largest size can ascend the river. There is a dry dock, and a large lumber and timber trade is carried on. Pop. 6,200.

CALAMIANES, ka-laĭ'-me-ai-nees, a group of islands in the Asiatic archipelago, situate N. and N.E. of Paragoa, the most westerly of the Philippines. The largest of the islands, which gives name to the rest, is 35 miles long and 15 broad. Lat. 11° 25′ N. Lon. 120° 20′ E.

CALAMY, EDMUND, kal'-a-me, an eminent English divine, who adopted the Presbyterian side in the ecclesiastical differences which arose in the reign of Charles I. He was monarchical in his views, opposed the execution of the king, and was one of the deputies appointed to meet Charles II. in Holland at the Restoration. He was offered and refused a bishopric, having in his works opposed the episcopal office.

Born in London, 1600; died 1666.

CALANTAN. (See KALANTAN.)

CALANUS, ka-laĭ'-nus, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the sect of the Gymnosophists. He followed Alexander in his Indian expedition, and having fallen ill in his 83rd year, ordered a pile to be raised, upon which he mounted, decked with flowers and garlands, in the presence of the whole Macedonian army. An officer asking him if he had nothing to say to Alexander, "No," answered he, "I shall meet him again in three months at Babylon." Alexander died within the time.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CALAS, JEAN, 'ka'-la, a Protestant merchant of Toulouse, who was accused, in 1761, of strangling his eldest son, Marc Antoine, on account of his having secretly embraced the Roman Catholic religion. The young man was of an impatient and gloomy disposition, and in a fit of melancholy had hanged himself. His unfortunate father was put to the torture to make him confess, and finally, without any evidence, broken on the wheel, declaring his innocence to the last. His property was confiscated, his youngest son banished, and his daughters sent to a convent. The widow found a friend in the philosopher Voltaire, and, through his talent and energy, the proceedings were considered in the council, when Calas, in 1765, was pronounced innocent.

Born in Languedoc, 1698; died 1762.

CALASCIBETTA, ka-laś'-che-bet-ta, a town of Sicily, 14 miles E. of Callauicetta, noted for its stalactite caves and sulphurous springs. Pop. 4,800.

CALASIAO, ka-las-e-a'-o, a town in the island of Luzon, Philippine Islands. Manf. Straw hats and cigar cases. Pop. 18,000.

CALASPARRA, ka-las-par'-ra, a Spanish town, province of Murcia. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits. Pop. 5,300.

CALATABELLOTA, ka-lat-a-bel-lo'-ta, a town of Sicily, in the province of Girgente. Pop. 5,000.

CALATAFIMA, ka-lat-a-fee'-me, a town of Sicily, province of Trapani, 8 miles S.W. of Alcamo. There is a ruinous old castle. Pop. 8,400. In 1860 the Garibaldians gained a victory over the Neapolitan troops at this place.

CALATAGIRONE, ka-la'-tazh-e-ro'-nai, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto, province of Catania. It is a well-built, thriving town. Manf. Cotton fabrics and pottery. Pop. 28,119.

CALATANAZOR, ka-la'-ta-na-thor, a town of Spain, in the province of Soria, and 10 miles S. W. of the town of the same name. Pop. 1,500. This place is celebrated as the scene of the defeat of Almanzor by the Christians, in 1001, when 60,000 Moors perished.

CALATAYUD, ka-la'-ta-yood, a town of Spain, in the province of Aragon, on the Jalon, 48 miles S.W. of Saragossa. It contains several squares and streets, some handsome edifices, and there are agreeable promenades in the skirts of the town. There are an old castle, two churches, and a convent. In the neighbourhood are some interesting stalactite caves. Manf. Leather, woollens, paper, and soap. Pop. 11,000.

CALAUREA, or CALAURIA, kal-au-ree'-a, an island near Troezene, in the Bay of Argos, where was the tomb of Demosthenes, who fled hither from the persecutions of Antipater, and poisoned himself, 322 B.C.

CALAVERAS, kal-a-veer'-as, a county of the United States, in the N. of Central California. Area, 3,000 square miles. It has extensive gold-mining works. Pop. 9,000.

CALBURGA, kal-bur'-ga, a town in the Nizam's dominions, Hindustan, 110 miles W. of Hyderabad, on a stream which is one of the tributaries of the Krishna. Under some of the Hindoo Mahometan sovereigns it was a town of great importance.

CALCA, kal'-ka, a province of Peru, in the department of Cuzco, and a few miles from the town of that name. Desc. Undulating, with a fertile soil, yielding wheat, maize, and sugar, and watered by the Beni or Paro, the Urubamba, and the Yambari.

CALCAGNINI, CELIO, kal'-kan-ye'-ne, a learned Italian, who served in the imperial army some time, and was employed in several embassies and other honourable commissions. At last he became professor of belles-lettres at Ferrara, and wrote several works, particularly on the Roman antiquities, which shew great erudition. He also asserted the motion of the earth, before Copernicus published his system.

Born at Ferrara, 1579; died 1640.

CALCAR, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, who closely studied the style of Titian. His pictures are hardly to be distinguished from those of that master. The portraits in Vasari's "Lives of Painters and Sculptors" are by him.

Born at Calcar, Cleves, 1499; died at Naples, 1546.

CALCHAS, kal-kas, in Greek legendary history, a soothsayer, son of Thestor. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy, in the office of high priest, and prophesied the principal events which were destined to take place regarding that doomed city. He had received the power of divination from Apollo, and was informed that as soon as he found a man more skilled than himself, he must perish. This happened near Colophon, after the Trojan war. He was unable to tell how many figs were on the branches of a certain tree, and how many pigs a sow was about to give birth to, and when Mopsus mentioned the exact number, Calchas died through grief.

CALCHIO, kal'-che-o, an Italian town, on the right bank of the Oglio, 18 miles S.E. of Bergamo. The town is well built. Manf. Linen, woollens, oil, and wine. Silkworms are extensively reared. Pop. 2,900.

CALCUTTA, kal-kut'-ta, the capital of the presidency of Bengal, and the metropolis of British India, the official residence of the governor-general, and seat of the supreme courts of justice. The name is a modification of the Hindoo "Kali Ghatta" (the ghaut or landing-place of the goddess Kali). The city extends for about five miles, from north to south, along the eastern bank of the river HOOGHLEY, a branch of the Ganges, about 100 miles from the sea. It is nearly two miles broad, and occupies a site of eight square miles in extent. The landward limit of the city is a broad road, known as the Circular Road, beyond which are a canal and the large suburbs of Nundenbaugh, Bahar-simleah, Sealdah, Entally, and Ballygunge. Another extensive suburb, Chitpore, is farther to the north; and to the south of the city are the suburbs of Bhonaneepoor, Alipore, and Kidderpore. On the opposite or western side of the Hooghley are Sulkeah, Howra, and Seebpoor, where are government warehouses, dockyards, shipbuilding establishments, and manufactories. Calcutta is divided into two portions, the native or Black Town, in the northern part, until recently a dirty and unhealthy place, with narrow unpaved streets, and wretched huts, but lately improved by the construction of broader thoroughfares, the erection of better houses, and the institution of a system of drainage; and the European town, regularly laid out, with wide streets, open squares, noble promenades, and the splendid public and private edifices which have obtained for Calcutta the designation of the City of Palaces. The approach to the city from the south by the river is between the Botanical Gardens and the Gothic Bishop's College, on the western side, and the beautiful gardens and handsome detached residences of the fashionable suburb, Garden Reach, on the right hand. Beyond Garden Reach are the government dockyards and arsenal, then the district of Chowringhee, now, in fact, a portion of Calcutta, with fine residences, then the Maidan Esplanade, the resort of the fashionable world in the cool of the evening, the "Hyde Park of Calcutta," as it has been termed, when the most superb equipages and costumes may be seen. The fine government house, built at the cost of 1,000,000*l.* by the Marquis of Wellesley during his presidency, at the beginning of the present century, is at the north end of the esplanade, near the centre of which on the river bank is Fort William, the largest fortress in India, which cost 2,000,000*l.* in construction, octagonal in form, occupying with its outworks an area half a mile in diameter, with a trench that can be filled with eight feet of water. The fortress mounts more than 600 guns, and contains 80,000 stand of small arms. The original Fort William, the nucleus of the present town, was erected in 1669, to protect the British factories in the villages of Chuttanee, Kali Ghattah, and Govindpore. Beyond Fort William, to the north, is an open place extending for two miles along the river bank, the Strand, 40 feet above high water, with numerous ghauts or landing-places. On the Strand are many handsome public buildings, including the custom-house (the old fort, famous or infamous for Surajah Dowlah's Black Hole atrocity, the "black hole" being now used as a warehouse), the mint and other government offices. Among the other most noticeable public buildings are the court of justice, the town-hall, the treasury, Metcalf Hall, Writers' Buildings, the Hindoo, Mahometan, and Jesuits' colleges, Medical College, Bank of Bengal, university, and theatre. There are two cathedrals (St. John's, the old, and St. Paul's, the new, a handsome structure in the Gothic style), and numerous churches and chapels belonging to various denominations. The Martinière, founded by a bequest made by General Martin, a Frenchman, in the service of the East India Company, was opened in 1836. Gratuitous instruction and board is given to poor Christian children, and the Protestant and Catholic bishops, and the ministers of the Scotch and other churches, unite in carrying on the work. There are several hospitals and asylums for orphans, a mechanics' institute, and various literary and scientific associations. The public monuments include statues of the Marquis of Wellesley, Lord William Bentinck, Sir David Ochterlony, Lord Hardinge, and other eminent persons. In front of the custom-house is an obelisk, 50 feet high, inscribed with the names of those who were killed in the Black Hole. The city is well supplied with water taken from the Hooghley, 15 miles higher up, and filtered. In the native town are Hindoo temples, mosques, pagodas, and bazaars, or native shops. Vessels of 2,000 tons can ascend the river as far as the city, but the navigation is dangerous, and ships of heavy burden generally unload at Port Canning or Muslah, 28 miles below Calcutta, with which it is connected by rail.

Lat. 22° 35′ N.; Lon. 88° 30′ E.

Pop.—Including the suburbs, 766,298; of Calcutta proper, 423,219. Of the native inhabitants, the large portion are Hindoos, but there are many Mahometans. There are about 20,000 Europeans, and the same number of Eurasians, or the children of white fathers and black mothers; the remainder of the population consisting of Armenians, Greeks, Parsees, and Jews.

Railway and other Communications.—The East Indian Railway connects Calcutta with Benares, Delhi, and Kurrachee; and the Great Indian Peninsula, connected with the East Indian, gives access to Bombay and Madras. The Eastern Bengal and the Calcutta and South Eastern have also stations in the city. Three different lines of telegraph afford means of communication with the chief towns of India and with England; and there are regular lines of steamers.

CALDARA, POLIDORO. (See CARAVAGGIO.)

CALDAS, kal'-das, several small towns of Spain and Portugal, celebrated for baths and medicinal springs, the word meaning "warm." There is also a plain so named in Brazil where there are hot sulphur springs.

CALDER, kal'-der, two rivers of England; one rising near Burnley, on the borders of Lancashire, and falling into the Aire, 2 miles from Pontefract; the other rising near the former, and falling into the Ribble, near Whalley.

CALDERA, kal-da'-ra, a new seaport of Chili, 50 miles N.W. of Copiapo. It is well laid out, and there is a good harbour.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA, DON PEDRO, kal'-dai-rone, a celebrated Spanish soldier, priest, and dramatic writer, who wrote his first piece at the age of fourteen. He was a soldier at twenty-five, and served with distinction at Milan and in the Netherlands, but continued to pursue poesy with great success. Philip IV., recognizing his great talents, called him to the court, bestowed on him his patronage, and provided the necessary funds for the representation of his plays. He was also made a knight of the order of San Jago. He subsequently entered the church, becoming chaplain in the royal chapel at Madrid, and a priest in the fraternity of San Pedro, to which at his death he left his property, and by whom a monument was erected to his memory in the church of San Salvador, Madrid. He is considered to be one of the greatest poets of Spain, and his dramatic writings, comedies, light comic pieces, and tragedies number 128. His plays were printed at Madrid in 9 vols. 4to, 1689.

CALDERONE, kal'-de-ro'-nai, three small islands in the Mediterranean, 15 miles from Crete.

CALDERWOOD, DAVID, Scotch divine and historian. In 1617 he protested against the appointment of an ecclesiastical council, and was banished the kingdom. He went to Holland, and wrote several works under the anagrammatic name of Edwardus Didoclavius. After the death of King James he returned to Scotland. The "History of the Kirk of Scotland" is his most important work.

Born 1575; died at Jedburgh, 1651.

CALDIERO, kal'-de-air'-o, a village of N. Italy, 9 miles E. of Verona, once celebrated for its thermal springs. Pop. 1,600.—Here, in 1796, just before the battle of Arcola, the French, under Napoleon I., were repulsed by the Austrians under Alvinzi, and in 1805 were beaten, under Massena, by the archduke Charles.

CALDWELL, kawd'-well, a county of the state of Kentucky, United States. There is a good bed of coal in the northern part, and iron ore is abundant. Capital, Princeton. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 11,000.

CALDWELL, a county of Missouri, United States. The chief town is Kingston. Area, 435 square miles. Pop. 13 646.

CALDWELL, a county of North Carolina, United States. Lenoir is the capital. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 10,291.

CALDWELL, a county of Texas, United States. The chief town is Lochhart. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 11,757.

CALEB, kai'-leb, one of the Hebrews sent by Joshua to view the land of Canaan, of which he gave a faithful description, and thereby raised the spirits of the people. He possessed the country of Hebron, and died at the age of 114.

Lived in the 15th century B.C.

CALEDON, kal'-e-don, a division of the western province of Cape Colony, South Africa, between the Zondereinde Mountains on the N., and the ocean on the S. The country is excellent for sheep-farming, and there is abundance of timber. Area, 1,700 square miles. Pop. 10,000.

CALEDON, the chief town of the above, 70 miles E. of Cape Town.

CALEDONIA, kal-e-do'-ne-a, the ancient name of that part of Great Britain now called Scotland. Various etymologies have been assigned to it. Camden derives it from the Celtic caled, 'hard,' as allusive to the uncivilized state of the country; Buchanan obtains it from the Scottish calden, 'a hazel-tree;' and others compound it of the two British words Cail dun, 'Gauls of the mountains,' or Gael doch, 'Gaul district.' Caledonia comprehended all those countries which lay to the north of the Forth and Clyde. The large limbs, red hair, and blue eyes of its inhabitants, according to Tacitus, seemed to assert a Germanic extraction. It was never reduced to subjection by the Romans, although Agricola penetrated to the river Tay, and Severus into the very heart of the country.

CALEDONIA, a county of Vermont, United States, bounded N. by Essex county, E. by Connecticut river, S. by Orange county, W. by Washington and Orleans counties. It is fertile and well watered, yielding oats, potatoes, and maple sugar. Minerals. Limestone and granite, and there are sulphur-springs. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 23,607.

CALEDONIA, a post-township of the United States, in Genesee county, New York, on Genesee river, 17 miles from Batavia, chiefly settled by emigrants from Scotland. Pop. 2,000.—The Big Springs here are a curiosity. They discharge water enough, at all seasons, to supply numerous mills.

CALEDONIA, NEW, an island of the S. Pacific Ocean, supposed to be called Balade by the inhabitants. It is about 200 miles long, by about 30 broad, and inhabited by Papuan savages. Lat. between 20° and 22° 26' S. Lon. between 164° and 167° E. Pop. 60,703, of whom the number of the natives is uncertain, but they are decreasing.—In 1774 this island was discovered by Captain Cook. The French took possession of it and its dependency, the Isle of Pines, in 1853.

CALEDONIAN CANAL, THE, connects the North and Irish seas, extending from the Moray Frith to Loch Eil. Length, 60 miles.—This canal was begun in 1803, and opened in 1823. It passes through lochs Ness, Oich, and Lochy.

CALELLO, ka-lel'-lo, a Spanish town, on the coast, province of Catalonia, 30 miles N.E. of Barcelona. Manf. Linen and cotton, lace, paint, and ropes. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 3,100.

CALENTIUS, ELISIUS, ka-len'-she-us, an Italian writer, who was tutor to the son of Ferdinand II., king of Naples.—He is known to fame by his poem of "The Battle between the Frogs and Mice," in imitation of Homer, which was printed in 1738, at Rouen.

Born in Apulia, about 1450; died 1503.

CALEPINO, or DA CALEPIO, AMBROSE, kal'-lai-pe'-no, a learned Italian, descended from a noble family. He embraced the monastic habit of the Augustines, and spent all his life in the compilation of a dictionary of the Latin, Italian, and other languages. The first edition of this appeared in 1503, and became very famous; and, after passing through a great number of editions, swelled, in 1681, to two volumes folio. He was blind for some time before his death.

Born at Bergamo, 1435; died 1511.

CALHOUN, JOHN CALDWELL, kal-hoon' a distinguished American statesman. Having had a successful practice at the bar, he was sent to Congress in 1811, and was soon recognized as the leader of the war party against England. During a period of forty years, he rendered faithful services to the Union, in the various capacities of representative, secretary of war, vice-president, and senator.

Born at Abbeville, South Carolina, 1782; died at Washington, 1850.

CALHOUN, a county of Arkansas, United States. Cotton and Indian corn are produced. Hampton is the chief town. Pop. 5,671.

CALHOUN, a county of Florida, United States, bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. The capital is St. Joseph. Area, 464 square miles. Pop. 1,580.

CALHOUN, a county of Illinois, United States. The Mississippi and Illinois rivers unite at the south-eastern extremity of the county. Hardin is the chief town. Area, 260 square miles. Pop. 7,467.

CALHOUN, a county of Michigan, United States. The capital is Marshall. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 38,452.

CALHOUN, a county of Mississippi, United States. Pop. 13,492.

CALHOUN, a county of Texas, United States, bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. Lavaca is the chief town. Area, 484 square miles. Pop. 1,731.

CALI, or SANTIAGO DE CALI, kal'-le, a town of Colombia, South America, founded in 1537. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 3° 24′ S. Lon. 76° 23′ W.

CALIANO, kal'-e-a'-no, a town of the Tyrol, Austria, 10 miles S. of Trent. It stands on the left bank of the Adige, near the place where the Venetians were defeated by the Austrians, under archduke Sigismund, in 1487.

CALICUT, kal'-i-kut, a seaport of the district of Malabar, in the presidency of Madras, although situated on the west side of the peninsula. It was formerly a magnificent and extensive city, but it is now comparatively inconsiderable, the harbour having filled with sand, and the anchorage being only an open roadstead. Exp. Teak, sandal-wood, cocoa-nuts, cordage, pepper, and wax. The well-known manufacture of cotton cloth, calico, derived its name from this place. Pop. 57,085. Lat. 11° 15′ N. Lon. 75° 50′ E.—This was the first place in India at which Vasco de Gama touched in 1498.

CALIDASA, kal'-le-da'-sa, a much-admired Indian poet. He wrote several poems, which display a remarkable genius. His "Sacuntala" was translated by Sir William Jones, and was the first work which made his name known to Europeans. Supposed to have flourished under the reign of Vicramaditya II., in the 5th century.

CALIFORNIA, LOWER, or OLD, kal'-i-for'-ne-a (from the Spanish caliente fornalla, "hot furnace"), a territory of the republic of Mexico, N. America. It occupies a long, narrow peninsula, united on the N. to the continent of N. America, from which it is separated on the E. by the Gulf of California, and is bounded on the W. by the Pacific Ocean. It is nearly 750 miles long, and in different places 30, 60, 90, and 120 miles broad. A chain of mountains runs through the centre of this peninsula, the greatest elevation being from 4,500 to 4,900 feet above the level of the sea. Wherever the soil is watered by springs, it is of singular fertility; but in general the ground is uneven, rough, and barren, full of mountainous ridges, and stony and sandy places, and deficient in moisture. It abounds with mules, horses, cattle, swine, goats, and sheep. The chief town is Loretto, on the eastern side, an unimportant place, with not more than 1,000 inhabitants. Area, 61,562 square miles. Pop. 30,178, including a large number of Indians, and many of mixed race. Lat. extending from Cape San Lucas, 22° 45′ N., to the northern extremity of the gulf, 32° N. Lon. 109° 53′ W. This country was discovered by Hernando de Grixalva in 1534, but was not known to be a peninsula till 1541.

CALIFORNIA, UPPER, or NEW, formerly a province of Mexico, or New Spain, but now one of the United States of N. America. It is bounded on the N. by Oregon, on the E. by Utah, on the S. by Lower California, and on the W. by the Pacific Ocean. The principal bays are San Francisco, Humboldt, Monterey, Pelican, and San Diego. The San Francisco is 70 miles long, with an average breadth of 8. The soil is well watered and fertile, and it is one of the most picturesque countries which can well be imagined. Two ranges of mountains, the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range, traverse it from north-west to south-east, and have, between them, the magnificent valley of the Sacramento and the Joaquin. The loftiest known peak is the Shasta, which attains an elevation of 14,400 feet, and is covered with perpetual snow.

Rivers.—The Sacramento and the San Joaquin, with their tributaries. The Sacramento has its rise in the northern extremity of the valley of the same name, the principal of its streams issuing from Mount Chasta, or some of its spurs.

Lakes.—Bonpland, Clear, Owen, Keru, and Tulare.

Climate.—Genial and mild. The seasons may be considered as consisting of two, a dry and a wet, there being no frost, and rarely snow, except on the mountains.

Zoology.—Bears, wolves, foxes, otters, wild cats, beavers, antelopes, hares, and rabbits. There are large herds of wild horses, cattle, deer, and elks browsing on the slopes of the hills, mules, goats, sheep, and hogs also are plentiful. Of birds, the turkey, quail, buzzard, and woodpecker are common; whilst ducks, geese, and cranes are numerous. There are many varieties of snakes; among which the rattlesnake may be mentioned. Lizards and scorpions are found, and mosquitoes are innumerable.

Forests.—Extensive; consisting chiefly of the pine and the oak. Some of the largest trees in the world are found here, attaining a height of about 450 feet, and a girth of nearly 120 feet.

Pro.—Rice, maize, the usual cereals, tobacco, and, with the exception of cotton, nearly all the plants which grow in the warmer parts of the United States; grapes, peaches, and mostly all the kinds of fruit which belong to a moderately warm climate. There are more than 30,000,000 vines in the state, and wine is a most important product. Silkworms are extensively reared. Onions, tomatoes, melons, and olives are largely cultivated.

Minerals.—Important; comprising gold, silver, quicksilver (the most productive mine in the world), lead, iron, copper (in large quantities), coal, granite, marble, and diamonds. Gold is found in great abundance, and was, in 1848, accidentally discovered in New Helvetia, on the banks of the Sacramento, and a "rush" from almost every part of the world was the result.

Pop.—After the discovery of gold, the population tripled in about two years, and is now six times what it was at that time. The census of 1872 gave 568,247 as the number of inhabitants, of whom 350,400 were native born, and nearly 50,000 were Asiatics, mostly Chinese, since excluded. Pop. in 1880, 864,694.

Chief Towns.—SAN FRANCISCO, SACRAMENTO, MARYSVILLE, STOCKTON, PLACERVILLE, SAN JOSE, SONORA, MORETON, and SAN DIEGO.

Lat. between 32° and 32° N.; Lon. Eastern boundary, 120° W.

History.—California was claimed for England by Drake, under the name of New Albion, in 1579, but not occupied. The Spanish established naval and military stations in 1698, and the country became a portion of Mexico in 1823. In 1848 it was ceded to the United States, at first forming a territory, but was admitted as a State of the Union in 1850.

CALIFORNIA, GULF OF, a gulf of the Pacific Ocean, on the W. coast of N. America, formerly celebrated for its pearl-fisheries, which, however, have greatly fallen off. It is 700 miles long, with a breadth varying between 45 and 150. It contains numerous islands and shoals, and there is a famous pearl-fishery. Lat. between 23° and 32° 30′ N.

CALIGULA, CAIUS CÆSAR AUGUSTUS GERMANICUS, ka-lig'-u-la, a Roman emperor, who received this surname from his wearing in the camp the caliga, a kind of shoe in use among the common soldiers. He was son of Germanicus, by Agrippina, and grand-nephew to Tiberius. During the first eight months of his reign, Rome was governed with mildness; but he soon displayed his true character, and became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himself, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wished to imitate the thunders and powers of Jupiter. In one year he wasted all the immense wealth left by Tiberius. The statues of all great men were removed, and he appeared in public places in the most indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed, himself, the worst of crimes, and established public places of prostitution. He banished or murdered most of his relatives, lived in incestuous intercourse with his sisters, often amused himself with putting innocent people to death, and attempted to famish Rome, by a monopoly of corn. He was pleased with the greatest disasters which befell his subjects, and often wished the Romans had but one head, that he might strike it off at a blow. Wild beasts were constantly fed in his palace with human victims; and, as if to insult the feelings and the dignity of fallen Rome, a favourite horse was made high priest and consul, and kept in marble apartments, adorned with the most valuable trappings and pearls which the Roman empire could furnish. He made a bridge of ships over the bay between Baiæ and Puteoli, and to commemorate the exploit had a large number of people drowned. He plundered Gaul, and at one time threatened Britain. In consequence of his numerous acts of tyranny, a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was murdered after a reign of four years. It has been said that Caligula wrote a treatise on rhetoric; but his estimate of learning may be rather obtained from his attempts to destroy the writings of Homer and Virgil.

Born at Antium, 12; died 41.

CALIPPUS, ka-lip'-pus, a mathematician of Cyzicus, famous for having corrected the cycle or period of nineteen years, invented by Meton, for the purpose of showing the correspondence in point of time between the revolutions of the sun and moon, and which is sometimes called the Calippic period.

Lived 330 B.C.

CALITRI, ka-lee'-tre, an Italian town, province of Avellino, 7 miles N.E. of Conza. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in sheep rearing and other agricultural pursuits. Pop. 6,200.

CALIXTUS, or CALLISEN, GEORG, ka-lix'-tus, German theologian, belonging to the Lutheran church. In 1605 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Helmstedt, and after travelling in Germany, Holland, and England, professor of theology. He was attacked by some of the more narrow-minded Lutherans, who charged him with heresy, on account of a work which advocated toleration towards the Catholics. But he had powerful friends, and retained the professorial chair. He possessed great ability, and exhibited a large and Catholic liberality of sentiment.

Born in Holstein, 1586; died 1656.

CALIXTUS, bishop of Rome, who suffered martyrdom in the 3rd century.

CALIXTUS II., POPE GUIDO, son of the Count of Burgundy. Elected pope in 1119, in opposition to Gregory VIII., who had obtained possession of Rome. Calixtus, after a long contest with the Emperor of Germany, entered Rome in triumph, and took Gregory prisoner, treating him with great severity.

Died 1124.

CALLA, or KHALED, kal'-led, one of the bravest of Mahomet's captains. He had at first taken part against him, and had contributed to the victory of Ohod, where the prophet had been defeated. In 630, however (the 8th year of the Hegira), he embraced the new religion, and was chiefly instrumental in the conquest of Syria, Mahomet conferring on him the title of the Sword of God.

Died 642.

CALLAN, kal'-lan, a town of Kilkenny, Ireland. The church, once a stately fabric, is now nearly in ruins. Pop. 2,500.

CALLANDER, kal'-an-der, a village and parish of Perthshire, Scotland, 16 miles N.W. of Stirling. This village, much visited by tourists, stands nearly at the foot of the mountain Benledi, and is about 10 miles from the romantic scenery of the Trossachs, through which the tourist passes en route from Stirling to Loch Katrine, the scene of Sir Walter Scott's "Lady of the Lake." Pop. 1,870.

CALLAO, kal-la'-o, or kal-ya'-o, a fortified seaport of Peru, situate on a river of the same name, 6 miles from Lima. The houses are generally built of slight materials; for, from the fact of its never raining in this country, stone houses are unnecessary. There are a good harbour and roadstead. Hides, cotton, bark, copper, and specie are exported. Pop. 33,502. Lat. 12° S. Lon. 77° 13′ 7″ W.—Earthquakes are frequent here. The most remarkable happened in 1746, when three-fourths of Lima was laid in ruins, and Callao was entirely demolished. Three thousand persons perished in the catastrophe.

CALLAO, a small island of further India, in the China Sea. It is 16 miles from the mouth of the Fai-Fo river. Area, 10 square miles. Lat. 15° 48′ N. Lon. 108° 30′ E.

CALLAS, kal'-la, a town of France, in Provence, 5 miles from Draguignan. Pop. 1,900.

CALLAWAY, kal'-la-wai, a county of Missouri, United States. There are fine beds of coal, iron ore, and limestone. Fulton is the capital. Area, 743 square miles. Pop. 23,670.

CALLAWAY, a county of Kentucky, United States. Murray is the chief town. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 13,295.

CALLCOTT, SIR AUGUSTUS WALL, kal'-cot, an eminent English landscape painter. He has been styled the English Claude. He was elected Royal Academician in 1810; knighted in 1837, and appointed conservator of royal pictures, 1844.

Born at Kensington, 1779; died 1844.

CALLCOTT, JOHN WALL, musical composer, elder brother of the above. In 1790 he received the degree of Doctor of Music at Oxford. For the last 15 years of his life he was insane. As a composer of glees he occupies the first rank among English musicians.

Born at Kensington, 1766; died 1821.

CALLICRATIDAS, kal'-li-krat'-i-das, a Spartan general, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the Lacedæmonian fleet. He took Methymna, and blockaded Conon, in Mitylene, but was conquered and killed the same year by the Athenians, at Arginusæ.

Died 406 B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, kal-lim'-a-kus, a Greek poet and historian, who had the charge of the library of the Ptolemies at Alexandria. He was tutor of Apollonius, the author of the "Argonautica." Fragments of his poems and works on rhetoric and grammar exist.

Born at Cyrene; died 270 B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, who invented the Corinthian order of Grecian architecture. Its origin is said to be this:—Beneath a basket which had been placed near the tomb of a Corinthian maiden was an acanthus root, the leaves of which grew in the spring, and curled round it in so graceful a manner, that the architect adopted it as a suitable ornament for his capital.

Lived in the 6th century B.C.

CALLINGER, kal'-lin-jer, a strong and celebrated fortress of Bundelcund, British India, 112 miles S. of Allahabad. It is built of stone, on the top of a mountain, 1,200 feet above the neighbouring plains. At the base of the rock is a town of the same name, now much decayed, but once of great extent. Excavated temples of Siva are in the vicinity. The fortress was captured by the British in 1812. Lat. 25° N. Lon. 80° 32′ E.

CALLINGTON, or KELLINGTON, a town and parish of Cornwall, 10 miles from Launceston. Area of parish, 2,600 acres. Pop. 2,200.—In its neighbourhood are tin and copper mines.

CALLINICUS, kal-lin'-i-kus, an ancient architect, who invented the Greek fire, and communicated his secret to the emperor Constantine Pogonat, who made use of it to burn the Saracen fleet at Cyzicus, in 673. The knowledge of this composition was afterwards lost; but a Frenchman, in Louis XV.'s reign, again discovered it; and the king, in 1756, bought the secret, in order to bury so frightful a knowledge in oblivion.

Born at Heliopolis, Egypt, in the 7th century.

CALLINUS, kal-li'-nus, an orator of Ephesus, who is said to have invented elegiac poetry. Flourished about the 8th century B.C.

CALLIOPE, kal-li'-o-pe ("sweet voiced"), the muse of eloquence and heroic poetry. The poets call her the mother of Orpheus, and of the Corybantes and Sirenes. She was represented as a young girl, with a majestic appearance, crowned with laurel, holding in one hand a trumpet, and in the other an epic poem.

CALLIRRHOE, kal-lir'-ro-e, a name common in classic fable. The best known is the daughter of the river Achelous. She married Alcmæon, and became the involuntary cause of his death, in asking for the fatal necklace of Eriphyle. (See ALCMÆON.)

CALLISTHENES, kal-lis'-the-nees, a Greek philosopher, disciple and cousin of Aristotle, who followed Alexander in his Asiatic expedition. He refused to acknowledge the alleged divinity of this hero, and even had the misfortune to displease him by his railleries. He was afterwards accused of conspiracy, confined, it is said, in an iron cage, and put to death at Cariatæ, in Bactriana. A very few fragments of his writings are extant.

CALLOSA (DE ENSARRIA), kal-lo'-sa, a Spanish town on the left bank of the Guadalest, province of Alicante. Pop. 4,300.

CALLOSA (DE SEGURA), another town in the province of Alicante, 60 miles S.W. of the preceding. It is well built, many of the houses being of black marble. There is a large aqueduct in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,900.

CALLOT, JACQUES, kal'-lo, a celebrated painter and engraver. He learnt his art at Rome, whither he went against the wishes of his family, who were noble. He acquired a great reputation, and his engravings, of which he produced an immense number, are highly valued. After the taking of his birthplace by Louis XII., in 1633, he refused to commemorate the event with his graver. Callot's works show his great genius in the representation of popular, grotesque, and warlike subjects, and in caricaturing the vices and follies of mankind.

Born at Nancy, 1592; died 1637.

CALMAR, or KALMAR, kal'-mar, a fortified town of Sweden, and the capital of a province, on the sound or strait of the same name, in the Baltic, opposite the island of Oland. Outside the town stands the castle. It is mostly built of wood, and is deemed one of the strongest in Sweden, but is now converted into a house of correction. The harbour is small, but secure. The commerce consists in the export of timber, alum, tar, and hemp. It is the see of a bishop, has a fine cathedral church, an academy, and a dockyard. In 1397, the treaty of Calmar, by which Denmark, Norway, and Sweden were united, was signed here.

CALMAR, or KALMAR, a maritime province of Sweden, extending along its eastern coast, and bounded by the Baltic on the E., and by the provinces of Linkoping, Jonkoping, Carlskrona, and Wexio on the land side. Area, including the island of Oland, 4,258 square miles. Desc. Undulating, especially in the N., with numerous lakes. Its coasts are indented with many bays, and the country produces corn, flax, timber, and iron. It also rears numerous herds of cattle. Pop. in 1884, 241,232. Lat. between 56° 20′ and 58° 20′ N. Lon. between 15° 30′ and 17° E.

CALMET, AUGUSTIN, kal-met (Fr. kal'-mai), a learned and laborious French Benedictine, who wrote a "Literal Commentary upon all the Books of the Scripture," 23 vols. 4to; a "History of the Old and New Testament," 4 vols. 4to; an "Historical, Critical, and Chronological Dictionary of the Bible;" a "Universal History," 15 vols. 4to; and other learned works. He was appointed abbot of St. Leopold in 1718, and of Senones, in Lorraine, in 1728.

Born near Commercy, 1672; died in Paris, 1757.

CALMINA, kal-me'-na, a large town of Dahomey, in Africa, 15 miles from Abomey. Pop. 15,000.

CALNE, kan, a town once a Parliamentary borough of Wiltshire, 7 miles from Devizes. The church, a large structure with a handsome square tower at the north-east end, has been recently restored; there is a very handsome new Free Church, and there are places of worship for other denominations. It has, besides, a free school, townhall, and union-workhouse. Pop. 2,474. A station on the Great Western railway.

CALNEH, or CALNO, kal'-ne, "our consummation," one of the oldest cities of Babylonia, supposed to have been on the site of the modern Niffer, 60 miles S.E. of Babylon. Some think the tower of Babel was near the town.

CALOMARDE, FRANCISCO TADEO, Count, kal'-o-mar'-dai, the leading Spanish minister for ten years under Ferdinand VII., studied at Saragossa for the law, and, through his marriage with the daughter of Beltran, physician to Godoy, the favourite of Ferdinand, he was immediately brought into prominent notice. He has the blame of most of the tyrannical measures which passed in Spain between 1823 and 1833, although, no doubt, many of them belong to Ferdinand, whose malignant passions stimulated him to the adoption of absolutist principles in their sternest form. On the expected death of Ferdinand, he induced that monarch to reintroduce the Salic law, by which Christina would be excluded from the throne, and paid his court to Don Carlos; but his attentions were too precipitate, and he was forced to flee his country in disgrace. He made his escape in disguise to France, but returned to Spain on the death of the king, who had meanwhile abolished the law he had been persuaded to sanction. He then offered his services to Don Carlos, but they were rejected, when he returned to France, where he passed the remainder of his life, principally at Toulouse.

Born at Villel, Aragon, 1775; died at Toulouse, 1842.

CALONNE, CHARLES ALEXANDRE DE, kal-lon, a French statesman, who succeeded Necker, in 1783, as comptroller general of the finances. In this office he continued till 1787. During this period he maintained the public credit by a punctuality, till then unknown in the payments of the royal treasury, though he found it drained to the lowest ebb. He laboured with unwearied assiduity to restore the equipoise between the annual income and expenditure, and to provide a supply for the emergencies of the state, without increasing the burthens of the people. For this purpose he advised the king to revive the ancient usage of convening national assemblies of the "notables," to whom he proposed the bold project of suppressing the pecuniary privileges and exemptions of the nobility, clergy, and magistracy. This measure alarmed those powerful bodies, and M. de Calonne found it necessary to retire to England, where he wrote two defences of himself,—his "Requête au Roi," and "Réponse à l'Ecrit de M. Necker." In 1802, by permission of Bonaparte, he returned to Paris, but did not long survive, and died poor. Besides the above, he wrote several other works; among which was his essay, entitled, "De l'État de la France présent et à venir," 1790, in which he predicted the disasters which afterwards befell his unhappy country.

Born at Douay, 1734; died 1802.

CALPE, kal'-pe, a lofty mountain in the most southern part of Spain, opposite to Mount Abyla, on the African coast. These two mountains were called the Pillars of Hercules. It is the modern Gibraltar.

CALPEE, kal-pe', a city of Bundelcund, British India, on the right bank of the Jumna, 51 miles S.W. of Cawnpore. Manf. Cotton, paper, and sugar. Pop. 21,000.

CALPENTYN, kal-pen'-tin, a long narrow peninsula on the W. coast of Ceylon, with a fort near its northern extremity. Lat. 8° 14′ N. Lon. 79° 53′ E. During the N.E. monsoon this peninsula becomes an island.

CALPRENEDE, GAUTIER DE COSTES DE LA, kal-pra-nède, French romantic writer, one of the earliest authors of those lengthy semi-chivalrous romances so much in fashion in the 17th century: "Cassandra," "Cleopatra," and "Pharamond," were some of his most popular romances. He also wrote tragedies, which were less successful.

Died in Paris, 1663.

CALPURNIA, kal-pur'-ne-a, a daughter of the consul, Calpurnius Piso, and the fourth wife of Julius Cæsar. The night previous to her husband's murder, she dreamed that the roof of her house had fallen, and that he had been stabbed in her arms. On that account she attempted, but in vain, to detain him at home.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

CALTANISETTA, kal'-ta-ne-set'-ta, a fortified town of Sicily, in a valley of the same name, 28 miles N.E. of Girgenti. The neighbouring country is highly fertile, and near the town are sulphur-works and mineral springs. Pop. 25,027.

CALTONICA, kal-to'-ne-ka, a town of Sicily 15 miles N.W. of Girgenti. In its vicinity are sulphur-works. Pop. 7,000.

CALTURA, kal-too'-ra, a seaport of Ceylon, on the south-west coast, a little above the mouth of the river Kalu-ganga. Arrack is distilled. The place is, on account of the healthful climate, much resorted to by invalids from Colombo.

CALUIRE, ka-lou-eer', a French town, department of the Rhone, on the left bank of the Saône, 3 miles N.E. of Lyons. Pop. 6,800.

CALUMET, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Chilton Centre is the chief town. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 16,932.

CALVADOS, kal-va'-dos, a maritime department of France, a part of the old province of Normandy, and taking its name from a dangerous ridge of rocks on the coast, on which a ship of the Spanish Armada, named the Calvades, was wrecked. It is bounded on the E. by the department Eure, W. by La Manche, S. by Orne, and N. by the English Channel. The surface of the country is undulating, and varied with fertile valleys and beautiful plains. The department is well watered by the Tonques, Orne, Dives, Seulle, Dromme, and Vire. The coast is in some parts rocky, in others there are extensive sand-downs, corn and fruit in abundance, besides hemp and lint, and large quantities of timber. Pasturage being abundant, cattle, sheep, and horses are reared. The trade of fish-curing is pursued along the coast. Minerals. Coal, marble, iron, slate, and freestone. CAEN is the capital. Area, 2,130 square miles. Pop. 439,830.

CALVAERT, DIONYS, kal'-var, a Flemish painter, who opened a school for artists at Bologna, where he had amongst his pupils, Guido, Albano, and Domenichino. He is sometimes known as Dionisio Flammingo.

Born at Antwerp, 1565; died at Bologna, 1619.

CALVARY, kal'-va-re, "the place of a skull," a hill near Jerusalem, where criminals were crucified, and the spot where Christ suffered.

CALVELLO, kal-val'-lo, an Italian town, province of Basilicata, pleasantly situated 13 miles S. of Potenza. There are two convents in the town. Pop. 6,550.

CALVENTURA ISLANDS, kal-ven-too'-ra, two groups of small islands in the Bay of Bengal, off the E. coast of Arracan. Lat. 16° 55′ N. Lon. 94° 20′ E.

CALVERT, kal'-vert, a county of the United States, in Maryland, on the west shore of the Chesapeake. Capital, Prince Frederick. Area, 2,039 square miles. Pop. 10,538.

CALVERT ISLAND is situate on the W. coast of British North America. Lat. 51° 30′ N. Lon. 128° 10′ W.—There is a group of islands of the same name in the Pacific. Lat. 8° 55′ N. Lon. 172° 10′ E.

CALVERT, GEORGE, family name of Lord Baltimore. (See MARYLAND—History.)

CALVI, kal'-ve, a fortified seaport in Corsica, in the Gulf of Calvi, about 40 miles S.W. of Bastia. There is a good port, and a large export trade is carried on. It was taken by the English in 1794, after a siege of 51 days. Pop. 1,800.

CALVIN, JOHN, kal'-vin, an eminent reformer, the founder of the religious sect called Calvinists. His father was procureur-fiscal of the district of Noyon, and secretary of the diocese. He was educated at Paris, under Corderius, with a view to the church. Two benefices were procured for him, but he had become dissatisfied with the tenets of the Church of Rome, and changed his opinions with respect to the ecclesiastical state. He was now induced to study the law, in which he made considerable progress at the university of Orleans, but his open avowal of the Protestant faith rendered his stay in France dangerous, and, after some wanderings, he retired to Basle, where he published, in 1535, his "Institutes of the Christian Religion," to which he prefixed an elegant dedication to Francis I. This work rendered his name famous, and it was translated into several languages. In the following year he settled at Geneva, as minister and professor of divinity, having Farel for his colleague. Both he and Farel, however, were in a short time compelled to leave Geneva, for refusing to administer the sacrament indiscriminately to the people, many of whom, having first adopted the principles of the Reformation, at length threw off control, and were known as the Libertines. Calvin now went to Strasburg, where he officiated in a French church of his own establishment, and was also chosen professor of divinity. Here, too, he married the widow of a converted Anabaptist. The divines of this town appointed him their deputy at the Diet of Worms. In the meantime, the citizens of Geneva requested his return to their city, and after repeated solicitations, he, in 1541, complied, and resided there, actively engaged both as a writer and a preacher, until his death. Of his unparalleled industry, Dr. Hoyle says,—"It may be the truest object of admiration, how one lean, worn, spent, and wearied body could hold out. He read, every week of the year through, three divinity lectures; every other week, over and above, he preached every day; so that (as Erasmus said of Chrysostom), I know not whether more to admire his constancy, or theirs that heard him. Some have reckoned his yearly lectures to be 186, and his yearly sermons 286. Every Thursday he sat in the presbytery; every Friday, when the ministers met to consult upon difficult texts, he made as good as a lecture. Besides all this, there was scarce a day that exercised him not in answering, either by word of mouth or writing, the doubts and questions of different churches and pastors, yea, sometimes more at once, so that he might say with Paul, 'the care of all churches lieth upon me.' Scarcely a year wherein, over and above all these former employments, some great volume in folio, or other, came not forth." His works have been published in 9 vols. folio. The great blot upon his character is his persecution of Servetus, on the charge of heresy. Calvin did not scruple to bring forth private letters and documents to help on the conviction of one who had long been his friend. Servetus was burned at Geneva.

Born at Noyon, in Picardy, 1509; died at Geneva, 1564.

CALVINIA, a division in the north-east of the western province of Cape Colony, South Africa. It is a vast grazing country, subject to severe drought, and without any constantly running streams. The Orange river is the northern boundary. Area, 5,000 square miles. Pop. 8,500.

CALVISANO, kal-ve-sa'-no, a town of Austrian Italy, in Lombardy, 17 miles S.E. of Brescia, situate in a beautiful and fertile plain, rich in grain and pasture, and containing numerous mulberry-plantations. Pop. about 3,000.

CALVISIUS, SETHUS, kal-vish'-e-us, a learned chronologer, and writer on the science of music, whose principal work is the "Opus Chronologicum," the last edition of which was that of Frankfort, in 1685. Scaliger speaks highly of it. He was also the author of several learned treatises on music.

Born in Thuringia, 1556; died 1615.

CALW, kal'-lo, an ancient town of Wurtemberg, in a valley of the Black Forest, 20 miles S.W. of Stuttgart. It is situated on both banks of the Nagold, which is crossed by two bridges. There is a very fine town-house, and in the neighbourhood are the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Considerable; Linen, woollens, hosiery, leather, and glue. Pop. 4,200.

CALYDON, kal'-i-don, a city of Ætolia, celebrated as the place where the wild boar was hunted by all the princes of the age. This boar-hunt, under the name of the chase of Calydon, has been much celebrated by the poets. (See MELEAGER.)

CALYPSO, ka-lip'-so, in Greek legend one of the Oceanides, the goddess of silence, who reigned in the island of Ogygia. Ulysses being shipwrecked on her coasts, she became enamoured of that hero, and succeeded in detaining him in her island seven years: after that, however, Ulysses quitted her to rejoin Penelope, and she died of grief. The story is told in Homer's "Odyssey."

CAM, or GRANTA, kam, a river of England, rising in Essex, and flowing through the north-east part of the county of Cambridge, until it falls into the Ouse, 4 miles from Ely. It is navigable from the Ouse to Cambridge, and has a course altogether of 40 miles.—Another, which rises in Gloucestershire, and runs into the Severn.

CAMAJORE, kam-a-zhor-e, a town of Italy, 16 miles N.W. of Lucca. It is surrounded by walls with a deep fosse. There is a handsome collegiate church, and the town is well built, with regular streets. Pop. 2,250.

CAMAMU, ka'-ma-moo, the name of an island, a flourishing town, and a bay, of Brazil. The bay is 75 miles from Bahia, and the town has a trade in timber, rum, and rice. Pop. 2,000.

CAMANA, ka-ma'-na, the capital of a province of the same name, in Peru, situate on the river Camana, about 6 miles from the sea. Pop. 1,500.

CAMARGUE, LA, ka-marg', an island of France, in the department of Bouches du Rhône, and divided into 9 parishes. It is quite flat, and mostly composed of mud-banks and arid sand, yielding, on the banks of the Rhone, wheat, and affording pasture to wild horses, cattle, and sheep. The phenomenon of the mirage is here frequently to be seen during the heats of summer.

CAMARINES, NORTH and SOUTH; two of the Philippine Islands.

CAMBACERES, JEAN JACQUES REGIS, kam-bas-a'-rai, came prominently into notice during the first great revolution of France. He commenced life as a lawyer, and by his talents succeeded in attracting the notice of the Convention, who employed him in various official situations. In the discussion on the conduct of Louis XVI. he declared the monarch guilty, but disputed the authority of the Convention to judge him; he, therefore, voted only for his provisional arrest, and his death in case of a hostile invasion. The management of foreign affairs was, for some time, committed to his hands, and when Napoleon was made First Consul, Cambacérès was chosen Second. When Bonaparte rose to the throne, Cambacérès became a great favourite, and had several honours conferred upon him. Subsequently he was created High Chancellor of the Empire, and duke of Parma, and appointed to the presidency of the Chamber of Peers. Devotedly attached to Napoleon, he adhered to him throughout his reign, and in 1813 was appointed president of the regency. On Napoleon's final fall, Cambacérès was banished from France, but was afterwards permitted to return to Paris.

Born at Montpellier, 1753; died at Paris, 1824.

CAMBAY, kam'-bai, a seaport town of Hindostan, at the head of the Gulf of Cambay, nearly 80 miles from Surat: a great portion of it is in ruins. Its trade has greatly declined, but it is still celebrated for the taste with which it produces articles of carnelian and bloodstone. Pop. 36,007. Lat. 22° 18′ N. Lon. 72° 39′ E.

CAMBAY, GULF OF, is 80 miles long, and 25 in average breadth. Lat. between 21° and 22° 10′ N. Lon. between 71° 50′ and 72° 40′ E.

CAMBERT, ROBERT, kam'-bair, a French musician, who was the first to exhibit operas in France; but being rivalled by Lulli, he went, in 1672, to England, where he became master of the king's band.

Born 1628; died 1677.

CAMBERWELL, kam'-ber-wel. (See LONDON.)

CAMBIASO, LUCA, kam'-be-a'-so, sometimes called Luchetto of Genoa, a distinguished Italian painter in fresco and oil. After becoming eminent in Genoa, he went to Spain, where he was commissioned by Philip II. to paint for the Escurial; accordingly, he executed several works; [among which is an immense fresco of Paradise, crowded with figures, on the ceiling of the choir of the church of San Lorenzo. This, however, is considered both stiff and formal in its execution. He also painted in oil, for the Escurial, "John the Baptist preaching in the Wilderness," which is esteemed as the best of his Spanish works. The best of his Genoese works are, "The Martyrdom of St. George," in the church of San Giorgio; and "The Rape of the Sabines," at Terralba, near Genoa.

Born near Genoa, 1527; died at the Escurial, Spain, 1585.

CAMBINI, GIOVANNI GIUSEPPE, kam-bé'-ne, musical composer, who excelled on the violin. While on a voyage to Naples, in 1766, he was captured by corsairs, and underwent great hardships before his ransom could be effected. He settled in Paris, but his improvident habits ensured him a life of poverty. He wrote oratorios, "Joab," and the "Sacrifice of Abraham," and opera and ballet music, but his best works are his violin quartettes.

Born at Leghorn, 1740; died at Paris, 1825.

CAMBOJA, or MAEKHAUM, kam-bo'-ja, a river of Asia, which rises among the mountains of Independent Tartary. It passes through the province of Yunnan, in China, the countries of Laos and Cambodia, and falls into the Chinese Sea by several mouths.

CAMBOJIA, or CAMBODIA, formerly one of the provinces of Cochin-China, but acknowledged to be an independent kingdom under the protection of the French, in 1867. Desc. As far as it is known, distinguished by its fertility, being formed by the alluvia of its large rivers, and almost a level. Zoology. Elephants, buffaloes, horned cattle, hogs, wild and tame goats, hares, cranes, and all kinds of poultry. Pro. Rice, areca-nuts, betel, spices, gamboge, sandal-wood, sapan-wood, and ivory. Mats are largely exported. Pop. 1,020,000. (See ANAM and COCHIN-CHINA.)

CAMBORNE, kam'-born, a town of Cornwall, 4 miles from Redruth, and the centre of a mining population. There are very productive copper, tin, and lead mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 13,607.

CAMBRAI, or CAMBRAY, kam'-brai, a fortified city of France, department of Nord, on the Scheldt, which divides it into two parts. It is 17 miles from Valenciennes, and is entered through four gateways. Its citadel is one of the strongest in Europe. The cathedral, archiepiscopal palace, and town-house, are interesting buildings, and there are many picturesque old houses. The old cathedral was destroyed in 1793 by the revolutionists, who broke open the tomb of Fenelon, archbishop of Cambrai, and melted his leaden coffin into bullets. There is a monument to his memory in the new cathedral. Manf. Cambrics, which take their name from the town, thread, lace, leather, beetroot-sugar, starch, and soap; and there is a trade in wool, flax, butter and hops. Population, 14,818.—In 1508 the league of Cambray was concluded here. It was formed by Maximilian I. of Germany, Louis XII. of France, the king of Aragon, Ferdinand of Spain, and Pope Julius, against the Venetian republic. In 1529 peace between Francis I. and Charles V. was also concluded here. This was called the Ladies' Treaty, being negotiated by Margaret of Austria, Charles V.'s aunt, and Louise of Savoy, Francis I.'s mother. In 1736 this treaty, which was disadvantageous to France, was broken.

CAMBRIA, kam'-bre-a, the name given by the Romans to Wales, from the Celtic name Cymri.

CAMBRIA, a county of Pennsylvania. Fertile, with coal and iron in abundance. Area, 670 square miles. Pop. 46,811.

CAMBRIDGE, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK CHARLES, duke of, kaim'-bridj, first cousin to Queen Victoria, early entered the army, and in 1837 was a colonel of infantry, and successively commanded a regiment of dragoons and the Scots fusiliers. In 1852 he was appointed inspector-general of the army, and in 1854 became lieutenant-general, with the command of a division, with which he proceeded to the Crimea. He fought at the battles of Alma and Inkermann, and in 1855 returned to England. On the death of Lord Hardinge, in 1856, he became commander-in-chief of the British forces. In 1857 he was presented by the citizens of London with a sword of honour, accompanied with the freedom of the city.

Born at Hanover, 1819.

CAMBRIDGE, the chief town of the county of Cambridge, one of the two great university towns of England, and a parliamentary borough, situate on the river Cam, by which it is intersected unequally. The town is about a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth, decreasing towards each extremity; and most of the streets, as well as the buildings, are irregular. Cambridge is chiefly celebrated for its university, the first public instrument relating to which does not ascend higher than an act of parliament of Henry III.'s reign, A.D. 1229, though it must have subsisted a considerable time before. The university consists of seventeen different colleges and halls, the schools, the public library, the Fitzwilliam Museum, the senate-house, and the university printing-office. The colleges have been founded at different periods during the six preceding centuries, and are very unequal in extent and decoration. 1. St. Peter's, or Peter House, in 1257, and consisting of two small courts. 2. Clare College, erected originally in 1326. 3. Pembroke College, in 1347. 4. Corpus Christi, Benit, or Benedict College, in 1351. 5. Trinity Hall, in 1350. 6. Gonville and Caius College, in 1348. 7. King's College, in 1441. The chapel of this college, said to be the most magnificent structure of the kind in Europe, was founded by King Henry VI., but not completed before the reign of Henry VIII. It consists of several detached piles of building, of which the chapel, with its wonderful roof of carved stone, unsupported by pillars, is the most admired. 8. Queen's College, founded in 1448. 9. St. Catherine's College, in 1473. 10. Jesus College, originally a monastic edifice, converted, in 1496, into a college. 11. Christ's College, in 1505, by Margaret, countess of Richmond. 12. St. John's College was also founded by the same Margaret, in 1511. 13. Mary Magdalen College, founded by Thomas, Baron Audley, in 1519. 14. Trinity College, founded by King Henry VIII. in 1546; here there is a library, which ranks among the first in Great Britain, for its collection of printed books, manuscripts, Roman antiquities, and natural curiosities. The structure containing it was erected by Sir Christopher Wren. 15. Emmanuel College, founded by Sir Walter Mildmay, in 1584. 16. Sidney Sussex College, founded in 1598. 17. Downing College, founded in the year 1800, in pursuance of the will of Sir George Downing, made 1717. Each college has its own statutes, by which it is governed; but the government of the colleges, as a confederation, rests with a senate composed of two houses, the members of which amount to 4,000, and have the degree of Doctor or M.A. The university sends two members to the House of Commons, who are chosen by this senate. The buildings in the town unconnected with the university are not generally remarkable. The circular church of the Holy Sepulchre, one of the few round churches in England, is interesting. There are about 18 churches of the establishment. St. Mary's, the university church, was restored in 1863, and the interesting old churches of St. Clement, St. Edward, and St. Benedict, have also been restored. There are various chapels for other denominations. A very fine guildhall was erected in 1862. There is a neat market-hall, and an old hospital, Addenbrooke's, has been handsomely rebuilt. The Albert Asylum is a pretty building in the Gothic style. No manufacture of consequence is carried on; the chief trade consists in corn, brawn, and cheese. Pop. 35,372.—A station on the Great Eastern, Great Northern, and London and North-Western Railways.

CAMBRIDGE, a town in Middlesex county, Massachusetts, United States, on Charles river, 3 miles N.W. of Boston. It contains a court-house, county-gaol, state arsenal, and several churches for different sects. It also contains Harvard College, or the University of Cambridge, the oldest and most wealthy literary institution in the United States. It was founded in 1638, in less than twenty years after the first settlement of New England. It possesses a library, a laboratory, museum, and botanical garden; and connected with it is a school for pupils preparing for business, and not wishing to study classics. The average number of students attending the college is about 1,100. Pop. 52,059. Many of the most eminent literary men of the United States have resided in Cambridge.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE, kaim'-bridj-sheer, an inland county of England, bounded N. by Lincolnshire, N.W. by Northamptonshire, N.E. by Norfolk, E. by Suffolk, S. by Essex and Hertfordshire, S.W. by Bedfordshire, and W. by Huntingdonshire, 50 miles long by 30 broad. The N. part is occupied by a portion of the great Bedford Level, including the isle of Ely, which is fertile, and produces luxuriant crops of wheat, oats, and cole-seed. On the dairy farms, butter of the finest quality is made; and the vicinity of Cottenham is noted for new cheese of delicious flavour. By far the most agreeable districts are to the S. and S.W., consisting chiefly of elevated land. The S.E. division, reaching from the Gogmagog hills to Newmarket, is bleak and healthy.

Rivers.—The Ouse, the Cam or Granta (a tributary of the Ouse), the Nene, and the Lark.
Principal Towns.—CAMBRIDGE, ELY, WISBEACH, NEWMARKET, and ROYSTON.
Area.—857 square miles.
Pop.—185,475.

CAMBYNA, kam-bi'-na, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, 15 miles from Celebes. Ext. 20 miles long, by 15 broad. Lat. 5° 21′ S. Lon. 121° 57′ E.

CAMBYSES, kam-bi'-seez, (Kabujiya in Persian history), king of Medea and Persia, was the son of Cyrus the Great, whom he succeeded 529 B.C. Four years afterwards conquered the Egyptians, defeated Psammenitus, and plundered their temples. Cambyses afterwards sent an army of 50,000 men to destroy the temple of Jupiter Ammon; but they were lost in the deserts of Libya. In his Ethiopian war he was not more successful, a horrible famine reducing his soldiers to live one on the other. Historians represent this monarch as a furious tyrant; he caused his brother Smerdis to be killed, and also his sister Meroë and her husband. There is probably some exaggeration in the accounts of the cruelties he perpetrated in Egypt. He was subject to epileptic fits, which perhaps sometimes gave him the appearance of being carried away by ungovernable outbursts of temper. He died of a small wound he had given himself with his sword as he mounted on horseback.
Died 521 B.C.

CAMDEN, CHARLES PRATT, earl of, kam'-den, was a younger son of Sir John Pratt, chief justice of the court of King's Bench in the reign of George I. Having been educated at Eton and Cambridge, he was trained to the law, and, in 1738, was called to the bar. For several years he had little success; but, in 1752, he was engaged as junior counsel in Defence of Owen, a bookseller, who had been prosecuted by the attorney-general for publishing a libel upon the House of Commons. In this case he greatly contributed to the success of his client in gaining a favourable verdict. From that time his fortune and fame were fixed. In 1757 he was made attorney-general, and, almost immediately afterwards was returned member of parliament for Downton, a borough, since abolished, in Wiltshire. In 1761 he was raised to the bench as lord chief justice of the common pleas, and, in 1765, was created a peer, with the title of Baron Camden, of Camden Place, in the county of Kent. In 1766 he became lord chancellor, but resigned in 1770. In 1782 until his death he was president of the council. It was as a judge in the court of Chancery, however, that he earned the praise of his countrymen. Only one of his decisions was reversed, and that reversal, Lord Eldon said, was probably wrong.

Born 1714; died 1794.

CAMDEN, WILLIAM, a learned antiquary. His father was a paper-stainer, of London, and he was educated at Christ's Hospital, St. Paul's School, and Oxford. In 1575 he was appointed second master of Westminster School, and, in 1586, published, in elegant Latin, "Britannia," giving an account of the history of the ancient inhabitants of Britain, their origin, manners, and laws. A third edition of this work appeared in 1590, at which time the author had a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, but without being in orders. In 1593 he became head master of Westminster School, and, next year, published an enlarged edition of his "Britannia." In 1597 he printed his Greek Grammar for the use of Westminster School, and, the same year, was made Clarencieux king at arms. Three years later his "Catalogue of the Monuments in Westminster Abbey" appeared, and also a new impression of his "Britannia." In 1603 he published at Frankfort "A Collection of our Ancient Historians," in Latin; and, in the following year, his "Remains Concerning Britain," in 4to. In 1615 he printed his "Annals of the Reign of Elizabeth." After his death his remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. He founded a history professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed all his books and papers to Sir Robert Cotton.

Born in London, 1555; died 1623.

CAMDEN, a maritime county of New South Wales, inclosed landward by the counties of Cook, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Argyle, and St. Vincent; and bounded on the E. by the Pacific. It is one of the most fertile districts in the colony. There are some fine lakes and beautiful scenery, especially in the Illiwarra district, or Five Islands, which extend for eighteen miles along the coast. Pop. 15,723.

CAMDEN, the chief place in the above county. It is the centre of a fertile district on the river Nepean. Pop. of town, 505; of district, 3,564.

CAMDEN, a county on the coast of Georgia, U.S., separated from Florida by St. Mary's river. Area, 1,125 square miles. Pop. 6,274.

CAMDEN, a county in the central part of Missouri, United States, intersected by the Osage river. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 7,266.

CAMDEN, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 220 square miles. Pop. 62,942.

CAMDEN, capital of the above county, on the left bank of the Delaware, opposite Philadelphia. It is regularly laid out, and possesses many fine buildings. Manf. Iron, glass, and chemicals. Pop. 41,659.

CAMDEN, a county of North Carolina, United States. The surface is level and partly occupied by the Dismal Swamp. Camden Court House is the chief town. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. 6,274.

CAMDEN, a bay of Russian America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 70° N. Lon. 145° W.

CAMELFORD, a town of Cornwall, on the little river Camel, 14 miles W. of Launceston. It was formerly a parliamentary borough, but was disfranchised by the Reform Act of 1832. Pop. 1,000.

CAMERARIUS, JOACHIM, käm'-e-rair'-e-us, a learned German writer. His real name was Liebhard, but he adopted the Latin form of Cämmerer (chamberlain), because his ancestors had been chamberlains to the bishops of Bamberg. He embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and formed a friendship with Melanchthon, whose life he wrote. On the establishment of a college at Nuremberg, he was made professor of belles-lettres, and afterwards removed to Leipsic to superintend the university of that city. He aided Melanchthon in drawing up the famous "Confession of Augsburg," wrote some good books, and translated a great number of the Greek authors.

Born at Bamberg, 1500; died at Leipsic, 1574.

CAMERINO, kam-a-ré'-no, a town of Italy, the see of an archbishop, on a hill at the foot of the Apennines, 41 miles S.W. of Ancona. There are a cathedral (built on the site of a temple of Jupiter) and a university. Manf. Silk. Pop. 6,000.

CAMERON, kam'-e-ron, a county of Texas, U.S., on the Gulf of Mexico. Area, 5,460 square miles. Pop. 14,459.

CAMERON, JOHN, Scotch scholar and divine. At various times he was professor at Sedan, in France, at Saumar, Glasgow, and Montauban. In the latter town he was assassinated by a political opponent in the open street. He was considered to be one of the most erudite scholars of his time.

Born at Glasgow, 1580; died at Montauban, France, 1625.

CAMERON, REV. RICHARD, a Presbyterian clergyman, the founder of a sect known in the religious history of Scotland as the Cameronians. He was one of the boldest opponents of the measures of Charles II., and, with twenty others, in 1680, entered armed into the town of Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, and, at the market cross, renounced his allegiance, and pronounced Charles a tyrant and a traitor to the civil and religious principles of the people. His party kept in arms for a month in the hill districts of Ayrshire and Nithsdale; but, in a skirmish with the king's troops, they were defeated at Airdsmoss, where Cameron was slain. A monument marks the spot where this event occurred.

CAMEROONS, käm'-e-roons, a river of Africa, falling into the Bight of Biafra, near lat. 4° N.; lon. 9° 40' E. with an estuary, 20 miles wide.

CAMEROONS CAPE is on an island in the estuary of the above river.

CAMEROONS PEAK, the highest point of a range of mountains of the same name. Lat. 4° 13' N. Lon. 9° 10' E. Height, estimated at 13,000 feet.

CAMETA, kam'-ai-ta, a town of Brazil, on the bank of the Tocantins, 85 miles S.W. of Para, or Belem. A fertile district was assigned to this town in 1839. Pop. 20,000.

CAMILLA, ka-mil'-la, queen of the Volsci, daughter of Metabus and Casmilla, is mentioned in the Æneid. Being, from her infancy, bred to the sports of the chase and war, she was famous for her extreme agility and skill with the bow. Whilst assisting Turnus against Æneas, she was treacherously killed by Aruns.

CAMILLUS, MARCUS FURIUS, ka-mil'-lus, an illustrious Roman, who obtained four triumphs, and was five times dictator. This great man, whose virtues were equal to his talents, was prosecuted on a charge of peculation, on which he went into voluntary banishment. While he was absent, Brennus, at the head of an army of Gauls, took Rome, and besieged the senate in the Capitol. Camillus, forgetting his wrongs, flew to the relief of his country, defeated the barbarian, and was created dictator. He soon retired from public life, and two years afterwards died of the plague.

CAMISANO, ka-mè-sa'-no, a town of Italy, 6 miles from Crema. There is an ancient Gothic castle here, with a large tower. Pop. 2,050.

CAMOENS, LUIS DE, kam'-o-ens, the most celebrated poet of Portugal. He studied at Coimbra, and having fallen in love with a lady of honour at the court of Lisbon, was banished. He then entered the army, and served with great reputation in Africa, against the Moors, losing his eye by a wound. Soon after his return to Portugal, he engaged in an expedition to the East Indies. He exposed the conduct of the Portuguese authorities in that country in a pungent satire, for which he was, in 1556, banished to Macao, where he wrote a great part of his famous poem entitled the "Lusiad." On his passage home he suffered shipwreck, but preserved the MS. of his poem, which was published in 1569. The people of Macao are still proud of showing a cave where Camoens amused himself in writing his "Lusiad." It has been translated into English both by Sir Richard Fanshaw and Mr. Mickle. He lost all his property in the wreck, and the last ten years of his life were passed in abject poverty, a faithful Indian servant begging in the streets for his support. He died in a public hospital, and when, about sixteen years afterwards, it was remembered that he was a great national poet, and a monument was raised to his memory, great difficulty was experienced in finding the obscure grave in which his remains were deposited. Besides his great poem, he wrote numerous political works and three comedies.

Born at Lisbon, 1524; died 1579.

CAMOGLIA, kam'-o-gle-a, a maritime town of Sardinia, built in the waters of the Gulf of Genoa, 13 miles S.E. of Genoa. Pop. about 5,800.

CAMONICA, or VALLE CAMONICA, ka-mo'-ne-ka, a well-cultivated valley of Northern Italy, extending for 50 miles, and terminating at the Lake of Iseo. It is watered by the Ogleo, and is the route from Italy to the Tyrol. It has marble and slate quarries, and lead, iron, and copper mines. Not officially recognized.

CAMPAGNA, kam-pan'-ya, a town of Italy, situate amid high mountains, 20 miles N.E. of Salerno, in the province of Principato Citra. It has a cathedral, several convents, and is a bishop's see. There is a large annual fair. Pop. 8,200.

CAMPAGNA DI ROMA, de ro'-ma, an uncultivated and unhealthy plain, surrounding Rome. It comprehends the greater part of ancient Latium, and is from 50 to 70 miles in length, and from 40 to 60 in breadth. Towards the Mediterranean there is a sandy plain. The whole district is volcanic in character, and pestilential vapours arise. On account of malaria, this region is but little inhabited; but in autumn, the least unhealthy time, cattle are grazed there, the pasturage being rich and abundant. In the time of ancient Rome, the air was more salubrious, and the emperors Hadrian and Domitian had villas in the district.

CAMPAGNAC, kam-pan'-yak, a town of France, in the department of the Aveyron, 24 miles from Rodez. Pop. 1,300.

CAMPAN, kam'-pan, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Pyrenees, 12 miles from Bagnère-en-Bigorre. Pop. 4,000. In its neighbourhood there are marble-quarries.

CAMPAN, JEANNE LOUISE HENRIETTE, MADAME, in her fifteenth year was appointed reader to the daughters of Louis XV. of France, and in 1770 married, and became first lady of the bedchamber to Marie Antoinette, the dauphiness. With this princess she remained till the Revolution parted them, when she opened a boarding-school at St. Germaine-en-Laye. She subsequently became superintendent of the establishment at Ecouen, founded by Napoleon I. for the daughters and sisters of the officers of the Legion of Honour. This establishment was, after the Restoration, suppressed, and she retired to Mantes, where she passed the remainder of her days, enjoying a reputation for many virtues and accomplishments. She wrote, "Memoirs of the Private Life of Marie Antoinette," "Historical Anecdotes of the Reigns of Louis XV. and XVI.," and published the correspondence of queen Hortense.

Born in Paris, 1752; died at Mantes, 1822.

CAMPANA, kam-pa'-na, an island off the W. coast of Patagonia. Ext. 55 miles long, with an average breadth of 10. Lat. 48° 30′ S. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

CAMPANA, LA, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia, on the Madre-Viega, a tributary of the Guadalquivir, 37 miles N.E. of Seville. Manf. Weaving and brick-making. Pop. 5,400.

CAMPANARIO, kam-pa-na'-re-o, a town of Spain, province of Estremadura, 62 miles S.E. of Badajoz. It is ill-built, and the streets are narrow. Manf. Linen. Exp. Ropes, wine, and oil. Pop. 5,400.

CAMPANELLA, TOMMASA, kam'-pa-nel'-la, an Italian philosopher, and a monk of the Dominican order. His sagacity enabled him to discover the errors of the "scholastic philosophy," and he published a work which attracted attention, and procured him many enemies. In 1599 he was seized at Naples, and committed to prison on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy against the Spaniards, who were then masters of his country. He was imprisoned 27 years, and was several times tortured, five times brought to trial, and finally sent to Rome at the request of Pope Urban VIII., who liberated him. In 1634 he went to France, where Cardinal Richelieu allowed him a pension. His philosophical works exhibit occasionally much logical power, but associated with a belief in astrology and dreams. He also wrote a Defence of the Catholic Church, and a discourse on the Spanish Monarchy, which was translated into English.

Born at Stello, Calabria, 1568; died at Paris, 1639.

CAMPANIA, kam-pai'-ne-a, the ancient name of that part of Italy which is now divided into the provinces of BENEVENTO, NAPOLI, and TERRA DI LAVORO. Pop. 2,979,004.

CAMPANO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, kam-pa'-no, a learned Italian, who was originally a shepherd-boy. In this capacity he attracted the notice of a priest, who took him home, and gave him a liberal education. Acquiring considerable knowledge of the Greek language, he subsequently became professor of rhetoric at Perugia. Pius II. made him a bishop, and sent him to the congress at Ratisbon. Sixtus IV. appointed him governor of Citta da Castello; but Campano, having resisted an arbitrary act of his against the inhabitants, incurred the pope's displeasure; on which he withdrew to his bishopric of Terrano, where he died. He wrote the history of Andrew Braccio, a famous commander; several moral and poetical treatises, letters, orations, and Latin poems; all of which were published together in 1707 and 1734, at Leipsic.

Born in Campania, 1429; died at Terrano, 1477.

CAMPANUS, GIOVANNI, kam-pa'-nus, sometimes called Novarese Campano, an Italian mathematician, the first translator of Euclid from the Arabic. Although his works, which consisted of writings on astronomy and geometry principally, are long exploded, yet he deserves praise, as one of those studious men who, though few, laboured zealously at the exact sciences, and did their best to extend the knowledge of them.

Died 1300.

CAMPBELL, JOHN LORD, kam'-bel, lord chancellor of England, was the second son of the Rev. Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar, Fifeshire. He received his education at the university of St. Andrew's, and in 1800 was entered a student at Lincoln's Inn, London. In 1806 he was called to the bar, and in 1827 became a bencher. In 1830 he was elected member of parliament for Stafford, and in 1832 was appointed solicitor-general. In 1834 he was attorney-general, and in 1841 became lord chancellor of Ireland, when he was raised to the peerage as Baron Campbell. The same year he resigned the chancellorship, and in 1846 became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he attained the position due to his industry, and became lord chief justice of the court of Queen's Bench, with a salary of £8,000 a year. In June, 1859, he was appointed, under the Palmerston administration, lord chancellor. As a member of parliament he represented first, Stafford, then Dudley, and then Edinburgh; for which he sat till 1841. In 1846 he produced his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors, &c.," and in 1849 the "Lives of the Chief Justices,"—works which, in a literary point of view, added to his reputation.

Born near Cupar, Scotland, 1779; died in London, 1861.

CAMPBELL, REV. GEORGE, an eminent Scotch divine, who in 1759 was appointed principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1763 he answered Hume's Essay on Miracles; and subsequently had the degree of D.D. conferred on him by King's College, Aberdeen. In 1771 he was appointed professor of divinity, and in 1776 published his "Philosophy of Rhetoric," which, with the exception of Whately's, is, perhaps, the ablest work on the subject. Campbell undoubtedly possessed a highly philosophical mind, of great depth, acuteness, and critical power. He wrote several other works of a theological kind. Some years previous to his death he resigned his professorship, and King George III. granted him a pension of £300 a year.

Born at Aberdeen, 1709; died 1796.

CAMPBELL, THOMAS, one of the most eminent of modern poets, was the son of a merchant of Glasgow, and youngest of a family consisting of ten sons and daughters. After passing through the university of Glasgow, where he excelled as a Greek scholar, he went to Edinburgh, where, in 1799, he published his "Pleasures of Hope," which Byron, who ought to be a judge, pronounces "one of the most beautiful didactic poems in the language." The profits arising from this performance enabled him to visit the continent. During this tour he had a view from a distance of the battle of Hohenlinden, which he afterwards celebrated in his vigorous little poem of that name. On his return to Edinburgh he continued to write, but in 1803 removed to London, where he began to pursue literature as a profession. In 1806 he received from the Fox ministry a pension of £200 a year, which he enjoyed for life. In 1809 he published his "Gertrude of Wyoming," which Lord Jeffrey pronounced "a polished and pathetic poem in the old style of English pathos and poetry." In 1820 he became the editor of the "New Monthly Magazine," which post he held till 1830. In 1824 appeared his "Theodoric," a poem of great sweetness, though deficient in power. In 1831 he established the "Metropolitan Magazine," which he managed only a short time. In 1842 he published his "Pilgrim of Glencoe," which did not raise his poetical character above the point it already had attained. During his intervals of repose from severer duties, he occasionally produced smaller effusions, which, from their strength and beauty, have long kept possession of the popular mind. His lyrics are, perhaps, the noblest bursts of poetical feeling, fervour, and enthusiasm, that have ever flashed from any poet.—Campbell also wrote several prose biographies and other works. He was elected twice to the lord rectorship of Glasgow, and took an active part in forming the London University, now University College, which he indeed claimed the merit of originating. His body rests in Westminster Abbey, where, near the centre of the Poets' Corner, there is a marble statue of him by Marshall.

Born at Glasgow, 1777; died at Bologne, 1844.

CAMPBELL, REV. JOHN, a Scotch clergyman, who took an active part in almost every Christian work. In 1804 he was appointed pastor of the Independent church at Kingsland, and greatly assisted in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1812 he made a voyage to Africa, for the purpose of visiting the stations of the London Missionary Society, and returned in 1814. He revisited that country in 1818-21. Of these voyages he published accounts, and founded the "Youths' Magazine," of which he acted as editor for eighteen years. He also published numerous other works of a religious tendency.

Born at Edinburgh, 1766; died 1840.

CAMPBELL, SIR ALEXANDER, a lieutenant-general in the British army, who aided in the defence of Gibraltar, and assisted in the destruction of the enemy's floating batteries. After serving abroad nearly twenty years, principally in the East, where he was present at the siege of Seringapatam, and all the great conflicts from 1793 to 1808, he returned in the latter year to England. Shortly after he went to the Peninsula, where, in 1809, at the battle of Talavera, he commanded the right wing, and was dangerously wounded. Recovering from this, he again joined the army, and fought at Busaco and other places. The last appointment he received was commander-in-chief of Madras.

Born in Perthshire, 1759; died at Fort St. George, 1824.

CAMPBELL, Lords of Argyle. (See ARGYLE.)

CAMPBELL, SIR COLIN. (See CLYDE, LORD.)

CAMPBELL, a county of Georgia, United States. Cambellton is the capital. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 9,970.

CAMPBELL, a county of Kentucky, United States. The soil is good and well cultivated. The chief town is Alexandria. Area, 120 square miles. Pop. 37,440.

CAMPBELL, a county of Tennessee, United States. The surface is hilly and partly covered with extensive forests. Jacksborough is the capital. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 10,005.

CAMPBELL, a county of Virginia, United States. The surface is hilly and broken. The chief town is Campbell Court House. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 36,250.

CAMPBELL ISLAND, in the South Pacific, is 36 miles in circumference. Its coast is indented with bays, forming good harbours, and there is an interesting flora. Lat. 52° 33′ S. Lon 160° 9′ E.

CAMPBELLTOWN, a township of Otago, New Zealand, 150 miles S. of Dunedin. It has a good harbour, and is a point of call for the Suez mail. Pop. 351.

CAMPBELTON, a royal burgh and seaport of Argyleshire, Scotland, near the south end of the peninsula of Cantire, 30 miles from Ayr, on a fine inlet of the sea, 2 miles long and 1 broad. In the principal street is a fine granite cross, said to have been brought from Iona. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in distilling, and in the herring fishery. The town is a favourite summer resort. Pop. 9,755.

CAMPEACHY, kam-pé'-che, a seaport of Mexico, on the west coast of the peninsula of Yucatan, 90 miles S.W. of Merida. Its houses are well built of stone. There is a good dock and fort, which commands both the town and harbour. It has, besides, churches, convents, a college, and shipbuilding-docks. Cotton and wax are its principal exports, and it is the centre of the Campeachy wood or logwood trade. Pop. of the state of the same name, 90,413.

CAMPEGGIO, LORENZO, kam-pej'-e-o, a cardinal, who was originally a professor of civil law at Padua, and had married; but losing his wife, entered the church, and was made a bishop. Leo X. created him a cardinal while he was nuncio at the imperial court. In 1518 he was sent legate to England, to collect the tithes for the war against the Turks; and, while there, he was nominated bishop of Salisbury. In 1524 he was sent into Germany, as the delegate of the pope, to oppose the progress of Lutheranism, in which he met with no success. The subject of the separation between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon brought him once more to England; but he was so unsuccessful in his mission, that he incurred the blame of all parties, and was deprived of his English bishopric. He was recalled in 1529, and the pope sent him again to Germany, where he attended the diet of Augsburg. He afterwards was made archbishop of Bologna.—He was a learned man, and the friend of Erasmus and other eminent scholars. Some of his letters are in a collection printed at Bâle in 1550.

Born 1474; died 1539.

CAMPEN. (See KAMPEN.)

CAMPER, PETER, kam'-per, an eminent German physician and naturalist, who studied under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravesande, and other great men in Leyden university. He was professor of medicine at Franeker, in 1750; at Amsterdam in 1755; and at Groningen in 1765. He afterwards travelled, and visited England, France, and Germany, where he cultivated the acquaintance of men of letters. At Berlin he met with a flattering reception from Frederick the Great. To the study of medicine he united that of many other sciences, and cultivated a taste for the fine arts. He designed, painted, and modelled with exactness and elegance; but he excelled in the study of philosophy and natural history. His works on these subjects are in 6 vols. 8vo, enriched with above 100 folio plates of the most curious objects. He wrote also on the physiognomies of men of different countries, a work of considerable ingenuity, though necessarily not altogether to be relied on.

Born at Leyden, 1722; died at the Hague, 1789.

CAMPERDOWN, kam'-per-down, a village of Holland, in the North Sea, 27 miles N.W. of Amsterdam. It gives its name to the victory of Admiral Duncan over the Dutch fleet, October 11, 1797.

CAMPERDOWN, the chief town of the county of Hampden, Victoria, Australia, 120 miles S.W. of Melbourne. The surrounding district is agricultural. Pop. 1,350.

CAMPHUYSEN, DIRK, kamp-hoo'-sen, an eminent Dutch painter, whose landscapes, winter, and moonlight pieces are extremely beautiful.

Born at Gorcum, 1586: died at Dockum, Friesland, 1627.

CAMPI, kam'-pe, a town of Italy, the province of Terra di Otranto, 9 miles from Lecce. Manf. Straw hats. Pop. 4,101.

CAMPI, a district of Italy, in the Val d'Arno, below Florence. It contains several villages of the same name, and the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the preparation of the fine Tuscan straw for hats and bonnets. Pop. 9,800.

CAMPI, BERNARDINO, Italian painter, who followed the style of Raffaelle and produced many admirable works. His masterpiece is the cupola of the church of San Gismondo, Cremona. He was also eminent as a portrait painter and engraver. Three other members of the family, Giulio, Antonio, and Vincenzo, also attained great reputation as painters.

Born 1522; died 1590.

CAMPIAN, EDMUND, kam'-pe-an, an English Jesuit, educated at Christ's Hospital and Oxford. Queen Elizabeth and Lord Burleigh noticed his abilities, and he was ordained deacon, but about 1570 abjured Protestantism, and went to Douay and Rome, where he became a Jesuit in 1573. In 1580 he came to England on a mission, but was arrested as a conspirator, imprisoned in the Tower, and after suffering torture on the rack, was with other Jesuits, his companions, executed at Tyburn. He wrote a book on universal chronology, a history of the divorce of Henry VIII., and a history of Ireland.

Born in London, 1540; died 1581.

CAMPISTRON, JEAN GALBERT DE, kam-pees'-trawng, French poet, who, at an early age, went to Paris, and there was fortunate enough to acquire the friendship and receive the advice of the poet Racine. Through him he became secretary to the duke of Vendôme. His plays possess many beauties, and are formed on the model of those of Racine. He also wrote some operas, of which the best known is "Acis and Galatea," not to be mistaken for the celebrated serenata of Handel, the words of which were by Gray.

Born at Toulouse, 1656; died 1723.

CAMPOBASSO, kam'-po-bas'-so, a fortified town of Italy, about 52 miles from Naples. Manf. Cutlery and arms. Pop. of comp. 380,467.

CAMPOBELLO, kam'-po-bel'-lo, an island of New Brunswick, with a lighthouse 60 feet high. It has several excellent harbours. Ext. 9 miles long, and from 1 to 3 broad. Lat. 44° 57′ N. Lon. 66° 55′ W.

CAMPO DE CRIPTANA, kam-po'-de-krip-ta'-na, a Spanish town in the province Ciudad-Real. Manf. Coarse cloths. There is a trade in corn and fruits. Pop. 5,250.

CAMPO FORMIO, kam-po for'-me-o, a town of Italy, in the province of Udine, 7 miles S.W. of the city of that name. It is remarkable as the place where a treaty of peace was signed between Austria and France, on the 17th October, 1797. By it Austria ceded the Low Countries and the territory of the empire as far as the Rhine, she recognized the Cisalpine republic, and received in return Venice, a portion of the Venetian States, Istria, and Dalmatia.

CAMPO-MAIOR, kam-po-mai'-yor, a fortified town of Portugal, on the Spanish frontier, in the province of Alemtejo, 15 miles N.W. of Badajoz. It is a poor place, with narrow, dirty streets. Pop. 5,300.

CAMPO SANTO, kam'-po san'-to, a town of Italy, situate on the Pavaro, 15 miles from the town of Modena. Pop. 2,500.—In 1743, a sanguinary battle was fought here, between the Spanish and Austrian forces.

CAMPOMANES, PEDRO RODRIGUES, kam-po-ma'-nees, count of, Spanish statesman and writer on history and political economy. He held office as minister, and was director of the Royal Academy of History at Madrid. He greatly assisted in the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain. He wrote on commerce, finance, popular education, the encouragement of manufactures, and the encouragement of the arts.

Born in Asturias, 1723; died 1802.

CAMPOS DOS GOITACAZES, kam'-pos dos goi'-ta-ka'-zuis, a city of Brazil, on the Parahiba, about 160 miles from Rio Janeiro. Pop. 4,000. There is a district attached to this city containing a population of 40,000, and producing considerable quantities of sugar-cane.

CAMTOOS, or GAMTOOS, kam'-toos, a considerable river of S. Africa, in the E. part of the Cape Colony. It rises in the Niewveld mountains, and, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the sea near Algoa Bay.

Born at Rome, 1775; died 1844.

CAMULOGENUS, kam'-u-lo-je'-nus, a general of the Gauls, chief of the Parisii (Parisians), who defended Lutetia (Paris) against the Romans under Labienus, one of Cæsar's lieutenants, and perished in a battle outside the walls, on the spot now called the Plain of Vaugirard.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

CAMUS, ARMAND GASTON, ka-moo', a French Jansenist, advocate-general of the French clergy. At the outbreak of the Revolution he represented Paris in the States-General, and published the "Red Book," giving an account of the lavish court expenditure. He was imprisoned by the Austrians in 1793, but returned two years afterwards and became president of the Council of Five Hundred.

Born in Paris, 1740; died 1804.

CANA, kai'-na, a town of Palestine, 5 miles N. E. of Nazareth. The modern Kefr-Kenna. It is pleasantly situated on the slope of a hill, with large fountain and beautiful gardens. There are remains of a much larger town. Pop. about 1,000, partly Moslems and partly Greek Christians.—This town is supposed to be the scene of the miracle of changing water into wine, recorded in St. John.

CANAAN, kai'-nan, "a merchant," the wicked son of Ham, whose posterity, the Amorites, Hivites, and others, suffered, in accordance with the prophetic curse of Noah.

CANAAN, a country extending between the Jordan and the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean Sea, where many of the principal events recorded in Scripture took place. It has been, from this circumstance, commonly called the Holy Land, and is identical with Palestine.

CANADA, DOMINION OF, kan'-a-da, the most extensive and important British possession in America, consists of the provinces of ONTARIO and QUEBEC (formerly West or Upper Canada, and East or Lower Canada), NOVA SCOTIA, NEW BRUNSWICK, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, MANITOBA, and BRITISH COLUMBIA. (See separate headings.) It is bounded on the N.W. and E. by other British territories; on the S. and partly on the E. it is bounded by the United States. Ontario, or the Upper province, may be viewed as possessed of a generally even surface, having few great elevations. It has a table ridge running S.E. and N.W., and forming a watershed between lakes Huron and Superior; but there are no physical features sufficiently striking to require particular description. Quebec, or the Lower province, may be viewed as mountainous when compared with the other. The principal ranges run parallel with each other, and stretch from S.W. to N.E. They are called the Green, the Mealy, and the Wotchish mountains. The first commences at Quebec, and, on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, follows the course of that river to where the range ends, between the Bay of Chaleur and Gaspe Point. The second stretches along the N. side of the river, and ends at Sandwich Bay; and the third, in the form of a crescent, lies between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Hudson's Bay.

Rivers.—The St. Lawrence and its tributaries (draining an area of more than 560,000 square miles), the Ottawa (450 miles long), Saguenay (famous for striking scenes), St. Maurice, or Three Rivers, Richelieu, Chaudiere, and St. Francis.

Lakes.—The largest in the world, and extremely numerous, the sizes of most of which are already noticed in the article on AMERICA, NORTH, which see.

Climate.—Ranging between extremes, a sudden rise or fall of 60° being not uncommon. In the west the winter is considerably shorter than in the east, and is also milder, on account of its nearer proximity to the great lakes. The skies of Canada are celebrated for their purity and transparency, fogs being hardly known.

Zoology.—Bears, wolves, beavers, foxes, otters, martens, racoons, minks, musk-rats, and squirrels. Deer were at one time plentiful, but they have become scarce, and the lynx and the wild cat have almost disappeared before the axe of the settler. Wild turkeys, swans, woodcocks, and snipes are frequently met with; whilst ducks and geese abound. The sky is sometimes darkened by flights of wild pigeons and jays. Woodpeckers and blackbirds are found in many and beautiful varieties. Besides these, there are eagles, hawks, kites, owls, crows, bitterns, and herons. Among reptiles, the rattlesnake and adder are found; but, although snakes are numerous, they are not so abundant as they are in the United States. Of insects, the bee and the mosquito are plentiful, and both the lakes and the rivers are well supplied with fish. The domestic animals are the same as those of this country.

Forests.—Immense; indeed, the greater part of the country is still covered with wood, chiefly consisting of the red and white pine, mingled with various kinds of ash, black and white birch, beech, elm, hickory, the butternut-tree, black walnut, cherry, bird's-eye-maple, sugar-maple, lime-tree, white sycamore, and buttenwood. In moist places, the alder, the willow, and several varieties of the thorn appear; whilst the tamarack and the red and white cedar spread their green foliage over the swamps.

Pro.—Wheat, rye, oats, pease, maize, buckwheat, and potatoes; nearly all kinds of vegetables thrive with proper cultivation, and pumpkins and squashes grow to an enormous size in the open fields. A considerable portion of ground is laid out for pasture and cattle, and sheep and hogs are raised. Wild fruits of the choicest description are gathered from the fruit-bearing bushes and trees. Among these may be noticed currants, gooseberries, raspberries, cranberries, cherries, grapes, plums, strawberries, figs, &c.

Minerals.—Gold, iron, copper, lead, tin, silver, marble, and lithographic stones.

Exp.—Timber is the principal article; but large quantities of barrelled beef, pork, flour, wheat, butter, peas, pot and pearlashes are also exported. There is a considerable trade carried on in lumber, fur, and wool, and a vast capital is invested in sawmills and log-ponds, Area, 3,483,952 square miles; of which at least 3,430,000 are uninhabited.

Pop. 4,324,810. More than four-fifths are natives of British North America. Nearly one half of the people are Roman Catholics, and in Lower Canada especially a large number are of French descent.

Railway and other Communications.—About 5,000 miles of railway are completed. By means of the St. Lawrence and the lakes there is connection with the great industrial centres of the United States and with the sea. By means of canals, seagoing ships of considerable size are admitted into Lake Ontario.

Constitution and Government.—The Dominion is constituted under the provisions of an Act of the imperial Parliament passed in March, 1867, known as "The British North America Act, 1867," which came into operation on the 1st July, 1867, by royal proclamation. The constitution of the Dominion is similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom; the executive authority is vested in the sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland, and carried on in her name by a Governor-general and privy council of 13 members; and the legislative power is exercised by a parliament of two houses, called the Senate and the House of Commons. The seven provinces forming the Dominion have each a separate parliament and administration, with a lieutenant-governor at the head of the executive. They have full powers to regulate their own local affairs, dispose of their revenues, and enact such laws as they may deem best for their own internal welfare, provided only they do not interfere with, or are adverse to, the action and policy of the central administration under the Governor-General.

History.—John and Sebastian Cabot discovered the country now known as Canada in 1497. In 1524 a French expedition founded a settlement named New France. In 1535, Jacques Cartier, a Breton mariner, ascended the St. Lawrence, as far as the spot where Montreal now stands. Quebec, the first permanent settlement, was founded in 1608. In 1759 Canada was conquered by the English, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Paris, 1763. The French laws were confirmed and religious liberty given to the Roman Catholics. The Upper and Lower provinces were established in 1791. Incorporated as a Dominion 1867. The name Canada probably originated in the Indian "Kannetha," a village.

CANALE, ka-na'-lai, a town of Italy, province of Cuneo, 7 miles N.W. of Alba. It has mineral waters. Pop. 3,500.

CANALETTO, or CANALE, ANTONIO, kan-a-lat'-to, Italian painter, the son of a theatrical decorator at Venice. He came to England and acquired great wealth and fame by his landscapes. His views in Venice are greatly admired.
Born in Venice, 1697; died 1768.

CANALETTO, BERNARDO, nephew of the above, whose surname he adopted, his own name being Bellotto, was also famous for landscapes. He, too, visited England, and produced some fine works.
Born at Venice, 1724; died at Warsaw, 1780.

CANAMINA, kan'-a-me-na, a town of Dahomey, Western Africa. Pop. 10,000.

CANANDAIGUA, kan'-an-dai-ga, a post-township in the county of Ontario, New York, U.S. Pop. 2,800.—The town stands on a lake of the same name, 15 miles long, with an average breadth of about 2 miles.

CANANEA, kan-an-e'-a, a town of Brazil, on an island in a bay of the same name. Small vessels frequent the port in connection with the export trade. Pop. 2,000.

CANANORE, or CANURA, kan'-a-nor, a seaport-town of British India, on the coast of Malabar, in the presidency of Madras, 44 miles N.W. of Calicut. It stands at the head of a bay forming a harbour. Cocoa-nuts, pepper, cardamums, grain, and timber are exported. It was the capital of a territory long ruled over by female sovereigns, and is the chief military station of the British in Malabar.—In 1501 a small fort was built here by the Portuguese, which was, in 1664, taken by the Dutch. These were driven out by Tippoo Sahib. In 1791 the British took possession. Pop. 26,386.

CANAR, ka-nar, a small town of New Grenada, S. America, 150 miles from Quito, celebrated for its numerous ruins, and for a palace of the Incas, in an extraordinary state of preservation.

CANARA, kan'-a-ra, a province on the Malabar coast of British India, and the most northerly part of the presidency of Madras. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Bejapore, E. by the Mysore and Balaghaut district, S. by Malabar, and W. by the sea. It is traversed by the Western Ghauts, and the surface is generally rocky and uneven. The valleys are fertile. MANGALORE and COOMTA are the chief towns. Ext. 180 miles long, by 30 to 70 broad. Area, 7,380 square miles. No longer officially recognized by the same name in the official returns.

CANARAC, kan'-a-rak, a town of Orissa, British India, at the north-western angle of the Bay of Bengal. The most noticeable feature of the place is an enormous pagoda, occupying a site of 13 acres, and built of basalt and granite. Lat. 19° 54′ N. Lon. 86° 10′ E.

CANARIES, or CANARY ISLANDS, ka-nair'-es, a group of 13 islands in the Atlantic, off the N.W. coast of Africa, the largest of which are TENERIFFE, GRAN CANARIA, FUERTEVENTURA, PALMA, HIERRO or FERRO, GOMERA, and LANZAROTE. (See proper headings.) They were celebrated in antiquity, under the appellation of the Fortunate Islands. The whole have a mountainous character, some of their peaks attaining a great height. The islands are divided into two bishoprics, suffragan the archbishop of Seville.

Area (of the group).—About 3,800 square miles.

Pop.—297,209, chiefly of European origin, but there are some descendants by intermarriages of the aboriginal inhabitants, the Guanches, the pure stock of which has long since disappeared.

Lat. Between 27° 40′ and 29° 25′ N. Lon. between 13° 25′ and 38° 16′ W.

History.—These islands were first discovered about 1330, when a Spanish or French vessel was driven upon them by stress of weather. In 1402 the Spaniards took possession of some of the islands, and in 1493 their government was supreme throughout the group, and they have since retained possession of them.

CANARY, GRAND, or GRAN CANARIA, the second largest and most fertile of the Canary Islands. The whole island, which is nearly circular in shape, consists of a mountainous volcanic mass, the culminating point of which is El Cumbre, which rises to 6,648 feet above the level of the sea, with its summit capped in perpetual snow. The lofty central parts of the island contain copious springs of pure water, which flow down in rivulets through the valleys, and preserve almost uninterrupted verdure and fertility. There are two, sometimes even three, harvests in the year, of wheat and maize. The coast, except on the north-east, where is the bay of Palmas, a fine harbour, is rocky and dangerous. The capital is LAS PALMAS. Pop. 60,000.

CANA-VERDE, ka'-na-verd, a town of Brazil, in the province of Minas-Geraes. Pop. 3,000, chiefly engaged in agriculture and cattle-breeding.

CANCALE, kan'-kal, a seaport-town of France, department Ille-et-Vilaine, 8 miles N.E. of St. Malo. Pop. 2,700.—The bay of Cancale furnishes large quantities of oysters.

CANCELLARA, kan-sail-la'-ra, a town of Italy, province of Naples, 9 miles from Potenza. There is a fine old church. Pop. 3,150.

CANDACE, kan-dai'-se, the designation conferred on the warrior queens of Æthiopia, in the later period of the kingdom of Meröe. The most distinguished in history invaded Egypt 22 B.C., but was defeated by the Romans, and compelled to sue to Augustus for peace. This she obtained, with a remission of the tribute imposed on her by Petronius, one of the generals of the Roman army.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

CANDAHAR, or KANDAHAR, kan'-da-har', a fortified city of Afghanistan, and one of its capitals. It stands in a fertile plain, 200 miles from Cabool, and about 3,500 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. unascertained; but variously stated from 30,000 to 100,000. Lat. 32° 37′ N. Lon. 66° 20′ E.—This city is supposed to have originally been founded by Alexander the Great. (See AFGHANISTAN.)

CANDEISH, or KHANDESH, kan'-dish, an old province of Hindostan, now belonging to the presidency of Bombay. Fertile, nearly encompassed by mountains, and watered by the Nerbudda, the Tuptee or Taptee, and other considerable streams. Area, 10,166 square miles. Pro. Grain, indigo, and cotton. Pop. 1,237,231. Lat. between 20° and 22° N. Lon. between 73° and 76° E.—Ceded to the British in 1818.

CANDELA, kan-dai'-la, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, 12 miles S.E. of Bovino. Good fruit and wine are produced in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,900.

CANDELADA, kan'-de-la'-da, a town of Spain, in the province of Old Castile, at the point where that province unites with New Castile and Estremadura. Manf. Weaving, hats, oil, brandy, and bricks. Pop. 4,800.

CANDELARIO, kan'-de-la'-ri-o, a Spanish town, province of Leon, 40 miles S. of Salamanca. Except a large and handsome church, there are no buildings of importance. Manf. Linen, paper, buttons, wine, and oil. There is a trade in cattle and agricultural produce. Pop. 2,100.

CANDIA, or CRETE, kan'-de-a (in Turkish, Kiaid'), an island belonging to Turkey, in the Mediterranean, situate to the south of the Grecian archipelago. It is 150 miles long, with a breadth ranging from 6 to 35, and mountainous, being traversed by a high range throughout its entire length. Mount Ida (modern name, Upsilorites), renowned in classic story, rises, near its centre, to a height of 7,674 feet. There are numerous springs, and the rivers, frequently dry in summer, are torrents in the wet season. The coasts are indented with caverns, and the soil of the valleys is fertile and productive.

Climate.—Genial and healthy.

Pro.—Oil, oranges, lemons, silk, wine, raisins, carobs, honey, cotton, and corn.

Manf.—Leather, soap, spirits, sacking, and coarse cloths.

Pop. 279,200.

Lat. Between 34° 50′ and 35° 55′ N. Lon. between 23° 40′ and 26° 40′ E.

Chief Towns.—CANDIA, RETIMO, and CANEA.

History.—Homer says there were 90 cities in Crete. The island was conquered by the Romans under Metellus. In 823 A.D. it was taken by the Saracens; and in 1204 the Venetians bought it of the Pope. The Turks gained possession of it after a 24 years' siege of the chief town in 1669.

CANDIA, or CANEA, capital of the island, situated on an elevated plain on the N. coast, and is strongly fortified. The harbour, once capacious, is now available only for vessels of light draught. Manf. Chiefly soap. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 35° 21′ N. Lon. 25° 8′ E.

CANDLISH, ROBERT SMITH, D.D., kan'-dlish, one of the most eminent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland. He was educated for the ministry of the established Church of Scotland, and held the parochial charge of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. At the disruption of the Establishment in 1843, Dr. Candlish took a leading part, and assisted, with other eminent clergymen, to form the Free Church. He afterwards became the pastor of Free St. George's, in the Lothian-road, Edinburgh. He published numerous pamphlets and sermons, besides some works on religious subjects. In 1862 he was appointed principal of New College, Edinburgh.

Born at Edinburgh, 1806; died 1873.

CANDOLLE, AUGUSTIN DE, kan'-dole, naturalist, who studied in France, and in 1808 was appointed professor of botany at Montpellier. After the final defeat of Napoleon, under whom he had held office during the Hundred Days, he quitted France and became professor of natural history at Geneva. He adopted what is known to botanists as "the natural arrangement," and holds the very first rank as a writer on botanical science.

Born at Geneva, 1778; died 1841.

CANDY, or KANDY, a town of Ceylon, formerly the capital of the above, situate near the centre of the island in a plain, amidst mountains covered with wood, 72 miles N.E. of Colombo. The residence of the governor is the finest structure in Ceylon. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 7° 23′ N. Lon. 80° 47′ E.

CANEA, or KHANIA, a fortified seaport and chief commercial town of the island of Candia, on the north coast, 65 miles from Candia, and on the east side of the Gulf of Canea. It is a neat town, many of the buildings being Venetian. There are several mosques and Greek churches, and a Capuchin monastery. Its harbour is the best in the island; it has a lighthouse, and is defended by a fort. The chief exports are soap, oil, wax, silk, fruit, and provisions. The foreign consuls reside here, and the town is the seat of a Greek bishopric. Pop. 15,000.

CANELLI, ka-nel'-le, a town of Italy, in the province of Alessandria, on the left bank of the Belbo, 14 miles S.E. of Asti. There are limestone quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,500.

CANETE-LE-REAL, kan-net'-te, a Spanish town, province of Malaga. Pop. 3,600, mostly engaged in agriculture, or as muleteers.

CANGA ARGUELLES, JOSE, kan'-ga ar-gail'-yais, a Spanish author and statesman. In 1823 he became an exile in England, where he produced a "Dictionary of Finance" and "Observations on the Histories of the Peninsular War."

These are his most important works, although he is the writer of several others. After passing seven years in London, he suddenly became an apologist for the measures of Ferdinand, and was permitted to return to his country. He subsequently became a member of the Cortes for the third time.

Born in the Asturias, 1770; died 1843.

CANGAS DE ONIS, kan'-gas-de-o'-nis, a town of Spain, 35 miles S.E. of Oviedo. There are monasteries in the neighbourhood, and the cave whither the Goths retreated after the battle of Guadalete, in 711. Pop. 7,000.

CANGE, CHARLES DU FRESNE DU. (See DUCANGE.)

CANGIAGO, or CAMBISI, LUDOVICO, kan-ja'-go, a Genoese painter, who executed some admirable works in Italy and Spain.

Born 1527; died 1585.

CANICATTI, kan'-e-kat'-te, a town in Sicily, province Girgenti, on the Naro, 15 miles S.W. of Caltanisetta. It is well built; and most of its inhabitants are connected with agriculture. Pop. 20,000.

CANINO, ka-ne'-no, a town in Italy, 20 miles N.W. Viterbo. Here is a fine palace, given by Pius VII. to Lucien Bonaparte, who also took the title of prince of Canino.

CANNA. (See HEBRIDES.)

CANNES, or CANES, kan, a seaport and favourite watering-place of France, department of Alpes-Maritimes, on the Mediterranean. The situation is picturesque, on the slope of a hill projecting into the sea. There are a Gothic castle, fine church, and many fine residences. Manf. Perfumes. A trade is carried on in olive oil, wine, fruit, corn, and anchovies. Pop. 14,086—Here Bonaparte landed on 1st March, 1815, on his return from Elba.

CANNING, THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE, kan'-ning, was, on the paternal side, of Irish extraction. His father having offended his relations by marrying beneath his station came to London, entered himself of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Meeting with little practice, he abandoned the law for literature, but being unable to maintain himself in this new vocation, became a wine-merchant, in which capacity he failed, and died of a broken heart, when his son was only a year old. His mother became an actress, and married an actor. He also dying, she was now married to a Mr. Hunn, a linendraper of Exeter, and lived long enough to see her son attain the eminence to which his distinguished abilities entitled him. George was educated first at Hyde Abbey School, Winchester, then at Eton, and then at Oxford, where he was recognized as a high-class man. He then entered Lincoln's Inn, to follow the law as a profession, but being introduced by Mr. Pitt to the House of Commons as representative of Newport, Isle of Wight, he abandoned the bar, and devoted himself wholly to the study of politics. This was in 1793. In 1796 he was appointed under-secretary of state, and in 1800 received a fortune of £100,000 by his marriage with Joanna, the daughter of General Scott. In 1804 he was appointed treasurer of the navy; and in 1807, a year after the death of Pitt, he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1809 he fought a duel with Lord Castlereagh; and in 1812 became member for Liverpool, which again elected him in 1814, 1818, and 1820. In 1814 he went as ambassador to Lisbon, but returned in 1816, and became president of the Board of Control, and in 1822 was named governor-general of India, and was about to embark for that country, when Lord Castlereagh, then marquis of Londonderry, committed suicide. This circumstance led to Mr. Canning relinquishing his appointment, and again accepting that of secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1827 he became premier, the great object of a long and arduous political life. The last time he spoke in parliament was on the 29th of June, 1827. His death was caused by inflammation resulting from a cold caught when attending the funeral of the Duke of York. He had great oratorical ability, with considerable literary power, and much brilliancy of wit. He was a firm supporter of the cause of Catholic emancipation, and the main promoter of the independence of Greece.

Born in London, 1770; died at the villa of the duke of Devonshire, Chiswick, 1827.

CANNING, CHARLES JOHN, Earl, was the only son of the Right Honourable George Canning, and on the death of his mother, in 1837, became Viscount Canning. In 1841 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and afterwards was commissioner of woods and forests, and postmaster-general. In 1856 he succeeded Lord Dalhousie as governor-general of India, which appointment he held throughout the whole of the mutiny of the sepoys of 1857, 1858, and part of 1859. For his conduct during this trying period he was, in 1859, created an earl. His health was greatly impaired by over-exertion, and he died soon after his return to England.

Born 1812; died 1862.

CANNSTADT, kan'-stat, a town of Wirtemburg, on the Neckar, 4 miles N.E. of Stuttgart. It consists of a walled inner town, and three suburbs. There are numerous mineral springs, with baths, and pleasure-grounds, much frequented. Manf. Woollens, cottons, tobacco, and vinegar; and there are several dyeing establishments. Roman remains are found in the neighbourhood. Pop. 16,205.

CANO (ALONSO) ka'-no, is called the Michael Angelo of Spain, from the greatness of his talents in painting, statuary, and architecture. He studied architecture, sculpture, and painting. His two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul were considered very fine, and many foreign artists came to copy them. He was soon taken notice of by Philip IV., and created first royal architect, king's painter, and instructor to the prince. He adorned the palaces and churches with elegant pieces both in sculpture and painting; but a singular misfortune occurred while he was in the career of glory. Coming home one evening, he found his house robbed, his wife murdered, and his Italian man-servant fled. Notwithstanding the strong presumption against this man, the magistrates fastened their suspicion on Cano, who was known to be of a jealous temper. Fearful of the consequences, he fled; but afterwards returned to Madrid, where he was racked to extort confession. He endured the torture without uttering a word to criminate himself, when the king caused him to be delivered, and took him again into favour. After this he entered the church as an asylum from further persecution, but still continued his professional pursuits. In his last moments, when the priest held to him a crucifix, wretchedly executed, he told him to take it away, for that it was so badly done he could not bear the sight of it.

Born at Granada, 1600; died 1664; or 1667.

CANO, JUAN SEBASTIAN DEL, the first who sailed round the globe. He accompanied Magellan to the East Indies, and, after the death of that famous sailor, sailed to the isles of Sunda, and doubled, after many attempts, the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain in 1522, after a voyage of more than three years.

Died 1526

CANOBBIO, kan'-ob-be-o, a town of Italy, on the west side of Lago Maggiore. The handsome church contains some fine paintings and frescoes. The town was formerly fortified, and there are remains of an old castle. Manf. Leather. Pop. 2,000.

CANOPUS, ka-no'-pus, a god of the water, amongst the Egyptians, represented under the form of a vase, surmounted with a man's or animal's head.

CANOSA, ka-no'-sa, a town of Italy, in the province of Bara, 13 miles S.W. of Barletta. The cathedral was built in the 6th century, in which is the tomb of Bohemund, king of Antioch. The town occupies the site of the ancient Canusium, a place of great size and importance. In the subterranean sepulchres many magnificent relics have been found, and there are the remains of a large aqueduct and amphitheatre. Pop. 8,000.

CANOURGUE, ka-noorg, a town of France, department Lozère, near the confluence of the Urugué with the Lot. Manf. Linen and woollen goods, for which the town has a great reputation, and calico. There is a trade in grain and cattle. Pop. 2,000.

CANOVA, ANTONIO, ka-no'-va, the eminent Italian sculptor, who, at fourteen years of age, was received into the studio of Bernardi Torretti at Venice, and subsequently into that of Ferrari. His first imaginative group was "Orpheus and Eurydice;" his next, "Dædalus and Icarus," which immediately brought him prominently into notice. Through the interest of Faliero, a senator of Venice, he was enabled to exhibit this work among the leading artists of Rome; and their judgment was so satisfactory that it stimulated him to higher efforts in his beautiful art. He returned to Venice for a short time, but afterwards went back to Rome, with a pension of 300 ducats, settled by his own government upon him for three years. He now produced his "Theseus and the Minotaur," and gave such strong evidences of a graceful yet simple talent, that he was chosen to execute the monument of Ganganelli (Pope Clement XIV.), for the church of the SS. Apostoli at Rome. This exquisite performance was exhibited in 1787, and it, at once, raised him to the highest rank in his profession. He next executed Rezzonico's (Clement XIII.) monument, which, if possible, surpassed the other. This work is in St. Peter's, at Rome. His fame being now established, he employed himself in the production of imaginary subjects. His genius was classical, yet in the highest degree pure and natural. "The Graces," "Cupid and Psyche," "Endymion," "Statues of Nymphs," "Hercules hurling Lycas from the Rock," are all evidences of the originality, as well as of that refined and exalted taste by which he was distinguished. Besides such works, he executed a large number of monumental groups, as well as portrait statues; among which we may mention his Napoleon I., and Letitia, the mother of that emperor. After his fame may be said to have travelled to the ends of the earth, he visited England, where he was highly gratified with his reception. The object of this visit was chiefly to see the Elgin marbles, the sight of which, he said, was sufficient to recompense him for his journey from Rome. On his return to Rome he received a patent of nobility, with the title of marquis of Ischia, which he never assumed, but, to the last, had his cards engraved with plain Antonio Canova. He also received a pension, which he expended in the support of arts and artists at Rome. A statue to his memory was erected in the church de Frati and the library of the capitol at Rome.

Born at Possagno, 1757; died at Venice, 1822.

CANROBERT, FRANÇOIS CERTAIN DE, kan'-ro-bair', a French marshal, who, in 1830, entered the army as a private. He highly distinguished himself in Algeria; commanded the French army in the Crimea, after the death of S. Arnaud; and shared in the Franco-German war.

Born 1809.

CANSO, kan'-so, an island, cape, and small fishing bank, on the S.E. coast of Nova Scotia. Lat. 45° 18′ N. Lon. 61° W.—The GUT OF CANSO leads from the Atlantic Ocean into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, between Nova Scotia and Cape Breton.

CANTABRIAN MOUNTAINS. (See SPAIN.)

CANTACUZENUS, JOHN, kan'-ta-cu-zé-nus, a Byzantine emperor, who, having distinguished himself by military service, was chosen emperor in 1346. He governed ably and with moderation, but civil dissensions induced him, in 1355, to retire to a monastery, where he employed himself in literary labours. His life was prolonged to upwards of a century. He wrote a history of the Byzantine empire, and some theological treatises.

Born 1295.

CANTAGALLO, kan'-ta-gal'-lo, a town of Brazil, in the province of Rio de Janeiro. It was formerly a place of greater importance than at present, being the centre of a gold district now exhausted. Pop. 4,000.

CANTAL, kan'-tal, a department of France which comprises the greater part of the old province Auvergne. It is mountainous, with its surface almost entirely covered with the débris of extinct volcanoes. There is, consequently, no great fertility, except in the valleys. The department is divided into 4 arrondissements, 23 cantons, and 264 communes. Rivers. The Cere, the Lot, and Dordogne, with their affluents. Pro. Buckwheat, corn, potatoes, chestnuts, hemp, and flax; cattle are depastured on the slopes of the hills, and the manufacture of cheese is considerable. Area, 2,245 square miles. Pop. 236,190. The chief town is AURILLAC.

CANTALUPO, kan-ta-loo'-po, a town of Italy, in the province of Campobasso. There are two annual fairs, and a considerable quantity of wine is made. Pop. 2,300.

CANTARINI, SIMON, kan'-ta-ré'-ne, called the "Pezarese," a disciple of Guido, whose paintings are often taken for those of his master.

Born 1612; died at Verona, 1648.

CANTELEUR, kan'-te-lu(r), a town of France, in the deparment Seine-Inférieure, on the Seine, 4 miles W. of Rouen. Manf. Cotton yarn and handkerchiefs. Pop. 1,200.

CANTELLANA, a town of Spain, province of Seville, on an eminence on the right bank of the Guadalquivir. Manf. Earthenware, soap, brandy, oil, and wine. There is a trade, in fruit, grain, and cattle. Pop. 4,400.

CANTEMIR, DEMETRIUS, kant-é-mir, a Moldavian prince, of Tartarian extraction. Early in life he served the grand seignieur, who appointed him governor of Moldavia, which he surrendered to Peter the Great, and obtained from him the title of prince. He wrote a "History of the Rise and Fall of the Ottoman Empire," in Latin; "The System of the Mahometan Religion;" "The Present State of Moldavia," &c.

Born in Moldavia, 1673; died at Astracan, 1723.

CANTEMIR, ANTIOCHUS, son of the preceding, was educated at St. Petersburg. He was raised to several important offices, and sent ambassador to Paris and London. He wrote poems in the Russian language, and translated Anacreon and other authors.

Born 1710; died 1744.

CANTERBURY, kan'-ter-ber'-re, a cathedral city, parliamentary borough, and county of itself, in Kent, on the Stour, 56 miles by road E. of London. The town consists of four principal streets, disposed in the form of a cross, and was formerly environed by walls, many portions of which remain. The dignity of being the metropolitan archiepiscopal see of all England belongs to it, and its spacious and magnificent cathedral, composed of the architecture of different periods, was, in the 12th century, erected on the site of the first Christian church built in Saxon England. It is in the form of a double cross, 514 feet in length, and 156 at its greatest breadth. The height of the vaulted roof is 80 feet, and that of the great tower 235. Many of the windows are superbly adorned with painted glass. The lady chapel, with a fan vaulted roof, was built in 1468. A chapel in the north transept is called the Martyrdom, for it was there that Thomas à Becket was murdered in 1171. The cathedral contains the tomb of the Black Prince, of Henry IV., and of many famous archbishops of Canterbury. It was repewed in 1879, at a cost of £10,000. Besides the cathedral, there are about 20 churches within the walls of the city, most of them very old, and three in the suburbs. There are likewise places of worship for other denominations, several charitable institutions, a handsome and commodious court-hall or guild, a philosophical institution, with a library and museum, a gaol, a theatre, and barracks both for cavalry and infantry. The grammar school was remodelled by Henry VIII. Part of the Benedictine abbey, St. Augustine's, with the fine gateway, still exists, and, with the addition of some modern buildings, forms a church missionary college. The remains of an old castle, of the Norman period, are near the city walls. A handsome Roman Catholic church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, was opened in 1875. A high mound, known by the name of "Dane John Hill," and encompassed by the city wall, is supposed to have been thrown up by the Danes. It forms the chief promenade of the citizens, as the old ramparts have been turned into terraces, and new ones added. One of the old gates remains. There are two mineral springs, which are much resorted to. Manf. Linen damasks. There is a good trade in corn, wool, and hops. Pop. 21,701. A station on the South Eastern, and London, Chatham and Dover railways.—This city is very ancient, and was called Durovernum by the Romans. The archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer of the realm, next to the royal family, and crowns the sovereign in Westminster Hall.

CANTERBURY, a province of South, or Middle Island, New Zealand, of which it occupies nearly all the central portion. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Nelson, on the S. by Otago, on the E. by the Pacific Ocean, and on the W. by the long narrow province of Westland, formerly a part of Canterbury settlement. The extreme length is about 200 miles, and breadth about 150. More than a third of the entire district forms a vast plain sloping gently down to the sea. The range of mountains known as the Southern Alps, the highest peak of which, Mount Cook, has an altitude of 13,000 feet, the summit being covered with perpetual snow. To the east of this range are the famous Canterbury Downs, the great sheep-grazing district of the colony, and unsurpassed for pasturage. These plains occupy about 3,000,000 of acres, and are watered by numerous streams. The extreme eastern portion of the settlement is Banks' Peninsula, a hilly district, of volcanic formation, the valleys being very fertile. To the south of the peninsula is Akaroa harbour. LYTTELTON, the chief shipping port, is on the northern side, on the western side of Pegasus Bay. To the west of Akaroa is an inlet of the sea, nearly closed by a long, narrow peninsula, and known as Lake Ellesmere. From this point the coast line makes a bold curve to the south-west, forming Canterbury Bight, a portion of the shore being known as the Ninety Miles Beach.

Rivers.—The Hurunui, Ashley, Waimakariri, Rakaia (or Cholmondeley), Selwyn, Courtenay, Ashburton, Bealey, Avon, Opiki, and Heathcote. These streams are generally shallow and easily forded, but are subject, in the wet season, to dangerous floods.

Area.—13,578 square miles.

Pro.—Cereals and fruit are cultivated with success; timber of excellent quality is abundant; and attention is paid to the production of silk, the mulberry growing well. Flax, wool, and hides are exported, and a great quantity of butter and cheese is made.

Chief Towns.—CHRISTCHURCH (the capital), LYTTELTON, Timaru, Kaiapoi, Rangiora, and Akaroa, all on the coast.

Minerals.—Iron ore, coal, fire-clay, quartz, sand and building stone.

Pop. 112,182 in 1881, increasing rapidly, chiefly by immigration from the British Isles.

History.—The district was settled in 1850 by the Canterbury Association, which included peers, bishops, and other influential persons connected with the established Church of England.

Railways and Communications.—Christchurch and Lyttelton are connected by railway, which extends north as far as Rangiora, and for about 20 miles S.W. of Christchurch. Altogether about 250 miles of rail are authorized and in course of construction.

CANTIANO, kan-te-a'-no, a fortified town of Italy, province of Pesaro, on a small stream of the same name. Pop. 2,500.

CANTIRE, or KINTYRE, kin'-tire (meaning in Gaelic, "a headland"), a peninsula of Argyleshire, between Arran Isle and the Atlantic. It is 40 miles long, with an average breadth of 6½. The surface is hilly with several lochs, and there is a considerable amount of cultivated land. The chief town is CAMPBELTON. There are some interesting antiquities on the peninsula. Pop. 18,000.—The MULL, is the S.W. point of the peninsula, and has a lighthouse 297 feet high. Lat. 55° 19′ N. Lon. 5° 49′ W.

CANTON, JOHN, kan'-ton, an experimental philosopher, who, after obtaining a common education, was apprenticed to the trade of broadcloth-weaving. His leisure hours were devoted to mathematical studies, in which he succeeded so well as to make a dial upon stone, which not only gave the hour of the day, but the rising of the sun, his place in the ecliptic, and other particulars. This was fixed against the front of his father's house, and so pleased many gentlemen of the neighbourhood, that he found, by access to their libraries, great helps in his favourite pursuits. In 1739 he went to London, and was engaged as assistant to Mr. Watkins, master of an academy in Spitalfields, whom he afterwards succeeded. About 1746 he made some discoveries in electricity, and in 1750 presented to the Royal Society a method of making artificial magnets, for which he was elected a member, and received the gold medal. In 1751 he was honoured with the degree of M.A. by the University of Aberdeen, and chosen one of the council of the Royal Society. His communications to that learned body, upon astronomical and philosophical subjects, were numerous and important, but he never published any separate work.

Born at Stroud, Gloucestershire, 1718; died 1772.

CANTON, a large city and seaport of China, in the province of Quang-tong, of which it is the capital, and of which the name is a modification. It stretches for about four miles along the left bank of the Chou-Kiong, or Pearl river, about 45 miles above the mouth of the Bocca Tigris, or Bogue, and is surrounded by lofty brick walls about six or seven miles in circuit, and entered by twelve gates. The northern and larger part is the Old Town; the southern, the New. The former is inhabited by the Tartar population, the latter by the Chinese. The suburbs are very extensive, and the streets are long, straight, and narrow, some of the principal not exceeding 15 or 20 feet in width, and the average breadth being only about 8 feet. Two of the widest and best thoroughfares are China and New China streets, great resorts of foreigners. The houses are built of brick, one story high, with two or three courts behind, for warehouses, or apartments for the females of the family. All the streets are well-furnished with shops. The poorest class live in mud hovels, many of them built on piles driven into the bed of the river. More than 270,000 people live entirely in boats on the river, and, in the great typhoon of 1862, at least 60,000 of these dwellers on the river lost their lives. The factories, or "hongs," of the different European powers, extending along the banks of the river, were destroyed by fire in 1856, and a new site of 24 acres, near the river, protected by a granite wall, in the western suburbs, has been set apart. A fine promenade extends along the river bank, and on the landward side the foreign quarter is separated from the Chinese town by a canal, crossed by three stone bridges. The whole of the foreign population, engaged in commerce, do not number more than 140. There are about 120 "joss-houses," nominally temples, but mostly gambling-houses or even worse. The largest, on Honam Island, (formed by the divided channels of the river), "the temple of the ocean banners," has 175 priests attached to it. In the western suburb is another large structure, "The temple of the 500 gods." There are also several pagodas, a Mahometan mosque, built in the 9th century by Arab merchants, and an English and an American hospital. The channels of the river form numerous islands, on which rice is cultivated.

Commerce.—The principal exports are tea, nankeen, silks, mother-of-pearl, tortoise-shell, camphor, China-ware, and many other articles. The imports from Great Britain and her eastern settlements are woollens, cloths, cotton, opium, betel-nut, furs, and watches. The establishment of Hang-Kow as a trading port, and the proximity of Hong-Kong, have somewhat affected the commercial position of Canton, but it is recovering from a temporary diminution, and its situation gives it many advantages. A fine line of quick steamers ply daily between the town and Macao and Hong-Kong.

Pop. 1,600,000.
Lat. 23° 7′ N. Lon. 113° 14′ E.

CANTON, capital of Stark county, Ohio, United States, beautifully situated in a rich agricultural district. The Nimisihillen creek on which it is situated offers great advantages for manufacturing power, and the town has rapidly prospered. Pop. of city, 12,258; of township, 14,873.

CANTORIA, kan-to-re-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Andalusia, on the left bank of the Almanzora, 36 miles N.E. of Almeria. Manf. Linen, woollens, saltpetre, oil, and wine. There is a trade in cattle and poultry. Pop. 4,500.

CANTU, CESARE, kan'-too, an Italian historian, whose liberal opinions drew upon him, in 1842, the vengeance of the Austrian government, who condemned him to a year's imprisonment. His principal work is his "Storia Universale," which was published at Milan, and extends to 20 vols. 8vo. It has passed through several editions, and has also been translated into French. He has written several other works. In poetry and poetic criticism he has likewise exercised his pen.

Born at Brescia, 1805.

CANTURIO, or CANTU, kan-too'-re-o, a town of Northern Italy, 5 miles S.E. of Como. There is an old church with an elegant tower. Manf. Iron wares. Pop. 5,500.

CANUTE, or KNUT, kan'-ute, the Great, king of Denmark and England, succeeded his father Sweyn in the former kingdom about the year 1014. Coming to England at the commencement of his reign in Denmark, he landed on the southern coast, where he committed dreadful ravages. Edmund Ironside, however, opposed him with such bravery that Canute agreed to divide the kingdom between them. On the murder of Edmund by Edric, in 1017, Canute obtained the whole kingdom, in an assembly of the states, conciliating the people by his espousal of Ethelred's widow. He then put to death Edric and several of the English nobility who had basely deserted their sovereign. He likewise levied heavy taxes, particularly on the inhabitants of London, but distributed justice with an even hand, and showed no partiality to the Danes in preference to the English. The king of Sweden having attacked Denmark, he embarked on an expedition against him, and slew the Swedish monarch in battle. Great now as was his power, he did not suffer it to inflate him with vanity. He returned to England, where it is said some of his flatterers praised him beyond the limits of even parasitical adulation. The story goes, that, shocked at the extravagance of his courtiers, whilst at Southampton, he caused a chair to be placed on the sea-shore. In this he seated himself, and commanding the waves not to approach nearer, calmly awaited his mandate to be obeyed. The heedless tide, however, rolled nearer and nearer, until it touched his royal feet. "See," said he to his flatterers, "how regardless of my power are these waves;" and bade them remember that no one should be called sovereign but the Great Being whom the waters and the winds alike obey. He subsequently made a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return founded the monasteries of St. Bennet, at Holme, and St. Edmund's Bury.

Died 1035.

CANUTE III. (See HARDICANUTE.)

CANUTE IV., called the Pious, king of Denmark, succeeded his brother Harold in 1080. He undertook an expedition to England, which failed. He made such extraordinary grants of land to the Church, that it excited his subjects to rise against him, and he was slain in a tumult. On this account he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1164.

Born 1086.

CAPE CLEAR, the most southern headland of Ireland, on an island, with a lighthouse 455 feet above the sea. Lat. 51° 26′ N. Lon. 9° 29′ W.

CAPE COAST CASTLE, the capital of the British settlements on the coast of N. Guinea, Africa. The large fortress which gives name to the place stands on a rock near the sea. The town itself consists chiefly of mud huts. The neighbourhood is wooded, but deficient in water, and the climate is humid and unhealthy. Pro. Palm-oil and maize, which, with gold-dust, iron, and tortoise-shell, are exported. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 5° 5′ N. Lon. 1° 13′ W.

CAPE COD, a peninsula of North America, in the Atlantic. Lat. 42° 2′ 23″ N. Lon. 70° 3′ 55″ W.—It is so called from the great number of cod-fish found in Massachusetts Bay.

CAPE-DA-ROCA, da-rō'-ka, the most western headland of Portugal, with a lighthouse and fort, 30 miles from Lisbon.

CAPE FEAR, a headland forming the S. point of Smith's Island, North Carolina, North America. It received its name from the danger incurred in navigating near it. Lat. 33° 32′ N. Lon. 78° 25′ W.

CAPE FRIO, frē'-o, a headland on the coast of Brazil, 80 miles from Rio Janeiro. Lat. 22° 59′ 9″ S. Lon. 41° 57′ 2″ W.

CAPE GIRARDEAU, jē'-rar-dō, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 875 square miles. Pop. 20,998.

CAPE COLONY, or CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, commonly known as "The Cape," a tract of country the most southern portion of Africa, colonized by the British, and taking its name from the cape which forms its southern extremity. The boundary on the N. is the Orange river, or Gariep, beyond which are Griqualand and Orange River Free State; on the E. Natal and Kaffraria; W. and S. the Atlantic Ocean. British Kaffraria was united with the colony in 1866, and Basutoland has been recently annexed. The coast-line is about 1,200 miles in length, rocky in the south and south-west, with lofty promontories, of which the most remarkable are the Cape of Good Hope and Cape Agulhas, the most southern point of the continent. The principal bays are St. Helen's, Saldanha, and Table, in the west; False and Simon's, St. Sebastian, Mossel, the Camtoos, and Algoa on the south. Saldanha and Simon's Bays are good harbours. The interior of the colony consists of successive ranges of mountains, running parallel to each other and to the southern coast. Each of these, as it ascends above the other, is proportionably barren. The most northerly range, having a direction generally parallel to the coast, includes the Roggeveld, the Nieuerveld, and the Sneeun, or Snowy Mountains, attaining in some parts of the range an elevation of 10,000 feet. About midway between these mountains and the south coast are the Zwarte, or Black Mountains, the intermediate district being an elevated district known as the Great Karroo, uniting on the east with another elevated table-land, the Candeboo. There are lower ranges near the coast, and in the west, stretching from north to south for about 200 miles, the Bokkeveld. Thus Southern Africa forms a succession of mountain terraces, rising above each other. The plain, next the sea, has a deep and fertile soil, is watered by numerous rivulets, well clothed with grass, and exhibits a rich variety of trees and shrubs. The second terrace contains a considerable proportion of well-watered and fertile lands; whilst the third, the Great Karoo, about 200 miles long, and 50 broad, consists of an impenetrable soil, nearly destitute of every trace of vegetation.

Rivers.—Great Fish, Keiskamma, Bushman, Sunday, Camtoos, Briede Berg, Oliphant, and Orange. Although the streams are numerous, in the summer they are mostly dry.

Zoology.—The wild animals, such as wolves, hyenas, elephants, hippopotami, tigers, antelopes, &c., have almost disappeared from every part of the settlement. In place of these, cattle and sheep have multiplied, and their breeds have been much improved. The merino sheep thrives admirably, and large quantities of its wool are sent to England. The ostrich is found in the plains; and is regularly bred in ostrich-farms for the sake of the feathers, in which a very large export trade is carried on. The pelican, flamingo, crane, guinea fowl, and pigeons are numerous There are venomous snakes and reptiles and insects in abundance.

Climate.—The alternations of heat and cold are great and sudden. The S.E. wind has the characteristic of a simoom, and brings with it clouds of red sand. On the whole, however, the climate is not detrimental to the health of Europeans, but, on the contrary, beneficial to consumptive invalids. The average temperature is below that of places in the corresponding latitudes of the northern hemisphere.

Pro.—Nowhere, perhaps, are produced plants and flowers more distinguished by the elegance of their form and the brilliancy of their colours. The forests are not extensive, but many of the timber trees are of considerable value. The culture of the vine, which grows here freely, although the fruit, perhaps, is rather abundant than of first-rate quality, receives considerable attention. There is a large exportation, principally to the mother country, of the wines known as Cape and Constantia, and a kind of port wine is also manufactured.

Minerals.—Gold has been found in the basin of the Orange River and there are copper-mines at work, yielding, it is said, 60 to 73 per cent. of pure metal. The discovery of diamonds in 1867 attracted a large number of persons to the colony, and the continued find has given a great impulse to trade; but the diamond fields are mostly near the Vaal river, beyond the limits of Cape Colony. (See GRIQUALAND.)

Area.—201,000 square miles.

Divisions.—The colony is divided into Western and Eastern divisions; the former, including 23, and the latter, 25 electoral divisions.

Pop.—902,693. The majority of the whites are of Dutch, German, and French origin, mostly descendants of the original settlers. The coloured people are principally Kaffirs and Hottentots. There is a mixed race known as Africanders, the offspring of black women and Dutch fathers.

Commerce.—The chief articles of export are wool (nearly one-tenth in value of all the exports), copper ore, feathers, ivory, hides, and sheepskins.

Lat. Between 28° 15′ and 34° 50′ S. Lon. Between 16° 20′ and 27° 30′ E.

History.—The Cape of Good Hope, which was long a barrier to the progress of the Europeans eastward, was discovered in 1486 by Barthelemy Diaz, a Portuguese navigator. He called it the "Cape of Tempests," on account of the storms which he had there experienced. John II., of Portugal, however, altered the title to that of "Good Hope," as he justly thought that it would open the road to the Indies. It was doubled in 1497, by the Portuguese navigator, Vasco de Gama; then European ships were seen, for the first time, in the Indian seas. The Dutch, in 1600, in the infancy of their Indian trade, fixed upon it as a station for their vessels to take in water and provisions, and at last began to colonise it. The Hottentots were either reduced to slavery, or driven beyond the mountains, and the Cape settlement was gradually extended. In 1795 it was reduced by the British naval force, but restored to Holland by the Peace of Amiens. It was again reduced in January, 1806, and was permanently confirmed to Britain at the congress of Vienna. There have been several wars with the Kaffirs, resulting in some annexations of territory. The present colonial government was established in 1853.

CAPE HATTERAS, hat'-te-ras, in the United States, at the angle of a long reef which lines the coast of N. Carolina. Lat. 35° 14′ N. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

CAPE HAYTIEN, hai'-ti-en, a seaport-town on the north coast of Hayti, 40 miles from Port au Prince. There are large sugar plantations in the vicinity. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 19° 40′ N. Lon. 60° 54′ W.

CAPE HORN, or HOORN, horn, the most southern point of America, named by Schouten, its discoverer, after the place of his nativity in the Netherlands. It is a lofty headland, and navigation round it is very dangerous. Lat. 55° 58′ S. Lon. 67° 16′ W.

CAPE LA HAGUE, haig, a promontory of France, in the English Channel, opposite the island of Alderney, 16 miles from Cherbourg. Lat. 49° 43′ 22″ N. Lon. 1° 57′ 6″ W. CAPE LA HOGUE is on the opposite side of the same peninsula, off which the united Dutch and English fleets, under Admiral Russell, defeated the French naval force under Tourville, May 19, 1692.

CAPE MAY, a county and headland of New Jersey, in the United States. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 9,765.

CAPE RIVER, or VAUNKS, vawnks, a river of Central America, which, after a course of 300 miles falls into the Caribbean Sea, at Cape Gracios a Dios. Its course is through the Maragua and Mosquito country, and it is navigable to a considerable distance inland.

CAPE TOWN, the capital of Cape Colony, is situated on the south side of Table Bay, 31 miles N. of the promontory known as the Cape of Good Hope, at the foot of Table Mountain, in a valley formed by the lofty crags, Devil's Peak, Lion's Head, and Lion's Rump. The town is regularly built, with wide streets intersecting at right angles, and some planted with trees. Many of the older houses are built in the Dutch style. Government House is a fine edifice, with large grounds, partly used as a public promenade. There are a court-house, many churches and chapels, a Roman Catholic cathedral, an exchange, a commercial-hall, an observatory, the South African college, a public library, and a large botanic garden. Cape Town is defended on the land side by a strong citadel, and towards the sea by large batteries. The harbour in Table Bay is protected by a breakwater 1870 feet long, and has a large outer and inner bason. The suburbs of the town are very pleasant and beautiful. Pop. 45,240. Lat. 33° 56′ S. Lon. 18° 28′ 7″ E.—Cape Town was founded by the Dutch, in 1650.

CAPE VERD, verd, the most W. cape of Africa, between the Senegal river on the north, and the Gambia on the south, called from a group of baobab trees, which crown its summit. Lat. 14° 32′ N. Lon. 17° 34′ W.

CAPE VERD ISLANDS, a group in the Atlantic Ocean, 320 miles W. of the above cape. They were discovered and settled by the Portuguese, 1499. They consist of ten islands and four islets. The islands are named Santiago, Sal, Mayo, Boavista, Brava, Fogo, S. Nicolao, and S. Luzia, S. Vincent, and S. Antonio. They are mountainous in general, with some of the peaks rising to a considerable height. The volcano of Fogo attains an elevation of 9,157 feet above the level of the sea. SANTIAGO is the largest of the islands. Some of the islands have sheltered bays and good anchorage, the best harbour being Porte Grande, in St. Vincent. Maize, rice, French beans, coffee, cotton, indigo, tobacco, orchil, cocoa-nut, melons, and an abundance of the usual tropical plants are cultivated. Cattle are reared, and pigs and goats are numerous. Mules and asses are the beasts of burden, and fowls are plentiful. Fish abound in the neighbouring seas, and amber is found along the coasts. The scarcity of fresh water, however, is a great drawback, and is the occasion of frequent and severe distress. The principal branches of industry are the preparation of salt and agriculture. Amber is found on the shores of all the islands. Manf. Salt, leather, linen, soap, and pottery. Pop. 99,317, nearly all negroes or half castes. Lat. between 14° 45′ and 17° 13′ N. Lon. between 22° 45′ and 25° 25′ W.

CAPE VERD, province of, comprises the island and the Portuguese possessions near Cape Roxo, on the African continent, the capital of which is Mindello, in the island of St. Vincent. The only worship is the Roman Catholic.

CAPE WRATH, rawth, is the N.W. extremity of Scotland, county of Sutherland. It is formed by a pyramid of gneiss, topped by a lighthouse 400 feet above the sea. Lat. 58° 38′ N. Lon. 4° 58′ W.

CAPE YORK, the extreme point of the N.E. coast of Australia. Lat. 10° 38′ S. Lon. 142° 33′ E.

CAPEFIGUE, BAPTISTE HONORE RAYMOND, kap'-feeg, a French historian and periodical writer, who studied for the law; but becoming a contributor to the newspapers in Paris, adopted literature as a profession. For a time he was editor of the "Quotidienne," and subsequently devoted the energies of his pen to the columns of most of the Parisian leading papers; besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes." Whilst supporting himself by this means, he was labouring in the mine of history, and has produced upwards of one hundred volumes, most of which have relation of some period in the annals of his own country.

Born at Marseilles, 1802.

CAPEL, ARTHUR LORD, kai'-pel, an English nobleman, who, in the parliament of 1640, voted for the attainder of the earl of Strafford, a measure which he afterwards sincerely repented. Finding that the Parliament went further against the king than he wished, he began to oppose their violent measures, for which he was created Lord Capel of Hadham. In the war which followed, his zeal in the royal cause induced the Parliament to confiscate his estates. In 1648 he, with the earl of Norwich and Sir Charles Lucas, defended Colchester against the Parliamentary forces, but was obliged at last to surrender, upon promise of quarter. He was, however, committed to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but being soon taken, was tried and executed.

Born 1600; died 1649.

CAPEL, EDWARD, an editor of Shakspeare, who obtained the place of deputy-inspector of plays, with a salary of £200 a year. He spent 20 years, not very successfully, on his edition of Shakspeare.

Born near Bury St. Edmunds, 1713; died 1781.

CAPELLA, MARTIANUS MINEUS FELIX, a learned writer on grammar, rhetoric, geometry, astronomy and music. He was the first to produce a kind of encyclopædia, the "Satiricon," and it is supposed that Copernicus was indebted to him for the true theory of the solar system.

Born in Africa, in the 5th century.

CAPELLADAS, ka-pel'-la-das, a Spanish town, province of Catalonia, 34 miles N.W. of Barcelona. Manf. Coarse cloth, cottons, and woollens, paper, and brandy. Pop. 2,800.

CAPELLEN, GODERD ALEXANDER GERARD PHILIP, Baron Van der, ka-pel'-len, Dutch statesman, was, in 1809, appointed minister of internal affairs of Holland, under King Louis Bonaparte, with whom, in 1811, he went to his retreat at Gratz, in Stiria. On the emancipation of Holland from the French yoke, Capellan was, in 1814, made governor-general of the Dutch East Indies; but he did not set out for the scene of his administration till after the battle of Waterloo, when he proceeded to Java. In 1826 he was recalled in disgrace, notwithstanding the many excellent reforms which he effected among the people he had been sent to govern. For a long time the prejudice against him was great; but justice, though tardy, came at last and vindicated his conduct in the eyes of his countrymen. He rose once more into favour, and was appointed ambassador to England on the occasion of the coronation of Queen Victoria.

Born at Utrecht, 1778; died at his seat at Vollenhoven, 1848.

CAPELLO, BIANCA, ka-pel'-lo, a Venetian lady, who, from the mistress became the wife of Francis, son of the grand duke Cosmo de Medici. She possessed considerable talents for intrigue, and deceived her lover, who was desirous of offspring, by pretending that she had had a child born to her. She and her husband died within a few days of each other, in 1587, not without strong suspicion of being poisoned by the Cardinal Ferdinand, brother of Francis.

Born at Venice, 1540; died 1587.

CAPERNAUM, ka-per'-na-um, "the field of repentance," or "city of comfort," on the north-western coast of the Sea of Tiberias. It is now a heap of ruins, known as Tell-hun.

CAPESTERRE, LA, or LE MARIGOT, kaps'-tair, mar'-re-go, a town of Guadaloupe, 13 miles N.E. of Basseterre, and the chief town of the most fertile district of the colony. Pop. 4,000.

CAPET, HUGO, ka'-pai, the founder of the Capet dynasty of French princes, of whom very little is known. He is said to have been of plebeian origin, was abbot of St. Martin de Tours (taking the name Capet from cappetus, the hood of a monk), and usurped the throne in the 10th century.

Born 933; died 996.

CAPITANATA, ka'-pe-ta-na'-ta. (See FOGGIA.)

CAPIZ, ka'-peeth, a town of the Philippines, on the coast of the island of Panay, and capital of a province of the same name. It is defended by a fortress. Pop. 11,000.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, JOHN ANTHONY, Count of, ka'-po-dees'-tre-a, a Greek, who began life as a student of medicine, but turned his attention to politics, and having held important offices in the Ionian Islands, entered the service of Russia, and was attached to the embassy at Vienna. In 1813 he became the plenipotentiary of Russia to Switzerland, and gained the favour of the Swiss by advocating the restoration of all the territory which the French had taken from them, and the re-establishment of Helvetian independence. In 1814 he was at the congress of Vienna, and, in the following year, was the plenipotentiary of Russia in the final treaty of peace with France. For the next ten or twelve years he laboured to undermine Turkey; and, on the separation of Greece from that power, he was, after the battle of Navarino, in 1828, installed president of the Greek government. In this capacity, however, he acquired little credit, being constantly at variance with the people over whom he presided. He was assassinated in a church at Nauplia, by relatives of a man whom he was prosecuting for offences against the State.

Born in Corfu, 1780; died 1831.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, a fortified seaport of Austria, in the Government of Illyria, on a small island in the Gulf of Trieste. It communicates with the mainland by a drawbridge nearly half a mile long, and has a cathedral containing some fine paintings and sculptures, many churches, a Gothic town-house, an exchange, several monasteries, and a gymnasium. Manf. Soap, candles, sea-salt, and leather. The fisheries are extensive. Pop. 9,200.

CAPPADOCIA, kap'-pa-do'-she-a, a country of Asia Minor, between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine. It received its name from the river Cappadox, which separated it from Galatia. Its inhabitants were dull and superstitious, and according to the ancients, addicted to every vice. They reared sheep and beautiful horses.

CAPRAIA, ka'-pra-e-a, a small island of Italy, in the Mediterranean, 18 miles E. of the northern extremity of Corsica. It is about 12 miles in circumference, of volcanic origin, mountainous, and productive in wine and oil. There is a small fortified port of the same name on the island. It takes its name from the numerous wild goats found upon it. Pop. 2,500. Lat. 44° 2′ N. Lon. 9° 51′ E.

CAPRAROLA, a town of Italy, 25 miles N. of Rome, containing a splendid castle, considered to be the finest extant specimen of the Italian fortified domestic architecture of the 16th century. It is the property of the Farnese family, and is richly decorated with frescoes and arabesques.

CAPRERA, ka-prair'-a, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, off the N. Coast of Sardinia. It is 6 miles long and 2 broad, and fertile. The island is famous as the residence of Garibaldi.

CAPRI, ka'-pre, a small island in the Mediterranean, near the entrance of the Bay of Naples, and 20 miles from the city of Naples. It is about 9 miles in circumference, and consists of two limestone mountains, with a fertile valley between. The climate is very fine. Fruit, grain, oil, and wine are produced. Pop. 3,300. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in fishing.

CAPRI, a small fortified town on the south side of the above island. It is built on the side of a hill, and contains a cathedral and several churches. Pop. 1800.

CAPRICORN ISLANDS, kai'-pri-korn, a small group on the tropic of the same name off the E. coast of Australia. Turtles are abundant. Lat. 23° S. Lon. 152° E.

CAPRINO, ka-pre'-no, a town of Italy, province of Venezia, on a small stream flowing into the Adige, 16 miles N.E. of Verona. Pop. 3,500.

CAPSALI, kap-sa'-le, a seaport, capital of Cerigo, Ionian Islands. There is a large harbour defended by a fort. Pop. 5,000.

CAPUA, ka'-poo-a, a town of Italy, in the Terra di Lavoro, on the Volturno, 18 miles N. of Naples. It contains, besides the cathedral, a collegiate church, several parish churches, and a number of convents. Capua has a strong citadel, and is considered to be of great military importance. Pop. 13,517.—In ancient times this city rivalled Rome, being called altera Roma, another Rome; and possessed so many pleasures and luxuries, that it enervated the soldiers of Hannibal, and rendered them unfit for the severities of war.

CAPUL, one of the Philippine Islands.

CAPURSO, ka-pur'-so, an Italian town, province of Napoli, 7 miles S.E. of Bari. The neighbourhood is famous for almonds. Pop. 3,200.

CARABOBO, a state of the republic of Venezuela, South America. The principal productions are coffee, wheat, tobacco, indigo, and cotton. The capital is VALENCIA. Area, 8,148 square miles. Pop. 163,401.

CARACALLA, MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS, kar'-a-kal'-la, a Roman emperor, who, with Geta his brother, succeeded his father Severus; but, desirous of reigning alone, he slew his brother whilst in the arms of his mother. He afterwards put to death 20,000 of the adherents of Geta of both sexes. After gaining over the soldiers, he wantoned in cruelty, and married his mother-in-law. The people of Alexandria, having uttered some sarcasms on the murder of Geta, he entered it with his army, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. He was assassinated by one of his guards, at Edessa.

Died 217.

CARACAS, ka-ra'-kas, a state of the republic of Venezuela, bounded on the N. by the Caribbean Sea, on the S. by Venezuela proper and Guiana, on the E. by Barcelona, and on the W. by Varinas and Carabobo. Varied with hill and dale, with good harbours on the coast. Pro. Indigo, coffee, and cacao. Area, 54,000 square miles. Pop. 60,000. Lat. between 7° 38′ and 10° 26′ N. Lon. between 65° 30′ and 68° W.

CARACAS, the capital of Venezuela, in the above state. It is built on a declivity, nearly 300 feet above the level of the sea, at a distance of about 16 miles from the coast of the Caribbean Sea. Its situation is healthy, and it is plentifully supplied with water from the Guayra, and three other streams, which are near to, or intersect, the town, which is regularly laid out, with squares and fountains. There are seven highly decorated churches, five convents, a university, and three hospitals. Pop. 55,638. In 1812 an earthquake destroyed 12,000 persons in this place.

CARACCI, or CARRACCI, ANNIBALE, ka-ratch'-che, painter, originally a tailor. He attained great fame, painting in the style of Titian, Correggio, and Paul Veronese. He was engaged for eight years in painting the Farnese gallery in Rome, for which he received such a miserable remuneration that he gave up the practice of his art in disgust. He takes a very high rank among Italian painters.

Born at Bologna, 1560; died at Rome, 1609.

CARACCI, AGOSTINO, elder brother of the above, also a painter of repute, and an engraver of eminence.

Born at Bologna, 1558; died at Parma, 1602.

CARACCI, LUDOVICO, cousin of the preceding, son of a butcher, who rose to be the founder of the Bologna school, the leading principle of which was that nature should be attentively studied, as well as the works of great masters.

Born at Bologna, 1555; died 1619.

CARACCIOLI, FRANCESCO, ka-ratch'-che-o-le, a Neapolitan admiral, who being offended by the treatment he received from the court, went to Naples, and entered into the service of the French invaders, who had possession of the town. He was captured and hanged. Lord Nelson has been greatly blamed for permitting the execution.

Died 1799.

CARACTACUS, ka-rak'-ta-kus, a British king of the Silures, in South Wales, celebrated for his magnanimous deportment when brought before the emperor Claudius, in 52. He had been betrayed by Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes. Claudius was so touched on the occasion as to take him into his favour, and to give him his liberty. There were some other British princes of the same name.

CARADOG, kar'-a-dog, a British historian, who wrote the chronicle of Wales from 686 to his own time. Of this work several copies remain.

CARAFFA, ka-raf'-fa, an eminent Neapolitan family, divided into many branches, and all descended from Filippo Caraffa, lord of Spinalonga, who died in 1220.

CARAGA, one of the Philippine Islands.

CARAGLIO, ka-rai-le-o, a town of northern Italy, in the province of Corri, on the Grana. Manf. Silk. Pop. 6,300.

CARA HISSAR. (See APIOM-KARA-HISSAR.)

CARAMANIA. (See KARAMAN.)

CARATE, ka-rā-te, a town of Italy, province of Milano, on the right bank of the Adda, 15 miles N. of Milan. Manf. Silk, woollens, and linen. Pop. 2,500.

CARAUSIUS, ka-rau'-si-us, a Roman captain, a native of Belgic Gaul, whom Maximian employed to defend the coasts of Gaul against the piratical Franks and Saxons. Here he acquired so much wealth by his prizes, as to excite the jealousy of the emperor. Carausius, foreseeing the results of this, sailed for Britain, where, in 287, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by the Roman legions. He now maintained a formidable fleet, and was enabled to resist all attempts to expel him, the Romans being obliged to acknowledge his independence in a treaty. He was assassinated by Allectus, one of his principal officers.

Born 250; died 293.

CARAVAGGIO, kar'-a-vaj'-e-o, a town of Italy, province of Bergamo, 24 miles E. of Milan, between the Adda and Serio. The fosse of the old fortifications (recently demolished) is crossed by six bridges. The principal church and the sanctuary of the Madonna, near the town, contain some valuable paintings. Pop. 5,500.

CARAVAGGIO, MICHAEL ANGELO MERIGHI DA, an Italian painter, who took his surname from his birthplace. His father was a mason, but the boy's artistic instinct was strong, and, though undergoing great privations, he studied the works of the great masters at Milan, Venice, and Rome. He fled from Rome, having killed a man in a quarrel, and took refuge at Malta, where he painted an altarpiece for the church of St. John. His unhappy temper soon caused him to leave Malta, and on his way back to Rome he was seized with a fever, and died by the roadside. He was a painter of low-life scenes, and chose subjects of a gloomy and ferocious character. Even his altarpieces partook of this character, and several were removed from the churches in consequence.

Born at Caravaggio, 1569; died 1619.

CARAVACA, ka-rav-a'-ca, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, on the left bank of a river of the same name, which is crossed by a stone bridge. The government house, a very fine townhall, and the church, with a lofty tower, are conspicuous buildings. Manf. Linen, woollens, paper, soap, earthenware, leather, copper vessels, brandy, oil, wine, and chemicals. A good trade is carried on in grain, cattle, and manufactured goods. There is a large annual fair. Pop. 15,017.

CARAVELLAS, ka-rav-al'-las, a maritime town of Brazil, in the province of Bahia, on a bay of the same name. Flour and coffee are exported. Pop. 2,500.

CARBET, LE, kar'-bai, the capital of Martinique, 2 miles from Saint-Pierre. To the S. of this town is a volcanic mountain, estimated above 5,000 feet high. Pop. about 4,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.

CARBON, kar'-bon, a county of Pensylvania, in the United States. It is rough and barren, but the most extensive coal-mining district in the United States. It has a great number of saw, flour, grist, and powder-mills, and several local railways in operation to facilitate the trade of the county. Pop. 31,923.

CARBONNE, kar-bon', a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, on the left bank of the Garonne, 24 miles S.W. of Toulouse. Manf. Woollens, bricks, and tiles. There is a trade in oil and wool. Pop. 2,500.

CARCABUEY, kar-ka-boo'-ai, a town of Spain, 34 miles S.E. of Cordova. The chief industries are weaving and agriculture. Pop. 2,500.

CARCAGENTE, or CARCAXENTE, kar-ka-jen'-te, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, beautifully situated on the right bank of the Jucar. There are a large palace belonging to the marquis of Calzada, several churches and convents, and beautiful promenades and gardens in the environs. A trade is carried on in grain, fruit, and silk. Pop. 7,300.

CARCASSONNE, kar-kas-son', an ancient city of France, department of the Aude, divided into the Upper and Lower towns by the river Aude, 53 miles S. of Toulouse. The former is surrounded by walls, and has a castle and the old church of St. Lazarus, formerly the cathedral; but the latter is better built, being comparatively modern. The new cathedral, the house of the prefecture, the large market, and the public library, are prominent features. The town is the see of a bishop, has a college, and a tribunal of commerce. Manf. Cloth, paper, soap, leather, linen, and nails. It also trades in grain, fruit, flour, wine, and brandy. Pop. 21,082.

CARCES, karce, a town of France, department of the Var, at the confluence of the Issole and the Argens. Manf. Silk and leather. There are several distilleries. Pop. 2,800.

CARDAN, JEROME, kar'-dan, a celebrated Italian physician, mathematician, and naturalist, the illegitimate son of a physician of Milan. He became professor of mathematics at Milan, and, in 1552, went to Scotland, and cured the archbishop of St. Andrews of an asthma which had baffled the skill of numerous physicians. He was next admitted to the court of Edward VI., and cast the nativity of that prince. Thence he rambled through various countries, and at Bologna was committed to prison for debt. On recovering his liberty he went to Rome, where he ended his days. As a physician he was empirical, and in philosophy fanciful and extravagant, but in mathematical knowledge he was eminent. He was so addicted to astrology, that, having foretold the time of his own death, it is said he starved himself to prove the truth of his prediction. He wrote more than 120 treatises on physics, mathematics, astronomy, astrology, rhetoric, natural history, music, and medicine.

Born at Pavia, 1501; died at Rome, 1576.

CARDI, LUDOVICO, kar'-de, surnamed Civoli, or Cigoli, Italian painter and architect, held in great esteem by the popes and grand dukes of Tuscany. His most famous picture, considered by some critics to be inferior only to the "Transfiguration," of Raffaelle, is in the church of St. Peter, at Rome.

Born 1559; died 1613.

CARDIFF, kar-dif, a parliamentary borough and seaport of Glamorganshire, on the Taff, which is here crossed by a bridge of three arches, 12 miles from Newport. A navigable canal, 25 miles long, constructed among the mountains, communicates with the Merthyr Tydvil works, whence a great quantity of cast and wrought iron is brought. The chief public buildings are St. John's Church, with a lofty tower, townhall, free library and museum, a county gaol, law courts, and a theatre. Cardiff castle, once large and strongly fortified, was erected about the year 1079. Robert, duke of Normandy, was confined in it for 26 years after the battle of Tinchebrai. This fortress was afterwards taken and partly demolished by Cromwell. It has been modernised and enlarged by the present proprietor, the marquis of Bute. Very commodious docks have been recently constructed at the cost of a million sterling. There are several large iron foundries in the town; but the great industries are connected with the coal and iron works in the neighbourhood, and the shipping trade, which is very large and rapidly increasing. Pop. 85,378. A station on the Great Western, London and North-Western, Midland, Cambrian, Taff Vale, and Rhymney railways.

CARDIGAN, earl of, JAMES THOMAS BRUDENELL, kar'-di-gan, entered the army in his 27th year, and in 1830 became a lieutenant-colonel of hussars. The death of his father brought him into possession of a large fortune, and he devoted a considerable sum to the service of his regiment. In 1841 he was tried and acquitted by the House of Lords for having fought a duel, in which he had wounded his adversary. In 1854 he commanded the 11th hussars, and, in the same year, was appointed a major-general of the light cavalry despatched to serve in the Crimea. On the 25th October he led the celebrated charge at Balaclava against the batteries of guns. In 1855 he was created a commander of the Bath, and in the following year was made a commander of the Legion of Honour by Napoleon III., and appointed inspector-general of cavalry.

Born in London, 1797; died 1868.

CARDIGAN, parliamentary borough and seaport of Wales, the capital of Cardiganshire, situate on the right bank of, and 4 miles from the mouth of the river Tivey, which is crossed by an ancient bridge of seven arches. The town was formerly surrounded by a wall, and defended by a castle, now in ruins. There are a church, built in the 16th century, several chapels, a free grammar-school. The entrance to the harbour is dangerous in rough weather, but there is a considerable coasting trade in slate, oats, butter, coal, limestone, and timber. Pop. 3,633.

CARDIGAN BAY, an inlet of St. George's Channel, encompassed by the counties of Pembroke, Cardigan, Caernarvon, and Merioneth. Near its N. extremity is the island of Bardsey.

CARDIGANSHIRE, kar'-di-gan-sheer, a maritime county of Wales, bounded N. by the counties of Merioneth and Montgomery, E. by those of Radnor and Brecknock, S. by Caermarthenshire, and W. by Cardigan Bay. The surface of the county is mountainous, interspersed with plains and mosses. Plinlimmon, 2,463 feet high, is its greatest elevation. Cattle, sheep, and wool are the staple commodities of the country; and a large proportion of the latter is manufactured for home use. Rivers. The Tivey, Arth, Cledon, Wirrai, Ystwith, Rheidol, Towy. Minerals. Silver, lead, and slates. Pop. 70,226.

CARDONA, kar-do'-na, a town of Spain, province of Catalonia, 45 miles N.W. of Barcelona. There are a large and handsome church, several chapels, two convents, a town house, and other good public buildings. Manf. Linen, woollens, paper, wine, and oil. In the vicinity there is a mountain of rock salt, 500 feet high, yielding an inex-inexhaustible supply of the article of which it is composed. Pop. 2,400.

CARDUCCIO, or CARDUCHO, BARTOLOMEO, kar-dootch'-e-o, Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, who resided principally in Spain, and attained great distinction.

CARDUCCIO, VINCENZIO, Italian painter, brother of the above, who also rose to eminence in Spain.
Born 1568; died 1638.

CAREME, MARIE ANTOINE, ka-raim', a celebrated French cook, who, abandoned by his parents when quite a child, filled the commonest situations in the kitchen. By his study and labour, however, he raised the culinary art almost to a science, and made his name celebrated at all the courts of Europe. He wrote several works, where he has laid down the principles of his art. The chief of these is, "The Art of Cookery in the 19th Century."
Born at Paris, 1784; died 1833.

CARENTAN, ka'-ren-tan, a maritime town of France, department Manche, in a marshy situation, on the left bank of the Taute, 14 miles N.W. of St. Lo. It is fortified, and has a castle. The church is handsome. Manf. Lace and cotton goods. There is a trade in cattle, horses, hemp, flax, cider, butter, and honey. Pop. 2,600. Lat. 49° 18' N. Lon. 1° 14' W.

CAREW, THOMAS, an English poet, descended from an old Gloucestershire family, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber. and sewer (taster) in ordinary to Charles I. His masque entitled "Cœlum Britannicum" was performed before the king and nobility at Whitehall, 1633; and the beautiful airiness of his effusions makes him equal, if not superior, to Waller.
Born 1589; died 1639.

CAREW, BAMPFYLDE MOORE, "king of the gipsies," an Englishman of roving habits, and the son of a clergyman. He became acquainted with some gipsies located in the neighbourhood of his native town, and was so fascinated by the romantic carelessness of their mode of life, that he abandoned his friends and linked himself to the fortunes of this strange people. The exploits into which his adoption of their wandering habits led him, have been related with a kind of incredible wonder. He would impose upon the same company three or four times a day under different disguises, and with new tales of distress. Sometimes he was a distressed clergyman, ruined because he could not take the oaths; at others, a Quaker, who had met with severe losses in trade. Now a shipwrecked mariner; and the same day, a blacksmith whose house and family had perished by fire. He had a method of enticing away people's dogs, for which he was twice transported from Exeter to America, but made his escape. On one of these occasions he travelled from Virginia through the woods, and swam across the Delaware upon a horse, with only a handkerchief for a bridle. He was a man of strong memory and pleasing address, and could assume the manners of a gentleman with as much ease as those of any other character. The fraternity to which he belonged, elected him their king; and he remained faithful to them to the last.
Born at Bickley, Devonshire, 1693; died about 1770.

CAREY, HENRY, kair'-e, an English musician, who wrote several excellent songs, the best known of which is "Sally in our Alley." He was also the author of several farces, and is supposed by some to have written the words of the national anthem. He committed suicide, impelled to the act by poverty.
Born 1696; died 1774.

CAREY, WILLIAM, a distinguished English orientalist. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but began to preach when a very young man. In 1793 he went to India for the purpose of disseminating the principles of Christianity. His labours were originally mostly confined to Bengal, and, in 1801, he became professor of Sanscrit, in Calcutta. He acquired a great facility in many of the eastern dialects, and published of them several grammars and dictionaries, which have been the means of greatly extending the knowledge of the oriental languages.
Born at Paulersbury, Northamptonshire, 1761; died at Serampore, 1836.

CARGILL, DONALD, kar'-gil, a famous preacher among the Covenanters, who studied at Aberdeen, and became minister of the Barony Church, Glasgow. He took part in the battle of Bothwell Brig, where he was wounded, 1680. At a field-preaching near Falkirk he formally excommunicated Charles II., the duke of York, and others. A reward was offered for his apprehension, and he was captured and executed at Edinburgh for high treason.
Born in Perthshire, 1610; died 1681.

CARHAIX, kar'-haiks, a small ancient town of France, in the centre of the department Finisterre. The church is about 1,200 years old, and there are many antique houses. Manf. Linen, leather, and paper. Pop. 1,800.

CARIA, ka'-re-a, an ancient country in the south-west of Asia Minor. The boundaries have been variously defined, but, generally speaking, it was at the south of Ionia, at the east and north of the Icarian Sea, and at the west of Phrygia Major and Lycia. It has been called Phœnicia, because a Phœnician colony first settled there. It afterwards received the name of Caria, from Car, one of its kings, who first invented the auguries of birds. Its chief town was Halicarnassus.

CARIACO, or SAN FELIPE DE AUSTRIA, ka'-re-a'-ko, a seaport of Venezuela, at the head of the Gulf of Cariaco, near the mouth of the river of the same name. The situation is very unhealthy. Cotton, coffee, and sugar are cultivated. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 10° 30' N. Lon. 63° 40' W.

CARIACO, GULF OF, on the coast of the province of Cumana, extends 38 miles from W. to E., and is nearly 10 miles broad.

CARIACO, one of the Grenadine group of the Windward Islands, between St. Vincent and Grenada. It is irregular in form, and has bays on the north side, and about 21 miles in circumference. Hillsborough is the principal place. Lat. 12° 30' N. Lon. 62° 30' W.

CARIATI, ka-re-a'-te, a seaport of Italy, on a promontory in the Gulf of Taranto. It is surrounded by ruinous walls, and there are an old castle, a cathedral, and several churches. Silkworms are extensively reared, and there are productive fisheries. Pop. 2,200. Lat. 39° 30' N. Lon. 17° E.

CARIBBEAN SEA, ka'-rib-be'-an, a part of the Atlantic, bounded N. by Jamaica, St. Domingo, Porto-Rico, and the Virgin Islands, S. and W. by the continent, and E. by the Caribbean Islands. It communicates with the Gulf of Mexico by a passage 120 miles in width between Yucatan and the western extremity of Cuba.

CARIGNANO, ka'-reen-ya'-no, a very old town of Piedmont, on the left bank of the Po, 11 miles south of Turin. There are old walls and a castle. A handsome square, with arcades, and a fine church, are the principal architectural features. Manf. Silk and sugar. Pop. 8,000.

CARIMATA ISLANDS, ka'-re-ma'-ta, a group in the China Sea, between Borneo and Billiton. The largest is named Carimata, and has a circumference of 15 miles. They have no settled population. Lat. of their highest peak, 1° 36′ S. Lon. 108° 54′ E.—The passage between Billiton and Borneo is 120 miles wide.

CARIMON JAVA, ka'-ri-mon, a cluster of 10 or 12 small islands in the Indian Sea. Lat. 5° 50′ S. Lon. 110° 34′ E.

CARIMONS, two islands in the Strait of Malacca, 30 miles from Singapore. Lat. 1° 5′ N. Lon. 103° 30′ E.

CARINI, ka-re'-ne, a town of Italy, 12 miles N.W. of Palermo. Pop. 7,000.

CARINOLA, ka-re-no'-la, a town of Italy, in the neighbourhood of which excellent wine is produced. There is a handsome cathedral. Pop. about 5,000.

CARINTHIA, ka-rin'-the-a, a province of the Austrian empire, bounded N. and E. by Salzburg and Styria, S. by Carniola and Friuli, and W. by Italy and Tyrol. It is covered with mountains over its whole surface. The soil is by no means fertile, except in the valley of Lavant and other favoured spots, which abound in the fruits of the south. Rivers. The principal is the Drave. Lakes. The Klagenfurth, Millstät, and Ossiach. Pro. Wheat, oats, millet, buckwheat, rye, and barley. Although the valleys of the Alps furnish excellent pasture, the breeding of cattle is very little understood. Minerals. The chief wealth of Carinthia lies in its metallic mines, its beautiful white marble, and, in certain situations, its precious stones. Area, 37,000 square miles. Pop. 348,730.

CARIPE, ka'-re-pai, a town of Venezuela, S. America, 40 S.E. of Cumana. Pop. 5,000.

CARISBROOK, kar'-is-brook, a village of the Isle of Wight, a mile S.W. of Newport, formerly of large extent, and still remarkable for its castle, which is of great antiquity. It is supposed there was a fortress on this spot before the time of the Roman invasion. In the castle Charles I. was imprisoned for 13 months. The church is a fine ancient structure, and contains the tomb, recently restored, of the princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I. A Dominican priory for 18 nuns was erected in 1867.

CARISSIMI, GIOVANNI GIACOMO, ka'-rees'-se-me, an eminent Italian musical composer, who, at the beginning of the 17th century, effected a great reformation in the modern music of Italy. In 1649 he was appointed master of the pontifical chapel, and introduced into the church instrumental accompaniments. He composed masses, oratorios, motets, and cantatas, of which the most remarkable are "Jephtha's Sacrifice" and "Solomon's Judgment."

Born at Venice, 1582; died about 1672.

CARLÉN, EMILIE, kar-len', a Swedish novelist, whose works have procured for her both an English and an American reputation. She is the authoress of a great many novels, most of them, if not all, illustrative of Swedish scenery and character. Her maiden name was Schmidt, and she has been twice married.

Born at Stockholm, 1810.

CARLENTINI, kar-len-te'-ne, a town of Sicily, 20 miles N.W. of Syracuse.—This place was founded by Charles V. to be the head-quarters of his army of Sicily, but it was never completed, and an earthquake, in 1693, may have had some effect in preventing its ever rising into importance. Pop. 4,200.

CALET, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, on the right bank of the Magio. It is well-built, with wide streets. Manf. Soap, brandy, oil, and wine. Pop. 3,800.

CARLETON, WILLIAM, karl'-ton, an Irish romance-writer of considerable genius and power. The first work which fixed the attention of the public upon him was his "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," which was published in 1832, and received by the general public with great favour. This was followed by several other works, which fully sustained the reputation he had already achieved, as one of the happiest delineators of Irish character. In 1840 appeared his "Fawn of Spring Vale;" in 1845, "Valentine Macclutchy;" and in 1847, the "Black Prophet," in which some of the appalling features connected with the famine of 1846 are graphically depicted. These were followed by the "Tithe-Proctor," "The Clarionet," and "Willy Reilly," which came out in 1855. For his services to the national literature, Mr. Carleton enjoyed a pension from government, and on his death a pension was granted to his widow.

Born at Prillisk, in Tyrone, 1798; died 1869.

CARLI, GIOVANNI RINALDO, kar'-le, Italian economist and archæologist, who, in 1743, was appointed professor of astronomy and navigation in Padua. He subsequently was made president of the new council of commerce at Milan. In 1769 he became the privy councillor of Joseph II., and induced that sovereign to abolish the tribunal of the Inquisition, which had existed in Milan for centuries. He wrote many works on archæology and other subjects; among which we may mention his "History of the Coins and Currency," and on "The Institution of the Mint of Italy." He also wrote in opposition to the philosophy of Rousseau.

Born at Capo d'Istria, 1720; died 1795.

Born at Turin, 1713; died 1783.

CARLINGFORD, kar'-ling-ford, a seaport town of Ireland, county of Louth, on the south-west side of a bay to which it gives its name. The bay is about 10 miles long and 2 broad, and is connected with Lough Neagh by the Newry Canal. On Blockhouse Island, at the entrance of the bay is a lighthouse 101 feet high. Oyster-dredging gives employment to many of the inhabitants of the town. Pop. 800. Lat. 54° 1′ N. Lon. 6° 4′ W.

CARLISLE, SIR ANTHONY, kar'-lile, an eminent surgeon, who, after finishing his studies in York, where, for some time, he had received instructions from Mr. Green, the founder of the hospital in that city, went to London, and, in 1793, was appointed surgeon to Westminster Hospital. He then rose rapidly in his profession, and became surgeon extraordinary to George IV. when Prince Regent, who knighted him on the first levée he held after his accession to the throne. In 1808 he became professor of anatomy in the Royal Academy, an appointment which he held for sixteen years. His contributions to medical literature were varied and extensive. He was the first to point out the fact that water might be decomposed by the galvanic battery.

Born near Durham, 1768; died in London, 1840.

CARLISLE, a city and parliamentary borough, the chief town of Cumberland, near the confluence of the rivers Eden, Caldew, and Peteril, 8 miles from the Scottish border. In former times it was a military post of great strength, having a citadel and a castle, the latter situate so as to command the passage of the river Eden. It is still kept in repair, and used for barracks. Mary, queen of Scotland, was imprisoned in it in 1568. The place of her promenade preserves remembrance of her, under the appellation of the Lady's Walk. The castle is said to have been first built in the 7th century, by Egfrid, king of Northumberland, and the walls are ascribed to William Rufus. The principal streets diverge from the market-place as a centre, and the city contains some good houses, with a town-hall, guildhall, assize courts, council-chamber, infirmary, news-room, theatre, assembly-rooms, libraries, and philosophical and mechanics' institutions. The cathedral, which has been recently elaborately restored, is a venerable structure, partly of Saxon and partly of Gothic architecture; the east window is one of the finest in England. There are eight other churches, besides chapels for various denominations. The citadel railway station, near the castle, in the north-western part of the city, is one of the finest in the kingdom. There is a very large and handsome bridge over the Eden, nearly a quarter of a mile in length, and the Caldew is crossed by two bridges and the Peteril by one. Manf. Cotton, woollens, linen, leather, hats, hardware, whips, fish-hooks, biscuits, and various other commodities. There are several foundries, dyeworks, and breweries. Carlisle is connected by rail with Port Carlisle, on the Solway Frith, 11 miles distant. Pop. 35,866. A station on the London and North-Western, North-Eastern, Glasgow and South-Western, North British, Maryport and Carlisle, and Caledonian Railways. Carlisle suffered severely in the civil wars, for its having espoused the cause of Charles I. In 1745 it surrendered to Prince Charles Stuart, but was retaken by William, duke of Cumberland.

CARLISLE, a town in Pennsylvania, United States, 18 miles W. of Harrisburg. There is a college, with a good library. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 6,700.

CARLO, kar'-lo, a small island in the Gulf of Bothnia, 18 miles W. of Utenborg, in Finland. Lat. W. point beacon, 65° 2′ N. Lon. 24° 33′ E. There is a college, with a good library. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 6,700.

CARLOFORTE, kar-lo-for'-te, an Italian town, on the island of San Pietro, near the south-western coast of the island of Sardinia. The fort is defended by a castle, and the town is fortified. There are large salt-works in the vicinity, and the fisheries give employment to many of the inhabitants. Pop. 2,500.

CARLOMAN, kar'-lo-man, the eldest son of Charles Martel, whom he succeeded as king of Austrasia in 741. He and his brother Pepin united in defending their dominions against the encroachments of their neighbours, and defeated the Germans in 743. Carloman then entered Saxony, took its duke prisoner, and, after several successful expeditions, became a monk of the order of St. Benedict. He assembled a famous council in 742, the acts of which bear his name. Lived in the 8th century.

CARLOS, DON, kar'-los, son of Philip II., king of Spain, was deformed in his person, and so perverse in his temper, that he endeavoured to kill his tutor for gently reproving him. A match was negotiated between him and the Princess Elizabeth, of France, but Philip, becoming a widower, married her himself. He was then desirous of marrying his cousin, Anne of Austria; but being crossed by his father, he endeavoured to excite discontent among the nobles. For this he was arrested, and condemned to death. Shortly afterwards he was found dead in prison, not without suspicions of violence, for which, however, there appears to be no foundation. Schiller, Alfieri, Otway, and Earl Russell have chosen Carlos for the subject of tragedies.

Born at Valladolid, 1545; died 1568.

CARLOS, DON MARIA ISIDORE, was the second son of Philip IV. of Spain. He was educated by Catholic priests, and was little heard of until the accession of his brother, Ferdinand VII., when he was sent to meet Bonaparte, who had announced his intention of paying a visit to the Spanish sovereign in his own dominions. Don Carlos, however, was made a prisoner, and his brother Ferdinand was soon compelled to abdicate all claims to the Spanish kingdom, in favour of his ally, the emperor of the French. Both the brothers were kept prisoners till 1813, when they were restored to liberty, and Ferdinand once more ascended the Spanish throne. Don Carlos now plotted, in conjunction with the absolutist party, against his brother, and in 1825 shared in an insurrectionary movement in Catalonia. In 1830 a daughter, Isabella, was born to Ferdinand, and she was declared the heir to the throne of Spain, which set aside the Salic law in her favour. In 1833, however, this law was restored by Ferdinand, when so ill as to be in expectation of death, and from an apprehension of the evils which would arise to his people from the exclusion of Don Carlos from the throne. He, however, recovered, when the evidences that were to secure the succession of Don Carlos were destroyed, and Isabella, on the death of her father, ascended the throne. A civil war now commenced between the Carlists and the adherents of Isabella. For five years the country was desolated by the most savage cruelties that ever marked the progress of a civil conflict. It terminated in favour of Isabella, when, in 1839, Don Carlos took refuge in France. In 1845 he formally relinquished his claim to the crown, and in 1847 went to live at Trieste, where he spent the remainder of his days.

Born 1788; died 1855.

CARLOS, SAN, a handsome city of Venezuela, province of Carobobo, on the Aguine, 30 miles from Caraccas. There are in the vicinity large plantations of indigo, coffee, and cotton, and large numbers of cattle, horses, and mules are reared. Pop. 5,000.—The name of various other inconsiderable settlements in South America.

CARLOTA, LA, kar-lo'-ta, a town of Spain, 18 miles S.W. of Cordova. An old palace is now divided into a town-house and a theatre. Manf. Soap, oil, and wine. Pop. 3,300.

CARLOW, kar'-lo, a county of Ireland, province of Leinster, bounded N. and N.W. by Kildare and Queen's county, E. by the counties of Wicklow and Wexford, and S.W. by Kilkenny. The surface of the county is generally undulating, but there is a mountainous ridge in the south, attaining an elevation of 2,600 feet. The other part of the county is fertile, and dairy farming is extensively carried on. The principal rivers are the Barrow and the Slany. Manf. Unimportant; but there is a trade in butter, corn, flour, bacon, and malt. Granite is found throughout the county. Pop. 46,508.

CARLOW, a Parliamentary borough, the capital of the above county, situate on the Barrow, 34 miles S.W. of Dublin. It consists of a main street, intersected by two others at right angles. A bridge of four arches connects the town with the suburban village of Goraigue, in Queen's county. Its public buildings are a market-house, court-house, gaol, barracks, a college for divinity students, a lunatic asylum, a venerable church with a modern spire, and a new Roman Catholic cathedral. On an eminence commanding the river stand the remains of a strong castle, supposed to have been erected by King John, which is now in ruins. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths. A large trade is done in butter, corn, and flour. Pop. 6,589 A station on the Great Southern and Western Ireland Railway.

CARLOWITZ, or KARLOWITZ, kar'-lo-itz, a town of the Austrian empire, on the right bank of the Danube, 7 miles S.E. of Peterwardein. There are a Greek cathedral and two churches, a Roman Catholic church, various educational establishments, and an archiepiscopal palace. Pop. 4,400.—Here, in 1699, a treaty was concluded between Turkey and Austria; and here Prince Eugene defeated the Turks in 1716. It is a station for steam-vessels navigating the Danube.

CARLSBAD, or KARLSBAD, karls'-bad, 'Charles's bath,' a town of Bohemia, on the small river Tepl, near its junction with the Eger, 70 miles N.W. of Prague. The high church, the granite bridge of one arch crossing the Tepl, and the monument of Charles IV. in the market-place, are the most conspicuous features of the place. It is one of the most celebrated watering-places in Germany, and its springs the hottest in Europe, are visited by about 4,000 persons annually. Pop. 3,000, permanent.

CARLSBURG, or KARLSBURG, karls'-boorg, a fortified town of Austria, in Transylvania, on the Maros, 33 miles N.W. of Hermanstadt. It consists of an upper and lower town, and is defended by a walled citadel, built by Charles IV. The cathedral contains several ancient monuments. There are Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches, and synagogues, an episcopal palace, colleges, mint, observatory, arsenal, and barracks. Maros Porto, the chief shipping-place for Transylvanian rock-salt, is half a mile distant. Pop. 6,100.—This place occupies the site of the ancient Apulum.

CARLSCRONA, or KARLSCRONA, kals-kro'-na, a strongly fortified seaport of Sweden, the capital of a county of the same name, on the Baltic, and the principal depôt of the Swedish navy. It is built on five small islands, connected by bridges with each other and the mainland, 55 miles from Christianstadt. It has a commodious harbour, defended by forts. The town is well-built. Manf. Tobacco, sugar, and whatever is necessary for fitting out a navy. Pop. 19,189. Lat. 56° 9′ N. Lon. 15° 35′ E.

CARLSCRONA, or KARLSCRONA (also named Blekinge), a lan or county, of which the above is the capital, is bounded on the N. by Wexio, N.E. by Kelmar, W. by Christianstadt, and S. and E. by the Baltic. Area, 1,193 square miles. Pop. 128,000. Lat. between 56° and 56° 30′ N. Lon. between 14° 30′ and 16° E.

CARLSHAMN, karls'-ham, 'Charles's harbour,' a fortified seaport-town of Sweden, on the Baltic, 27 miles W. of Carlscrona. Manf. Sailcloth, hats, leather, soap, and tobacco. It has both shipbuilding docks and dye-works, with an active trade in timber, pitch, tar, and potash. Pop. 4,400. Lat. 56° 10′ N. Lon. 14° 52′ E.

CARLSRUHE, or KARLSRUHE, karls'-roo, 'Charles's rest,' the capital of the grand duchy of Baden, standing in a fine plain, 4 miles E. of the Rhine, and 40 miles from Stuttgart. It is built almost entirely of stone, and the streets diverge like the spokes of a wheel from the ducal palace, or schloss, in the centre of the town, which is partly walled and has seven gates. Among the other public edifices are the Lutheran, Calvinist, and Catholic churches, the Jewish synagogue, the chancery, the town-house, the mint, the barracks, arsenal, a polytechnic school, in the style of the middle ages, and several hospitals, one of them endowed by the London tailor, Stultz, who on account of his humanity was created a baron. Besides these, there are a number of literary institutions, a lyceum, medical and veterinary schools, and academies of painting, music, and architecture. Manf. Carpets, cabinet-work, carriages, chemicals, and jewellery. Pop. 56,686. Lat. 49° 0′ 50″ N. Lon. 8° 24′ 44″ E.—Carlsruhe is a modern city, having been founded in 1715 by Charles William, margrave of Baden, in a hunting locality. In the market-place is a stone pyramid enclosing his remains. Its connection with the Rhine, and an extensive railway system, give it great facilities for trade. Pop. of duchy, 406,973.

CARLSTAD, karl'-stat, a town of Sweden, on the island of Tingwalla, near the N. shore of Lake Wenem, 160 miles W. of Stockholm. The town, which is connected with the mainland by two bridges, is well built, and has a cathedral. It exports copper, iron, salt, timber, and corn. Pop. 4,500.

CARLSTAD, a lan, or county of Sweden, of which the above is the capital. It is hilly, interspersed with numerous lakes, and abounding in streams and rivers. It is rich in iron-mines. Pop. 264,000. Lat. between 59° and 61° N. Lon. between 12° and 14° 30′ E.

CARLSTADT, karl'-stat, the capital of Austrian Croatia, seated between the Korona and Kulpa, 34 miles S.W. of Agram. It is fortified, and garrisoned, being considered a position of great military importance. There is a good transit trade. Pop. 3,240.

CARLTON, a township of the United States, on Lake Ontario, 220 miles from Albany. Pop. 3,000.

CARLUKE, kar'-look, a town of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 6 miles N.W. of Lanark. Pop. 3,400, chiefly engaged in cotton, coal, iron, and lime-works.

CARLYLE, THOMAS, kar-lil', a writer of great power and originality, who, after passing through the university of Edinburgh, with a view to entering the Scottish church, abandoned that intention, and prepared to devote himself to a literary life. In 1823 he acted as tutor to Charles Buller, who became distinguished in the political history of his country; and, whilst acting in that capacity, he occupied his leisure in translating from the German, and translating and writing mathematical works. The works which he produced between his 26th and 32nd years were "A Life of Schiller," the "Wilhelm Meister" of Goethe, and "Specimens of German Romance," all of which were received with approbation by those who were best qualified to judge of the difficulties with which he had to contend, in imbuing his translations with the true spirit of the originals which he had chosen to render into an English dress. He had now made himself well known in the world of letters, and became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," in which he wrote many masterly critical articles. Among these may be noticed his "Essays on Burns" and on "German Literature." In 1827 he married Miss Welch, a lineal descendant of John Knox. In 1833-4 appeared his "Sartor Resartus" (perhaps the most characteristic of all his works), in "Fraser's Magazine." From that time he commanded a large circle of admirers, and afterwards produced many works of sterling merit. In 1837 he delivered a course of lectures on "German Literature," in Willis's Rooms, in London, which he followed up by lecturing on other subjects, down to 1840, when he lectured on "Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History." His splendid "French Revolution, a History," was the first work to which he appended his name, and raised him to the highest pinnacle of literary reputation. Previously to the publication of that work he had removed to Chelsea, near London, where he continued to reside. In 1845 appeared "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," which were warmly received. In 1850 he published the "Latter-Day Pamphlets," which were more remarkable for the singularity of their style than the soundness of their doctrines. In 1851 appeared his "Life of John Sterling," and in 1859, his "Life and Times of Frederick the Great."

Born at Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 1795. Died 1881.

CARMAGNOLA, kar-man-yo'-la, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Po, 16 miles S. of Turin. Manf. Jewellery. An active trade is carried on in corn, cattle, flax, and silk. Pop. 12,433.

CARMEL, MOUNT, kar'-mel, a celebrated mountain ridge of Palestine, on the N. side of the Bay of Acre. On its summit are oaks and pines, and, lower down, laurels and olives. It is celebrated as being the place where Elijah destroyed the priests of Baal. Near its top is a monastery, occupied by some of the monks called Carmelites. Height, 1,500 feet. Lat. 32° 51′ 10″ N. Lon. 34° 57′ 42″ E.

CARMEN, kar'-men, an island in the Gulf of California, opposite Loreto, containing a large salt lake. Lat. 26° 10′ N. Lon. 111° 2′ N.

CARMEN, EL, or PATAGONES, kar'-main, a town of the Argentine Confederation, province of Buenos Ayres, on the Rio Negro, 16 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic. It has an export trade in skins, oil, beef, and salt. Pop. 1,100. Lat. 41° 4′ S. Lon. 62° 50′ W.

CARMOE, or KARMOE, kar'-moo, an island of Norway, at the entrance of the Bukke Fiord, 20 miles N.W. of Stavanger, in the North Sea. Ext. 21 miles long, with an average breadth of 5. Pop. 6,400, chiefly engaged in fishing and cattle rearing. Lat. 59° 20′ N. Lon. 5° 15′ E.

CARMONA, kar-mo'-na, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 20 miles N.E. of Seville. It is picturesquely situated on an elevated ridge, has old Moorish walls and castle, a fine Gothic cathedral, and a gate rich in architectural details. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, hats, flour, and oil. There is a large annual cattle fair. Pop. 18,000.

CARNAC, kar'-nac, a small French village, in the department of Morbihan, 17 miles S.E. of Lorient. The locality is famous for the Celtic or Druidical remains of a temple and avenues, consisting of more than 10,000 broken obelisks of granite, forming ten avenues. Some of these stones are 18 feet high.

CARNATIC, kar-nat'-ik, formerly a division of India, extending along its E. coast from Cape Comorin to the river Gondegam. (See INDIA.)

CARNEADES, kar-ne'-a-des, of Cyrene, in Africa, the founder of the third academy at Athens. His eloquence was dreaded by his adversaries. He argued fluently, but had no moral convictions, and contended that there was no criterion of truth, no such virtue as justice. It is recorded of him, that when the Athenians sent him, with other ambassadors, to Rome, to get a fine, which had been imposed upon them, mitigated, Cato the elder pressed the senate to dismiss them, lest the oratory of Carneades, in whose sincerity he had no faith, should corrupt the Roman youth.

Died 213 B.C.; died 129 B.C.

CARNICOBAR, kar-nik-o-bar', the most northern of the Nicobar Islands, in the Bay of Bengal, with a circumference of 40 miles. It is fertile and well wooded, but unhealthy. Lat. 9° 10′ N. Lon. 92° 54′ E.

CARNIOLA, or KRAIN, kar'-ne-o'-la, a province of Austria, bounded N. by Carinthia, N.E. by Styria, E. and S.E. by Croatia, S. by Dalmatia and the Adriatic, and W. by Istria, Friuli, and the county of Goritz. It is about 120 miles in length, and 100 in breadth. It is fertile in some portions of the south, and produces oil and excellent wine; but the north and north-west parts, where the province is separated from Carinthia by lofty mountains, are cold, bleak, and barren. A portion of the Julian Alps is in the south. The scenery is interesting, and a great natural curiosity is the rock bridge of Saint Kanzian, 130 feet high, 160 feet broad, with a perfect arch. On the whole, Carniola is one of the least productive regions of the empire.

Area. 3,811 square miles.

Rivers.—The principal are the Save, the Laybach, the Gurk, and the Kulpa.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, fruits of various kinds, and flax. Bees are numerous, therefore honey is plentiful; and silkworms are reared.

Minerals.—This province contains a number of iron-mines, the most ancient and noted of which is the one in the mountain of Eisenberg. Quicksilver is found near Ostraga; and the famous mines of that metal at Idria may likewise be considered as belonging to this province. Coal and marble are also abundant.

Manf.—Woollens, linens, coarse lace, stockings, leather, wooden articles, and iron.

Exp.—Steel wares, quicksilver, linens, hats, wax, glass, wine, and flour.

Lat. Between 45° 10′ and 46° 20′ N. Lon. Between 13° 50′ and 16° 25′ E.

History.—Carniola in the 13th century became a duchy under the Counts of Tyrol. In 1809, by the Treaty of Vienna, it was ceded to France, and incorporated with the kingdom of Illyria. In 1814 it passed into the possession of Austria. (See ILLYRIA.)

CARNOT, LAZARE NICOLAS MARGUERITE, kar'-no, a French engineer, who entered the army in 1771, was a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and, as a member of the Committee of Public Safety, had the chief direction of military affairs. The most successful period of the republic, in a military sense, was during the time that he had the organization of its military affairs. It was accordingly said of him that he had "organized victory." In 1797 he was forced into exile, from being suspected of having become favourable to royalty; but, on Napoleon becoming first consul, he was recalled. He was then appointed minister of war, but was deprived of that office, with all his other posts, for voting against the consulate for life. After the Russian campaign, he again offered his services to Napoleon, and received the command of Antwerp, which he kept till the abdication of 1814. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he was appointed minister of the interior, but, on the fall of the emperor, he retired, first to Warsaw, and then to Magdeburg, where he passed the remainder of his days.—As a writer, Carnot is favourably known by his "Essai sur les Machines en Général;" his "Geometry of Position," and several other scientific treatises.

Born at Nolay, Côte d'Or, 1753; died at Magdeburg, 1823.

CARO, ANNIBALE, ka'-ro, Italian poet. He was secretary to Duke Pietro Farnese, of Parma, who employed him on several missions to Charles V. After the murder of the duke, he went to Parma, where he remained, under the protection of the Farnese family, until his death. He translated the Æneid, and Aristotle's "Rhetoric," and wrote poems remarkable for their elegant versification.

Born 1507; died 1566.

CAROLINA, LA, kar-o-le'-na, a town of Spain, province of Jaen, 36 miles N.E. of the town of Jaen.—This is one of the principal places established in 1776, in the Sierra Morena, for German colonists. Manf. Linen, woollens, oil, and wine. Pop. 1,810.

CAROLINA, NORTH, kar-o-li'-na, one of the United States, bounded N. by Virginia, E. by the Atlantic, S. by South Carolina, and W. by Tennessee. It is 450 miles long, and 180 broad. Along the whole coast is a ridge of sand, separated from the mainland, in some places by narrow sounds, in others by broad bays. The coast is indented by numerous inlets, the principal of which are Pamlico and Albemarle sounds. Between these is the Great Alligator Swamp; and N. of it, extending into the state of Virginia, is the Dismal Swamp. At a distance of 60 or 80 miles inland from the shore, the country swells into hills, and, in the most western part, rises into mountains, branches of the Alleghanies, attaining an elevation of nearly 6,500 feet.

Rivers.—The Chowan, Roanoke, Neuse, Cape Fear, Catawba, Pamlico, and Yadkin. These are generally navigable for small vessels from 60 to 100 miles, and still farther for boats. Westward of the Alleghany mountains, the Tennessee flows through part of this state in its progress to the Ohio, and there are various smaller streams which it receives in its course.

Climate.—Unhealthy, especially on the low grounds, and in the neighbourhood of the swamps.

Pro.—Cotton and rice in the low lands; and on the higher grounds wheat, rye, oats, barley, maize, flax, tobacco, and various fruits are cultivated. The valuable pitch pine grows abundantly in the lower parts of the state.

Minerals.—Gold, copper, iron, and coal.

Lat. Between 33° 53′ and 36° 53′ N. Lon. Between 75° 25′ and 84° 30′ W.

Area. 50,704 square miles.

Pop. 1,399,750

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The state is divided into 90 counties. RALEIGH is the capital; WILMINGTON, and CAPE FEAR.

History.—Carolina was the last part of America which was planted by the English after Sir Walter Raleigh's unfortunate attempts to colonise it, in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. This country seems to have been entirely overlooked till after the restoration of King Charles II. The ministry were then informed that it would produce wine, oil, silk, and almost every article of trade which Britain wanted; when they obtained a patent from the king, in 1663, which was granted to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, the Duke of Albemarle, Lord Craven, Lord Berkeley, Lord Ashley Cooper, Sir George Carteret, Sir William Colleton, and others. North Carolina was the first of the American states to demand a separation from Great Britain, in 1775.

CAROLINA, SOUTH, one of the United States, bounded N. and N.E. by North Carolina, S.E. by the Atlantic, and S.W. by Georgia, from which it is separated by Savannah river. It is 200 miles long, and 125 broad. The coast is bordered with a chain of islands. A belt of swampy land runs from 80 to 100 miles inland from the coast, and is covered with extensive forests of pitch-pine, called pine barrens, interspersed with swamps and marshes of a rich soil. This part is succeeded by a region of little sand-hills, resembling the waves of the ocean in a high sea. It is sometimes called the Middle country, and continues for 50 or 60 miles, where it is bounded by a ridge of high ground, which, in its turn, is succeeded by a fine healthy, undulating country, terminating at the western extremity of the state, in the Alleghanies, which in Table Mountain attains an elevation of 4,000 feet.

Rivers.—The principal are the Pedee, Santee, Cooper, Ashley, Edisto, and Savannah.

Climate.—The climate of the Upper country is healthy at all seasons of the year. In the Low country the summer months are sickly, particularly August and September; and at this season the climate frequently proves fatal to strangers.

Pro.—Rice, maize, wheat, and other cerealia, tobacco, indigo, sugar, silk, cotton, and other crops. A great quantity of rice is annually raised, and the islands which line the coast, produce the famous sea-island cotton. Great numbers of live stock are also reared.

Minerals.—Gold, lead, iron, granite, marble, and building stone.

Area. 34,000 square miles.

Pop. 995,577.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 32 counties. The chief towns are CHARLESTON, COLUMBIA (the state capital), and GEORGETOWN.

Lat. Between 32° and 35° 10′ N. Lon. Between 78° 35′ and 83° 30′ W.

History.—Previous to 1693 the Carolinas formed one province.

CAROLINE, kar'-o-line, a county of Maryland, United States. Area, 310 square miles. Pop. 13,766.

CAROLINE, AMELIA ELIZABETH, Queen, wife of George IV. of Great Britain. She was the second daughter of Duke Charles of Brunswick Wolfenbüttell, and of the Princess Augusta of Britain. She was brought up in great restraint, and acquired awkward and coarse habits, which made her repulsive to the Prince Regent, to whom she was married (the bridegroom and bride never having seen each other previously) in 1795. They separated immediately after the birth of the Princess Charlotte, and the queen lived for some years in retirement at Blackheath. She was suspected by her husband (whose own vicious habits were matters of notoriety) of improper conduct, but an investigation failed to substantiate any criminality. In 1814 she visited the continent, and resided for some time near the Lake of Como. On the accession of George IV. she was offered £50,000 a year to renounce the title of queen and live abroad. She refused the offer, and claimed her position as queen. Proceedings for a divorce on the ground of adultery, chiefly with an Italian named Bergamo, were then instituted by the king, and the trial in the House of Lords is a memorable event in English history. Popular feeling was excited in her favour to an extraordinary degree, prompted as much perhaps by dislike to her profligate husband as by any admiration of her special virtues. The powerful advocacy of Denman, the splendid oratory of Brougham, and the intense feeling excited throughout the country, compelled the king and the ministry to abandon the proceedings. Caroline demanded to be crowned with her husband, and went in state to Westminster Abbey, but was refused admittance. Broken in health and spirit, she went back to her residence, Brandenburg House, Hammersmith, where she died in less than three weeks afterwards. Her body was conveyed to Germany for interment, and the removal caused a riot, in which lives were lost. The ministry were afraid to let the hearse pass through the city, where the queen had experienced such active sympathy; and the people were determined that it should pass through. Trenches were dug across the proposed route, and the popular wish was gratified, though not without some sharp encounters with the soldiers, who fired on the people, killing two men.

Born 1768; died 1821.

CAROLINE ISLANDS, or NEW PHILIPPINES, a chain of islands in the Pacific Ocean, extending over a space estimated at 2,000 miles. They include about 50 groups, the most important being the Pelew Islands, the Yap, the Maletots, the Ulie, the Harveis, the Hogolen, the Piscodores, and Marshalls. Many of the various groups are mere coral reefs, but little elevated above the surface of the ocean. Those, however, which are capable of bearing vegetation produce palms, bananas, and breadfruit-trees. Lat. between 3° and 12° N. Lon. between 132° and 172° E.—The inhabitants of these islands comprise various races, and live mostly by fishing. A great portion of them are Malays, and make excellent seamen. The islands were discovered in 1543, by Lopez de Villalobos, a Spaniard; and although they nominally belong to Spain, the Spaniards have no settlement upon them.

CAROLINE, MATILDA, Queen of Denmark, daughter of Frederick, Prince of Wales, son of George II. of Great Britain. In 1766, she married Christian VII. of Denmark. He being jealous of her, imprisoned her, and executed two of her friends, Counts Struensee and Brandt. The queen was liberated through the intercession of her brother, George III.

Born 1751; died in Hanover, 1775.

CAROLINE ISLAND, one of the Marquesas group, lying to the north of Erineo, in the South Pacific Ocean. It is 5 miles in circumference, and is covered with verdure, but has a very little elevation above the surface of the sea. Lat. 9° 57′ S. Lon. 150° 25′ W.

CARONY, ka'-ro-ne, a river of Venezuela, South America, rising in the Sierra Pacaraima, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Orinoco at about 150 miles from its mouth. It has for its affluents the Paragua and the Acamon, but its cataracts render it unfit for the purposes of navigation.

CARORA, kar-or'-a, a town of Venezuela, on the Tocuyo. There are a handsome parish church, and a Franciscan convent. The district is famous for aromatic balsams, resins, and gums. The inhabitants rear oxen, mules, horses, sheep, goats, &c., and contrive, by their industry, to live in great comfort, although the surrounding country is parched and barren. Manf. Leather, shoes, cloth, ropes, and hammocks, made of the Agave fibre. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 10° 13′ N. Lon. 70° 26′ W.

CAROTTO, GIAN FRANCISCO, ka-rot'-to, Italian painter, celebrated for the softness and warmth of his colouring. There are many of his works in the churches of Verona.

Born in Verona, 1470; died 1546.

CAROUGE, kar-oozh', a town of Switzerland, on the Arve, 2 miles S. of Geneva. Manf. Leather, cotton, and fine pottery. Pop. 4,500.

CARPACCIO, VITTORE, kar-patch'-e-o, a famous Italian painter of the old Venetian school.

Born 1450; died 1522.

CARPATHIAN MOUNTAINS, kar-pai'-the-an, an extensive chain, which reaches from the Black Sea to the borders of Saxony, having a semi-circular form, and covering a space of 800 miles long and 250 broad. They may be divided into two great sections, the E. and the W.; the former extending from the mouth of the Nera to the source of the Theiss, and marking the boundary-line between the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, and Austria. The latter may be viewed as bounding Galicia and Hungary, having its commencement at the sources of the Theiss, and its termination on the Danube, near to Presburg. These are divided into various groups, with different names, presenting numerous peaks and summits, of higher or lower degrees of latitude. The loftiest points of the E. Carpathians are Ruska-Poyana and Garluvipi, which, respectively, attain an elevation of 9,909 and 9,587 feet above the level of the sea. In the W. Carpathians, the highest is the Tatra range and in the mountains of the Lomintz, in which the Eisthalerspitze culminates at 8,521 feet. Minerals. Abundant; comprising gold, copper, quicksilver, iron, mercury, silver; salt is found in beds, with a thickness of 600 or 700 feet, and is apparently inexhaustible. Pro. Corn and fruit grow to the height of 1,500 feet, and forests of pine ascend to 5,500. At 6,000 feet the limit of vegetation is attained, where a few lichens may be seen clinging to the bare and rugged rocks, but nothing more to clothe their naked conical forms, which apparently bid defiance alike to time and the elements.

CARPENDOLO, kar-pen-do'-lo, a town of Italy, province of Brescia, near the left bank of the Chiese. There are four churches and two hospitals. Manf. Silk. Pop. 5,000.

CARPENTARIA, GULF OF, kar'-pen-tair'-e-a, on the north coast of Australia. It was discovered in 1606. (See AUSTRALIA.)

CARPENTER, WILLIAM BENJAMIN, M.D., kar'-pen-ter, one of the most eminent physiologists of modern times, son of Dr. Lant Carpenter, a Unitarian minister, passed his examination at the Royal College of Surgeons and Apothecaries' Society in 1835, and subsequently pursued his studies in the university of Edinburgh. Whilst here he made himself popular by the publication of several scientific treatises, and, in 1839, published his "Principles of General and Comparative Physiology, &c.," which at once drew upon him the attention of the most distinguished physiologists of the day. He now went to reside in Bristol, where he became lecturer on medical jurisprudence, and produced several other works in connection with his profession. Indeed, his contributions to physiological science have been of the most important kind, and, have been very extensive. A bare enumeration of their titles would occupy a considerable space, and his works would form, in themselves, a large encyclopædia. He became lecturer on medical jurisprudence in University College, London, as well as an examiner in physiology and comparative anatomy. He was, also, lecturer on general anatomy and physiology at the London Hospital School of Medicine, and in 1844 was admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1849 he gained the prize of 100 guineas for his essay on "Alcoholic Liquors," which was published in 1850. He received the gold medal of the Royal Society for his contributions to physical science in 1861, and between 1868 and 1870 was engaged in the Government expedition for exploring the deep sea.

Born at Bristol, 1812. Died 1885.

CARPENTER, MARY, philanthropist, elder sister of the preceding, who having had considerable experience in education, especially in connection with ragged and reformatory schools, made three visits to India, where she engaged actively in promoting female education. Her services were very valuable and highly appreciated. Prison discipline is another subject in which she has taken a deep interest.

Born at Bristol, 1807.

CARPENTRAS, kar'-pen-tra, a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse, on the left bank of the Auzon, 15 miles N.E. of Avignon. It is surrounded with old walls, with four gates, one of which, the Porte d' Orange, is very fine. The principal edifices are a palace of justice, cathedral, and an hospital. There is also an aqueduct over the river. As an entrepôt for the south of France, its trade is considerable in silk, wool, madder, honey, wax, olive-oil, and saffron. Manf. Cotton and woollen-spinning, chemicals, leather, and dyes. There are some dye-works. Pop. 7,800.

CARPI, kar'-pe, a town of N. Italy, on the canal of Carpi, 10 miles N. of Modena, with a citadel and a cathedral. Manf. Silk, and straw hats. Pop. 5,000.

CARPI, a town of Italy, province of Verona, 28 miles S.E. of Verona. Pop. 1,200.—In 1701 Prince Eugene gained a great victory here over the French.

CARPI, UGO DA, an artist, who discovered the secret of painting in chiaroscuro, with two pieces of boxwood, one of which marked the outlines and shadows, and the other impressed any colour laid upon it. In this manner he executed several prints after great pictures; among which we may notice "David killing Goliath" and the "Massacre of the Innocents."

Born in Rome 1486; died 1530.

CARPINI, JOHANNES DE PLANO, kar-pe'-ne, a Franciscan friar, who, in 1246, formed one of an embassy from Pope Innocent IV. to the descendants of Genghis Khan. The object was to induce them to dissuade them from invading Europe. He wrote a narrative of the mission, and was the first writer to describe with anything like accuracy the countries he visited.

Born near Naples, 1210.

CARPINO, kar-pe'-no, a town of Italy, in the province of Foggia, on Monte Gargano, 22 miles N.E. of San Severo. Pop. 6,000.—Also the name of a mountain in Calabria, near Cosenza, and of an affluent of the river Tiber, in the States of the Church.

CARPOCRATES, or CARPOCRAS, kar-poc'-ra-tes', a Gnostic of Alexandria, who founded a sect named after himself. He professed to teach that the essence of pure religion is the union of the soul, by contemplation, with the Divinity. He also taught the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. His followers, against whom terrible accusations of immorality were made, continued until the 6th century.

Lived in the 2nd century.

CARPIO, kar-pe'-o, a Spanish town, province of Cordova, on the left bank of the Guadalquiver. There is a trade in cattle and fruit. Pop. 2,700.

CARPIO, (EL TAJO), a Spanish town, province of Toledo, 24 miles S.W. of the town of Toledo. Manf. Serge, glass, and oil. Pop. 2,500.

CARRACA, kar-rak'-a, a Spanish town, 4 miles S.E. of Cadiz. It is the chief naval arsenal of the Government. It is built chiefly on piles, and defended by four batteries.

CARR, ROBERT. (See SOMERSET, Duke of.)

CARRA, JEAN LOUIS, kar'-ra, a French political revolutionist, distinguished for his violence in the first great revolution. He joined the party of Brissot, and fell with his leader, and was guillotined.

Born at Pont-de-Vesle, 1743; died 1793.

CARRACCI. (See CARACCI.)

CARRAN-TUAL, kar-ran-tu'-al, the loftiest mountain of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, 5 miles from Killarney. It belongs to the MacGillicuddy Rocks range, and has an elevation of 3,410 feet.

CARRARA, a town of Italy, on the Avenza, 2 miles from where it falls into the Mediterranean Sea. Its port is at L'Avenza.—In its vicinity are the celebrated marble-quarries (worked for more than 2,000 years,) which produce the Carrara statuary marble; and for that reason it is a great resort of artists, who have studios there. Many of the houses are built of marble. There are a fine old collegiate church, and an academy of fine arts. Pop. 24,000.

CARREIRA ISLES, kar-ri'-ra, a group off the E. coast of Galicia, Spain, about 22 miles N.W. of Vigo. Pop. 1,200.

CARREL, ARMAND NICHOLAS, kar'-rel. He served several years in the army, and then became the principal editor of the French National newspaper, and a distinguished political writer. Opposed alike to the extremities of absolutism in royalty or democracy, he attained a high position as a French journalist; but, being led into a quarrel with Emile de Girardin, editor of the Presse, a duel was the consequence, in which he was killed.

Born at Rouen, 1800; died at St. Mandé, 1836.

CARRICAL. (See KARIKAL.)

CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, the capital town of the county of Leitrim, Ireland. It stands on the left bank of the Shannon, and communicates with a small suburb by a bridge. There is a great market for grain and provisions, and a trade is done in druggets, friezes, and other coarse fabrics. The river is now navigable to about 8 miles from the town. Pop. 1,587.—A station on the Midland Great Western of Ireland railway.

CARRICK-ON-SUIR, a market-town of Tipperary, Ireland, 12 miles E. of Clonmel. Its public buildings are a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a monastery, nunnery, school-house, a prison, an hospital, and a barracks. There are the remains of a castle built in 1309. The river has been made navigable to the town, which has an export trade of corn and cotton. Manf. Woollens, linen, and flax. Pop. 7,689.—A station on the Waterford and Limerick railway.

CARRICKFERGUS, kar'-rik-fer'-gus, a seaport-town and Parliamentary borough of Antrim, Ireland, on Belfast Lough, or Carrickfergus Bay, 10 miles from Belfast. It has an ancient church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and dating from the 12th century, and a castle, erected by De Courcy in the 12th century, which is kept in repair and very strongly defended. A considerable portion of the old wall of the town exists. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, starch, and leather. The oyster beds in the bay are very productive. Pop. 10,009.—A station on the Belfast and Northern Counties railway. Here William III. landed in 1690. In its neighbourhood extensive salt-mines were discovered in 1852.

CARRIER, JEAN BAPTISTE, kar'-re-ai, one of the most ferocious of the French revolutionists, who became deputy of the department of Cantal, in the national Convention. In 1793 he was despatched on a mission to the departments in the west, where the civil war was raging. The cruelties of Carrier at Nantes recall to mind the times of Nero. He caused to be constructed covered barges, in which he sunk about a hundred persons at a time. These horrible executions were known as noyades. He also invented those frightful executions, which went by the name of "republican marriages," and which consisted in fastening together, by the neck, a man and woman, who were then thrown into the Loire. By his means 15,000 individuals are said to have perished, and the water of the Loire was so polluted with dead bodies, that it was prohibited to be drunk. On the fall of the party called the Mountain, he was tried before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to the guillotine.

Born near Aurillac, 1756; died 1794.

CARRIERA, ROSA ALBA, kar'-re-air'-a, known also as ROSALBA, an Italian female painter, who learnt the rudiments of the art from her father. She was afterwards placed under an eminent artist, and her progress was so great, that her full-length portraits became famous throughout Italy. She went to Paris, and in 1720 was admitted a member of the Academy of Painting. After executing portraits of the royal family of France, she proceeded to Vienna, where she received distinguished honours. Her miniatures are very highly esteemed.

Born at Venice, 1672; died 1757.

CARRON, kar'-ron, a village of Stirlingshire, on a stream of the same name, falling into the river Forth, 3 miles N.E. of Falkirk. It is noted for its extensive iron-works, in which a great number of persons are employed. All kinds of iron goods, from the heaviest to the lightest, are manufactured. The carronade, a peculiar kind of gun, derives its name from this place, the first having been manufactured here.

CARR ROCK, kar, a portion of a reef in the North Sea, 12 miles from the Bell Rock lighthouse. Lat. 56° 17′ N. Lon. 2° 35′ W.

CARSTAIRS, WILLIAM, kar'-stairs, a Scotch divine and politician, who took an active part in bringing about the Revolution of 1688. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and at Utrecht, where he became acquainted with the Prince of Orange, who placed great confidence in him. In 1682 he visited England, and was arrested on a charge of being implicated in the Rye House plot, and was put to the torture, but with extraordinary firmness refused to reveal any of the political secrets with which he had been entrusted. In 1685 he returned to Holland, and assisted the Prince in making his arrangements for the events of 1688. He accompanied William to this country in the capacity of chaplain, and rendered great service by his influence with the Scottish church. He was elected principal of the university of Edinburgh in 1704, and minister of the church of Greyfriars. He was four times chosen as moderator of the General Assembly. He was possessed of great scholarship, and his many high qualities gained for him a position of great influence.

Born near Glasgow, 1649; died at Edinburgh, 1715.

CARSTENS, ASMUS JACOB, kars'-tens, a Danish painter, was the son of a miller, and had his mother for his first drawing-teacher. When quite a boy he studied at Copenhagen, and at the age of 15 started on foot for Rome, but was obliged to return for want of means before reaching his destination. In 1789 he went to Berlin, where he was appointed professor of drawing, and in 1792 to Rome, where he died. Amongst his best paintings are "The Death of Achilles" and "The Fall of the Angels." He generally chose his subjects from the ancient poets, Dante, or Shakspeare.

Born near Schleswig, 1754; died 1798.

CART, kart, two rivers in Renfrewshire, Scotland. They unite and enter the river Clyde 6 miles below Glasgow.

CARTAGO, kar-ta'-go, the name of a town, mountain, river, and bay of Central America, in the state of Costa Rica. In 1841 the town, formerly the capital, was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake. The mountain, once volcanic, attains a height of 11,480 feet. The river falls into the Gulf of Nicoya, 50 miles from Cartago. The bay, a large lagoon, communicates with the Caribbean Sea.

CARTAGO, a town of Colombia, South America, on the Viega. The streets are wide, and there is a cathedral. The town is the entrepôt for the trade of Bogota. Cocoa, tobacco, coffee, fruit, dried beef, and live pigs are the chief articles of trade. Pop. 5,500.

CARTAMA, kar-ta'-ma, a Spanish town, 14 miles W. of Malaga. Pop. 2,900, chiefly employed in agriculture and cattle rearing.

CARTE, THOMAS, kart, an English historian, who, having been educated at Oxford and Cambridge, entered the church, and published a defence of Charles I. in the matter of the Irish massacre. On the accession of George I. he refused the oaths, but afterwards became secretary to Bishop Atterbury. When that prelate was committed to the Tower, a reward of £1,000 was offered for apprehending Carte, who escaped to France, where he remained till Queen Caroline obtained permission for him to return to England. In 1736 he published his "Life of James, Duke of Ormond," in 3 vols. folio. Soon after this, he issued proposals for a history of England. He met with great encouragement, and this work, completed in four volumes, has been highly praised. His MSS. are in the Bodleian library. Besides those mentioned, he published a "Collection of Original Letters and Papers relating to the Affairs of England," in 2 vols. 8vo.; a "History of the Revolutions of Portugal," and some other pieces.
Born at Clifton, Warwickshire, 1686; died 1754.

CARTEAUX, JEAN FRANÇOIS, kar'-to, a French brigadier-general, who entered the service as a private, and rose from grade to grade, until he received the command of a brigade. His principal success was the taking of Toulon in 1793, then held by the British. Here he was ably seconded by Napoleon Bonaparte, at that time a simple artillery captain.

CARTER, ELIZABETH, kar'-ter, an English lady, who became an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, besides acquiring a knowledge of the German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Arabic, and Hebrew. She executed several translations, and contributed a paper to the "Rambler" of Dr. Johnson. She translated Epictetus, and her attainments secured her the friendship of the most eminent men of the day. She was never married.
Born at Deal, Kent, 1717; died 1806.

CARTER, THOMAS, a distinguished Irish musician and composer of vocal music. Amongst many others, he composed the melodies, "Oh, Nannie! wilt thou gang wi' me?" and "Stand to your guns, my Hearts of Oak."
Born 1768; died 1800.

CARTERET, JOHN. (See GRANVILLE, Earl of.)

CARTERET, PHILIP, kar'-te-ret, a distinguished naval officer, who, in conjunction with Captain Wallis, in 1766, commanded an expedition to the South Seas. Dr. Hawkesworth, in his Introduction to his narrative of Cook's voyages, gives an account of their discoveries.
Lived in the 18th century.

CARTERET, an island in the Pacific, in the Solomon archipelago. Lat. 8° 50′ S. Lon. 160° 48′ E. Named after Carteret, its discoverer, in 1767.

CARTERET, a maritime county of North Carolina, U.S., on Gore and Pamlico sounds. Beaufort is the capital. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 9,784.

CARTHAGE, kar'-thage, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival of Rome. The precise time of its foundation is unknown. Some writers say that it was first built by Dido, about 869 years before the Christian era; others, 72 or 93 years before the foundation of Rome. It and its republic flourished for 737 years; and the time of its greatest glory was under Hannibal and Hamilcar. It maintained three famous wars against Rome, called the Punic wars, and was at last totally destroyed by Scipio, the second Africanus, B.C. 147. In circumference it was 23 miles; and when set on fire by the Romans, it burned incessantly during seventeen days. Before that event there were 700,000 inhabitants. Cæsar planted a small colony on its ruins, and Adrian rebuilt a part of it, which he designated Adrianopolis. Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genseric, A.D. 439; and it was, for more than a century, the seat of the Vandal empire in Africa, falling into the hands of the Saracens in the 7th century. The Carthaginians, before their subjugation by the Romans, were governed as a republic, and had two persons yearly chosen among them with regal authority. They bore the character of a faithless and treacherous people, and the proverb Punica fides ("Punic faith," meaning treachery), is well known. In 1859 excavations were carried on by both English and French archæologists on the site of this ancient city; and several discoveries, further revealing the social and moral character of its former inhabitants, were the result.

CARTHAGE CAPE, a headland of North Africa, in the Mediterranean. Lat. 36° 52′ N. Lon. 10° 22′ E.

CARTHAGENA, or CARTAGENA, kar'-ta-zhaï'-na, a fortified city and seaport of Spain, on a bay in the Mediterranean, about 30 miles from Murcia. It lies in a natural basin, forming one of the best harbours in the Mediterranean, defended by fortifications on the island of La Isoletta. The city is Moorish in appearance, the cathedral (now only a parish church) and old castle being in that style of architecture. There are several churches, convents, a town-hall, hospitals, a school of marine, custom-house, observatory, theatre, and circus. Manf. Canvas and cordage, besides other articles necessary for the equipment of ships. It has a glass-factory and smelting-works, and trades in agricultural produce and tunny-fish. Its shipbuilding-docks are extensive, and sufficiently large for constructing ships of war. The old mines of Cartagena were discovered a few years ago. Pop. 75,908. Lat. 37° 36′ N. Lon. 0° 57′ W.—This town was built by Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general, 242 B.C. It was named new Carthage, and was the head-quarters of the Carthaginians in Spain. It was taken by Scipio 210 B.C. At that time it was one of the richest places in the world. It was subsequently reduced by the Goths, and did not begin to rise into importance again till the time of Philip II.

CARTHAGENA, capital of Bolivar, one of the states of the republic of Colombia, South America. It is situate on a sandy peninsula, in a commodious bay of the Caribbean Sea. The city and suburbs are well laid out, the streets being straight, broad, uniform, and well paved. The houses are built chiefly of stone, except a few of brick. It has various churches and convents, some of which are magnificent. The bay extends 2½ leagues from north to south, has a sufficient depth of water and good anchorage, and is so smooth that the ships are no more agitated in it than in a river. There are strong fortifications, and a naval arsenal. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 10° 26′ N. Lon. 77° 54′ W.—In 1544 Carthagena was taken by the French under a Corsican pilot; also by Sir Francis Drake, who, after pillaging it, set it on fire, and its complete destruction was only prevented by a ransom of 120,000 ducats, paid him by the neighbouring colonies. It was captured and pillaged a third time, by the French under Monsieur de Pointis, in 1697. In 1741 it was besieged by the English; but the enterprise miscarried. In the contest with the mother country, Carthagena was besieged first by Bolivar, and afterwards by Morillo, to whom it surrendered. It was subsequently reduced by the independent troops.

CARTIER, or QUARTIER, JACQUES, kar'-te-ai, a French navigator, employed by Francis I. in exploring the coast of North America, where, in 1534, he completed the discovery of Canada. He had letters of nobility conferred on him by the French government.

Born at St. Malo, 1494; died 1555.

CARTISMANDUA, kar'-tis-man'-du-a, a queen of the Brigantes, in Britain, who has gained an unenviable fame by her treachery in betraying to the Romans the unfortunate Caractacus. She put away her lawful husband, Venutius, and took, in his room, his armour-bearer, Vellocatus. On this her subjects revolted, which induced her to call to her assistance the Romans, who made themselves, thereby, masters of the country.

Lived in the 1st century. (See CARACTACUS.)

CARTWRIGHT, EDMUND, kart'-rite, the inventor of the power-loom for weaving, was educated for the church, and first held the living of Brampton, near Chesterfield, and afterwards that of Goadby-Marwood, in Leicestershire. He had published several poetical effusions, besides contributing to the "Monthly Review," when his attention was accidentally drawn to the subject of mechanical weaving. Accordingly, in the April of 1785, his first power-loom was put in motion; and, although its introduction was much opposed both by manufacturers and their workmen (a mill containing 500 of the looms being maliciously burnt), it gradually rose into importance, until it has become one of the greatest of the mechanical forces of Great Britain. In 1809 Parliament granted him £10,000 for "the good service he had rendered the public by his invention of weaving."

Born at Marnham, Notts, 1743; died 1823.

CARTWRIGHT, JOHN, a brother of the above, was conspicuous for his advocacy of American independence, and was one of the earliest and most active agitators for parliamentary reform. He was generally called Major Cartwright, although he held his commission in the navy. There is a bronze statue of him in Burton Crescent, London.

Born at Marnham, 1740; died 1824.

CARTWRIGHT, THOMAS, Puritan divine, who, in 1570, was appointed Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge, but his views being too independent, he was deprived of his fellowship. He then travelled in Europe, and was recognized as one of the most learned men of the time. On his return to England, he suffered imprisonment for nonconformity.

Born in Hertfordshire, 1535; died 1603.

CARUPANO, ka-ru-pa'-no, a seaport of Venezuela, South America. The port is defended by a battery. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 10° 40′ N. Lon. 63° 22′ W.

CARUS, MARCUS AURELIUS, kair'-us, a Roman emperor, prefect of the prætorians under Probus, on whose death, in 281, he was elected emperor by the soldiers. He defeated the Sarmatians in Illyria, conquered Mesopotamia and the towns of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and died, it is said, by a lightning-stroke, at the latter town, 282.

CARUS, KARL GUSTAV, German scholar and physiologist, professor, court physician, and councillor of state at Dresden, where he was looked upon as the leader of learned and artistic society. He was author of a remarkable work on the circulation of blood in insects.

Born at Leipsic, 1789; died 1869.

CARVAJAL, FRANCIS DE, kar'-vash-al, a Spanish captain, who served in America, and contributed greatly to the success of Vaca de Castro, governor of Peru, over the young Almagro. He subsequently joined his fortunes to those of Pizarro, and was taken with him and hanged as a traitor at Cuzco.

Died 1548.

CASA, DE LA, JOHN, ka'-sa, an Italian prelate, who, in 1544, was created archbishop of Benevento, and, the same year, was sent nuncio to Venice, where he displayed great diplomatic abilities. He was in disgrace under Julius III., on account of his connection with Cardinal Farnese; but was restored to favour by Paul IV., who made him secretary of state. He is accounted one of the most elegant of the Italian writers, and his Latin poetry is very fine. His principal performance is the "Galateo; or, Art of Living in the World;" besides which he wrote some beautiful Italian poems, the lives of Cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and other works, collected at Venice, in 5 vols. 4to, 1728.

Born at Florence, 1503; died 1556.

CASABIANCA, LOUIS, ka'-sa-be-an'-ka, a distinguished captain in the French navy, who represented Corsica in the National Convention, and was also a member of the Council of Five Hundred. In Napoleon's expedition to Egypt, he commanded the Orient, a 120-gun ship; and, at the battle of the Nile, perished with his son, a youth of ten years, who, though seeing the vessel about to sink, would not abandon his dying parent.

Born 1755; died 1798.

CASACALENDA, ka'-sa-ka-len'-da, a town of Italy, in the province of Malese, 17 miles N.E. of Campobasso. Wine of good quality is produced in the neighbourhood, fruit is abundant, and silk-worms are reared. Pop. 6,000.

CASALBUTTANO, ka-sal-boot-ta'-no, an Italian town, 8 miles N.N.W. of Cremona. Manf. Silk, linen, and cotton. Pop. 3,400.

CASALE, or CASAL, ka-sa'-lai, a town of Italy, on the right bank of the Po, 38 miles N.E. of Turin. Its principal public buildings are a cathedral, dating from the 8th century, several churches, hospitals, a college, library, town-hall, theatre, and corn magazine. It was formerly fortified, and was one of the strongest places in Italy, but was suffered to fall into comparative decay till 1849, when, under the direction of General Della Marmora, it was again strongly fortified. The clock-tower, which was built in 1000, and repaired in 1510, is a curious structure; and an iron bridge, which here crosses the Po, is worthy of notice. Pop. 27,500.

CASALE MAGGIORE, ca-sal' maj'-je-or'-ai, a town of Northern Italy, on the left bank of the Po, about 20 miles S.E. of Cremona. Manf. Earthenware, glass, and leather. Pop. 5,000.

CASALE NUOVO, noo'-o-vo, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, 15 miles from Castrovillari. Pop. 6,300.

CASAL-PUSTERLENGO, poos-ter-len'-go, a town of Northern Italy, 12 miles S.E. of Cremona. Manf. Silk fabrics, linen, earthenware, and Parmesan cheese. Pop. 5,600.

CASAMASSIMA, ka-sa-mas'-se-ma, a town of Italy, in the province of Bari, 14 miles S.E. of the city of Bari. There are two abbeys and a convent. Pop. 5,600.

CASANARE, ka'-sa-na'-rai, a large river of South America, rising in the mountains of Chita, and falling into the Meta. Lat. 5° 56′ N. Lon. 76° 50′ W.

CASANOVA, FRANCIS, ka'-sa-no-va, painter. He was of English birth, but of Venetian parents, and educated in Italy. He resided for some time at Dresden, where he became famous for his battle-pieces, and afterwards went to Vienna.

Born in London, 1732; died near Vienna, 1805.

CASANOVA, DE SEINGALT, GIOVANNI JACOPO, a famous adventurer, elder brother of the preceding, who at first studied for the church, but was expelled from the seminary, and then visited different countries of Europe in various capacities. He was at once a schoolmaster, soldier, musician, chemist, alchemist, writer, and politician; and displayed, in these various callings, a great amount of talent, accompanied, necessarily, by equal chicanery. Like Cagliostro, he professed to be able to perform miracles. He left, besides other books, a "History of his Captivity," and his "Memoirs," which have been translated into French.

Born in Venice, 1725; died in Bohemia, 1803.

CASAUBON, ISAAC DE, ka-so'-bawng, a learned Swiss divine and critic, who, at the age of 23, was chosen professor of Greek at Geneva, and subsequently at Montpellier and Paris. In 1586 he married a daughter of Henry Stephens, a learned printer, by whom he had twenty children. In 1600 he was appointed one of the Protestant judges in the controversy between Du Perron and Du Plessis Mornay, and decided against the latter. Three years later he became head librarian to Henry IV. of France, and on the death of that monarch, removed to England, where James I. settled upon him a considerable pension, and gave him a prebend of Westminster, and another of Canterbury. In this country he passed the remainder of his days, a rigid adherent to the principles of Protestantism. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Casaubon was the author of many learned works; among which we may notice his "De Libertate Ecclesiasticâ," suppressed by Henry IV. as offensive to the pope; "De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis," "A Criticism on Baronius," and his "Epistolæ." He edited Aristotle, Persius, Polybius, Strabo, Theocritus, and many other classical authors.

CASAUBON, MERIC, son of the above, was educated at Oxford, and obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and two livings in Kent, of which he was deprived in the civil war. He was also professor of theology at Oxford. Cromwell made him large offers to induce him to write the history of the war, but he steadily refused to comply. He also refused to accept an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to superintend the universities in her kingdom. At the Restoration he recovered his preferments. His most remarkable work is a treatise on "Credulity and Incredulity," wherein he maintains the existence of witches. He edited Marcus Aurelius, Terence, and Epictetus.

Born at Geneva, 1599; died at Oxford, 1671.

CASBIN, or KASVIN, kas'-bin, a town of Persia, in the province of Irak, 90 miles N.W. of Teheran. It is of a square form, each side about a mile long, and surrounded by brick walls. It has a royal palace, bazaars, schools, and baths. A large portion is in ruins, owing to the frequency of earthquakes. Manf. Carpets, made of pieces of cloth of different colours, which are much valued, and bear a high price, velvets, brocades, and coarse cotton cloths. There is a large trade in raw silk and rice. Pop. 25,000 to 30,000.

CASCADE, or PRESIDENT MOUNTAINS, kas-kaid', a range traversing Oregon, U.S., and part of British Columbia, at a distance of from 100 to 150 miles from the shore. The highest summits are Mounts Washington, Baker, Hood, and Jefferson, rising to altitudes of from 13,000 to 14,000 feet. The name is taken from the number of falls and rapids into which the river Columbia is here broken.

CASERTA, ka-sair'-ta, a town of Italy, 17 miles N.E. of Naples, at the foot of Mount Caserta. Its royal palace was begun in 1752 by Charles III. of Spain, and is a magnificent structure. There are several churches, a convent, hospital, military school, and a spacious barracks, and it stands in a district which produces much excellent fruit, and wine of a superior quality. A royal silk factory has been established in the neighbourhood. Pop. 30,135; of the province, 737,110.

CASEY, kai'-se, a county of Kentucky, U.S. Area, 350 square miles. The capital is Liberty. Pop. 9,000, CASHAN, or KASHAN, kash'-an, a city of Persia, province of Irak, 90 miles from Ispahan, and containing a royal palace, many fine mosques, bazaars, and caravanserais. All kind of copper utensils are made, and artists work skilfully in gold and silver. Pop. 30,000.

CASHEL, kash'-el, a city and parliamentary borough of the county of Tipperary, Ireland. It is an episcopal see, and has a cathedral and a library containing many curious manuscripts. There are a handsome market-house, a sessions-house, a county infirmary, a charter school liberally endowed, barracks, an hospital, and an archbishop's palace. There are also some fine ruins of an old cathedral, the largest in Ireland, situate on the edge of a remarkable elevation with almost perpendicular sides, "the rock of Cashel." Adjoining it are the remains of buildings called the Chapel and Hall of Audience of Cormac M'Carthy, king and bishop, commonly called Cormac's Chapel, built in 1127; Hore Abbey, founded 1260; the palace of the kings of Munster, a round tower 90 feet high, and other ruins. Pop. 3,961. In the ancient cathedral was formerly deposited the stone upon which the sovereigns of England are now crowned. In 513, it is said, Feargus, a prince of the royal line of Cashel, obtained the throne of Scotland, and used this stone at his coronation at Dunstaffnage. Here it remained until the time of Kennet II., who removed it to Scone; and thence, in 1296, Edward I. of England had it conveyed to Westminster, and placed under the coronation chair. Cashel was the ancient residence of the kings of Munster, and in it was assembled, in 1172, the synod by which Ireland was confirmed to Henry II. of England. Dean Swift was born here, 1667.

CASHGAR. (See KASCHGAR.)

CASHMERE, or KASHMIR, kash'-meer, an independent State of Northern India, between British India, and Tibet, including besides Cashmere proper, Jamu, Bulti, Ladakha, and Chamba. Desc. It consists of an extensive alluvial valley, of an irregular oval form, about 5,500 feet above the sea (probably at some remote time a lake bed), surrounded on all sides by mountains, whence descend numerous rivulets, forming several beautiful lakes. The summits of these mountains ascend far into the skies, and are capped with perpetual snow. The highest peak is Pir Panjal, which attains the elevation of 15,000 feet. There are few passes into the valley, and in winter they are scarcely practicable.

Rivers.—The principal is the Jhelum, which forms a navigable communication from its eastern to its western boundary, and flows into the Punjab.

Lakes.—The Dal or City Lake, the Manasa Bul, the Great Wuller, the Ossun, and the Wusikara. The Dal is 6 miles long, by 4 broad, and the Great Wuller may be regarded as nothing more than a shallow expansion of the Jailum.

Climate.—Very hot, but on the whole salubrious.

Pro.—Rice in the valley, and, in the higher lands, wheat, barley, and various other grains; but the most valuable vegetable production is saffron, of which great quantities are exported to Hindostan and other countries.

Manf.—Shawls, which constitute the chief source of the wealth of Cashmere. The wool or hair of which the shawl is made, is produced by a goat, only found in Tibet, whence the Cashmere merchants are supplied with the wool, and have a monopoly of the commodity. Sugar, paper, leather, gun and pistol barrels, lacquered ware, otto of roses, and some drugs, are also made and exported.

Area, 70,000 square miles.

Pop.—Estimated at 100,000, to which, in 20 years, it has been reduced by famine, pestilence, and earthquakes, from 800,000. They are chiefly Mahometans.

Lat. Between 33° 15′ and 34° 35′ N. Lon. Between 74° 10′ and 75° 40′ E.

Chief Towns.—SERINAGUR, ISLAMABAD, SHUPAYON, PAMPUR, and Baramula.

History.—In 1586 this country was taken by the emperor Akbar, and added to his empire. In 1752 it was conquered by the Afghans, who kept it till 1819, when it was wrested from them by the Sikhs, under whose dominion it remained, in connection with the Punjab, till 1846, when a dispute with the British resulted in its cession to them, upon conditions of mutual assistance being rendered in cases of war, and was immediately afterwards transferred, as an independent possession, to Gulab (or Gholab) Singh.

CASILINUM, kas-i-li'-num, an ancient city of Campania, on the Vulturnus, opposite Capua. It was in this vicinity that Hannibal was inclosed by Fabius in an upland valley, whence the Carthaginian general escaped by driving before him, up the hill-sides, oxen with blazing faggots fixed to their horns, about 217 B.C.

CASIMIR, kas'-i-meer, the name of four Polish kings.

CASIMIR III., the Great King of Poland, succeeded Vladislaus in 1333. He defeated John, king of Bohemia, and conquered a part of Russia. He united to his warlike qualities the powers of a great king; maintained peace, founded several churches and hospitals, and built numerous fortresses. He is said, however, to have been a man of strong passions, in which he frequently indulged to excess. In his reign, privileges were bestowed on the Jews, which they ever continued to enjoy; these were granted at the request of a Jewess, named Esther, one of his favourites. His consideration for the poor obtained for him the name of King of the Peasants. He was killed by falling from his horse.

Born 1309; died 1370.

CASIRI, ka-seer'-e, a learned Oriental scholar, who took orders at Rome, and taught the Eastern languages in that city. In 1748 he repaired to Madrid, where he was made a member of the Academy of History, interpreter to the king, and head librarian of the Escurial. From 1750 to 1770 this industrious man laboured at the compilation of a description and analysis of all the Arabian MSS. contained in the library of the Escurial, the richest in Europe in works of that kind. This esteemed production was published at Madrid, 2 vols. folio, the second containing most interesting accounts of the battles of the Moors and Christians in the Peninsula.

Born at Tripoli, Syria, 1710; died at Madrid, 1791.

CASKETS, THE, kas'-kets, a group of rocks in the English Channel. (See ALDERNEY.)

CASOLI, ka'-so-le, a town of Italy, 17 miles S. of Chieti. Pop. 5,500.

CASORATE, kai-so-ra'-te, a town of Northern Italy, 11 miles N.W. of Pavia. It has a church with some fine pictures. Pop. 4,300.

CASORIA, ka-so'-re-a, a town of Italy, 5 miles N.E. of Naples. Silk is cultivated in the district. Pop. of district, 137,619; of town, 9,753.

CASPE, kas'-pe, a town of Spain, in the province of Saragossa, 57 miles S.E. of the city of that name, near the Ebro. Manf. Oil and soap. Pop. 7,500.

CASPIAN SEA, kas'-pe-an, an inland sea of Asia, the largest lake in the world, forming a portion of the boundary between Europe and Asia, 730 miles long, by 150 to 270 broad. Area, 140,000 square miles; in certain places it is of great depth, but very shallow near the shore. The coast line is irregular, and on the eastern side there are several large bays. On the west side is the peninsula of APSHERON, and the south-eastern termination of the great range of the CAUCASUS. On the south, at a distance of about 20 miles from the coast, are the ELBURZ mountains. The northern limit is marked by great steppes, and on the eastern side is an extensive plain. The water is salt, but less so than the ocean, on account of its receiving a great many large fresh-water rivers, among them the VOLGA, the URAL, the Terch, and the Kur. It has neither tides nor outlets, its superfluous waters being exhausted by evaporation, and it is well supplied with fish. On the upper coasts, seals abound, and tortoises are numerous at the mouths of the Ural and Volga. Many thousands of persons are employed in the Upper Caspian fisheries, and sturgeon and sterlet are taken in vast quantities. The Russian delicacy caviar is here made, being the roe of the sturgeon, salted and smoked. This sea was known to the Greeks and Romans, and took its name from the Caspii, a people who inhabited its western and southern shores. At a later period the western portion of the sea only was known as the Caspian; the eastern part being named the Hyrcanian Sea. Although its navigation is difficult, it is now traversed by steam vessels, and is a naval rendezvous for Russian ships. By a canal uniting the Volga with other rivers, there is new communication between the Caspian and the Baltic Seas. It has been proposed to unite the Caspian and Black Seas by a navigable canal.

CASS, LEWIS, an American politician, educated for the law, but preferred military service, and in the war between England and the United States, in 1812, made an incursion into Canada, and was taken prisoner. When peace was concluded, he was appointed governor of Michigan, and organized that vast territory, making treaties with the Indian tribes, by which three millions of acres were added to the state. Under the presidency of General Jackson, in 1831, he was secretary for war, and five years afterwards, was sent to Paris as envoy extraordinary. He remained there seven years, and whilst engaged in this mission, published his "Views on the Subject of the Limitation of the Northern Frontiers of the Union," and protested against the adhesion of M. Guizot to the doctrine of the "right of visit." The treaty concluded in 1842, between England and the United States, not meeting his approval, he resigned and returned to America. He was nominated for the presidency in 1844, and again in 1848, each time unsuccessfully. In the senate he voted for the Fugitive Slave Law, and in 1857 was made secretary of state under President Buchanan. He is chiefly remarkable for his determined hostility to Britain. He was the author of a history of the Indians in the United States, of a work on France during the period of his residence there, and of other works.

Born at Exeter, New Hampshire, 1782; died at Detroit, Michigan, 1866.

CASS, a county of Illinois, United States. Beardstown is the capital. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 14,493.

CASS, a county of Indiana, United States. The capital is Logansport. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 18,345.

CASS, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 16,943.

CASS, a county of Michigan, United States. The capital is Cassopolis. Area, 528 square miles. Pop. 22,009.

CASS, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Harrisville is the chief town. Pop. 22,431.

CASS, an unsettled county of Minnesota, United States. The Mississippi rises near the north-western border. Area, 11,000 square miles. Pop. 486.

CASSANDER, kas-san'-der, the son of Antipater, took possession of the kingly power in Macedonia, on the death of his father. He caused the death of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, and also of his son, the young Alexander. Joining his forces to those of Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, he defeated Antigonus at the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C., the latter monarch falling on the field, and the four conquerors dividing between them Alexander's empire into the great kingdoms of Macedonia, Thrace, Egypt, and Syria. (See ANTIGONUS, &c.)

CASSANDRA, in Greek poetry, daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was passionately loved by Apollo, who promised to grant her whatever she might require, if she would look with favour on his suit. She demanded the power of prophecy, and as soon as she had received it, refused to perform her promise, and slighted Apollo. The god, thus disappointed, wetted her lips with his tongue, and thus no belief was ever placed in her predictions. She endeavoured to prevent the entrance into Troy of the wooden horse of the Greeks, but was unsuccessful, and when that city was taken, she suffered violence from Ajax Oileus. In the division of the spoils of Troy, she fell to the share of Agamemnon, who carried her to Greece, and by whom she had twin sons. She repeatedly foretold to him the calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was assassinated by his wife Clytemnestra. Cassandra shared his fate, after seeing all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled.

CASSANDRA, NOVA, kas-san'-dra, a peninsula in the province of Roumelia, of European Turkey, between the gulfs of Salonica and Cassandra. Lat. 40° N. Lon. 23° 20′ E.—The GULF is 35 miles long by 10 broad.

CASSANO, kas-sa'-no, a town of Italy, 34 miles N. of Cosenza. It has a cathedral, several convents, and an old castle, built on a lofty rock in the midst of the city. Timber, corn, and fruit are raised in the neighbourhood. Manf. Linen, leather, silk, cotton, and maccaroni. Pop. 6,000.

CASSANO, a town of Northern Italy, 17 miles N.E. of Milan, on the Adda, across which is a railway-bridge. Manf. Silk. Pop. 1,200.—In 1259 Eccelino Romano, chief of the Ghibelines, was here defeated and killed. In 1705 the French, under the duke of Vendôme, gained a victory over the Imperialists, commanded by Prince Eugène; and, in 1799, Suwarrow inflicted a defeat on the French, under Moreau.

CASSAY, or MUNEEPOOR, kas-sa', formerly a province of the Birman empire, but now independent, is bounded on the N., E., and S. by Burmah, and on the W. by Cachar. It is a valley encompassed by rugged and precipitous mountains, watered by the tributaries of the Irawadi or the Barah. Cotton, indigo, tobacco, rice, sugar, opium, and mustard are cultivated. The tea-plant is produced in the N., and a valuable breed of ponies is reared. Manf. Muslins, silk stuffs, cotton cloths, and iron wares. Area, 7,584 square miles. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. between 23° 49′ and 25° 41′ N. Lon. between 93° 5′ and 94° 32′ E.—The government of this country is invested in a hereditary rajah, assisted by a divan. In 1826 it was ceded to the British and handed over to the native rajah.

CASSEL, kas'-sel, a town of Prussia, capital of a district of the same name, in Hesse-Nassau, on both sides of the Fulda, across which there is a fine stone bridge. The Fulda divides it into an old and new town, in the former of which are the town-hall, the government offices, the arsenal, the foundry, the house of correction, the Friedrichs-Platz (a very large square), the large barracks, the church of St. Martin, and the public library. The other public buildings are the opera, a picture-gallery, museum, observatory, a mint, and a riding school. Besides these there are pleasure-gardens, an orangery, baths, many churches, a college, an academy of arts, and societies of trade and agriculture. Manf. Fabrics of silk, cotton and wool, leather, paper-hangings, gloves, chemicals, jewellery, earthen and lacquered wares, lace and carpets. In the neighbourhood are oil, gunpowder, and other mills. Pop. 62,950.—This town was the capital of Westphalia, under Napoleon I. Within three miles of it is the splendid palace of Wilhelmshohe, where Napoleon III. was a state prisoner after the fall of Sedan.

CASSEL, a town of France, in the department of the Nord, 15 miles from Dunkirk. Manf. Linen cloth, thread, lace, hosiery, and soap. It has some salt-refineries and oil-mills, besides a trade in cattle and poultry. Pop. 3,000.

CASSENEUIL, kas'-neuh(r)l, a town of France, department of the Lot and Garonne, 5 miles from Villeneuve-sur-Lot. Pop. 2,000.

CASSIANUS, or MASSILIENUS, kas-se-a'-nus, sometimes known as John the Hermit, a promoter of monasticism in Southern Gaul, in the 5th century, and a theological opponent of St. Augustine. He founded two monasteries, one of which, the Abbey of St. Victor, had 5,000 inmates. He was the originator of the doctrine known as "semi-pelagianism."

Died about 435.

CASSINA, or CASHNA, kash'-na, an extensive kingdom of Central Africa, situate W. of Bornou and S. of the Niger. It is but little known.

CASSINI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, Italian astronomer, educated among the Jesuits at Genoa. In 1650 he succeeded Cavalieri, as professor of astronomy at Bologna. Hé there gained so great a reputation that the Pope and the senate of Bologna entrusted him with several scientific and political missions. In 1669 Colbert induced him to visit France. He there was naturalized, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. He discovered several of Jupiter's and Saturn's satellites, and determined the rotation of Jupiter, Mars, and Venus. He published a "Theory of Jupiter's Satellites," remarkable for its correctness, and assisted in the measurement of the meridian line of Paris. He left behind him a great number of astronomical memoirs and observations.

Born near Nice, 1625; died at Paris, 1712.

CASSINI, JACQUES, son of the above. He travelled in Italy, Holland, and England, became acquainted with the leading scientific men of the age, and was elected a member of the Royal Society of London. In 1712 he succeeded his father in the charge of the observatory at Paris, and enriched science with many valuable discoveries. In 1720 he published a book on the figure of the earth, in which he maintained, in opposition to Newton, that it was an oblong spheroid. To determine this, the French king sent two companies of mathematicians, one towards the polar circle and the other to the equator, to measure a degree, the result of which was a decided refutation of Cassini's opinion.

Born at Paris, 1677; died 1756.

CASSINI DE THURY, CÆSAR FRANCIS, son of the above, evinced, at a very early age, great talents for astronomy, and was received into the Academy of Sciences at 22. He was employed many years in perfecting a general chart of France, and in continuing the perpendicular of the meridian of Paris. The former was composed of 180 pages, and gave a most complete representation of the country, on a scale of a line to 6 feet. Cæsar François was unable to finish it; but it was at length concluded by his son, who presented it, in 1784, to the National Assembly. He published a great number of papers in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences."

Born at Paris, 1714; died 1784.

CASSINI, JEAN DOMINIQUE, Count de, son of the above, who succeeded to the direction of the observatory, but resigned when three colleagues were appointed. In his indignation he resolved to discontinue all astronomical studies, and he kept his resolution throughout a very prolonged life. In his 95th year he published a small volume of poems.

Born at Paris, 1748; died 1845.

CASSIODORUS, MARCUS AURELIUS, kas-si-o-dor'-us, an Italian of great talents, who was appointed by Theodoric, king of the Goths, governor of Sicily, and filled some of the highest offices in Rome. In his 70th year he retired to a monastery in Calabria. He is celebrated as a chronologist and historian, and is said to have devoted himself also to mechanical pursuits, and invented water-clocks, sun-dials, and lamps. He wrote manuals of grammar and rhetoric, which were much used as text-books; and made a valuable collection of state papers, illustrating the rule in Italy of the Ostrogoths. He lived to be nearly a hundred years old.

Born about 468.

CASSIOPE, or CASSIOPEA, kas-si'-o-pe, or kas'-si-o-pe'-a, in mythology wife of Cepheus and mother to Andromeda. Boasting herself fairer than the Nereides, Neptune was exasperated, and sent a huge sea-monster to ravage her dominions, and she was forced to expose Andromeda to its fury. After her death, Cassiope was made a constellation. (See ANDROMEDA.)

CASSIQUIARI, kas'-se-ke'-a-re, a large branch of the Orinoco, joining the Rio Negro, in South America, at lat. 2° 5′ N.; Lon. 67° 40′ W.

CASSIS, kas'-see, a seaport of France, department Bouches-du-Rhone, 9 miles S.E. of Marseilles. The port, defended by a long mole, is protected by batteries. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 43° 13′ N. Lon. 5° 32′ E.

CASSITERIDES, kas'-si-ter'-i-dees, a group of islands, so named by the Greeks, on account of the quantity of tin (kassiteros) there found. They are supposed to be the Scilly Isles, off the coast of Cornwall.

CASSIUS, LONGINUS CAIUS, kash'-e-us, a Roman general, one of Cæsar's murderers. During the civil wars between Pompey and Cæsar, he followed the fortunes of the former. After the decisive battle of Pharsalia, he was, however, spared by the conqueror. Returning to Rome, he married Junia, the sister of Brutus, and in conjunction with the latter formed a conspiracy against the emperor. After the death of their victim, 44 B.C., Cassius fled and made himself master of Syria, afterwards, in conjunction with Brutus, plundering Asia Minor. On the plains of Philippi, in Macedonia, where Antony and Octavius met them, the left of the army, under Cassius, was defeated by Antony's troops, and this neutralized the success which Brutus was achieving on the right. Fearing to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through, and perished thus early by that very sword which had given a wound to Cæsar. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called "the last of the Romans." If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was often to-rash and too violent, and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. Shakspeare describes him as having "a lean and hungry look," and makes Cæsar say,—

> "He reads much;
> He is a great observer, and he looks
> Quite through the deeds of men; he loves no plays,
> As thou dost, Antony; he hears no music:
> Seldom he smiles; and smiles in such a sort,
> As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit,
> That could be moved to smile at anything."

CASSIVELAUNUS, kas'-si-ve-lau'-nus, a British chief, who was invested with the supreme command of the forces of the island, to oppose Julius Cæsar during his second invasion of Britain. He was glad to sue for peace, which he obtained on payment of a tribute.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

CASTAGNO, ANDREA DEL, kas-tan'-yo, a Tuscan painter, who worked first in fresco, but afterwards learned the art of painting in oil from Domenico Veneziano. His repayment for this was to assassinate his friend. Unsuspected, he pursued his calling, and produced some fine pictures, the principal of which is the "Execution of the Conspirators against the Medici," now in the Hall of Justice at Florence. Stung with remorse, he, on his death-bed, confessed, amidst universal execration, the atrocious crime of which he had been guilty.

Born at Castagno, 1406; died 1480.

CASTALIA, in Greek legend a fountain on the slope of Parnassus, sacred to Apollo and the Muses. Its waters were supposed to impart the gift of poetry. The spring still exists and bears the name of St. John, from a chapel in the vicinity.

CASTALLA, kas-tal'-la, a town of Spain, 24 miles W. of Alicante. Pop. 3,000.

CASTANOS, DON FRANCIS XAVIER DE, Duke of Baylen, Spanish general, who studied the military art in Germany, and in 1808 gained a remarkable success against the French general Dufont, at Baylen, for which he was raised to the dignity of duke. He served with distinction throughout the Peninsular War; and in 1826 was made a member of the State Council.

Born at Madrid, 1756; died 1852.

CASTEGGIO, kas-tedj'-e-o, a town of Northern Italy, 5 miles N.E. of Voghera. Pop. 3,200.—On June 9, 1800, the battle of Montebello was gained by the French, under Lannes, over the Austrians, in the neighbourhood of this place. Another engagement was also fought on May 20, 1859, when Count Stadion, at the head of his Austrians, stormed the town on his advance upon Montebello, where, met by the French and Sardinian forces, the Austrians were defeated. (See MONTEBELLO.)

CASTEL ARQUATO, kas'-tel-ar-qua'-to, a town of Northern Italy, 19 miles S.E. of Piacenza. There are an ancient Gothic castle, and a fine Gothic church. Manf. Silk. Pop. 4,400.

CASTEL-BUONO, boo-o'-no, a town of Sicily, 8 miles S.E. of Cefalea. There are mineral springs. Pop. 5,300.

CASTEL CALDO, kal'-do, a town of Italy, 30 miles from Padua. Pop. 3,000.

CASTEL-FRANCO, fran'-ko, a town of Italy, 25 miles N.W. of Venice. Manf. Linen and woollens. Pop. 4,220.

CASTELLAMARE, a fortified city and seaport of Italy, 17 miles S.E. of Naples, built at the foot of a hill. There are a royal palace, cathedral, several convents, in one of which is a famous statue of the Madonna, to which pilgrimages are made, an old castle, a royal dockyard, and a military hospital. Manf. Leather, silk, cotton, linen fabrics, and sail-cloth. Pop. 15,191. This place is built on the site of the ancient Stabiæ, near which the elder Pliny met his death during the eruption of Vesuvius, in the year 79. Here, also, considerable damage was done from the shock of an earthquake, which extended over a wide area, in 1857.

CASTELLAMARE, a town of Sicily, at the head of a gulf of the same name, Cotton, wine, fruit, and manna are exported. Pop. 22,207.

CASTELLAMONTE, kas'-tel-la-mon'-tai, a town of Northern Italy, 10 miles S.W. of Ivrea. Pop. 5,600, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of pottery.

CASTELLANA, kas'-tel-a'-na, a town of Italy, 26 miles S.E. of Bari. Pop. 9,700.

CASTELLAZZO, kas'-tel-lat'-so, a town of North Italy, 7 miles from Alessandria. Pop. 5,800.

CASTELLAWETA, kas'-tel-la-wai'-ta, a town of Italy, 20 miles N.W. of Taranto. There are a cathedral and several convents. Cotton is grown in the vicinity. Pop. 6,600.

CASTELLEONE, kas'-tel-le-o'-ne, a town of Northern Italy, near the Ogho, 12 miles N.W. of Cremona. There is a fine church and the town is surrounded by walls. Pop. 5,700.

CASTELLON DE LA PLANA, kas'-tel-lone dai la pla'-na, a town of Spain, in a province of Tarragona, 4 miles from the Mediterranean, and 40 miles N.E. of Valencia. Some of its old Moorish walls still remain. It has several handsome old churches, several chapels, the town-house, and a tower or belfry, 260 feet in height, and 116 in circumference. Manf. Linen, woollens, sail-cloth, paper, earthenware, and fire-arms. Pop. 23,393.

CASTELLON-DE-PLANA, a province of Spain, one of five into which the ancient province of Valencia was divided. It is very mountainous in the north and west, but in the south and east there are rich valleys and fertile plains. The principal rivers are the Mijares, Moxleon, Bergantes, Gerria, Cerval, and there are numerous smaller streams. Minerals. Iron, copper, cobalt, quicksilver, silver, lead, marble and granite, and there are many mineral springs. Pop. 296,706.

CASTELNAU, PIERRE DE, kas'-tel-no, archdeacon of Maguelone, was sent, early in the 13th century, by Innocent III. into the S. of France as legate extraordinary, in order to search out the heretic Albigenses, and deliver them over to the secular arm. He was met by a determined resistance, and was at last slain in the territory of Raymond, count of Toulouse. This murder led to the excommunication of Raymond, and also to the war of the Albigenses.

CASTELNAUDARY, kas-tel'-no-da-re', a town of France, department of the Aude, 33 miles from Toulouse. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics and earthenware. It has also shipbuilding-docks, and the Canal du Midi, by the side of which the town is situated, expands into a commodious haven. Pop. 10,000.—In 1355 this place was taken and burnt by Edward the Black Prince. In 1632 Marshal Schomberg gained a victory over the party of the Duke of Orleans.

CASTELNUOVO, kas-tel'-noo-o'-vo, a seaport-town of Austria, in Dalmatia, near the entrance of the Gulf of Cattaro. It is defended by a citadel and two forts on the neighbouring heights. Pop. of port and district, 7,000.—The British took it in 1814.

CASTEL-SARRASIN, a town of France, department of Tarn-et-Garonne, on the Songuine, 11 miles W. of Montauban. There are the remains of a very old castle traditionally said to have been erected by the Saracens. Manf. Serge and worsted stockings. Pop. 3,000.

The French commander was afterwards made, on account of this battle, Duc de Castiglione. In 1859, the battle of Solferino also occurred in its neighbourhood.

CASTI, GIAMBATISTA, kas-te, an Italian poet, who visited the principal courts of Europe, and succeeding Metastasio, was appointed poet to the Imperial Theatre at Vienna. He afterwards retired to Florence. He wrote elegant, but licentious poetical stories.

Born near Florence, 1721; died at Paris, 1803.

CASTIGLIONE, GIOVANNI BENEDETTO, called by the French Le Benedette, and at Mantua Il Grechetto. He is one of the most eminent of the Genoese painters and etchers. In animal and pastoral painting especially he excelled. His chef-d'œuvre is "The Nativity of the Saviour," in the church of San Luca, Genoa.

Born at Genoa, 1616: died at Mantua, 1670.

CASTIGLIONE, BALDASSARE, Count, an Italian writer and politician, who, after serving with great bravery in a military capacity, was employed by the duke of Urbino in state affairs, and sent ambassador to England and France. In this country he received the honour of knighthood from Henry VIII. He was also engaged in the same service by Pope Clement VII., and became nuncio at the court of Charles V., who held him in high estimation. His greatest work is "Il Cortigiano," or the Courtier, written in an elegant style, and abounding with good rules and reflections.

Born in Mantua, 1478; died at Toledo, 1529.

CASTILE, kas-teel', a part of Spain, occupying the central table-land of the peninsula, and erected into a kingdom at the beginning of the 11th century. It was subsequently extended by the additions of Andalusia, Estremadura, and Leon. In 1474 the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon with Isabella of Castile was consummated. This circumstance brought all the Christian states of Spain under one sceptre. In 1492 the conquest of Grenada was achieved, which paved the way for the constitution of the Spanish kingdom. The northern part is known as Old Castile; the southern as New Castile.

Modern Divisions.—Castile is now divided into the following provinces:—New Castile—MADRID, GUADALAXARA, TOLEDO, CUENCA, and CIUDAD REAL; Old Castile—BURGOS, LOGRONO, SANTANDER, OVIEDO, SORIA, SEGOVIA, AVILA, LEON, PALENCIA, VALLADOLID, SALAMANCA, and LAMORA. (See each heading.)

CASTILHO, ANTONIO FELICIANO DE, kas-teel'-yo, one of the most distinguished modern Portuguese poets, who early displayed his genius, and first came into notice by the publication of a meritorious imitation of Ovid, entitled "Letters from Echo to Narcissus." He has written much poetry with various success, and was the founder of a magazine, which had a considerable circulation.

Born at Lisbon, 1800.

CASTILLO (DE LOCUBIN), kas-teel'-o, a town of Spain, province of Jaen, 25 miles S.W. of the town of that name. There are a fine church, chapels, convents, town-hall, and other public buildings, and in the public square the remains of an Arab fortress. Manf. Linen, woollens, vinegar, wine, and oil. There are quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 4,000.

CASTILLO (DE LAS GUARDAS), a town of Spain, province of Seville, 30 miles N.E. of Seville. A small trade in agricultural produce, oil, wine, and honey is carried on. Pop. 2,300.

CASTILLON, kas-tee'-yawhn, a town of France, in the department of the Gironde, 26 miles E. of Bordeaux. Manf. Cotton and woollen yarns, nails, and cordage. Pop. 3,300.—In the neighbourhood of this place Montaigne, the French essayist, was born and died. In 1453, under the walls of this town, the English were defeated by the French, and Talbot, their leader, was slain.

CASTLEBAR, kas'-el-bar, a town of Ireland, capital of the county of Mayo, 10 miles from Westport. It is situated on the Castlebar river. There are a very handsome Protestant church, a large Roman Catholic chapel, a court-house, and a large new county jail. Manf. Coarse linen. Pop. 3,508. This town was occupied by the French when they landed in Killalea Bay, in 1798; but, on the approach of Lord Cornwallis, shortly afterwards, was evacuated.

CASTLEMAINE, a town of Victoria, Australia, in the county of Talbot, 77 miles N.W. of Melbourne. It is pleasantly situated, has good public buildings, and is the centre of an important mining district. A considerable amount of wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 5,787. In the adjoining district there are several thousand Chinese.

CASTLETON, kas'-el-ton, a village of Derbyshire, 13 miles from Sheffield. The parish church is a good specimen of the Pointed style. It stands at the bottom of a precipitous rock, on which is erected Peak Castle, the fortress of William Peveril, natural son of the Conqueror. The supposed founder was the Peveril of the Peak in Sir Walter Scott's novel of that name. In the neighbourhood is the Peak Cavern, 46 feet high and 120 wide, extending into the rock for nearly half a mile.

CASTLETOWN, or CASTLE RUSHEN, the chief town of the Isle of Man, on the south coast. It is tolerably well built, situated on the margin of Castletown Bay, and has a safe and commodious harbour. The keep of the ancient castle of Rushen (an extensive and very strong edifice) now forms the jail, and the remainder of the building is used for public offices. Shipbuilding is carried on, and the town is a favourite resort of tourists. Pop. 2,320. This town was the ancient Sodo.

CASTOR and POLLUX, kas'-tor, pol'-lux, in mythology, were twin brothers, sons of Jupiter, by Leda; or, according to another version, of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedæmon, and brothers of Helen of Troy. As soon as they had arrived at years of maturity, they embarked with Jason in quest of the golden fleece, and behaved with great courage. Pollux slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and is the god and patron of boxing and wrestling. Castor distinguished himself in the management of horses. After many adventures, Castor was killed, and his death avenged by Pollux.

CASTRACANI, CASTRUCCIO. (See CASTRUCCIO.)

CASTREN, kast'-ren, Finnish linguist and ethnographer. He studied at Helsingfors, and afterwards made pedestrian excursions in Lapland, Finland, and Norway, collecting ballads and legends. Having been appointed linguist and ethnographer to the St. Petersburg Academy, he extended his investigations, between 1845 and 1849, to the Chinese empire and the shores of the Arctic Ocean. On his return he was appointed professor of the Finnish language and literature at Helsingfors. Worn out by mental and bodily labour, he died at the age of 39. He wrote a Finnish poem, "Kalevala," the metre of which appears to have suggested the metre of Longfellow's "Hiawatha." He wrote several works descriptive of his travels and researches, and on the languages of the people he had visited.

Born in Finland, 1813; died 1852.

CASTRES, kastr, a town of France, in the department of Tarn, divided by the river Agout, which is crossed by two bridges. It contains many fine public buildings, particularly the ancient palace of the bishops of Castres, and the cathedral church. Manf. Considerable, especially fine wool-dyed goods, linen, paper, leather, and soap. Pop. 18,442.

CASTRO, kas'-tro, a seaport of Italy, province of Naples, 10 miles S.W. of Otranto. There are a cathedral and old castle. The port admits only small vessels. Pop. 7,780. Lat. 42° N. Lon. 18° 27′ E.

CASTRO, a seaport of Chili, South America, on the island of Chiloe, at the head of a fine bay of the same name. There is a good port. Pop. 3,500. Lat. 43° 20′ S. Lon. 65° 5′ W.

CASTRO, the ancient Mitylene, a seaport-town and capital of the island of Mitylene, Asiatic Turkey, 55 miles N.W. of Smyrna. It is a mean and dirty town, surrounded by walls, and defended by a castle. There are some remains of the ancient town. Pop. 6,500.

CASTRO, INES. (See INES DE CASTRO.)

CASTRO, JUAN DE, a Portuguese viceroy of the Indies, allied to the royal family of his country. In 1545 he was appointed to the government of the East, and gained several considerable victories over the natives. As honest as brave, he died poor, and was buried at the public expense. It is said that once, wanting to raise a loan to assist commerce, he offered his "moustaches" as a security; the lenders, however, were satisfied with his word.

Born at Lisbon, 1500; died at Goa, India, 1548.

CASTRO, VACA DE, priest and judge-royal of Valladolid, was sent by Charles V. to Peru, in 1540, to suppress the various contending factions, and to regulate the interior administration of the kingdom. On his arrival he learnt the assassination of Pizarro, and Almagro's usurpation. Marching an army against the latter, he defeated, and executed him with his accomplices. This done, he endeavoured to ameliorate the lot of the Indians by wise regulations, but fell into disgrace on this account, 1544.

Died in Spain, 1558.

CASTRO-DEL-RIO, a town of Spain, in the province of Cordova, and 16 miles south-east of the town of that name. The old town is surrounded by ruinous walls, beyond which is a well-built new town. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics and earthenware. There is a good trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 9,000.

CASTRO GIOVANNI, zho-van'-ne, a town of Sicily, in the province of Caltanisetta, 13 miles N.E. of Catanea, on a fertile elevation 4000 feet above the sea level. There are a castle and other buildings of Saracenic origin. A large quantity of sulphur is obtained in the neighbourhood. Pop. 18,725. This is the Enna of antiquity, fabled as the birthplace of Ceres, and the site of her most celebrated temple. At a distance of 6 miles is the Lake of Pergusa, where Pluto found Proserpine and carried her off.

CASTRO NUOVO, noo-o'-vo, a fortified town of Sicily, in the province of Palermo. In its vicinity are marble quarries. Pop. 4,100.

CASTRO URDIALES, oor'-de-a-laist, a seaport-town of Spain, 24 miles S.E. of Santander, in the Bay of Biscay. The town is defended by an old castle and strong batteries. There are an ancient church, a large town-hall, several convents, a handsome public fountain, and a dock. Manf. Linen, leather, tiles, bricks, sailcloth, ropes, and fishing-nets. Pop. 3,100.—In 1811 this town was sacked by the French; but it was afterwards rebuilt.

CASTRO-JERIZ, geer-iz, a town of Spain, 17 miles S.W. of Burgos, at the foot of a hill, on the summit of which is a castle built by Julius Cæsar. There are a fine collegiate and other churches, convents, hospitals, and a large public square. Manf. Linen and woollens, earthenware, and hats. Pop. 2,500.

CASTROVILLARI, kas'-tro-veel-la'-re, a fortified town of Italy, in the province of Calabria Citra, 8 miles from Cassano. It is situated on an eminence, and partly fortified, with an ancient castle. There is a trade in wine, silk, and manna. Near Monte Pollino, in its neighbourhood, the famous cheese called cacio cavallo is made. Pop. 10,173.

CASTRUCCIO, CASTRACANI, kas-trooteh'-e-o, a distinguished Italian soldier, who was designed for the church. In his youth the quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibelines were distracting Italy, and he, as one of the latter party, was driven out of Pavia. After serving with distinction in Lombardy, he went to England, and entered the army of Edward I.; but was forced to quit that country, having killed a nobleman in a duel. He then became a soldier under Philip the Fair, of France, and subsequently returned to Italy, where the Ghibelines of Lucca made him their chief. He had here much to combat, both in the jealousies of his friends and the strength of his enemies; but ultimately succeeded in overcoming all difficulties. In 1320 he was proclaimed duke of Lucca, and was recognized by the emperor Louis of Bavaria. His life has been written by Macchiavelli.

Born at Lucca, 1284; died 1328.

CASTUERA, kas-too-air'-a, a town of Spain, 68 miles S.E. of Badajoz, on the right bank of the Guadalefra. The town is well built, and in the principal square are a spacious modern church, the town-hall, and prison. A large cemetery is near the town. Manf. Earthenware, tiles, bricks, and shoes. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in weaving, and a trade is carried on in cattle, wool, wine, grain, and oil. Pop. 5,600.

CASWELL, kaz'-well, a county in the N. of N. Carolina, U.S. It is fertile, and diversified with hill and dale. Maize, wheat, and tobacco are cultivated. Yancy is the capital. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 17,825.

CAT ISLAND, one of the Bahama islands, 47 miles long, and about 5 in average breadth. Lat. 25° 34′ N.; Lon. 79° 18′ W.

CATALANI, ANGELICA, kat-a-la'-ne, an Italian singer, famous for the volume, range, and flexibility of her voice, and her wonderful certainty of execution. She was educated in the convent of St. Lucian at Rome, where, while yet a child, her extraordinary voice was a great attraction. She first appeared upon the operatic stage at Venice, at the age of 16. For more than 30 years she enjoyed a succession of triumphs; and in 1839 she retired to a villa at Florence, where she gratuitously trained girls to sing. When political disturbances broke out in 1849, she went to Paris, where she died of cholera.

Born at Sinigaglia, 1780; died in Paris, 1849.

CATALDO, SAN, ka-tal'-do, a town of Sicily, in the province of Caltanisetta, 5 miles N. of the town of that name. There are sulphur-mines in the vicinity. Pop. 9,700.

CATALINA, SANTA, ka'-ta-le'-na, the name of several small islands in the Caribbean Sea and Pacific Ocean. Also a CAPE of central America, 70 miles from Nicaragua, and a HARBOUR on the E. coast of Newfoundland, at the N. entrance of Trinity Bay.

CATALONIA, kat'-a-lo'-ne-a, an old province of Spain, situate in the N.E. part of the kingdom, now divided into the provinces of BARCELONA, TARRAGONA, LERIDA, and GERONA. This province was anciently under the dominion of the Romans, who were ejected in the 5th century by the Goths, who, in their turn, were ejected by the Moors, at the beginning of the 8th century. The Spaniards finally reconquered it, and its people were represented by local parliaments. From 1137, when the province was united to Aragon, the history of the Catalonians is nothing more than a record of rebellions, which were not finally suppressed until Philip V., who, after the capture of Barcelona, in 1714, crushed their liberties and deprived them of their ancient cortes.

CATAMARCA, ka'-ta-mar'-ka, a province of the Argentine Confederation, S. America, bounded on the W. by the Andes, which separate it from the northern provinces of Chili. On the other sides it has the departments Cordova, Salta, Tucuman, and Rioja. Desc. Fertile, having excellent pasture lands, and producing maize and other corns in abundance; it also grows good cotton, and exports large quantities of red pepper to Buenos Ayres. Area, 31,500 square miles. Pop. 102,000. Lat. between 25° and 29° S. Lon. between 66° and 69° W.

CATANDUANES, ka'-tan-doo-a'-nais, one of the Philippine isles. Ext. 44 miles long, by 20 broad. It is fertile. Lat. 14° 13′ N. Lon. 124° 10′ E.

CATANIA, ka-tai'-ne-a, a city and seaport of Sicily, on the east coast, beautifully situate at the foot of Mount Etna, 30 miles N.W. of Syracuse. Although destroyed three times by the lava of Etna, Catania appears to have always risen with renewed splendour from its ashes, to rank among the elegant cities of Europe. It consists of two very long and spacious streets, which are intersected at right angles by several others, and are all regularly built and well paved with lava. The houses are generally very handsome, and the public buildings superb: they consist of a number of monasteries, a foundling hospital, poor-house, and an asylum; about 50 churches, and other places of public worship, conspicuous among them being the grand church of San Nicolo; a senate-house, which is a model of architecture; the cathedral, originally founded by Roger, earl of Normandy, in the year 1094, and rebuilt after the earthquake of 1693, very beautiful in the simplicity and grandeur of its design. There is a great square formed by the town-hall, cathedral, and university; and in the centre of the square the statue of an elephant, sculptured in lava. The harbour of Catania is one of the largest in the island, and is enclosed by a natural mole of lava. Pop. 99,025. Lat. 37° 28′ 18″ N. Lon. 15° 5′ 12″ E.—The ancient town of Catana was on this spot, and there are still considerable remains. Pop. of the province, 585,431.

CATANIA, GULF OF, extends from La Trizza on the N. to Santa Croce on the S., a distance of 17 miles. It forms an indentation in the coast about 10 miles deep.

CATANZARO, ka'-tan-za'-ro, a city of South Italy, built on a mountain 5 miles from the Gulf of Squillace. It has an old castle, a cathedral, several convents, a royal academy of sciences, a lyceum, and several charitable institutions. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics, and silk velvet. There is an active trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 20,931. In 1783 this town suffered severely by an earthquake. Pop. of the compartment, 443,342.

CATAWBA, ka-taw'-ba, a county in the centre of N. Carolina, U.S. It is fertile in maize and wheat, besides having rich pastures. Minerals. Iron is the principal. Newton is the capital. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 14,947.

CATBALOGAN, kat-ba-lo'-gan, capital of Samar, one of the Philippines. Pop. 7,000.

CATEAU CAMBRESIS, ka'-to kam-bres'-e, a town of France, in the department of the Nord, 14 miles S.E. of Cambrai, on the Selle. Manf. Merinoes, shawls, calicoes, and leather. Pop. 9,200. —The treaty which bears the name of this place was here made in 1559, between Philip II. of Spain and Henry II. of France.

CATERINA, SANTA, ka'-tai-re'-na, a fortified town of Sicily, in the province of Caltanisetta, near the bank of the Salso. Manf. Fine earthenware. Pop. 5,800. In the neighbourhood fine jaspers and agates are found.

CATESBY, MARK, F.R.S., an English naturalist, who from 1712 to 1726 occupied himself in collecting specimens of natural history in Virginia, Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama isles. Returning to England, he published, in 2 vols. folio, with beautiful coloured plates, the Natural History of those countries. He is also the author of other works. A genus of plants, Catesbia, is named from him.

Born 1680; died 1749.

CATESBY, ROBERT, instigator of the Gunpowder Plot. (See JAMES I.)

CATHARINA, SANTA, ka-ta-re'-na, san'-ta, a fortified island off the coast of Brazil, 37 miles long and 10 miles wide. The soil is fertile, producing coffee, wheat, and fruits. Pop. 12,000.

CATHARINE, the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and wife of Henry V., king of England. After the death of that prince, she married Owen Tudor, by whom she had a son called Edmund, who was the father of Henry VII.

Born 1401; died 1438.

CATHARINE I., empress of Russia, from being born of poor Livonian parents, became the wife of a Swedish dragoon, who was killed at the taking of Marienburg by the Russians. She then became the mistress of General Bauer, and subsequently obtained a situation in the family of Prince Menzikoff, who was fascinated by her beauty. She now attracted the notice of the Czar, Peter the Great, who made her his mistress, and, in 1711, his wife. At his death he left her the throne. In 1725 she was proclaimed empress, and continued to execute the great designs which had been left unfinished by her husband. She had eight children by the emperor, of whom only two daughters, Anne and Elizabeth (afterwards empress) survived. In the last year of her life she was addicted to intemperance and loose habits.

Born in Livonia, 1683; died 1727.

CATHARINE II., empress of Russia, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt-Zerbst. Her original name was Sophia Augusta, but on her marriage, in 1745, with the grand-duke of Russia, afterwards Peter III., she was baptized according to the formulary of the Greek church, and named Catharine Alexiewna. She brought her husband two children: Paul, who succeeded her, and Anne, who died an infant. On the death of the empress Elizabeth, in 1761, Peter came to the throne, and soon discovered his intention of disinheriting his son and divorcing Catharine. She, however, anticipated his designs, and formed a conspiracy against him. Accordingly, she gained over the nobility and the army, and on June 27, 1762, Peter, after signing a renunciation of his crown, was sent prisoner to the palace of Robscha. On the 17th of July, Alexius Orloff, the empress's favourite, with some other conspirators, strangled Peter, who, it was given out, had died of colic. It is not absolutely certain that the empress instigated the murder, but she did not take any measures against the assassins, and in the following September was crowned at Moscow. The regulations adopted at the beginning of her reign were in the manner and spirit of Peter the Great. She affected to rule by clemency, and laboured to win the hearts of her subjects by acts of liberality. She also avoided foreign war till she had settled the tranquillity of the empire. Fond of literature and the arts, she gave unbounded encouragement to their introduction to her dominions, and held a correspondence with the most eminent literary characters in Europe. She also caused a liberal code of laws to be enacted, in which the practice of torture was abolished; attended to the subject of education, and took means to diffuse knowledge among all classes of her subjects. She encouraged medical discovery by submitting herself to inoculation, and in every way laboured for the enlightenment of her people. In 1764 she caused her favourite, Poniatowski, to be crowned king of Poland, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. In 1769 Turkey declared war against Russia; the result of which was the first partition of Poland, between Catharine, Joseph II. of Austria, and Frederick of Prussia, in 1772. More than one-third of the kingdom fell to the share of Russia, and which included the larger portion of Livonia and Lithuania. In 1774 the peace of Kainardji was concluded, and Azof and Taganrog were annexed to Russia, and the Crimea made independent of Turkey. Peace being restored, the empress devoted her attention to public improvements and to political engagements. In 1780 she formed, with the other northern states, the famed armed neutrality, the object of which was to protect the Baltic trade from the belligerent powers. In 1782 she founded a Roman Catholic archbishopric in her dominions, for her subjects of that persuasion. About the same time she created the order of St. Wladimir. In 1785 she seized on the Crimea and the country north of the Kuban, which so alarmed the Porte that war became almost inevitable; but the accession of Germany as an ally to Russia stopped the preparations, and the Turks yielded to the aggression. In 1787 Catharine travelled through her new territory with a magnificent retinue, her favourite Potemkin preparing the way, erecting splendid buildings for her to see, and providing large numbers of well-dressed peasants and citizens, who appeared at each station along the route, so as to give an appearance of prosperity and happiness to the country. At Cherson she had an interview with the emperor Joseph II. Immediately after this, war again broke out between Russia and the Porte, in which the former was assisted by Germany and the latter by Sweden. Hostilities were carried on with great fury. Oczakoff was stormed by the Russians, and a prodigious carnage ensued; Ismail was also taken by Suwarrow in the same manner, and the Turks were, in general, everywhere unsuccessful. In 1792 peace was concluded, when, by the treaty of Jassy, the Porte ceded to Catharine the important fortress of Oczakoff, and the frontiers of Russia were extended to the Dniester. Shortly after the attention of Catharine was drawn to the state of Poland, where a spirit of revolt had broken out, and the people seemed determined to shake off a foreign yoke. A Russian army was immediately dispatched to that province, and decided the fate of Poland, by the massacre of the inhabitants of Warsaw. That kingdom was again partitioned between Russia, Germany, and Prussia, when the whole of Lithuania, Volhynia, and Podolia were given to Russia. This is historically called the second partition of Poland, and took place in 1793. In 1795 the third and last partition of Poland was effected, when Russia had all that remained of that kingdom, with the exception of Warsaw, which was assigned to Prussia, and Galicia, which was handed over to Austria. Courland was next annexed by Catharine to her empire, after which her life was suddenly terminated by a fit of apoplexy. The passions of this woman were as gross as her mental powers were great to govern her empire. Byron, in "Don Juan," gives a scarcely exaggerated description of her reckless sensuality.

Born 1729; died 1796.

CATHARINE OF ARRAGON, fourth daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. At the age of 16 she was married to Arthur, prince of Wales, son of Henry VII. of England, younger than herself. He died a year afterwards; and eight years afterwards she married his brother, who had just succeeded to the throne as Henry VIII. The royal pair lived happily for about 18 years, when the attractions of Anne Boleyn alienated the affections of the king. The sad story of the divorce and the death of the broken-hearted Catharine are familiar to all readers of English history and Shakspeare's historical play.

Born 1485; died at Kimbolton Castle, Huntingdonshire, 1536.

CATHARINE DE MEDICI, med'-e-che, queen of France, was the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, duke of Urbino. In 1533 she married the second son of Francis I., afterwards Henry II. After the death of her husband and that of her eldest son, Francis II., she possessed herself of the regency of the kingdom during the minority of her second son, Charles IX. Trickery and dissimulation distinguished her government. Exciting the civil war between the Catholics and Huguenots, she resolved on the destruction of the latter, after having feigned to favour them for a time, and will be ever infamous as the principal instigator of the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. She was entirely unscrupulous as to the means she employed to gain her ends; was suspected of being privy to the murder of the duke d'Alencon, her fourth son, and employed the beautiful women of her court as a means of gaining the alliance of influential nobles. Subsequently, she quarrelled with her son, Charles IX., and lost her power at court, in the reign of her third son Henry III. of France.—Notwithstanding her evil propensities, Catharine possessed the love of literature and the arts, which distinguished the Medici family. By her orders the palace of the Tuileries, the Château of Monceaux, &c., were built. She was, it is said, a strong believer in astrology.

Born at Florence, 1519; died 1589.

CATHARINE PARR. (See HENRY VIII.)

CATHARINE OF SIENA, a saint in the Romish calendar, was a dyer's daughter, and entered, at the age of 20, into the institution of the Dominican sisters. There, it is asserted, revelations were made to her, which soon rendered her famous. She played an important part in the schism in the Church which broke out in 1378, between Popes Urban VI. and Clement VII., Catharine declaring for the former. She wrote some treatises on devotion, letters, and poetical pieces, which have been described as remarkable for the elegance and purity of their style. This, however, is somewhat doubtful.

Born at Siena, 1347; died, emaciated by her austere penances, 1380.

CATHCART, kath'-kart, a parish of Scotland, 2 miles from Glasgow. Here, in 1568, the battle of Langside, which ended in the defeat of Queen Mary, was fought. When she beheld her adherents defeated, she fled to the abbey of Dundrennan, in Galloway, and thence to England, whence she never returned.

CATHCART, WILLIAM SHAW, Earl, British general and diplomatist, son of Lord Cathcart, a Scottish peer. He distinguished himself in the American war and in Flanders, and in 1803 was commander-in-chief in Ireland. In 1805 he was sent on a diplomatic mission to Russia. In 1807 he commanded the land forces at the attack on Copenhagen, and for his services was created a viscount, and received the thanks of Parliament. In 1812 he was ambassador to St. Petersburgh, and accompanied the Emperor Alexander in the campaigns of 1813 and 1814. In the latter year he was raised to the rank of Earl.

Born at Renfrewshire, 1755; died near Glasgow, 1843.

CATHCART, SIR GEORGE, K.C.B., son of the above, entered the army in 1810, and served with distinction throughout the campaigns of Germany, in 1813, and of France, in 1814. At Quatre-Bras and Waterloo he acted in the capacity of aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington, and continued on his staff to the end of the service of the army of occupation. In 1818 he accompanied the duke to the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to Verona in 1822, and to Prussia in 1826. He subsequently served with success in Canada; and, in 1852, was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, where he brought the Caffir war to a successful termination. In 1853 he was appointed adjutant-general, and, the following year, received the command of the fourth division of the army, destined to operate in the Crimea. At the battle of the Alma, his division, with the cavalry, was held in reserve; but at Inkermann he bore a distinguished part, and fell, mortally wounded, in the thickest of the fight.

Born at Walton, Essex, 1783; killed at Inkermann, 1854.

CATHELINEAU, JACQUES, ka-tel'-e-no, general of the royalist army of La Vendée. He was born in humble life, but exhibited so much ability that he was chosen to be commander-in-chief of the loyal peasants. He made an attack on Nantes, when he received a shot which proved fatal. His personal character was so high that he was popularly known as "the saint of Anjou."

Born in Lower Anjou, 1759; died 1793.

CATHERINE, SAINT, a virgin of Alexandria, said to have been of royal descent. She publicly professed her belief in Christianity, and, refusing to recant, was put to death after being tortured on a wheel, whence comes the phrase "St. Catherine's Wheel."

Martyred 307.

CATHERINE'S, ST., an island lying off the coast of Georgia, in the United States, 12 miles from Riceborough. Ext. 10 miles long, by 5 broad.

CATILINA, LUCIUS SERGIUS, kat-i-li'-na (CATILINE), born of a noble Roman family, squandered his fortune in debaucheries and extravagance. Being refused the consulship, he conspired, with many of the most illustrious of the Romans, to extirpate the senate and set Rome on fire. This conspiracy was timely discovered by the consul Cicero, who, in the full senate, crushed Catiline with his eloquence, and forced him to unmask himself. Catiline then retired to Gaul, where his partisans were assembling an army. Petreius, the lieutenant of Antonius, Cicero's colleague, attacked his ill-disciplined troops, and routed them, Catiline himself falling. Sallust has written an excellent account of this conspiracy, and Ben Jonson wrote a play on the subject.

Born 108 B.C.; died 62 B.C.

CATINAT, NICHOLAS, ka-te'-na, an illustrious French marshal, who, in 1690, defeated the duke of Savoy at the battle of Staffarde, in Piedmont, and again, in 1693, at Marseilles. Subsequently he was appointed commander of the army in Italy against Prince Eugene; but the want of funds and provisions paralyzed his efforts; and, meeting with several disasters, he was forced to retreat. These checks brought him into disgrace, to which he submitted with great philosophy, living contentedly in retirement. He was a man of an elevated, grave turn of mind, sincere, and religious.

Born at Paris, 1637; died on his estate of St. Gratien, 1712.

CATO, MARCUS PORCIUS, kai'-to, an illustrious Roman, surnamed the Elder, or the Censor, who served in the army at the age of 17, and distinguished himself alike by his valour and his temperance, never drinking anything but water, and always contenting himself with the plainest food. By the interest of his friend Valerius Flaccus, he was appointed military tribune in Sicily, and afterwards became quæstor in Africa under Scipio, where he displayed strict economy in the expenditure of the public money. After passing through other employments, he was chosen consul, 195 B.C. in which station he had Valerius Flaccus for his colleague. He conducted the war in Spain with great success, and, on his arrival at Rome, was honoured with a triumph. In 184 B.C. he was elected censor, and exercised the functions of that office with a stringency which passed into a proverb; and a statue was erected to him with a laudatory inscription. In his latter years, fearing the rivalry of Carthage, he always concluded his speeches in the senate with the expression "Delenda est Carthago,"—Carthage must be destroyed. He was a man of inflexible honesty, but of a narrow mind, discouraged the study of literature, was a severe, even cruel, master to his slaves, and in his old age avaricious. When eighty years of age, his second wife bore him a son, who was the grandfather of Cato of Utica. He wrote a history of Roman affairs, of which only a few fragments remain; but a treatise of his on husbandry is extant in the "Scriptores de Re Rustica."

Born at Tusculum, 234 B.C.; died 149 B.C.

CATO, MARCUS PORCIUS, known as Cato the Younger, or Cato of Utica, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and at an early age manifested that inflexibility of disposition which marked the whole of his public conduct in after-life. His habits of austerity and frugality led him to embrace the doctrines of the Stoics. He served in the army with his brother Capio against Spartacus, and displayed so much valour and prudence as to obtain the commission of tribune in the army sent to Macedonia. In his civil character he served first the office of quæstor, and by his uprightness in administering justice gained great popularity, and rendered his name proverbial for integrity. He gave his support to Cicero, when that great man was consul, and publicly honoured him with the title of "father of his country." Penetrating the ambitious designs then contemplated by Cæsar, he opposed him to the utmost of his power, and was afterwards sent into Asia to announce to Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, the decree which deprived that sovereign of his dominions. This resulted in Ptolemy's poisoning himself and Cato seizing the royal treasure for the republic. He supported Pompey against Cæsar, whose designs he considered as dangerous to Roman liberty; but the civil war which ensued, filled him with grief. After the battle of Pharsalia, he retired to Africa, where he had thought Pompey had fled, and endured, with his troops, great hardships in marching across the desert to join Scipio at Utica, with whom he had some contest about the mode of carrying on the war. Cato also gave offence to that general by sparing those inhabitants of Utica who were attached to Cæsar. When that conqueror came before the place, Cato retired to his chamber and after reading Plato's "Phædo," or Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, committed suicide by stabbing himself with his sword. When Cæsar arrived, he said, "Cato, I envy thee thy death, since thou didst envy me the glory of saving thy life."—The principal events in the life of this great Roman furnished Addison with a theme for his celebrated tragedy of "Cato."

Born 95 B.C.; died 46 B.C.

CATORCHE, ka-tor'-chai, the richest silver-mine of Mexico, in the state of San Luis de Potosi, from the town of which name it is distant 120 miles. This mine produces annually nearly £1,000,000 sterling.

CATS, JACOB, kats, Dutch statesman and poet, who rose to represent his country twice at two very dissimilar courts in England—Charles the First's and Oliver Cromwell's. He was knighted by Charles in 1627, but was unsuccessful in his mission with the Protector. After he returned to his country, he retired from public life, and in a rural retreat, near the Hague, betook himself to the cultivation of the Muses. Here he composed his "Court Life," a poem full of practical precepts of wisdom and virtue, poetical stories of remarkable marriages, distinguished for playful fancy and elegance of style. He was long a favourite with his countrymen, who still affectionately style him "Father Cats."

Born in Zeeland, 1577; died near the Hague, 1660.

CATSKILL, kats'-kil, the capital of Greene county, New York, U.S., on the Hudson, 34 miles S. of Albany. It is a place of considerable trade. Pop. 8,311. The MOUNTAINS of the same name are in the neighbourhood; their highest peak is called Round Top, and rises to 3,804 feet.

CATTARAUGUS, kat'-ta-raw'-gus, a county of the state of New York, U.S., with a fertile soil and excellent pasture. Pop. 55,806.

CATTARO, kat-ta'-ro, a fortified town of Dalmatia, Austria, at the head of the Gulf of Cattaro, on the east side of the Adriatic, 36 miles S.E. of Ragusa. It is surrounded by mountains, the heights of which are covered with fortifications. It has a cathedral, several other churches, and an excellent harbour. Pop. 4,000.—This place was captured by the British in 1813, and till 1814 belonged successively to Austria and France.

CATTARO, GULF OF, is about 30 miles long, consisting of three basins or lakes, connected by straits about half a mile long, sheltered on all sides by mountains in such a manner as to make it one of the safest harbours in the Adriatic. Its depth varies from 15 to 20 fathoms.

CATTEGAT, or KATTEGAT, kat'-te-gat, a large inlet of the German Ocean, between the E. coast of Jutland, the islands of Funen and Zeeland, the W. coast of Sweden, and the Scagerrack. The length is about 150 miles and the breadth 85. (See BALTIC.)

CATTERMOLE, GEORGE, kat'-ter-mole, English painter in water-colours. Though dealing mostly with imaginative or semi-historical subjects, his genius found ample scope in the manner in which he treated them, whilst his style is entirely his own. Scenes from Shakspeare's plays and the novels of Sir Walter Scott he conceived and executed with an originality which few have equalled. Subsequently he painted chiefly in oil.

Born at Dickleburgh, Norfolk, 1800; died 1868.

CATULLUS, VALERIUS, ka-tul'-lus, a Latin poet, whose compositions, though elegant, are the offspring of a too luxuriant imagination. He had the boldness to satirize Cæsar, but the emperor soon gained the poet's heart by his liberality. Catullus was the first Roman who imitated with success the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. His latter years were passed in poverty at Rome. The effusions of this poet are said to have been lost till the beginning of the 15th century, when, in 1425, a copy was accidentally found in a granary, and transmitted to his native city.

Born at Verona, 87 B.C.; died 46 B.C.

CATULUS, Q. LUCTATIUS, kat'-u-lus, a Roman consul, who commanded the fleet during the first Punic war against the Carthaginians, and destroyed their navy under Hamilcar, near the Ægates, sinking 50 and taking 66 of their ships. This decisive victory put an end to the war.

CAUB, koub, a town of Nassau, N. Germany, 21 miles N.W. of Wiesbaden. There are slate-quarries. Pop. 1,500.—In the January of 1814, Blucher crossed the Rhine with his army at this spot.

CAUCA, kou'-ka, a large river of S. America, rising between the great western and middle ridges of the Andes, and after a course of about 500 miles, falling into the Magdalena, in lat. 4° 30′ S.

CAUCA, a state of the republic of Colombia, South America; the chief town is POPAYAN. Area, 68,000 square miles. Pop. 621,000.

CAUCASUS, kaw'-ka-sus, a vast chain of mountains in Asia, occupying the isthmus between the Black Sea and the Caspian, commencing at the mouth of the river Kuban, and, after taking a southerly direction, traversing Mingrelia to the source of the river Kuma. Thence it takes a S. course, and enters Georgia near the source of the Kur, and afterwards turning E., runs along the W. shores of the Caspian Sea, and terminates in the peninsula of Apsheron. The range is about 750 miles long, and from 65 to 150 broad. The culminating point of the chain is Mount Elburz, which attains a height of 18,464 feet; the next point is Mount Kazbek, which rises to 16,526 feet. The height of the other peaks is much less. The snow line is at an elevation of about 10,500 feet. The only practicable pass for carriages is from Mogdok to Tiflis, by the valley of the Terek: on the E. the chief is that of Derbend. The slopes of the Caucasus are covered with wood, and the valleys which intersect them are fertile in the highest degree. Pro. The usual cerealia, some kinds of which are cultivated at a height of 8,000 feet. In the lower valleys, cotton and rice, tobacco, lint, indigo, and the grape are raised. Minerals. Iron, coal, sulphur, lead, and copper.—From the regions of Caucasus it is supposed by some ethnologists that the white race of mankind, which now covers the whole of Europe and a great part of ASIA, issued, and is thus called the "Caucasian race."

CAUCASUS. (See RUSSIA.)

CAUCHY, AUGUSTIN, LOUIS, F.R.S., ko'-she, a modern French mathematician, who, after passing through the Polytechnic School and attracting considerable notice by his talents, was appointed engineer for the port of Cherbourg. He was a large contributor to mathematical science. His loyalty to the Bourbon dynasty he suffered greatly to stand in the way of his pecuniary interests, and rather than take the oath of allegiance to Louis Philippe, he resigned his public employments. The republican government of 1848 absolved him from taking any oath, and he took the chair of the Sorbonne. Louis Napoleon also pursued the same course, demanding no oath either from him or the astronomer Arago. Independently of his scientific pursuits, he produced several poems of considerable merit.

Born at Paris, 1789; died 1857.

CAUDEBEC, ko'-de-bek, a town of France, department of Seine-Inférieure, 26 miles E. of Havre. It is remarkably picturesque. There is a fine Gothic church. Manf. Cotton goods, leather, soap, and sail-cloth. Pop. 2,000. Formerly the fortified capital of the Pays de Caux, and in 1419 taken by the English.

CAUDETE, kaw-da'-te, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, 50 miles S.E. of Albacete. Pop. 5,500, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

CAUDIUM, kaw-dē'-um, a city of Samnium, on the frontiers of Campania, between Beneventum and Capua. In its neighbourhood is the defile known as the "Caudine Forks," celebrated for the check which the Romans here received at the hands of the Samnites, 321 B.C. Closed up in the defile by a stratagem of the Samnite general, the whole Roman army, with the consuls Calvinus and Albinus, was obliged to surrender and pass under the yoke.

CAULAINCOURT, ARMAND AUGUSTIN LOUIS DE, ko'-lan-koor, duke of Vicenza, a French military officer and diplomatist, who took part in most of the wars of the French revolution, and attracted the attention of Napoleon I., who successively made him grand equerry, general of division, and duke of Vicenza. In 1807 he was sent as ambassador to Russia, and succeeded in gaining the friendship and esteem of the emperor Alexander. Being unable to persuade Napoleon to adopt a policy of peace towards Russia, he resigned his post, and received a military appointment in Spain. After the reverses of the Russian campaign, he was sent on various missions to the courts of Napoleon's allies, was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and ever showed himself devoted to the interests of the emperor and his dynasty. During the Hundred Days he was again foreign minister, and after the downfall of the emperor retired into private life. From 1837 to 1840 he published, under the title of "Souvenirs of the Duke of Vicenza," interesting memorials of the empire.

Born at Caulaincourt, Somme, 1772; died in Paris, 1827.

CAUS, SOLOMON DE, ko, a French mechanic and engineer, who, being of the reformed religion, served under several Protestant princes. He is believed to have discovered the principle of steam engines forty years before the Marquis of Worcester wrote on the subject.

Died 1635.

CAUSSADE, ko-sa'de, a town of France, department of Tarn-et-Garonne, 13 miles N.E. of Montauban. Manf. Linen and woollens, leather, and sugar. There is a good trade in grain, cattle, wool, and agricultural produce. Pop. 2,400.

CAUSSIDIÈRE, MARK, ko-sid'-e-air, a French politician, born of a family of humble artisans, took an active part with the revolutionists of 1834, in Lyons and St. Etienne. He was taken prisoner and sent to Mount St. Michel, where he was confined till 1837, when he was released by the amnesty granted by the minister Molé. In 1848, when his party triumphed, he was appointed prefect of police, in which capacity he acted with great firmness, and had the glory of extracting order from disorder. He was one of the firmest defenders of the rights of property throughout the insurrectionary movements of the time. For the inactivity which he showed on the 15th of May, he was accused before the National Assembly; but he not only defended himself, but justified his conduct. After the days of June, he was again accused, and by a vote of the Assembly, condemned on the night of the 25-26th of August. He immediately took refuge in London, where he published his memoirs, in which a full explanation of his conduct will be found. After this he relinquished politics and entered on a mercantile life.

Born at Lyons, 1809.

CAUVERY, kaw'-ve-ri, a river in the south of India, discharging, after a course of 470 miles, into the Bay of Bengal, in the province of Tangore. Lat. of source 12° 25' N. Lon. 75° 34' E.

CAVA, LA, ka'-va, a town of Italy, 3 miles N.W. of Salerno. About a mile distant is the Benedictine monastery of the Trinity, famous for its immense collection of valuable manuscripts. Manf. Silk, cotton, linen, and pottery. Pop. 21,016.

CAVADONGA. (See COVADUNGA.)

CAVALCANTI, GUIDO, ka-val-kaw'-te, a Florentine philosopher and poet, a friend of Dante, and, like other of the prominent Ghibellines, exiled, but afterwards permitted to return. His poems are chiefly addressed to a young lady whom he names Mandetta.

Died 1310.

CAVAIGNAC, LOUIS EUGÈNE, ka'-van-yak, a French general and statesman, entered the army, and, as a captain of engineers, served in the Morea, when the revolution of 1830 found him one of its firmest adherents. A warm republican and fearless in the expression of his opinions, it was found necessary to give him employment abroad. Accordingly, in 1832, he was sent to join the army of Africa. Here he distinguished himself in various skirmishes and battles, when, in 1836, he was appointed to the command of the garrison in the citadel of Tlemsen. In this post he continued to extend his fame for determination and valour. Soon afterwards, he had the command of a battalion in the infantry of the line. In 1840 we find him holding a lieutenant-colonelcy in the Zouaves, with whom he had served before; and in the following year he was made a colonel; but, subsequently, he again entered the line, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Isly. In this conflict he commanded the vanguard under General Bugeaud, and, for his conduct, was, in 1844, created a maréchal-de-camp. In 1846, at the head of 6,000 men, he drove Abd-el-Kader before him; and, in the following year, succeeded Lamoricière in the government of Oran. In 1848 he was appointed governor-general of Algeria, and two months afterwards, was invited by Lamartine to Paris, where he promptly suppressed the insurrection of June, and established his character for great decision and military ability. On this occasion he became dictator, and defeated the anarchists after a general slaughter of 8,000 individuals. On the achievement of this feat, he resigned the dictatorship, and was appointed president of the council by the National Assembly. He next came forward as a candidate for the office of president of the republic, and was supported by nearly 1,450,000 votes. On December 2, 1851, he was arrested; but, shortly afterwards, was set at large, and permitted to live undisturbed in France, although he abstained from giving his support to the government of Napoleon III. In 1857 he was elected, with M. Carnot, a member of the Legislative Assembly, by the 4th arrondissement of Paris; but both refused to take the oath to the emperor. Cavaignac died suddenly of heart disease, a few weeks afterwards. He was buried in the cemetery of Montmartre, at Paris.

Born in Paris, 1802; died 1857.

CAVAILLON, ka-vaïl'-yon, a town of France, department Vaucluse, 14 miles S.E. of Avignon, on the right bank of the Durance, situated in the midst of productive orchards. Manf. Silk, oil, vermicelli, and brass utensils. A large silk market is held weekly. There are some Roman remains of interest. Pop. 8,000.

CAVALIER, JEAN, ka-val'-e-ai, the son of a peasant, and one of the principal leaders of the Camisards, or Protestants of Cevennes, when forced into rebellion against Louis XIV., by the persecutions of the Catholic. He defeated the best generals that came against him, and compelled Ma shal de Villars to make a treaty with him. He was then taken into the king's service as colonel of a regiment; but being apprehensive that some design was formed against him, he entered into the service of England, and commanded, with his usual skill, a regiment of French refugees at the battle of Almanza, in Spain. He was afterwards appointed governor of Guernsey and Jersey, and subsequently resided in this country.

Born in the Cevennes, 1679; died at Chelsea, 1740.

CAVALIERI, BUONAVENTURA, ka-val'-e-air-e, an Italian friar, who, from being a disciple of Galileo, became a mathematical professor at Bologna. He wrote several treatises upon his favourite science, of which he was the first to attempt the generalization.

Born at Milan, 1598; died 1647.

CAVALLER-MAGGIORE, a town of Northern Italy, province of Cuneo, 24 miles N.E. of Coni. Pop. 5,300.

CAVALLINI, PIETRO, ka-val-lé-ne, a distinguished artist, who assisted his master, Giotto, in the famous mosaic in the porch of St. Peter's at Rome. Some of his own mosaics are to be seen in the basilica of San Paolo; but we know of no remains of his paintings. The last of these were consumed in the fire of 1824, when the old basilica of San Paolo was nearly entirely destroyed. Some of his frescoes still exist at Orvieto, Florence, and Assisi. It is conjectured that he was the architect of the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey.

Born 1259; died 1344.

CAVALLO, TIBERIUS, ka-val'-lo, an eminent electrician, who began his manhood as a merchant, and ended it as a natural philosopher. His performances were not characterized by originality, so much as by the industry they displayed, and the untiring energy with which he laboured to illustrate electricity and magnetism.

Born at Naples, 1749; died in London, 1809.

CAVAN, kav'-an, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded N. by Fermanagh, E. by Monaghan, S. by the counties of Longford, Meath, and Westmeath, and W. by Leitrim. It consists entirely of hill and dale, with many bogs and lakes, and is mountainous towards the S.W. In general the soil is poor and clayey, except along the courses of the streams. Rivers. The Erne, Croghan, Annalee, and other streams. Lakes. Lough Erne, Lough Oughter, Lough Ramer, and Sheelan. Pro. Oats, potatoes, turnips, and, in some districts, flax. Agriculture, however, is in general in a backward state. Minerals. Coal, lead, copper, iron, manganese, also sulphur. There are several mineral springs. Manf. The principal are yarn and linen. Area, 746 square miles. Pop. 129,008.

CAVAN, the principal town of the above county, situate on a small river of the same name. It has a court-house, a gaol, a county infirmary, and barracks for the military. Its trade is inconsiderable. Pop. 3,050.—A station on the Midland Great Western of Ireland railway.

CAVANUS. (See CUBA.)

CAVASO, a town of Italy, province of Treviso, 20 miles N. of the town of that name. Manf. Linen and woollens, and hats. Pop. 2,500.

CAVE, WILLIAM, kaiv, a distinguished English divine, who wrote a great number of works of a religious tendency, and others with a view to illustrate ecclesiastical history. He was appointed vicar of Islington in 1662, and at the time of his death was vicar of Isleworth. He is remembered chiefly by his "Primitive Christianity," "Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs," and his "Historia Literaria."

Born at Pickwell, Leicestershire, 1637; died at Windsor, 1713.

CAVE, EDWARD, a London bookseller, who was originally a clerk in the excise, but afterwards went to London, where he apprenticed himself to a printer. On the expiration of his time he obtained a place in the Post-office, but still continued at intervals to follow his business. He corrected the "Gradus ad Parnassum," and wrote for the newspapers. On being dismissed from his place for resisting abuses in the privilege of franking, he started the "Gentleman's Magazine," which had great success, and to which Dr. Johnson, at an early stage of his literary career, was a contributor.

Born at Newton, in Warwickshire, 1691; died in London, 1754.

CAVENDISH, HENRY, kav'-en-dish, was the younger son of Lord Charles Cavendish, and nephew of the duke of Devonshire. He was the first to lay the foundation of the modern form which the science of chemistry has taken. His philosophical researches have been followed by the most important results; and it is said that he supplied Lavoisier with the materials for his system. He may be considered as the originator of the science of pneumatic chemistry; made discoveries in electricity, and ascertained the density of the earth. Sir Humphry Davy observed, shortly after his death, that "his processes were all of a finished nature, perfected by the hand of a master; they required no correction; and though many of them were performed in the very infancy of chemical science, yet their accuracy and their beauty have remained unimpaired amidst the progress of discovery." This philosopher was of so singular and retired a disposition, that he could hardly bear the presence of strangers. He was never married; and always exhibited an intense dislike even to speak to women. At all events, Lord Brougham says of him, that "he used to order his dinner daily by a note, which he left at a certain hour on the hall table, whence the housekeeper was to take it." It is also said, that if a female servant showed herself to him, she was immediately dismissed. When he felt death approaching he shut himself up in a room, so that he might uninterruptedly observe the physical symptoms of dissolution. He left property worth upwards of £1,000,000 sterling.

Born at Nice, 1731; died 1810.

CAVENDISH, WILLIAM, duke of Newcastle, Cavalier leader. He was a younger brother of the first Earl of Devonshire, and became a great favourite at the court of James I. In 1620 he was raised to the peerage, and eight years afterwards created Earl of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. In 1638 he was appointed tutor to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles II. On the outbreak of the Parliamentary war, he raised a troop of 200 men, and gave £10,000 to the royal treasury. He was appointed general of the forces raised north of the Trent, and made himself conspicuous by the lavish manner in which he entertained the king. It is said that one banquet cost £15,000. After the battle of Marston Moor he resided on the continent, where he wrote various works of small literary merit. After the restoration he was raised to the rank of duke.

Born 1592; died 1676.

CAVENDISH, MARGARET, duchess of, the eccentric wife, first of Sir Charles Lucas, and then of William Cavendish, duke of Newcastle. (See above.) After the Restoration, she passed the greater part of her time in literary composition, holding the belief that she was one of the greatest geniuses that ever held a pen. She also believed the same of her husband, who, very singularly, entertained a similar opinion of her. The best-known works of the duchess are some plays, which are wretchedly poor productions.

Died 1673.

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH, THOMAS, an enterprising English navigator, who, about 1585, fitted out "a stout bark" of 120 tons, and proceeded to Virginia and the West Indies. By this expedition his fortune was not increased; but on his return he assumed the manners of a courtier, and became one of the gallants of the court of Queen Elizabeth. The mode of life which he then led still further impaired his fortune, and in 1586 he undertook another voyage. He crossed the Atlantic, passed through the Straits of Magellan, and, entering the Pacific, reached the scene where he had intended to recruit his finances. His object was to plunder the Spaniards, with whom England was then at war, and, after greats uccess, he circumnavigated the globe, and arrived at Plymouth in September, 1588. He was now rich enough to purchase an earldom, and was knighted by the queen. In three years, however, he was again reduced in circumstances, when he once more looked to the New World to replenish his coffers. Another expedition was fitted out, but in the manner of a joint-stock concern. It met with no success; and Cavendish, a disappointed and broken-hearted man, ended his days whilst on his passage back from this ill-starred enterprise.

Born in Suffolk, 1564; died at sea, 1593.

CAVENDISH, LORD FREDERICK, a field-marshal in the English service, entered early on a military life. In 1758 he was in the action of St. Cast, on the coast of France, and was taken prisoner, but released on parole. This officer was one of the six who, at the beginning of the "Seven Years' War," entered into an agreement with each other not to marry until peace was restored, so that no domestic relations might influence their conduct. Generals Wolfe, Monkton, and Admiral Keppel were among the number.

Born 1729; died at Twickenham, 1803.

CAVIANA, ka'-ve-a'-na, an island of Brazil, in the northern mouth of the Amazon, on the equator. It is about 50 miles long, and 20 broad, fertile, and well stocked with cattle.

CAVITE, ka'-ve-tai, a fortified seaport-town of Luzon, one of the Philippines, 10 miles S.W. of Manilla. This is the capital of the province of the same name, and the head naval depôt of the Spanish possessions in the East. Manf. Cigars. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 14° 29' N. Lon. 120° 56' E.

CAVITE, a province, of which the preceding is the chief town. The country is flat, but productive in rice, indigo, sugar, and coffee. Its rivers are unimportant. Pop. 57,000.

CAVOUR, CAMILLA BENSO DI, Count de, ka-voor', a modern Italian statesman, whose father amassed a considerable fortune by speculation, and was created a count by Charles-Albert. In 1847, when the principles of reform became prevalent in the states, Count Cavour took a leading part in examining the economical questions of the day; but, in the following year, did not play a very important part in the struggle between his country and Austria. He resided for some time in England, studying our institutions, and on his return to Turin in 1847, established a journal in which he advocated a representation of the middle classes. By his exertions the king of Sardinia was induced to grant a constitution in 1848. After the disaster of Novara, he entered, in 1849, the Chamber of Deputies, succeeding Santa Rosa as minister of commerce and agriculture. In 1851 he became minister of finance, and, by his abilities, re-established the equilibrium which, by the wars of Charles-Albert, had been deranged. He now took the government of Great Britain for his model, and laboured to organize a similar free-trade system for his country, but met with many difficulties in the attempt. In 1852 he succeeded D'Azeglio as premier, and was, for the succeeding seven years, the moving spirit of Sardinian affairs. The great question which occupied his attention after 1848 was the establishment of the union and independence of the Italian states; and, regardless of the threats of Austria, he pursued his object with unswerving constancy. Relying on the active assistance of the emperor of the French, the liberal sympathies of western Europe, and the national sentiment expressed by the elections of 1857, he persevered in his course, which may be considered to have tended greatly to precipitate the war with Austria in 1859. When the peace of Villafranca was concluded in the same year, he resigned the premiership, but returned to office in 1860.

Born at Turin, 1809; died 1861.

CAVOUR, or CAVOR, a town of Italy, province of Turin, 7 miles S.E. of Pinerolo. Manf. Leather, linen, and silk twist. In its vicinity are marble and slate quarries. Pop. 6,000.

CAWNPORE, kawn'-por, a district in the N.W. provinces of British India, between the Ganges and the Jumna, with Futtehpore on the E. and Etawah and Furruckabad on the W. It is a fertile alluvial plain, in a state of high cultivation, and watered by the tributaries of the Ganges, Esun, and Jumna, all of which are navigable.

Pro.—Maize, pulse, wheat, barley, sugar, rice, potatoes, cotton, tobacco, poppy, oil-seeds, European vegetables and fruits. Wine is produced, and indigo grows wild.

Area, 2,353 square miles.

Pop. 1,181,396.

Lat. between 25° 55′ and 27° N. Lon. between 79° 34′ and 80° 37′ E.

CAWNPORE, or CAWNPUR (properly Kahnpur, "chief's town"), the capital of the above, stands on the right bank of the Ganges, 140 miles above Allahabad. Most of the European houses are large and roomy, standing in extensive compounds, and built one story high, with sloping roofs, first thatched, and then covered with tiles,—a roof which is found better than any other to exclude the heat of the sun, and to possess a freedom from the many accidents to which a mere thatched roof is liable. The great inconveniences of the place are its glare and dust; defects, however, which are, in a considerable degree, removed by the multitude of trees planted in all directions. There are handsome assembly rooms, a theatre, a fashionable resort, the course, and several club-rooms. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church. The shops in Cawnpore are large, and, though far from showy, contain many excellent articles, which are sold very little dearer than in Calcutta. The old town, with several mosques, and a ruinous palace of the rajahs, is about two miles to the north-east. Cawnpore is lamentably memorable in the annals of the great Indian mutiny; for here, on June 15, 1857, "the bloodiest record in the book of time" took place. The Nana Sahib ordered 205 British women and children to be murdered in cold blood; and when the butchery was completed, he gave a nautch, or dancing ball, in an adjoining hotel to his friends. On the following day he ordered the bodies to be flung into a well in the compound; but, as this receptacle was too small to hold them all, he caused some to be thrown into the Ganges and other places. Near the fatal well is a memorial building, in the centre of which is an octagonal tomb, with a suitable inscription, and surmounted by a figure of Mercy. A church has also been erected, and the cemetery and well are surrounded by beautifully laid out memorial gardens. Pop. 151,444.

CAXAMARCA, kax'-a-mar'-ka, a town of Peru, 80 miles N.E. of Truxillo. It is well-built, with broad streets, and there are numerous handsome churches. There are thermal baths in the vicinity. Manf. Woollens, linens, arms, and steel articles. A good trade is carried on. Near the town are the remains of the palace of Atahualpa, the last of the sovereign Incas of Peru. Pop. 7,000.

CAXAMARQUILLA, kax'-amar-keel'-la, a town of Peru, 110 miles N.E. of Truxillo. Pop. 8,000.

CAXATAMBO, kax'-a-tam'-bo, a town of Peru, 140 miles N.E. of Lima. Manf. Woollen yarns. Pop. 6,000.

CAXIAS, or ALDEAS ALTOS, kak'-se-as, a large town of Brazil, province of Maranhao, on the right bank of the Itapicura. There is a large transit trade.

CAXTON, WILLIAM, kax'-ton, the first English printer, who, at the age of 15, was apprenticed to a mercer, and, on the death of his master, went to the continent, as agent of the Mercers' Company. During his residence in Flanders, he acquired a knowledge of the new invention of printing, and the first book he put to press was the "Recueil of the History of Troy," in the original. This work he himself afterwards translated "by commandment of Margaret, duchess of Bourgorne, &c.," and printed in 1471. In 1474 appeared "The Game and Playe of the Chess," which was succeeded by other works. He printed in the Almonry in Westminster. He had a good knowledge of French, German, and Dutch, and translated "Reynard the Fox," and other German books.

Born in Kent, about 1412; died 1491.

CAYENNE, kay'-en, an island of S. America, in French Guiana, 18 miles in length from N. to S., and 10 broad. There are some hills in the north-west, but the southern part is low and swampy. Pro. Cotton, sugar, maize, tobacco, indigo, pepper, cloves, cocoa, and rice. Pop. 20,284. Lat. 50° 0′ N. Lon. 53° 15′ W.—It was taken by the British in 1809, but was restored to France at the peace of Paris, in 1814. The climate is described as unhealthy in the extreme; and to the swamps were deported, by the government of Louis Napoleon, and afterwards by the Republican government, political criminals.

CAYENNE, the capital of the above island, stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, on the north side of the island. It has a shallow harbour, protected by batteries, and is the centre of all the trade of French Guiana. Pop. 8,000.

CAYES, kai, a port on the south coast of Hayti. The harbour is exposed and dangerous. A large trade in sugar, indigo, cotton, and coffee is carried on. Pop. 3,000.

CAYMANS, kai'-mans, three islands of the British West Indies, in the Caribbean Sea, 130 miles N. of Jamaica, of which they are dependencies. Pop. 200, chiefly occupied in catching turtle for the inhabitants of some of the other islands.

CAYSTER, kais'-ter, a river of Asia Minor, which, after a course of 75 miles, falls into the Gulf of Scala Nova, 35 miles from Smyrna. The ruins of Ephesus stand at its mouth.

CAYUGA, kai-yoo'-ga, a county of New York, United States, E. of Cayuga lake. Desc. Fertile, and producing the usual cerealia, and having gypsum and salt, with numerous sulphur springs. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 65,081.

CAYUGA LAKE, between Cayuga and Seneca counties, United States, 40 miles long, and from 1 to 4 broad. Its outlet is Seneca river, which falls into Lake Erie.

CAZALLA-DE-LA-SIERRA, ka-thal'-la, a town in the Sierra-Morena, Spain, 38 miles N.E. of Seville. The district around is well wooded, and iron, silver, copper, sulphur, and marble are abundant. Manf. Machinery, agricultural implements, cannon, and leather. There are smelting-works, and weaving is carried on. Pop. 8,000.

CAZEMBE, ka-zem'-be, a country in the interior of Africa, S. and W. of Lake Tanganyika, with a fortified capital town, said to be some miles in circumference. Pro. Maize, manioc, copper, iron, and ivory. Lat. of its capital, 11° 45′ S. Lon. 30° 30′ E.

CAZENOVIA, kas'-e-no'-ve-a, a post township of New York, U.S., 40 miles from Utica. It is a pleasant and flourishing place, and contains a courthouse, gaol, church, and bank. Woollen and fulling mills are the principal sources of industry. Pop. 5,000.

CAZORLA, ka-zor'-la, a town of Spain, 40 miles N.E. of Jaen, pleasantly situated on a hill-side by the Vega. It is of considerable antiquity, and there are two old castles, one erected by the Arabs. Manf. Leather, earthenware, soap, and bricks. Pop. 7,500.

CEARA, sai-ar-a', a maritime province of Brazil, stretching along the N. coast, where it is bounded by the Atlantic. On the other sides it is inclosed by the Rio Grande-do-Norte, Pernambuco, and Piauhi. The country rises from the Atlantic coast towards the centre, in the form of an amphitheatre. It is fertile and well watered, producing a great deal of timber, and abounds in minerals. Area, 50,000 square miles. Pop. 722,000. Lat. between 2° 40′ and 7° 25′ S. Lon. between 37° 40′ and 41° 30′ W.

CEBES, se'-bees, a Greek philosopher, a disciple of Socrates. The "Pinax," or Picture of Human Life, is generally attributed to him. It is usually printed with the "Enchiridion" of Epictetus.

Born at Thebes, and lived in the 5th century B.C.

CEBREROS, se-bra'-ros, a town of Spain, province of Avila, on the left bank of the Alberche, crossed by a handsome bridge. Manf. Leather, wine, and oil. Pop. 2,800.

CECIL, see'-il, a county of Maryland, U.S., on the E. shore of the Chesapeake, enclosed by Pennsylvania, Delaware, Kent county, and the Chesapeake. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 27,108.

CECIL, ROBERT, earl of Salisbury, son of William Cecil, the eminent statesman. (See BURLEIGH, Lord.) He succeeded his father as secretary of state, and was created Earl of Salisbury by James I. In 1608 he was made lord high treasurer. He was a statesman of great ability, but his persecution of Ralcigh has injured his reputation.

Born 1550; died 1612.

CECILIA, ST., a Christian martyr, and considered the patron of music, belonged to a noble Roman family, and being converted to Christianity, refused to sacrifice to idols. One legend is that she was thrown into a cauldron of boiling water, where she remained unhurt, and was then condemned to be beheaded, but the executioner found it impossible to obey his orders. Cecilia, however, saved farther trouble by dying naturally three days afterwards. She is regarded as the inventor of the organ, and Dryden's allusion,

> "At length divine Cecilia came, > Inventress of the vocal frame," and Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," must be remembered.

Died 230.

CECLAVIN, se-kla'-ven, a Spanish town, province of Caceres, 10 miles N.E. of Alcantara. It is well built, and the streets are wide. Sulphureous baths in the neighbourhood are frequented. Manf. Linen and woollens, soap, candles, hardware, earthenware, oil, and wine. Pop. 4,700.

CECROPS, se'-krops, the founder of Athens, who led a colony to Attica about the 16th century B.C., and divided the country into twelve communities, of which Athens afterwards became the capital. He established the tribunal of the Areopagus, extended the worship of Minerva and Jupiter, introduced agriculture, and the rites of marriage and burial. Athens was originally called Cecropia, in honour of Cecrops, and the word is often used for Attica, the Athenians being also called Cecropidæ.

Died at Sais, Egypt; lived in the 10th century B.C.

CEDAR MOUNTAINS, se'-dar, a range in Cape Colony, South Africa. It runs between the Thorn and Oliphant rivers, having a varying elevation of from 1,500 to 5,000 feet. The mountains take their name from the cedar-trees with which their sides are, in different places, clothed.

CEDAR LAKE, a lake of N. America, about 60 miles from Lake Winnipeg.

CEDRON, ke'-dron, or KIDRON, a brook flowing at the foot of Mount Olivet into the Dead Sea, Palestine.

CEFALU, se-fa-loo', a seaport on the north coast of Sicily, 47 miles S.E. of Palermo. It is surrounded by old walls, and there are the ruins of a Saracenic castle on an adjoining hill. There is a cathedral. The place is of slight importance as a seaport; but the fisheries give employment to a large number of the inhabitants. Pop. 10,000.

CEHEGIN, se-ha-gin', a town of Spain, in the province of Murcia, 37 miles N.W. of the city of that name. It is well built, with wide streets. Manf. Paper, cloth, and pottery. Pop. 10,000.

CELAKOWSKY, FRANTISEK LADISLAW, sel'-a-kov'-ske, a modern Bohemian poet and philologist, who, besides some original effusions, produced a translation of Sir W. Scott's "Lady of the Lake," into a kind of Ossianic prose, which does not seem to have had the effect of inspiring his countrymen with a very exalted idea of the poetical qualities of the Scottish minstrel. He subsequently became the editor of the leading newspaper at Prague, and also professor of the Bohemian language in that university. These situations he afterwards lost on account of an article which he wrote against the severities exercised by the emperor Nicholas of Russia upon the insurgent Poles of 1831. In 1842 he obtained a professorship of Sclavonian literature in Breslau, where he remained for several years. In 1849 he returned to Prague, mentally shattered through misfortunes and domestic calamities, which he did not long survive.

Born at Strakonue, 1799; died at Prague, 1852.

CELANO, TOMMASA DA, se-la'-no, Italian Minorite friar, author of the celebrated Latin hymn, "Dies ira, dies illa," which has been translated into nearly all the European languages, and set to music by some of the most illustrious composers.

Died about 1250.

CELAYA, or ZELAYA, se-lal'-ya, a town of the republic of Mexico, in the state of Guanajuto, 130 miles N.W. of Mexico. It is situated more than 6,000 feet above the sea level, on the right bank of the Rio Grande de Santiago, across which there is a handsome bridge. There are several churches, the finest of which is the church of the Carmelites. Manf. Leather and saddlery. Horses and mules are bred in the environs. Pop. 7,000.

CELEBES, sel'-e-bees, a large island of a very irregular figure, in the Asiatic archipelago, S.E. of Borneo. It consists of four peninsulas, between which immense bays are formed, affording secure harbours for shipping. The surface is diversified with hill and dale, but mountainous in the centre, where Lampoo Betang attains an elevation of 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. Volcanoes exist in the N. and S. peninsulas. This island, generally, is well watered, and its climate healthy. There are several large lakes at considerable elevations.

Area, 70,000 square miles.

Pro.—Maize, rice, cassava, tobacco, cotton, yams, sago, and sugar. Excellent breeds of cattle and horses are raised, vegetables are abundant, and poultry is plentiful.

Minerals.—Iron, salt, and gold.

Manf.—Cloths and variegated mats, but the native produce is collected and exchanged for muskets, gunpowder, calicoes, and other British and Indian manufactures. Turtles abound on the coast, and the Boojir, or sea-gipsies, who live in their vessels, carry on an active trade with the Chinese in tortoise-shell, birds'-nests, trepang, pearl, and sharks' fins.

Chief Town.—MACASSAR.

Pop.—Nearly 1,700,000.

Lat. Between 1° 50′ N. and 5° 30′ S. Lon. Between 119° and 125° E.

History.—The Portuguese established themselves in Celebes in 1512, and were expelled by the Dutch in 1667. The latter were dispossessed by the British in 1811; but by the treaty of Paris, in 1816, the Dutch settlements were again restored.

CELESTIAL MOUNTAINS, otherwise THIAN'-SHAN', a lofty chain of Central Asia.

CELESTINE, sel'-es-teen, the name of several Popes. The most remarkable was Celestine V., a Benedictine monk, who founded a new order called the Celestines, suppressed in France in 1778. Confining himself to his cell, he spent a life of constant devotion, which led to his being elected Pope, in 1294. Cardinal Cajetan prevailed upon him to resign the chair, and was afterwards elected in his stead. (See BONIFACE VIII.) He then caused the credulous Celestine to be imprisoned in a castle, where he died, 1296. Clement V. canonized him in 1313.

CELLAMERE, ANTONIO GUIDICE, Prince, sel'-la-mere, general and statesman. He took a prominent part on the Spanish side in the War of Succession, was taken prisoner by the Imperialists in 1707, and detained for five years in Milan, after which he returned to Spain, and in 1715 was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of France, where he engaged in a conspiracy for supplanting the regent, Philip of Orleans, and was sent back to Spain under guard. He was afterwards appointed captain-general of Old Castile.

Born at Naples, 1657; died at Seville, 1733.

CELLARIUS, CHRISTOPH, sel-lair'-e-us, a German professor of philosophy and Oriental languages at Weimar, who attracted the attention of Frederick I., elector of Brandenburg, and first king of Prussia, who gave him the professorship of history and rhetoric in the university of Halle, Saxony. In this tranquil capacity he passed the greater part of his life, and produced several works of great merit. Among these may be noticed his "Atlas Cœlestis," and his "Notitia Orbis Antiquæ."

Born at Smalkald, 1638; died at Halle, 1707.

CELLE, or ZELL, tsell, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hanover, on the left bank of the Aller, 23 miles N.E. of Hanover. It is well built and paved, containing several churches, a library, gymnasium, lying-in-hospital, royal palace, medical school, and penitentiary. In the old parish church is the burial-vault of the house of Brunswick-Luneberg. Caroline Matilda, queen of Denmark and sister of George III., died here, and the town contains a monument to her memory. (See CAROLINE.) Manf. Linen fabrics, hosiery, soap, chicory, tobacco, wafers, and brandy. Pop. 16,200.

CELLINI, BENVENUTO, chel-le'-ne, a famous Florentine artist, who served an apprenticeship to a jeweller and goldsmith, and, at the same time, applied himself to the study of drawing, engraving, and music. He was appointed by Clement VII. his goldsmith and musician. Being of a very turbulent disposition, he was frequently engaged in quarrels, in one of which he so severely wounded his antagonist that he was forced to make his escape from Florence to Rome, in the disguise of a friar. Here he distinguished himself by his courage in defending the citadel against the constable of Bourbon, whom he boasted of having killed as he attempted to scale the city walls. He also defended the castle of St. Angelo, and the duke of Orange, he declared, was killed by the ball which was shot from a cannon he had directed. After this, he was employed to engrave stamps for the mint, and the coins and medals which he executed are very beautiful. On the death of Clement VII., in 1534, he returned to Florence, whence he went to France, where he was patronized by Francis I., but soon, quitting that country, revisited Rome, where he was confined a long time in the castle of St. Angelo, on the charge of having robbed the fortress of a considerable treasure, when he had the care of it. He escaped, but was retaken, and suffered great hardships till released by the mediation of Cardinal Ferrara. He then revisited France, where he executed some fine works of sculpture, and cast large figures in metal, which gained him a high reputation. After staying there five years, he returned to his own country, and was employed by the grand duke Cosmo de Medici, who gave him a studio, where he commenced his great work, "Perseus," which was not finished for some time afterwards. It now adorns the market-place of Florence. The success of this performance was so great that, in gratitude, he went on a pilgrimage to Valambrosi and Camaldoli. He now contested the palm of glory with Bandinelli for a design of Neptune. Cellini's work being pronounced the best, caused the death of the rival sculptor, through grief. His fame was now firmly established, and he spent the remainder of his days in Florence. He worked equally well in marble and metal, and his productions are held in the highest estimation. He wrote a treatise on the goldsmith's art, and another on sculpture and the casting of metals. He also wrote his own life, which has been translated into English by W.

Roscoe, and which presents us with a tolerably accurate picture of the manners of the 16th century.
Born in Florence, 1500; died 1572.

CELSIUS, OLAUS, sel'-se-oos, a Swedish botanist, theologian, and orientalist. He was the professor of theology and the eastern languages at Upsal, and, by command of Charles XI., visited the principal states of Europe, to compile an account of the plants mentioned in the Bible. He wrote a number of works, the principal of which are "Hierobotanicon," being dissertations on the plants of the Scriptures, "De Linguâ Novi Testamenti Originali."—Celsius is regarded as the founder of natural history in Sweden. He was the first master and patron of Linnæus, the great botanist, who gave to a new genus of plants the name of Celsia.
Born 1670; died 1756.

CELSUS, sel'-sus, an Epicurean philosopher, who, about the year 150, wrote an attack on Christianity, which was answered by Origen, in the famous "Contra Celsum."
Lived in the 2nd century.

CELSUS, AULUS CORNELIUS, a celebrated Roman physician, who lived in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Nothing is known with certainty of his personal history, but he is supposed to have practised medicine at Rome. He appears to have understood the sciences of rhetoric, agriculture, and military tactics, as well as medicine, and compiled a kind of cyclopædia, treating on those various subjects, with great ability and success. Only one work of his has come down to the moderns, called "De Medicinâ," consisting of eight books, and it is considered the most precious work of its kind which the Romans have left us. Celsus was styled the Hippocrates of the Latins, and is universally admired for his extensive erudition and the purity of his language. Eighty editions of his "De Medicinâ" have been published, and a good English translation by Dr. Grieve appeared in 1756.
Lived in the 1st century.

CELTÆ, sel'-te, or kel'-te, the Celts, a great people of Gaul, a portion of the Indo-Germanic race, who, at a very early period, would seem to have spread from east to west across central Europe, and to have left in their route various tribes; amongst others, the Cimmerians, in the Crimea; the Cimbrians, in Jutland; and different races in ancient Illyria, before the great body of them settled in Gaul. According to some authorities, the name of Gaul or Gael (Gallus) is synonymous with the Celts dwelling in Gaul; but, according to others, it means the primitive indigenous population, with whom the Celts, who would then be no other than the Cimbri (or Kymri), divided the country. From Gaul the united Gauls and Celts swarmed into Germany, where they occupied Bohemia, and then Bavaria; thence into Italy, of which almost the whole northern portion took the name of Cisalpine Gaul; and here they left the Ligurians, the Isombrians, and the Ombrians. They afterwards overran Spain and Portugal, Britain, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland.

CENCI, FRANCESCO, chen'-che, a Roman nobleman, who plunged into the lowest depths of infamy, and was only saved from an ignominious end by his gold, with which he corrupted the judges. He had four sons and one daughter, the celebrated Beatrice Cenci, all of whom he treated with the most abominable cruelty. He is even accused of having assassinated his two elder sons and of having violated his own daughter. Revolting at the horrible scenes she had passed through, Beatrice, it is asserted by the historian Muratori, in concert with two of her brothers, and Lucretia, her stepmother, accomplished the death of the hated Francesco. Other writers, however, mention the innocence of Beatrice. Accused and found guilty of the murder, all four perished on the scaffold, that sentence having been passed on them by Clement VIII. Notwithstanding the strong evidence submitted to him of her innocence and the horrible crimes of her father, it is said the pope was anxious to obtain the Cenci possessions. This terrible event made a profound impression on the People of Rome, and for many ages the name of Beatrice Cenci was preserved in the popular airs. The death of the Cenci has been the subject for many paintings, of which the most celebrated is in the Colonna palace, Rome, and was for a long time attributed to Guido Reni. The life of Beatrice has also been dramatized.

CENCI, BEATRICE, daughter of the above.

CENIS, or CENISIO, MOUNT, se-ne', a mountain of the Alps, in Savoy, famous for the railway tunnel, nearly 8 miles long, constructed through it, between 1857 and 1870.

CENTALLO, sen-tal'-lo, a town of Italy, 7 miles N.E. of Coni, near the right bank of the Grana. There is an old castle. Pop. 5,000.

CENTAURI, sen-taw'-ri, "bull-killers," in Greek legend, Centaurs, a people of Thessaly, half men and half horses. They are supposed by some to be the offspring of Centaurus, son of Apollo, by Stilbia, daughter of the Peneus, and by others, to be the progeny of Ixion. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in classic history, and the distinguished painters Phidias and Parrhasius represented it in the temple of Jupiter, at Olympia and at Athens. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the intoxicated Centaurs offered rude violence to the women that were present. This insult irritated Hercules, Theseus, and others of the Lapithæ, and they attacked and defeated the Centaurs, obliging them to leave the country and retire to Arcadia. They were afterwards extirpated by Hercules, few escaping his vengeance. The truth respecting the Centaurs probably is that they were expert horsemen, and that some of the tribes on whom they made inroads never having seen mounted men, conceived that the rider and horse formed one animal.

CENTLIVRE, SUSANNA, sent-le'-ver, an English actress and dramatic writer, whose performances are marked by considerable elegance and vivacity, though not altogether free from a charge of indelicacy. Her maiden name was Freeman. She was three times married, first, to a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox; next, to an officer named Canol; and for the third time (being then only 26 years of age) to Joseph Centlivre, chief cook to queen Anne. Among her best plays are "A Bold Stroke for a Wife," "The Busybody," and "The Wonder."
Born, it is supposed, in Ireland, 1680; died in London, 1723.

CENTO, chen'-to, a town of Italy, 16 miles N.W. of Bologna. It is pleasantly situated near the Reno, and contains several churches, convents, and a cathedral. Pop. 5,000.

CENTRAL AMERICA. (See AMERICA, CENTRAL.)

CENTRAL PROVINCES. (See INDIA).

CENTRE, sen'-ter, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., inclosed by the counties of Lycoming, Northumberland, Mifflin, Huntingdon, and Clearfield, diversified with barren mountains and fertile valleys, yielding a considerable quantity of timber, and the usual cerealia. It has also iron, coal, and limestone. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 37,922. Belfont is the capital.

CENTREVILLE, sent-ter-veel, a town of the United States, 45 miles from Buffalo. Pop. 1,500.

CEOS, or ZEA, an island of the Ægean Sea.

CEPHALONIA, or KEPHALLENIA, sef'-a-ló'-ne-a, the largest of the Ionian islands, is situate in the Mediterranean, opposite the entrance of the Gulf of Lepanto, between Santa Maura, Zante, and the coasts of Morea, and Livadia. The principal capes are Fiscardo in the north, and Capra in the south. The island is irregular in shape, and uneven in surface. Mount Nero, or Black Mountain, in the south, rises to a height of upwards of 5,300 feet above the level of the sea.

Pro.—Maize, wheat, corn, currants, flax, cotton, olive oil, wine, and salt. Of these, a considerable quantity is exported.

Area, 348 square miles.

Pop. 80,543.

Lat. between 38° 3′ and 38° 30′ N. Lon. between 20° 21′ and 20° 49′ E.

History.—This is the Samos of Homer and the Tetrapolis of Thucydides. In 1809 it was taken by the British, under whose protection it continued until 1864, when the Ionian Isles were ceded to Greece. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CEPHALUS, sef'-a-lus, in Greek legend, son of Deioneus, king of Thessaly, and husband of Procris, an Athenian princess. Aurora became enamoured of him, but he remained faithful to his wife. Aurora, however, with a view of gaining his affections from Procris, wished him to prove his wife's fidelity. Disguised as a merchant, he entered his own house, and Procris's virtue was not proof against the riches he offered her. He then drove her from his door; but she afterwards similarly tempted him, and he yielded, and a reconciliation was soon effected between them. Finally, Cephalus, whilst hunting, accidentally pierced her with his spear; and, in despair at her death, killed himself with the same weapon.

CEPHISUS, or CEPHISSUS, se-fi'-sus, a celebrated river of Greece, rising at Lilæa, in Phocis, and, after passing to the N. of Delphi and Mount Parnassus, entered Bœotia, where it flowed into the lake Copais. The Graces loved this river, and were called the goddesses of the Cephisus.—There was another river of the same name in Attica, and also in Argolis.

CERACCHI, GIUSEPPE, sculptor, one of the most promising pupils of Canova. In 1798 he took part in establishing a republic at Rome. He went to Paris, where, with other young artists, he formed a conspiracy against Napoleon, for which he suffered death.

Born in Corsica, 1760; died 1801.

CERAM, se-ra'm, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, between New Guinea on the E. and Booro on the W. It is about 200 miles long, but narrow. It is traversed by a chain of mountains, which attain an average elevation of 8,000 feet, and produce fine timber. The valleys teem with fertility, and the vegetation is both luxuriant and gigantic. The Dutch have several establishments on the coast, and claim to possess the island. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 28,000. Lat. between 2° 47′ and 3° 50′ S. Lon. between 128° and 131° E.

CERAMI, se-ra'-me, a town of Sicily, 7 miles N.E. of Nicosia. Silver, copper, sulphur, and slate are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,700.

CERBERUS, ser'-be-rus, in Greek mythology a dog with three heads, who was stationed as a watch at the entrance of Hades, and guarded it night and day. Orpheus, when he descended into the infernal regions in search of Eurydice, lulled him to sleep with his lyre; and Hercules dragged him from the gate of Hades, when he went to redeem Alceste.

CERDIC, ser'-dik, a Saxon chief, who, in the first year of the 6th century, invaded England, and, after an obstinate resistance from the Britons, sustaining many defeats, yet winning more victories, established, about 516, the kingdom of Wessex. At his death, in 534, he possessed the Isle of Wight and the present counties of Hants, Dorset, Wilts, and Berks, and was succeeded by his son Cynric.

CERE, ST., seer, a town of France, in the department Lot, on an island formed by the Baue. A remarkable fortress on a conical hill, 600 feet high, is in the neighbourhood. Manf. Principally hats, and it has a linen trade. Pop. 3,000.

CEREA, a town of Northern Italy, 19 miles S.E. of Verona There are the remains of an old castle. Pop. 6,000.

CERES, se'-reez, in mythology the goddess of corn and of harvests, was the daughter of Saturn and Vesta, sometimes named Demeter. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom she called Pherephata, "fruit-bearing," and afterwards Proserpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto, as she was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. Ceres went in search of her daughter, and, during her absence, Attica had become the most desolate country in the world, when she instructed Triptolemus of Eleusis in everything which concerned agriculture. Her benefits to mankind made Ceres respected, and Sicily was supposed to be the favourite retreat of the goddess. Attica, which had been so eminently distinguished by her, gratefully remembered her favours in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. Ceres is the same as the Isis of the Egyptians; and her worship, it is said, was first brought into Greece by Erechtheus.

CERET, ser-ay', a town of France, department of Pyrenées-Orientales, on the right bank of the Tech, near the Spanish frontier, 15 miles S.W. of Perpignan. The river is crossed by a bridge of one arch 147 feet in span, and the town is surrounded by walls. Manf. Copper wares, cork, and leather. Pop. 2,900.—Here, in 1660, the plenipotentiaries of Spain and France met to determine the limits of the two kingdoms.

CERIGNOLA, che-reen'-yo-la, a town of Italy, in the province of Capitanata, 28 miles S. of Manfredonia. There are the old and new towns, the former partially fortified. Manf. Chiefly linen; and the district produces large quantities of cotton and almonds. Pop. 22,659.—Here, in 1503, the French were defeated by the Spaniards, the duke of Nemours, who commanded the former, being slain, and the supremacy of Spain in Italy being established.

CERIGO, or KERIGO, cher'-e-go, one of the Ionian islands, situate at the entrance of the Archipelago, to the S. of the Morea, from which it is separated by a narrow strait. Hilly, with fertile valleys, and a precipitous and rocky coast. There are two caverns, famous for stalactites. Area, 107 square miles. Pro. Grain crops, olives, and the vine. Pop. 14,500, of Greek origin, and belonging to the Greek church. Lat. between 36° 28′ N. Lon. 23° E. The chief town is CAPSALI. This island was noted in antiquity for the worship of Venus, and it still contains some remains of the ancient Cythera and its temples. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CERIGOTTO, or KERIGOTTO, cher'-e-got'-to, the most S. of the Ionian islands, 18 miles from Cerigo. Ext. 6 miles long, by from 1 to 2 broad. Desc. Mountainous, and fertile in producing olives. Pop. 300. This was long a favourite resort of Greek pirates. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CERINTHIUS, se-rin'-the-us, a Gnostic heretic of the first century, who is supposed to have directly opposed the teaching of the Apostle John. He studied at Alexandria, and afterwards lived at Ephesus. Very little is known about his life or writings.

CERISY-LA-SALLE, sa-re'-se, a town of France, department Manche. There are many Druidical remains in the vicinity. Manf. Muslin, calico, and lace. Pop. 2,300.

CERNAY, or SENNHEIM, sair-nai', a town of France, department Haut-Rhine, 17 miles N.E. of Belfort, on the left bank of the Thur. Manf. Cotton goods and machinery and paper. Pop. 3,600.

CERNIN, ST., sair-nahn', a town of France, department Cantal, in a hilly district, 8 miles N.W. of Aurillac. There is an ancient and very fine church, and in the neighbourhood are the castle of Marzeres, and several old feudal residences. Pop. 3,000.

CERNUSCO, cher-noos'-co, a town of Italy, 7 miles N.E. of Milan, standing on both sides of the canal of Martesana, which is crossed by a handsome bridge. The town contains many good houses surrounded by beautiful gardens. Pop. 3,700.

CERRETO, che-rai'-to, an Italian town, on a slope of the Apennines, 22 miles N.E. of Capua. There is a cathedral, and the town is well built. Manf. Coarse cloth. Pop. 6,500.

CERRO DE ANDEVALO, ser'-ro, a town in the south of Spain, 24 miles N.W. of Huelva. There is a trade in wool and timber. Pop. 2,700.

CERRO GORDA, a town of Peru, about 140 miles N.E. of Lima. It stands 14,000 feet above the level of the sea, with a climate throughout the year resembling the winter of England. Its silver-mines are the richest in Peru. Pop. uncertain, but estimated at from 10,000 to 15,000.

CERROS, ser'-ros, a barren island of the North Pacific, off the west coast of California. It is 30 miles long. Lat. 28° 3′ N. Lon. 115° 11′ W.

CERTALDO, chair-tal'-do, a town of Italy, on the Elsa, 18 miles S.W. of Florence. Boccaccio resided and died here. His house is still standing. Pop. 6,500.

CERVANTES DE SAAVEDRA, MIGUEL, ser-van'-tees, a distinguished Spanish novelist, the author of "Don Quixote." In early years he discovered a strong predilection for literature, but his necessities forced him to seek for a livelihood by some other means. Consequently, at the age of 22, he entered the service of Cardinal Aquaviva of Rome, as a page, but subsequently entered the navy, and lost his left hand at the famous battle of Lepanto, in 1571. This misfortune did not prevent him joining the troops of the king of Spain at Naples; but when returning to Spain by sea, he was made a prisoner by pirates, who took him to Algiers, where, for five years, he was kept as a slave. After this period he was ransomed, when he went to Madrid. There he settled, married, and, in the course of about ten years, published about thirty dramas. The prolific Lope de Vega, however, was at that time at the head of the Spanish drama, to whom, therefore, he resigned the palm of superiority, and directing his genius into a kindred channel, he produced, in 1605, the immortal novel of "Don Quixote." Inimitable in its wit and humour as this work is, it was at first received with comparative indifference. Ultimately, however, it met with the greatest applause, although the author reaped few or none of the emoluments which might have been expected from it. He was compelled to continue to struggle on in the shades of poverty, sustained only by the consciousness of being possessed of such talents as fall to the lot of few to cultivate. He afterwards wrote a clever work, "Journey to Parnassus," and a number of tales and dramas. He and Shakspeare died on the same day.

Born at Alcala de Henares, New Castile, 1547; died 1616.

CERVERA, sair-vair'-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Barcelona, 28 miles E. of Lerida. There are old walls and gates, and a ruinous castle. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton fabrics. Pop. 5,300.

CERVETERE, chair-vai-tair'-ai, an Italian town, 27 miles W. of Rome. Pop. 750. This is the Cære of antiquity, and is celebrated by Virgil as the capital of Mezentius.

CERVIA, cher'-ve-a, a town of Italy, on the shore of the Adriatic, 13 miles S.E. of Ravenna. There are a cathedral and several convents. Large salt-works give employment to many of the inhabitants. Pop. 6,000.

CERVIN, MONT, sair'-va(n), the Matterhorn, or Monte Silvio, a mountain of the Pennine Alps, 40 miles N.E. of Mont Blanc. Height, 14,835 feet. (See ALPS.)

CERVINARA, cher-ve-nai'-ra, a town of Naples, in the province of Principate Ulterio, 12 miles N.W. of Avellina. There are a convent and several churches. Pop. 6,400.

CESARI, GIUSEPPE, sai-sa'-ra, Italian painter, known also as Giuseppino and Il Cavaliere d'Arpino. He was a brilliant colourist, but his style was strongly condemned by the Caracci and the other early adherents of the "naturalistic" school.

Born at Rome, 1570; died 1642.

CESARIA, SAN, sai-sa'-re-a, a town of Italy, province Napoli. There is a magnificent palace. Pop. 3,500.

CESAROTTI, MELCHIORE, sai'-sa-rot'-te, an Italian poet, and professor of rhetoric, Greek, and Hebrew in the university of Padua. In 1762 he translated the poems of the Scottish Ossian into Italian blank verse, and declared that he preferred the fitful flights of Ossian the Scot to the steady and sustained grandeur of Homer the Greek. He also freely translated the "Iliad" into Italian; but the performance brought upon the head of Cesarotti a considerable amount of ridicule. Besides these, he produced some critical and philosophical works. He was a great admirer of Napoleon, and wrote a poem called "Pronea" (Providence), which aimed at exhibiting that personage as the envoy of the Almighty. Whether the emperor was pleased with this performance, we have no means of knowing; but as he was a great admirer of Cesarotti's Ossian, he created him a knight of the Iron Crown, and gave him a pension.

Born at Padua, 1730; died 1808.

CESENA, chai-sai'-na, a town of Italy, 12 miles S.E. of Forli. It stands on the Savio, at the foot of a mountain, and has a palace, monasteries, and nunneries. Manf. Silk.—In the neighbourhood are some sulphur-mines. Pop. 38,026.

CESENATICO, chai'-sai-na'-te-ko, a town of Italy, 18 miles from Ravenna, near the Adriatic. Pop. 8,000.—This town was bombarded by the British in 1800.

CESIO, chai-se'-o, a town of Italy, province of Venezia, 6 miles N.E. of Feltre. There is a valuable mine of quicksilver. Pop. 3,400.

CESPEDES, PAUL, ses-pai'-dais, an eminent Spanish painter, whose picture of the "Last Supper," in the cathedral of Cordova, is greatly admired. He wrote a learned book on ancient and modern art, was a linguist and poet, and practised sculpture as well as architecture.

Born at Cordova, 1538; died 1608.

CETHEGUS, se-the'-gus, an ancient and illustrious Roman family, noted for their austerity, and for their affecting a peculiar costume, which left their arms bare. The following are its most important members:

CETHEGUS, MARCUS CORNELIUS, who was successively pontifex maximus, prætor, censor, and consul. In 206, whilst consul, he defeated Mago, Hannibal's brother, in Cisalpine Gaul, and obliged him to quit Italy.—He was, according to Cicero, the best orator of his time.

Died 196 B.C.

CETHEGUS, CAIUS CORNELIUS, who followed, in their turn, the fortunes of Marius, Sylla, Pompey, and Antony, and ended by taking a part in Catiline's conspiracy. He was arrested by command of Cicero, and strangled in prison with the other conspirators.

Died 63 B.C.

CETONA, che-to'-na, a town of Tuscany, in the Val de Chiana, 35 miles from Arezzo. It is built round the foot of a mount of the same name. Pop. 3,500.

CETRARO, che-tra'-ro, a town of Italy, on the Mediterranean, 24 miles N.W. of Cosenza. There is an anchovy fishery. Pop. 2,700.

CETTE, or SETTE, set, a fortified seaport of France, in the department of Herault, 15 miles S.W. of Montpellier. It has a commodious harbour, defended by a citadel, and formed by two moles, on both of which are forts, which, with the citadel, defend the entrance of the harbour. There is also a broad and deep canal, bordered by quays and warehouses, connected with the Lagoon of Thau, and with other canals leading to the Rhone, and greatly facilitating the trade of the place. Manf. Soap, cork, spirits, perfumes, grape, sugar, liqueurs, and casks. There are shipbuilding-yards and glass-works, and sardines are caught on the coast, and here salted. Very extensive salt-works are established in the neighbourhood, and a considerable commerce is carried on in wine, there being an extensive manufactory for the preparation of port, sherry, claret, and champagne, for the English and other markets. For this purpose large quantities of Benecarlo wine are imported from Spain. Pop. 32,665. Lat. 43° 24′ N. Lon. 3° 42′ E.—Steamers ply from this place to Marseilles, and it is at the head of a railway from Beaucaire.

CETTIGNE, set-teen', the capital of Montenegro, Turkish empire, 20 miles E. of Cattaro. There is a fortified convent on the slope of a hill, round which is the small scattered town. In the plain below is a new government-house, partly occupied as an archiepiscopal palace. Manf. Gunpowder.

CEUTA, soo'-ta, a fortified seaport of Morocco, opposite Gibraltar, belonging to Spain. The castle stands on the highest point of Mount Hacho, the ancient Abyla, one of the pillars of Hercules, terminating a peninsula, and has a fine appearance from the sea. The town, however, is extremely mean, and is used mostly as a penal settlement for the state prisoners of Spain, and has little to attract the attention or excite the interest of the stranger. It has a harbour, fit only for small vessels. Pop. 8,200. Lat. 35° 54′ N. Lon. 5° 16′ W.—This was a Mauritanian town under the Romans, and in 1415 was taken from the Moors by the Portuguese. In 1580 it passed into the possession of the Spanish, in whose hands it afterwards remained.

CEVA, chai'-va, a town of northern Italy, on the Tenaro, 44 miles W. of Genoa. It has a trade in cheese (which has been celebrated for 2,000 years) and a manufactory of silk twist. Pop. 3,500.

CEVALLOS, PEDRO, Don, sa-val'-los, Spanish statesman, who took part with the Junta against king Joseph Bonaparte, and was sent on a mission to London, where he published a work on Spanish affairs, strenuously attacking Napoleon. After the restoration of the Bourbons he became secretary of state, and afterwards ambassador to Naples and Vienna.

Born at Santander, 1764; died 1838.

CEVENNES, se-ven', a range of mountains in the S. of France, divided into N. and S., and forming the water-shed between the system of the Rhone and the Garonne. The district, bearing this name in former times, occupied a large tract of Languedoc. The highest points are Mezen, 5,794 feet, and Lozère, 4,884 feet above the level of the sea. (See ARDECHE, LOZÈRE, and FRANCE.) This district is famous as the scene of the heroic defence of the Protestants (known here as Camisards) against the terrible persecutions in the beginning of the 18th century.

CEYLON, se-lon', (native "Singhala," the Taprobana of ancient geographers), a British colony, an island in the Indian Ocean, separated from the south-eastern extremity of Hindostan by a channel called the Straits of Manaar and Palk's Strait. It is 271 miles long, and 137 miles in greatest breadth. On the N.W. the coast presents a flat and monotonous appearance, but on the S. and E. it rises into bold and rocky heights, crowned by a luxuriant vegetation. The centre of the island is mountainous, some of the summits rising to 7,000 and 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. Of these the most remarkable is Adam's Peak (7,420 feet), which, though not the highest, is seen at a great distance from the sea, and was the point whence Buddha, according to his followers, rose to heaven, a huge indentation, known as "Buddha's footprint," still bearing testimony to the fact. The highest mountains are Pedrotallagalla, 8,280 feet; Kirrigal Potta, 7810 feet; and Totapella, 7,720 feet. The table land of Neuera Ellia, the sanitarium of the island, near the centre, has an elevation of 6,210 feet. Near the northern and southern extremities of the coast are numerous clusters of small verdant and very beautiful islands, with clusters of palm trees. Between the island of Manaar, on the north-west coast, and the island of Ramiseram, on the opposite coast of India, is a ridge of sand-banks, intersected by three narrow shallow channels.

This ridge, which nearly connects Ceylon and the continent of Asia, is known as Adam's Bridge. The principal harbours are those of TRINCOMALEE, on the northern coast, and POINT DE GALLE, on the south. There are eight other harbours, but adapted only for small vessels. The roads of Colombo afford good anchorage at certain seasons.

Rivers.—The principal are the Mahaweli Ganga (rising 30 miles S. of Kandy, near Adam's Peak, and falling into the sea 9 miles S. of Trincomalee), Kalani Ganga, Kalu Ganga, and the Waiawe Ganga, all of which have their sources in the central mountain mass, and are navigable only by canoes. There are no lakes of great extent, the largest having a breadth of not more than 4 miles.

Climate.—Exceedingly diversified; in some parts hot and oppressive, and liable to frightful storms of thunder and lightning; in others more temperate and salubrious; but in the neighbourhood of the woods and jungles particularly destructive to strangers. The eastern part of the island is generally hot and dry; but the S.W. is cooler and humid. The average rainfall is three times that of England, but in the northern part the rainfall is moderate.

Zoology.—Ceylon contains a considerable proportion of the animals indigenous to the East. Its elephants are highly celebrated for strength and sagacity. Buffaloes, wild hogs, deer, and hares abound. Two species of wild cats, the bear, leopard, and jackal, inhabit the forests. Monkeys of various species are seen everywhere, and there is a very large and fierce species of baboon. The great snake, or boa-constrictor, is said to attain the length of 30 feet; and there are some of the most venomous species, as the cobra di capella, as well as others which do not bear poison. Alligators, and all the lizard tribe, bats, and insects are numerous; fish are various and abundant, and 320 species of birds, some very beautiful, are enumerated.

Pro.—Rice, cotton, tobacco, pepper, coffee, an infinite variety of vegetables, and the finest fruits. The most valuable of all the Ceylonese plants, however, is the cinnamon-tree, of which the natives enumerate ten species, five of which only are esteemed fit for use. Amongst the most useful of other trees are the cocoa-palm, the Palmyra-palm, talipot-tree, jack-tree, tamarind, and the bread-fruit.

Minerals.—Tin, lead, iron in abundance, manganese, plumbago, and rubies and other precious stones in great variety.

Manf.—Unimportant, with the exception of arrack, which is extracted from the blossoms of the cocoanut-tree. The native manufactures consist of handkerchiefs, napkins, towels, sail-cloth, table-cloths, and a coarse material made use of for their own dresses. The natives also are ingenious workers in gold and silver, and excel in producing lacquered ware.

Provinces.—The island is divided into six provinces—Western, North-Western, Southern, Eastern, Northern, and Central.

Chief Towns.—COLOMBO, KANDY, TRINCOMALEE, POINT DE GALLE, JAFFNA, and KORNEGALLE. (See separate headings.)

Area, including the small dependent islands, 25,742 square miles.

Pop. 2,761,396. The majority are the Singalhese, descendants of the first settlers from the northern part of India. The Kandyans, inhabiting the highlands, are a stronger and more warlike race; and the Malabars, or Tamils, descendants of various tribes of Southern India, a vigorous race occupying chiefly the district of Jaffna, in the northern part of the island. A wretched race of savages, the Veddahs, dwelling in the interior, are believed to be the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants. In the towns, the trading classes are chiefly of Arab or Persian descent; and there are many of European extraction, half castes, Portuguese, Dutch, and Chinese, and British residents engaged in commerce. Of the entire population about 4,800 are British, and 14,300 other whites of European descent.

Religion.—The Singalhese profess Buddhism, but it is considerably modified by the introduction of some doctrines and practices of Hindoo origin. The Tamils of the north are mostly Hindoos. In the towns the natives generally profess Roman Catholicism. Those of Arab or Persian descent are Mahometans. The British residents have 14 churches and many chapels, and there are several Roman Catholic chapels. Colombo is the see of a bishop of the Church of England. In 1871 the members belonging to each religious creed were officially stated to be—Buddhists, 1,520,575; Sivites (professing the Hindoo religion), 464,414; Roman Catholics, 182,613; Mahometan, 171,542; Episcopalians, 24,756; Wesleyans, 6,071; Presbyterians, 3,101; and Baptists, 1,478. The whole of the Christians belonged to the European-descended population.

Constitution and Government.—The present form of government of Ceylon was established by letters patent of April 1831, and supplementary orders of March, 1833. According to the terms of this constitution, the administration is in the hands of a governor, aided by an executive council of five members; viz., the officer commanding the troops, the colonial secretary, the queen's advocate, the treasurer, and the auditor-general; and a legislative council of 15 members, including the members of the executive council, four other office-holders, and six unofficial members.

Commerce.—The annual value of the exports is about £3,800,000; of the imports, £4,800,000. The principal articles of export are coffee, cinnamon, areca nuts, arrack, tobacco, cocoa-nut oil, and raw cotton.

Lat. between 5° 55′ and 9° 51′ N. Lon. 79° 42′ and 81° 55′ E.

History and Antiquities.—Native annals record that Ceylon was invaded 543 B.C. by the son of an Indian king, who founded a dynasty which lasted for 800 years. Egyptians, Romans, Greeks, Persians, and Arabians visited the island for the purpose of trading in its rich products; and some writers identify Port du Galle with the Tarshish of Scripture. In 1505 the Portuguese established colonies in the west and south, which were taken from them early in the next century by the Dutch. In 1795-96, the British government took possession of the foreign settlements in the island, which were annexed to the presidency of Madras; but two years after, in 1798, Ceylon was erected into a separate colony. In 1815 war was declared against the native government of the interior; the Kandyan king was taken prisoner, and the whole island fell under British rule. Among the remains of antiquity attesting the former greatness of the Singalhese nation are the immense tanks, one of which is nearly 15 miles in circumference, enclosed by walls of huge stones and colossal embankments. There are about 30 very large and 700 smaller tanks. An immense Buddhist pagoda, 250 feet high, partially overgrown with trees and other vegetation, surrounded by an enclosure, a mile in circumference; the cave temples at Pollanarrua (the ancient capital) and Dambool; and a Buddhist temple, or "dagoba," at Mihintala, are very striking antiquities. A famous object is the sacred Bo tree, or tree of Buddha, at Anarajapoora, more than 2,000 years old, believed to be the oldest tree in the world.

CEZE, sais, a river of France, which rises in the Cevennes, and, after a course of 50 miles, unites with the Rhone 6 miles from Orange. Its sands are said to be auriferous.

CEZIMBRA, se-zim'-bra, a town of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, on the coast, 18 miles S. of Lisbon. There is an active fishery. Pop. 5,000.

CHABERT, JOSEPH BERNARD, Marquis de, sha-bair', French astronomer and geographer. He entered the navy at an early age, and soon distinguished himself by his skill as a surveyor and constructor of charts. For the last five years of his life he was blind, but his powerful memory enabled him to contribute largely to scientific knowledge. He holds a very high rank in his special department.

Born at Toulon, 1724; died 1805.

CHABOT, FRANÇAIS, sha-bo', one of the most bloodthirsty of the French Revolutionists. In the National Convention he was conspicuous for his violence, and afterwards belonged to the sanguinary mountain party. He is said to have been the chief originator of the worship of the Goddess of Reason. He was originally a priest of the Capuchin order. He was guillotined by order of Robespierre.

Born 1759; died 1794.

CHABLIS, sha-blé', a town of France, in the department of the Yonne, 9 miles E. of Auxerre, on the left bank of the Serein. Pop. 2,500. In the neighbourhood the wine called Chablis is produced.

CHABRIAS, kai'-bre-as, an Athenian general, famous for his many naval victories. From 388 to 376 B.C. he defeated, in several engagements, the Spartans, who were commanded by Agesilaus, and took a prominent part in the war in Egypt.

Died at the siege of Chios, fighting on his ship, 357 B.C.

CHACO, cha'-ko, a district in the Argentine Confederation, frequently called Gran Chaco. It is bounded E. by the river Paraguay, and extends as far S. as Buenos Ayres. It is 400 miles long from N. to S., with a breadth towards its N. part of about 250. The country is well watered by the affluents of the Paraguay, and has extensive plains and marshes interspersed with immense tracts of sand and salt-pools. In other portions there are dense forests and a luxuriant vegetation; but it is, in general, little known and thinly inhabited. Its population chiefly consists of wandering tribes of Indians.

CHAD. (See TCHAD, Lake.)

CHADWICK, EDWIN, chad'-wik, a modern social reformer. Having been engaged on the metropolitan newspaper press, and studied law, he was, in 1834, appointed secretary to the board of the Poor Law Commission. In 1842 he completed a report "On the General Sanitary Condition of the Labouring Classes in Great Britain," and in 1847 was appointed to the Metropolitan Sanitary Commission. The following year he became a member of the General Board of Health, and in 1854 received a retiring pension for the labour of a long series of years devoted to the advocacy of questions, by the practical application of which the social comforts of the community at large were greatly improved. Whilst labouring as commissioner of the General Board of Health, the honour of companion of the Bath was conferred upon him.

Born at Manchester, 1801.

CHÆRONIA, CHÆRONEA, or CHERRONEA, ker'-o-ne'-a, a city of Bœotia, in ancient Greece, on the Cephisus, so called from Chæron, the founder. It is celebrated for a defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, 447 B.C., and for the victory which Philip of Macedon obtained here, at the head of 32,000 men, over the confederate army of the Thebans and Athenians, consisting of 30,000 men, 338 B.C. The site of the old city is marked by the modern village of Kapurna, near which some interesting sculptures have been found.—It was the birthplace of Plutarch.

CHAGOS ARCHIPELAGO, sha'-gos, a group of coral islands in the Indian Ocean, comprising the Peros Banhos group and the Egmont Isles. The most important of them is Diego Garcia, or Great Chagos Island, which is represented as being a wall of coral of a circular form, inclosing a natural harbour or lagoon. Pro. Cocoa-nut oil, vegetables, poultry, &c., for which latter ships often touch at the island. Pop. unascertained. Lat. between 4° 44′ and 7° 39′ S. Lon. 70° 50′ and 72° 50′ E.—The French formerly had a small settlement here, dependent on Mauritius; but this island, with Chagos Archipelago, came into the possession of the English in 1810.

CHAGRES, shagr, a large and navigable river of the Isthmus of Panama, rising 30 miles from the town of that name, and falling into the Gulf of Darien on the north side of the isthmus.

CHAGRES, a town and port of New Granada at the mouth of the above river. The part on the right bank is known as the Spanish and Indian Town; that on the left, the American Town. The situation is very unhealthy, and since the establishment of ASPINWALL, the place has rapidly declined in importance. The population is of a very mixed character. Lat. 9° 21′ N. Lon. 180° W.

CHALCEDON, kal-se'-don, a city of Bithynia, at the entrance of the Pontus, opposite Byzantium, colonized 684 B.C., by the Megareis. It was a flourishing place for a long period, and retained its independence under the Roman empire. It was destroyed by the Scythians under Gallienus, in the 3rd century, and rebuilt by Justinian in the 6th. It was finally demolished by the Turks, who used its ruins as material for public buildings at Constantinople. It was the birthplace of Zenocrates.

CHALCIS, or NEGROPONT, kal'-sis, a maritime town of Greece, capital of Eubœa, built on the Euripus, where it is crossed by a bridge, 18 miles from Thebes. Pop. 5,000.

CHALCO, chal'-co, a town of Mexico, 18 miles S.E. of the town of Mexico, pleasantly situated on a small lake of the same name. Pop. 3,000.

CHALDEA, kal-de'-a, the ancient country of Shinar, or Babylonia, watered by the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. (See BABYLON.)

CHALEUR BAY, sha'-lur, a large bay in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, North America. It separates New Brunswick from Lower Canada, and has a length of 85 miles, with a varying width of from 12 to 20. Lat. 48° N. Lon. 65° W.

CHALKY ISLAND, chauk'-ke, is situate in a bay of the same name, at the south-west extremity of Middle Island, New Zealand. Lat. of the bay, 46° S. Lon. 166° 10′ E.

CHALMERS, ALEXANDER, chal'-mers, received a Scottish classical education and settled in London as a literary man. He was employed by the most eminent booksellers and printers of his time, edited a great variety of works, and contributed largely to periodical literature. Amongst other works, Mr. Chalmers edited the "General Biographical Dictionary," 32 vols.; "The British Essayists, with Prefaces, Historical and Biographical," in 45 vols.; "The British Poets, from Chaucer to Cowper," in 21 vols.; and Shakspeare, in 9 vols.

Born at Aberdeen, 1759; died in London, 1834.

CHALMERS, GEORGE, historical antiquary. He was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and in 1763 went to North America, where he practised as a lawyer until the outbreak of the War of Independence, when he returned. In 1786 he was appointed clerk to the Board of Trade, which appointment he held for the remainder of his life. He was the author of a historical and topographical account of Scotland, annals of the United Colonies, various other works of a political and historical character, and biographies of Mary Queen of Scots, and Daniel Defoe, and edited the works of Sir David Lindsay and Allan Ramsay.

Born at Fochabers, Morayshire, 1742; died in London, 1825.

CHALMERS, THOMAS, one of the most distinguished modern Scottish divines. He was educated at the University of St. Andrews, and, in 1803 was appointed to the living of Kilmany in Fifeshire, where, in conjunction with his clerical duties, he, for twelve years, devoted himself to the study of mathematical and chemical science. In 1809 he became a contributer to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia," then under the editorship of Dr. David Brewster; and other periodicals, among which were the "Christian Instructor" and "Eclectic Review." In 1815 he was called to the Tron Church, of Glasgow, where he officiated for eight years. He was already, however, a man of note; and in the following year, the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the university of Glasgow. His eloquence now excited a national interest. In 1816 he began his "Astronomical Discourses," which created an unprecedented excitement amongst all who heard them. He resolved to devote himself to what may be called organising Christianity among the people; and in this was so successful that he created a new era in the parish in which he officiated as pastor. He removed from the Tron Church to St. John's, where Edward Irving was for some time his assistant; and, perhaps, no two such extraordinary men ever before officiated to one and the same congregation as ministers of the Gospel. In 1823, when at the very zenith of his fame, Dr. Chalmers resigned his charge, and accepted the chair of moral philosophy in the university of St. Andrew's. In this capacity his emoluments were much less, but his duties were better suited to his tastes, for his health was already somewhat shaken. Here he remained for five years, when, in 1828, he was appointed to the divinity chair of the university of Edinburgh. He officiated here for fifteen years, when, in 1843, the disruption in the Church of Scotland called him to another sphere of action. Then, at the head of 400 clergymen, he seceded from the establishment and instituted the "Free Church," and became principal and professor of divinity in the new college founded by its adherents. In this position he continued during the remainder of his days.

Born at Anstruther, Fifeshire, 1780; died at Edinburgh, 1847.

CHALONNE-SUR-LOIRE, sha-lon', a town of France, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, 12 miles from Angers. Manf. Woollen and cotton. Pop. 5,000.

CHALONS-SUR-MARNE, sha'-lawng, a town of France, in the department of Marne, 25 miles S.E. of Rheims. It is divided by the river Marne into three parts, and is crossed by several bridges, one of which, erected in 1787, is admired for its boldness and elegance, and has an elevation of 270 feet. The public buildings are a handsome town-house, Gothic cathedral, built in the 13th century, and famous for its splendid grand altar, several parish churches, three secularised abbeys, some convents; and there is a fine public promenade, occupying 19 acres. Manf. Woollen, linen and cotton goods. Both dyeing and tanning are carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. 17,298.

CHALONS-SUR-SAONE, a town of France, in the department of Saône-et-Loire, on the Saône, 33 miles N. of Macon. It is well built, and has a cathedral, town-hall, hospital, hospice, theatre, college, public library and baths. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, hosiery, hats, watches and jewellery; also glass manufactures and iron goods. Pop. 19,864. It is the centre of a considerable trade.

CHALUS, sha'-loo, a town of France, in the department of Haute-Vienne, 18 miles S.W. of Limoges. Pop. 1,100. It is a place of great antiquity, and contains the remains of the castle of Chabrol, besieging which, in 1199, Richard Cœur de Lion was mortally wounded.

CHALYBÆUS, HEINRICH MORITZ, ka-lib'-e-us, German philosophical writer, appointed, in 1839, professor of philosophy in the university of Kiel. He was the author of various works on the speculative philosophy of Kant and Hegel, and on the relations of philosophy and Christianity.

Born in Saxony, 1796; died at Kiel, 1862.

CHAMAS, ST., sha-ma', a town and small port of France, department Bouches-du-Rhone, 24 miles N.W. of Marseilles. It is divided by a hill, a tunnel through which connects the two parts of the town. The older part is fortified. There is a large government gunpowder manufactory. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the fisheries. Pop. 2,700.

CHAMBERLAIN, JOSEPH, politician. Son of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, of Birmingham. He was educated at University College School, London, and subsequently joined his father as a partner in the screw-making firm of Nettlefold and Chamberlain. In 1869 he was elected chairman of the National Education League, which he was largely instrumental in founding. The same year he entered the Birmingham Town Council, and the Birmingham School Board in 1870. He was mayor 1873-75. His first attempt to enter Parliament was unsuccessful, at Sheffield in 1874; but he was elected for Birmingham in 1876, from which date he rapidly rose to parliamentary distinction. In 1880 he accepted office as President of the Board of Trade, and held that position till the defeat of the Gladstone Government in 1885. On the return of Mr. Gladstone to the premiership in the spring of 1886, Mr. Chamberlain accepted the office of President of the Local Government Board, which he resigned in a few weeks in consequence of differences with Mr. Gladstone on the proposed legislation for Ireland. He subsequently took a leading and very active part in opposing Mr. Gladstone on that subject.

Born 1836.

CHAMBERS, chaim'-bers, a county in Alabama, U.S. The capital is Chambers Court House. Area, 775 square miles. Pop. 23,440.

CHAMBERS, EPHRAIM, the compiler of an extensive encyclopædia, was born at Kendal, in Westmoreland, and while an apprentice to Mr. Senex, a globe-maker in London, formed the plan of his well-known dictionary. This design occupied his whole attention, and some of the articles are said to have been written by him whilst standing behind the counter. The first edition appeared in 1728, in 2 vols. folio. The next year he was chosen F.R.S. The encyclopædia was afterwards continued by Mr. Seot and Dr. Hill, and subsequently enlarged by Dr. Rees. Besides this work, he was engaged in translating and abridging the "History of the Academy of Sciences of Paris." He also translated the "Jesuits' Perspective." Chambers may be considered the originator of all the encyclopædias which afterwards appeared in England, as well as on the Continent.

Died in London, 1740.

CHAMBERS, SIR WILLIAM, F.R.S., F.R.A.S., English architect, surveyor general of the Board of Works, treasurer of the Royal Academy, and knight of the Polar Star in Sweden, was descended of an ancient Scotch family. At the age of 18 he was appointed supercargo to the Swedish East-India Company, and brought from China the Asiatic style of ornament, which became so fashionable in England at one time, under the patronage of King George III. He then settled in England as an architect, and erected some magnificent mansions in various parts of the kingdom. His principal work, however, is Somerset House, which will prove a lasting monument of his taste. He was very successful in his staircases, and designs for interior ornaments. His treatise on civil architecture is deemed valuable. He realised a large fortune.

Born at Stockholm, 1726; died 1796.

CHAMBERS, GEORGE, an English marine painter, who, in his tenth year, was sent to sea as a cabin-boy. He afterwards worked as a house-painter, then took lessons of a drawing-master, and finally began to paint small marine pieces, which met with a ready sale. Three years after this, he worked his passage to London as a seaman, where, after some difficulty, he became a painter of ships. He now attracted the attention of a Mr. Horner, who employed him on the panorama of London, which was exhibited at the Colosseum. He was next engaged to paint for the Pavilion Theatre, where he received the patronage of Vice-Admiral Lord Mark Kerr, who introduced him to William IV. and Queen Adelaide. His fortune was now made, and he became marine painter to their majesties.

Born at Whitby, Yorkshire; died in London, 1840.

CHAMBERS, ROBERT, publisher and author, the younger of the two famous brothers, William and Robert Chambers, whose practical good sense and high moral rectitude of taste have been directed to the elevation of the people, through the means of their numerous publications. At the age of 16 he commenced business with very limited means, as a bookseller in Edinburgh, and subsequently contributed some popular works to "Constable's Miscellany." These were marked by considerable ability, and in 1832 led him, with his brother William, to unite in the establishment of "Chambers's Edinburgh Journal," to which he contributed numerous moral and humorous essays. The success of this periodical was complete, and it largely helped to exalt the intellectual enjoyments of its readers. Independently of his contributions to his "Journal," Robert wrote "Traditions of Edinburgh," a "History of the Rebellion of 1745—46," a work of great merit; "Popular Rhymes of Scotland," "Domestic Annals of Scotland," and "The Life and Works of Burns," of whom he was an enthusiastic admirer, and to whose family he was of great service. He also devoted much of his time to scientific pursuits, especially geology, to which science his "Ancient Sea-margins" is a valuable contribution. He is also credited with the authorship (neither acknowledged nor denied) of the "Vestiges of Creation," which created so great a sensation by the boldness of its speculations. In 1863 he received the degree of LL.D. from the university of St. Andrews.

Born at Peebles, 1802; died at St. Andrews, 1871.

CHAMBERS, WILLIAM, elder brother of the preceding. At the age of 19 he began business as a bookseller in a small way in Edinburgh, from which position he rapidly advanced to eminence as a publisher of popular works of high character. He has written narratives of travel in Europe and America, a history of France, a biography of his brother, and numerous other works, besides superintending the large number of publications issued by the firm of which he is the head, and contributing extensively to the Journal.

Born at Peebles, 1800. Died 1883.

CHAMBERSBURG, the capital of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, U.S., 32 miles S.W. of Harrisburg. Its situation is healthy, and the surrounding country rich and highly cultivated. The town is composed of two large streets, intersecting each other at right angles, and having a public square in the centre. Pop. 6,877.

CHAMBERY, sham'-ber-i, a French town, capital of the department of Haute-Savoie, situate in a fruitful valley, nearly 1,000 feet above the sea level, 45 miles S.W. of Geneva. There are the remains of a castle erected in the 13th century. It is an archbishop's see, the seat of a superior tribunal, and of the Academy of Savoy. Manf. Gauze, silk, lace, leather, hats, and soap. Pop. 14,523. Chambery, with the rest of Savoy, was ceded to France by the treaty of 1860. (See SAVOY.)

CHAMBORD, sham'-bor, a village in the department of Loire-et-Cher, France, 12 miles E. of Blois, surrounded by the large forest of Chambord. Pop. 470.—This place is famous for its fine chateau, which was commenced, in 1526, by Francis I., after designs by Primaticcio, and finished under Louis XIV., vast sums having been spent in its erection. It was for some time the residence of Stanislaus Leczinsky, king of Poland; was afterwards presented by Louis XV. to Marshal Saxe; by Louis XVI. to the Polignac family; to Napoleon, by Berthier; and subsequently was purchased by public subscription, and given to the duke of Bordeaux. A park is attached to it, 21 miles in circumference.

CHAMBORD, Count of. (See BORDEAUX, Duke of.)

CHAMBRAY, GEORGES, Marquis de, sham'-brai, a French general and historian, who, entering the artillery, served in the German campaigns of 1806—9. He rose to the rank of captain, but in the Russian campaign fell sick at Wilna, and was taken by the Russians, and transported into the Ukraine. After the fall of Napoleon, he returned to France, and in 1825 became colonel-director of the artillery of Perpignan. In 1829, on account of bad health, he was permitted to retire from the service with the honorary title of maréchal-de-camp. In his retirement, the marquis wrote a history of the Russian expedition, which, in 2 vols., appeared in 1833. This work passed through several editions, and was recognized as a production of considerable merit. He also wrote some other works upon military tactics.

Born at Paris, 1783; died 1850.

CHAMFORT, SEBASTIEN ROCH NICOLAS, sham'-for, a French writer, who became connected with the "Revue Encyclopédique." His Eloges of Molière and Fontenelle procured him prizes from the French Academy, and that of Marseilles. He next compiled a "French Vocabulary," and a "Dictionary of Dramatic Anecdotes." The latter work led him to dramatic composition, and his tragedy of "Mustapha" was very successful. He was honoured with the patronage of the Prince de Condé, Madame Helvetius, and Madame Elizabeth. At the breaking out of the French revolution, he, at first, supported its principles, but afterwards became shocked at its outrages. Being a friend of Mirabeau, he assisted him in many of his works. He is now best known by a collection of bon-mots, some of which are severely satirical. He suffered imprisonment under Robespierre, and the horrors he witnessed had such an effect on his mind that he attempted to destroy himself.

Born in Auvergne; and died, from the effects of his wounds, 1794.

CHAMIER, FREDERIC, cha'-meer, a modern English writer of naval tales, who entered the navy in 1809, and distinguished himself in the American war of 1812. In 1833 he quitted the service. The best known of his works are "Ben Brace," the "Arethusa," "Life of a Sailor," and "Tom Bowling." He also wrote an account of the French Revolution of 1848.

Born in London, 1796; died 1870.

CHAMILLY, NOEL BONTON, Count of, sha'-me-ye, a marshal of France in the reign of Louis XIV., who greatly distinguished himself in the defence of Grave, 1674. The siege of this place occupied 93 days, and cost William, prince of Orange, 16,000 men. The count, however, is better known as the receiver of the charming epistles known as the "Portuguese Love-Letters," written to him, when in Portugal, under Schomberg, by a nun, who had conceived a violent passion for him. These he had the bad taste to show to his friends, and, returning to France, to publish.

Born 1636; died 1715.

CHAMISSO, ADELBERT DE, sha-mees'-so, a German poet, traveller, and naturalist, of French extraction. The misfortunes brought upon his family by the first revolution drove them from France, and in 1790 they took up their residence in Berlin. Adelbert became one of the pages of the queen of Prussia, who had him educated with great care, and made well acquainted with German literature. In 1798 he entered the Prussian army, and soon after commenced writing poetry in German, and from 1804 to 1806 was one of the editors of the "Musen-Almanach." In 1810 he returned to France, where his family had again settled, and recovered the greater portion of their property; but his mind having become thoroughly Germanized, he returned to that country, and devoted himself to the study of the natural sciences. In 1813 he wrote, for the amusement of the children of a friend, a little book called "Peter Schlemil," containing the story of a man who lost his shadow, which was translated into English, and most other European languages. In 1815 Chamisso accompanied an exploring expedition round the world, in the capacity of naturalist, and after an absence of three years, returned, and appended a supplement to the work of Kotzebue, who wrote an account of the expedition. He now took up his abode at Berlin, and became the inspector of the Botanical Gardens of that city. Here he remained to the end of his life, cultivating poetry and botany, and living in the esteem of many friends. His ballads and legends are considered among the best effusions of their kind in German literature.

Born at the château of Boncourt, Champagne, 1781; died at Berlin, 1838.

CHAMOND, ST., sha-mohn', a town of France, in the department of the Loire, at the confluence of the Gier and the Ban, 7 miles N.E. of St. Etienne. Manf. Ribbons, staylaces, and silk. There are many iron furnaces, and foundries, and coal-mines in the vicinity. Pop. 12,500.

CHAMOUNI, or CHAMONIX, sha-moonee, a valley among the Alps of Savoy, forming the upper portion of the basin of the Arve, with a length of 12 miles, and a breadth of from 1 to 6. It has on the N. Mont Breven, and on the S. Mont Blanc, and the village of the same name has an elevation of 3,425 feet above the level of the sea, and 2,000 feet above the Lake of Geneva. No situation more sublime can be conceived, heightened, as it is, by a view of the Mer de Glace, one of the grandest glaciers of the Alps. This village is much frequented by tourists, and there are several good hotels. Pro. Grain and fruits are cultivated, and cattle are reared. The soil, however, is not fertile, but much honey is collected.

CHAMPAGNE, sham-pain', an old province of France, in the eastern part of the kingdom, adjacent to Franche-Comté and Lorraine. It now forms the departments of ARDENNES, HAUTE-SAONE, YONNE, and SEINE-ET-MARNE. Champagne is celebrated for the sparkling wine called Champagne, produced from the grape which flourishes here. In 1286 the union of Philip the Fair with Jeanne de Navarre annexed it to France.

CHAMPAGNEY, a town of France, department of Haute-Saône, 25 miles N.E. of Vesoul. Manf. Leather, tiles, and "kirschwasser," a spirit made from cherries, which grow abundantly in the neighbourhood. There is a large coal-mine in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,000.

CHAMPAGNOLE, sham'-pane-yole, a town of France, department of the Jura, on the right bank of the river Ain. Manf. Wine, nails, and needles. Pop. 3,200.

CHAMPAIGN, a county of Ohio, U.S. Pop. 27,817. Another county in Illinois. Pop. 40,863.

CHAMPAUBERT, shawmp-o'-bair, a village and parish of France, 30 miles from Chalons, where the progress of the allied Russian and Prussian army was arrested by Napoleon I. in 1814.

CHAMPEAUX, GUILLAUME DE, sham-po', a French scholastic theologian, who established one of the schools in which the University of Paris originated. He is best known by his contention with Abelard and a treatise arguing that infants dying without baptism are undoubtedly and justly damned. He was bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne.

Died 1121.

CHAMPLAIN, sham-plain', a large lake, forming the boundary between New York and Vermont, U.S., and penetrating about six miles into Canada. It is 105 miles long, with a varying breadth from 1 to 15. It contains numerous islands. The superfluous waters are carried off by the Richelieu river into the St. Lawrence, 45 miles below Morehead, and a canal connects it with the river Hudson. It is navigable for small vessels.

CHAMPLAIN, a post-township and port of entry of Clinton county, New York, United States, about 5 miles from the mouth of the Chazy, which discharges into the north-western end of Lake Champlain. Pop. 3,600.

CHAMPLAIN, SAMUEL DE, a French naval officer, who founded Quebec, and of which he became governor-general. The above lake was named after him.

Born at Le Brouage, 1570; died 1634.

CHAMPLITTE, sham-pleet', a town of France, department Haute-Saône, on the Salon. Manf. Brace-webs and brandy. There is a trade in grain, wax, and wine.

CHAMPOLLION, JEAN JACQUES, sham-pol'-le-awng, known as Champollion-Figeac. From being professor of Greek literature in Grenoble, he became, in 1849, keeper of the library in the palace of Fontainebleau, and in 1856 librarian to the emperor Napoleon III. He was the author of several scientific, chronological, and antiquarian works, and in 1819 received the prize of the Academy of Inscriptions. He also wrote a work entitled "The Tournaments of King Réné," of which only 200 copies were printed, and which is very expensive.

He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature, and edited the manuscripts left by his brother.

Born at Figeac, 1778; died 1867.

CHAMPOLLION, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a younger brother of the above, distinguished himself as an archæologist. He began, while a boy, to study Egyptian antiquities; at the age of 19 he was appointed professor of history in the Lyceum of Grenoble, and two years afterwards began the publication of his great work, "Egypt under the Pharoahs." For several years he was engaged in attempts to decipher the famous Rosetta stone (now in the British Museum), and at length succeeded in doing so, and so obtained the key to the hieroglyphic writing of Egypt. In 1828 he accompanied a party of savans to Egypt, where important discoveries were made relative to the manners and customs of the ancient inhabitants of that country. Among his numerous works, we may mention his "Panthéon Egyptien," and his "Précis du Système Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Egyptiens," and the "Grammaire Egyptienne," published after his death.

Born at Figeac, 1790; died at Paris, 1832.

CHANAK-KALESSI, cha-nak'-ka-les'-se, a town of Turkey in Asia, on the Dardanelles, 28 miles S.W. of Gallipoli. It has a very strong castle. The name of the town means "the strong place of pots," the place being famous for the production of earthenware. Pop. 3,500.

CHANCELLOR, RICHARD, chan'-sel-lor, an English navigator, who had a command under Sir Hugh Willoughby in the unfortunate voyage, undertaken under the direction of Sebastian Cabot, to discover a N.E. passage to China. Parting company with Sir Hugh, who perished on the coast of Lapland, Chancellor discovered the port of Archangel, Russia, and had an audience of the grand-duke John Basilovitz, who received him graciously, giving permission to the English to trade with his subjects. This was the foundation of the Russian Company. On Chancellor's arrival in England, a company was incorporated, by whom he was sent again to Russia; but on returning, he was unfortunately lost on the coast of Norway.

Perished 1556.

CHANDAH, shan'-da, a town of British India in the division of Nagpoor, 80 miles S. of the town of that name. It is surrounded by walls, and has an extensive suburb.

CHANDAHNEE, shan-da-ne', a town of the Punjab, British India. It stands near an affluent of the Chenab, and is 75 miles S.E. of Serinagur.

CHANDELEUR ISLES AND BAY, shan'-de-lur, a group of small islands, uninhabited, in the Gulf of Mexico, off the coast of Louisiana. Lat. 30° N. Lon. 88° 50′ W.—The BAY is formed by these islands and those of Grand Grozier and Briton.

CHANDERNAGORE, shan'-der-na-gor', a small settlement of the French in Bengal, on the right bank of the Hooghly, 21 miles N. of Calcutta. Area, 2,330 acres. The town is well built, but falling to decay. Pop. about 30,000, all of whom are natives, with the exception of a few hundreds of Europeans and persons of mixed race.—In 1757 this settlement was taken by the British, but restored in 1763. In 1793 it was again taken by the British, but again restored in 1816.

CHANDLER, RICHARD, chand'-ler, an emi-nent English scholar and antiquary, who published, in 1763, a magnificent edition of the "Marmora Oxoniensia." Commissioned to examine the monuments of antiquity, he, from 1764 to 1766, visited Asia Minor and Greece, bringing back to England a vast amount of valuable materials. He published, during the succeeding years, the result of his travels and researches, some of which have been translated into French. He also wrote a history of Troy.

Born at Elson, Hants, 1738; died 1810.

CHANDORE, shan-dor', a fortified town of British India, in the Bombay presidency. It is a thriving town. The fort, on an almost inaccessible hill, commands an important pass. Pop. 7,000.—In 1804 and 1818 this place capitulated to the British.

CHANDOS, JOHN, Lord, shan'-dos, a celebrated English captain in the reign of Edward III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the English possessions in France; and, at the battle of Auray, in 1364, took Duguesclin prisoner. When Edward III. erected Aquitaine into a principality for his son, the Black Prince, Chandos became the prince's constable. He was present at the battle of Poitiers, 1356; and was killed, bravely fighting, at the battle of Lussac, 1369.—Chandos was a chivalric soldier, and was held in equal esteem by his adversaries and friends.

CHANGARNIER, NICOLAS-ANNE-THÉODULE, shan-gar'-ne-ai, a French general. He was educated at the military school of St. Cyr, and in 1815 entered the army as a private. In 1821 he accompanied the duke of Angoulême to Spain, where he distinguished himself by his courage and capacity. After the revolution of 1830, he went to Algeria, where he greatly increased his renown. His coolness and intrepidity, in the first unsuccessful attack on Constantine, were the forerunners of greater fame and honour to him; for at Mausourah, on the 24th November, 1836, with only 300 men, he defeated 6,000 of the enemy. In 1838 he was made a colonel, and in 1841 was wounded at the head of his brigade in an affair with Abd-el-Kader, in which, as usual, he distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1843 he had the rank of lieutenant-general conferred on him; and, after serving a period of thirteen years, returned to France. In 1847 the duke d'Aumale became governor of Algeria, and induced Changarnier to accept the command of the army in that province. In the following year the duke was forced to quit Algeria, when the government was provisionally handed over to General Cavaignac, and Changarnier, once more, returned to France. He was then appointed governor-general of Algeria, in the place of Cavaignac, who was recalled to Paris; and, on the election of Louis Napoleon to the presidency of the republic, he was made commander of the first military division, with the whole of the military command of Paris. He was also a member of the National Assembly, where he opposed the Bonapartists. His influence was too great to be viewed with ease by Napoleon, who stripped him of his command, and reduced him to the condition of a private citizen. After the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was exiled, and afterwards lived mostly at Brussels. On the outbreak of the Franco-German war he offered his services to the emperor, and was in Metz with Bazaine. In 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly, and assisted in reorganizing the army.

Born at Autun, 1793; died 1877.

CHANG-CHOO, chang-choo', a city in the province of Fo-Kien, in China, 36 miles S.W. of Amoy, on both sides of a river, crossed by two bridges, on one of which, a remarkable structure of stone and timber, shops are built. A wall surrounds the city. Manf. Silk, sugar, and tiles. Pop. 900,000.

CHANG-MAI, chang'-mai, a town of Laos, farther India, on the bank of the Menam. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 20° 16′ N. Lon. 99° 2′ E.

CHANNEL ISLANDS, a name given to a group in the English Channel, off the N.W. coast of France. They are the only portions of ancient Normandy now belonging to the British crown, under the power of which they have remained since the Conquest. (See ALDERNEY, GUERNSEY, JERSEY, &c.) Pop. 87,731.

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY, chan'-ning, an eminent Unitarian minister of the United States. He studied at Harvard, took his degree in 1798, and in 1803 became pastor of the Federal-street congregation in Boston. As a preacher, he was remarkable for the polished grace with which he adorned his style, and the love of pure and lofty morality with which his sentiments were imbued. His writings are animated by the same spirit, and have justly obtained for him a considerable celebrity wherever the English language is spoken. His "Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton," "Remarks on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte," and "Essay on Self-culture," are the performances by which he is best known in Great Britain. He was an ardent opponent of negro slavery.

Born at Newport, Rhode Island, 1780; died at Bennington, Vermont, 1842.

CHANTENAI, shan-ta'-ne, a town of France, department Loire-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Loire. Manf. White lead. Ship and boat building and cattle rearing are carried on, and there are quarries of granite in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,900.

CHANTIBUN, shan'-te-boon, a town of Siam, near the mouth of a river, on the east side of the Gulf of Siam. It is about 180 miles from Bangkok, and exports dye-woods, ivory, hides, horns, and gums. In its vicinity are mines of precious stones. Lat. 12° 45′ N. Lon. 102° 18′ E.

CHANTILLY, shan-te'-ye, a town of France in the department of the Oise, 24 miles N.E. of Paris. Manf. Porcelain and blonde lace.—The Forest of Chantilly, in the neighbourhood, comprises 6,700 acres. Here is the best race-course in France. English horses are often sent by their owners to run in its races, and frequently carry off the stakes. Pop. 3,400.

CHANTREY, SIR FRANCIS, chant'-re, an eminent English sculptor, was left almost destitute at an early age by the death of his father, a Derbyshire carpenter and small farmer. His mother married again, and he was bound to a carver and gilder, in Sheffield. Whilst serving his apprenticeship, he became a modeller in clay, and, in that capacity, subsequently tried his fortune successively in Dublin, Edinburgh, and London, where he received some instruction as a student at the Royal Academy. He was taken by the hand by Nollekens, who greatly smoothed his path to fame and fortune. His abilities as a monumental sculptor were great; and, being universally acknowledged, he was uniformly successful in his career. In 1816 he was elected an Associate, and in 1818 a member of the Royal Academy, and, in the following year, paid a visit to Italy. In 1837 he was knighted by Queen Victoria. Chantrey had little of the poetry of his art. He therefore prudently confined himself within the limits of what it was in his power to achieve. One of his best statues is that of Pitt, in Hanover Square, London; another that of Canning, in Westminster Abbey. He realized a large fortune.

Born at Jordanthorpe, Derbyshire, 1781; died 1841.

CHAO, cha'-o, known also as Naiman-Soume, Tolon-Noor, and Dolonoor, a large trading town of Mongolia, 165 miles N.W. of Pekin. There are numerous Buddhist temples. The place is famous for the manufactory of iron and brass idols, bells, and other articles connected with the worship of Buddha. There is an extensive trade in Russian merchandise. Pop. Estimated to be very large.

CHAO-TCHEOO-FOO, cha'-o-che'-oo-foo, a town in China, in the province of Canton, at the confluence of the Si-ho and Tang-ho, which form the Peking river, which is crossed by a bridge of boats. Pop. about 40,000.

CHAO-CHOW, a town and port of China, province of Quangtung, on the river Han, 195 miles N.E. of Hong-Kong. It is a great trading and emigration port.

CHAOS, or BIRD ISLANDS, kaë'-os, several rocky islets off the coast of S. Africa, about 35 miles E. of Port Elizabeth. On one of them the Portaguese navigator Bartholomew Diaz perished in 1500.

CHAPALA, sha-pa'-la, a lake of Mexico, containing many islands, and traversed by the Rio Grande de Lerma. Area, 1,300 square miles.

CHAPELAIN, JOHN, shap'-la, a French poet, who wrote "La Pucelle" (the Maid of Orleans), which, at first, was received with immense favour. It passed through six editions in eighteen months, but was subsequently neglected. Besides the above, he produced some other effusions, and had a fate unusual with his order,—that of dying very rich, having himself amassed his fortune.

Born at Paris, 1595; died 1674.

CHAPEL-EN-LE-FRITH, a town of Derbyshire, 11 miles N.W. of Derby. Manf. Chiefly cotton and paper. In its neighbourhood are coal and lead mines, and lime works. Pop. 10,383. A station on the London and North-western and Midland Railways.

CHAPELLE ST. DENIS, LA. (See PARIS.)

CHAPMAN, GEORGE, chap'-man, an English poet and dramatist, one of the ornaments of the Elizabethan age. He was educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and was well versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and translated Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey" into English. This work, if less elegant than Pope's, is more faithful; and Pope is said to have been greatly indebted to it in his own translations of the immortal Greek bard. He also wrote many dramatic pieces. Unlike some of his literary contemporaries, he was a man of temperate and reputable life.

Born, supposed, in Hertfordshire, 1557; died in London, 1634.

CHAPONE, HESTER, sha-pone', a writer of educational and moral books for young ladies, at one time of great repute. Her maiden name was Mulso. She corresponded with, and was highly esteemed by many of the leading writers of her time.

Born at Twywell, Northamptonshire, 1727; died 1801.

CHAPPE, CLAUDE, shap, a Frenchman, inventor of the aërial, or signal telegraphs, generally used before the introduction of the electric telegraph. His priority of invention was disputed, and the contention had such an effect on his mind that he committed suicide by throwing himself into a well.

Born 1763; died 1805.

CHAPPE, D'AUTEROCHE, JEAN, French astronomer. He was in clerical orders, but devoted himself to scientific pursuits, and in 1761 was sent by the French Academy to Russia, to observe the transit of Venus. He published a narrative of his journey, some remarks in which so offended the empress Catherine II. that she wrote a reply to the book. In 1769 he started on a scientific expedition to California, but died before completing his observations.

Born in Auvergne, 1722; died at St. Lucar, 1769.

CHAPTAL, JEAN ANTOINE CLAUDE, shap'-tal, a distinguished French chemist, Count of Chanteloup, who, in 1793, became manager of the saltpetre manufactory at Paris, and one of the first professors of the Polytechnic School. In 1801, during the consulate of Napoleon I., he became minister of the interior; but, in three years, retired from this post, to devote himself to pursuits more in accordance with his tastes. In this spirit he directed his attention to the manufacturing interests of his country, instituted chambers of commerce, and established councils of art and manufactures. From time to time, he gave to the public the results of his studies and investigations, and, by every means in his power, endeavoured to improve and extend the manufactures of France. His chemical works are numerous and highly appreciated, and he was one of the founders of the Society of Encouragement, over which he presided for many years.

Born at Nogaret, 1756; died at Paris, 1832.

CHARD, chard, a town of Somersetshire, 12 miles S.E. of Taunton. There are a new town-hall and market-house, a hospital, grammar-school, and large market-place. Manf. Woollen and lace goods, iron and brass castings, machinery, and rope. Pop. 2,291.—A station on the London and South-Western railway.—Here the royalists were defeated in the Civil wars in the time of Charles I.

CHARDIN, JEAN, shar'-da(n), a French traveller, who went to the East when young to purchase diamonds. He twice visited Persia, remaining several years each time, between 1664 and 1677, and making himself acquainted with the manners and customs of the country. On his return, he visited London, where, in 1681, he settled as a jeweller to the court and nobility. He was knighted by Charles II., and married on the same day; and, in the following year, became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1686 a folio volume of his travels appeared, and has been translated into several languages. Chardin was a painstaking traveller, and knew Ispahan better than he did Paris, and spoke the Persian language like a native.

Born at Paris, 1643; died at Turnham Green, 1713.

CHARENTE, sha-rent', a large river of the west of France, rising in the department Haute Vienne, 14 miles N.W. of Chalus, and, after a course of 200 miles, falling into the Atlantic, opposite the island of Oléron.

CHARENTE, a department of France, bordered by the departments of Charente-Inférieure, Deux Sèvres, Vienne, Haute-Vienne, and Dordogne. It is generally diversified with hill and dale, and watered by the Charente, Vienne, and Dronne. It abounds with wood, and produces large crops of chestnuts; but the soil is not considered fertile. The department is divided into five arrondissements. Minerals. Iron and gypsum. Manf. Paper-making, tanning, distilling, and iron-wares. Area, 2,200 square miles. Pop. 370,822. Cap. ANGOULÊME.

CHARENTE-INFÉRIEURE (the Lower), a department of France inclosed by the Atlantic Ocean and the departments of Gironde, Dordogne, Charente, Deux Sèvres, and Vendée. The country is flat, but generally fertile, and producing corn and wine. The pastures are extensive, and live stock numerous. The Charente, Sèvre-Niortaise, Gironde, and Sendre are the rivers. The most important towns are LA ROCHELLE, the capital, and ROCHEFORT. The department is divided into six arrondissements. Manf. Woollens, soap, glass, leather, and earthenware. The coast fisheries are important, and a considerable quantity of brandy is made. Area, 2,740 square miles. Pop. 466,416.

CHARENTON-LE-PONT, sha-ren'-tawng, a town of France, in the department of Seine, 5 miles S.E. of Paris. It stands on the Marne, over which there is a bridge, which was frequently the scene of bloody conflicts between the citizens and the soldiers during the revolutionary periods of France. It now forms a portion of the fortifications of Paris. Pop. 6,700. (See PARIS.)

CHARETTE DE LA CONTRIE, FRANCIS ATHANASIUS DE, sha-ret' kon-tre, a French royalist, and leader of that party in La Vendée. From being a lieutenant in the navy, he headed an army of Bretons, and in a great many battles fought with various success. At length he was wounded and taken prisoner. He was carried to Nantes, where he was shot.

Died 1796.

CHARIKAR, shar'-e-kar, a town of Afghanistan, 21 miles N. of Cabul. It is a busy place, in connexion with the transit trade between Turkestan and Central Asia, and the residence of the governor of Kohistan. Pop. 5,000.

CHARITÉ (LA), shar'-e-tai, a town of France, in the department of Nièvre, on the right bank of the Loire (crossed by a fine bridge), 14 miles N.W. of Nevers. Manf. Glass, buttons, hardware, tools, and potteries, and it trades in iron, timber, and charcoal. Pop. 4,500.

CHARITES (Greek), and GRATIÆ (Latin), kar'-i-tes, grai'-shi-e, the Graces, the three daughters of Venus, by Jupiter or Bacchus, who were named Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. They were the constant attendants of their beautiful mother, and were represented as three young and lovely virgins, with their hands joined. They presided over kindness and all good offices, and their worship was the same as that of the nine Muses, with whom they had a temple in common. They were generally represented in a nude state, to show that kindnesses ought to be performed with sincerity and candour. The moderns explain the allegory of their having their hands joined, to mean, that there should be a perpetual return of kind and good deeds among friends.

CHARKOV, or KHARKOV, kar-kof', a province of European Russia in the south, inclosed by Veroniaj and Katerinoslav, Pultowa, and Koursk. Area, 1,000 square miles. Desc. Flat, but fertile, producing grains of all kinds and wine in abundance. Pop. 2,160,263.

CHARKOV, or KHARKOV, the capital of the above government, is situate on the small rivers Charkov and Lapan. It is the see of the bishops of the Ukraine and Kharkov, and holds, for cattle and wool, four yearly fairs, which are among the most important in Russia. Pop. 35,000.

CHARLEMAGNE. (See CHARLES THE GREAT OF FRANCE.)

CHARLEROI, shar'-rwaw, a town and fortress of Belgium, province of Hainault, on the Sambre, 22 miles from Mons. The fortifications destroyed by the French in 1794 have been since restored. Manf. Nails and other hardware, glass, and woollen stuffs. In the neighbourhood are extensive pits of turf and coal; and the famous iron-works of Couliers are near the town. Pop. 16,110. It is a station on the Brussels and Namur Railway, and is connected with Brussels by the Charleroi canal.

CHARLES, the name of many European sovereigns, the biographies of whom are given under the following headings:—

ENGLAND.

CHARLES, I., king of England, was the third son of James I., by Anne, daughter of the king of Denmark. On the accession of his father to the English throne, he was created duke of York and Cornwall. The death of his brother Prince Henry, in 1612, left him heir-apparent to the throne; but he was not created Prince of Wales till the month of November, 1616. In 1623, at the suggestion of the duke of Buckingham, and accompanied by him, he undertook a journey to Spain, for the purpose of personally paying his addresses to the Infanta, with whom a marriage had been arranged. This contemplated match was, however, broken off, and shortly after his accession to the throne, in 1625, he married Henrietta Maria, youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France. Previous to his accession, the struggle between the popular and the monarchical principles of the constitution had commenced; but they had not assumed the definite form into which the resolute spirit of the times so soon afterwards moulded them. Charles was engaged in a war with Spain, and found it necessary to summon a Parliament to grant him supplies. Nothing, however, was more remote from the minds of the representatives of the people than the intention of complying with the demands of the king. Accordingly, they were dismissed, and in 1626, Sir John Eliot and other distinguished members were imprisoned. Other Parliaments were summoned, and, being equally determined, were dismissed, and members were again imprisoned. The king then governed in an arbitrary manner, without a Parliament, for eleven years, by means of edicts from the Star Chamber, and raising money by his own authority. But he was compelled, from want of supplies, once more to summon a Parliament, and in November, 1640, the famous Long Parliament began its sittings. Meanwhile, a foolish war with France had been terminated, and also that with Spain; the duke of Buckingham had been assassinated, and in 1637 John Hampden had been tried and condemned for refusing to be assessed for ship-money. Scotland had risen in insurrection, and the first act of the Long Parliament was to enter into an alliance with the insurgents. It then proceeded to strip the crown of all its objectionable prerogatives, impeached, and subsequently executed Strafford, the minister of Charles, and committed Bishop Laud to the Tower. It also brought in a bill called the Militia Bill, which was to transfer all the military power of the kingdom into the hands of Parliament, and to which the king would not give his assent. In January, 1642, he went to the House of Commons, accused five members—Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Hazelrig, and Stroud—of high treason, and demanded that they should be given up to him. This was refused, and it became evident that the quarrel must be decided by an appeal to arms. The king left London, and civil war began with the battle of Edgehill, fought on the 23rd October 1642, which was the first blood drawn in the civil war. Hostilities having thus commenced, the royal arms were, for some time, successful, particularly in the west; but the battle of Marston Moor, in July, 1644, and that of Newbury, were ruinous to the king's cause. A treaty was entered into at Uxbridge, but the Parliament insisting upon the abolition of episcopacy, which Charles would not yield, hostilities were renewed, when the battle of Naseby, fought in June, 1645, proved fatal to the royal cause. The king now threw himself on the protection of the Scots, who ultimately gave him up to the commissioners of the English Parliament, from whom he was forcibly taken, and carried to the army, then lying at Triplow Heath. Thence he was sent to Hampton Court, where he was treated with some respect, as the Parliament and army were at variance, the former being mostly Presbyterians, and the latter Independents. Intending to quit the kingdom, he shortly afterwards effected his escape, and sought refuge with Colonel Hammond, the parliamentary governor of the Isle of Wight. Here, however, he was detained as a prisoner, and confined in Carisbrook Castle. The army now determined to bring him to trial, in which the House of Commons concurred. Accordingly, he was, on the 20th January, 1649, brought to trial in Westminster Hall, and behaved with great dignity, refusing to acknowledge the authority of his judges, who had constituted themselves into a High Court of Justice. During his trial, he was forced to submit to many indignities, which he bore with patience and resignation. The trial lasted some days, and, on the 27th, sentence of death was pronounced upon him. Three days only were allowed to intervene between his condemnation and his execution, which were spent in affectionate interviews with his children, whom he exhorted to steadfastness in the Protestant religion, as reformed in the Church of England, and in recommending his successor to forgive his enemies. On the scaffold before the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, he was beheaded by a masked executioner. In his domestic character few sovereigns have equalled Charles I., but no man ever exhibited so marked a distinction between private and public morality. In private affairs he was truthful, sincere, and kind; in politics he was arbitrary, untruthful, and treacherous. The idea of the divine right of kings to do as they pleased appears to have influenced all his actions. He was naturally possessed of a fine genius, and was a powerful and elegant writer of the English language. Of the fine arts he was a liberal patron, and, but for the evil counsels by which he suffered himself too much to be guided, might have escaped the untimely end to which he was brought by the offended judgment of a people determined to be free. He was the father of Charles II. and James II.

Born at Dunfermline, Scotland, 1600; died 1649.

CHARLES II., king of England, was the second son of the above, an elder brother, Charles James, having died on the day of his birth. Having served with the royal army till after the battle of Naseby, he then left the country, and in 1646 joined his mother at Paris, whence he proceeded to the Hague, where he received the news of the fate of his father. In Scotland he was, at Edinburgh, proclaimed king on the 3rd February, 1649, and again on the 15th July, 1650, after he had arrived in that country. He had already been obliged to take the covenant imposed by the Presbyterians, when, on the 1st January, 1651, he was crowned at Scone. Cromwell, however, was by this time "up and doing," and had made himself master of the greater part of Scotland, when Charles determined on marching southward into England. He was proclaimed king at Carlisle, of which city he took possession. He next proceeded to Worcester, where Cromwell put an end to his enterprise by defeating his army, on the 3rd of September, 1651. His escape, after this battle, was almost miraculous. Hid in the thick branches of a large oak in Boscobel wood, he avoided his pursuers, who came under the tree where he was. After wandering from one place to another in various disguises, he reached Shoreham, in Sussex, whence he embarked on the 15th October, and arrived safe at Fescamp, in Normandy. Thence he proceeded to Paris, and finally to Bruges and Brussels, at which he mostly resided until the death of Cromwell, in September, 1658. On the 23rd of May, 1660, he embarked from the Hague for London, where he arrived on the 29th of the same month, and was received with the most joyous acclamations. General Monk was the chief instrument of his restoration, and therefore shared in the royal favour. One of the first acts of Charles, on coming to the throne, was to sell Dunkirk, in order to supply his extravagances. In 1662 he married the princess Catharine of Portugal, for the sake of her large dowry, and afterwards shamefully neglected her. In 1663, for the sake of a pecuniary benefit, he declared war against Holland, the result of which was that a Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway, and destroyed several ships. To add to the national calamities, the plague, in 1665, swept away a vast number of the inhabitants of London, and, in the following year, a large proportion of the city was laid in ruins by fire. In 1667 peace was concluded with the Dutch, and, shortly afterwards, the great Lord Clarendon was sent into exile. About 1670 was formed the famous ministry called the Cabal, from the initial letters of the names of the five persons who composed it. At this time Charles became a pensionary of France, and entered into a new war against Holland, which terminated in 1674. In 1678 the peace of Nimeguen was established. The same year was remarkable as being that on which the pretended discovery of a popish plot was made, when, on the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, several eminent persons were put to death. In the parliament of 1679 the famous Habeas Corpus act was passed; and, in the following year, the contest between the court and popular party gave rise to the famous distinctions of Whig and Tory. A new Parliament met at Oxford in 1681, but it was soon dissolved. From this time Charles assembled no more Parliaments, and governed in the most arbitrary manner. The charters of the corporations were called in and altered, so as to make them dependent on the crown. These proceedings caused a conspiracy, called the Rye-house plot, to be formed against him, and Lord Russell and Algernon Sydney were executed for their supposed concern in it, 1683. He was taken suddenly ill while, as Macaulay describes the scene, "toying with his sultanas" at Whitehall Palace, and died soon afterwards. In his last moments the "merry monarch" (as he was named, from his jocular affability of manner), received the sacrament from a Catholic priest, although he had professed Protestantism. His libertinism was of the most open and audacious kind. He had no legitimate children, but, by various mistresses, he left a numerous progeny, whose descendants represent in England some of the titular dukedoms which he conferred upon them. (See PORTSMOUTH, Duchess of; MONMOUTH, Duke of; GWYNNE, Eleanor, &c.)

Born 1630; died 1685.

CHARLES EDWARD, of the Stuart family, commonly called the Young Pretender, was the grandson of James II. of England. In 1745 he landed in the west Highlands of Scotland, and published a manifesto setting forth the claims of his father to the English throne. Being aided by several Highland chiefs and their followers, he made a successful descent upon the Lowlands, and entered Edinburgh. Here he caused his father to be proclaimed; on which General Cope hastened towards the capital, but was met and defeated by Charles at Preston Pans. Instead of making a proper use of this victory, by pushing into England, Charles returned to Edinburgh, wasting his time in an idle parade of royalty. Being joined, however, by Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and other discontented chiefs, he marched as far as Derby; but hearing that the king was about to take the field, he returned to Scotland, where he defeated the English forces under Hawley at Falkirk. In the mean time the duke of Cumberland advanced to Edinburgh, and thence to Aberdeen, the Pretender retreating before him. At last the two armies met at Culloden, when, after an obstinate conflict, in which the Highlanders displayed signal courage, the royal army was victorious, and the Scotch fled, leaving three thousand of their number dead on the field. Charles, after wandering about in different disguises, chiefly among the Hebrides, effected his escape to France, and thus ended all hopes of this unfortunate family ever recovering the crown of their ancestors. In his later years he adopted habits of intemperance, brutally ill-treated his wife, and exhibited the libertine tendencies of his race. He married the Princess Stolberg-Guendern, who afterwards secretly married Count Alfieri, the poet. (See STUARTS; ALBANY, Countess of; and ALFIERI.)

Born at Rome, 1720; died at Florence, 1788.

GERMANY.

CHARLES I. and II. (See CHARLEMAGNE and CHARLES THE BALD of France.)

CHARLES III., or the Fat, was elected emperor of Germany in 880. He subsequently usurped the French crown. (See CHARLES II. of France.)

CHARLES IV. was the son of John of Bohemia, of the house of Luxembourg (who fell at the battle of Crecy), and grandson of the emperor Henry VII. He was elected emperor in 1346; crowned king of Italy in 1354, and emperor of Germany, 1355. His reign was rendered remarkable by the "golden bull," published at the diet of Nuremberg in 1356, and which established the Germanic constitution, in defiance of which, however, he secured, by bribes, the election of his son Wenceslaus as his successor. He was a learned man, and a great encourager of letters.

Born at Prague, 1316; died 1378.

CHARLES V., emperor of Germany and king of Spain, was the son of Philip, archduke of Austria, and Joanna, the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. He succeeded his grandfather Ferdinand in the kingdom of Spain in 1516, and to the empire on the death of Maximilian, in 1519. Francis I. of France disputed with him the latter title, which gave rise to a violent war, in which Charles was leagued with Henry VIII. of England. After driving the French from Lombardy and taking Geneva, he defeated and made Francis a prisoner at the battle of Pavia, fought in February, 1525. In the following year, Francis was liberated; and, although the war was renewed, peace was concluded in 1529, when, by the treaty of Cambrai, Francis gave up all his claims to Italy and Flanders. In 1530 Charles was crowned by the pope at Bologna, emperor and king of Lombardy. In 1535 he turned his arms against Africa, where he took Goletta, vanquished Barbarossa, entered Tunis, and re-established Muly-Hassan on the throne. Soon after this, he recommenced hostilities against France, and ravaged Champagne and Picardy; but was, at length, obliged to retire, and peace was restored in 1538. In 1539 the revolt in Ghent led him into Flanders, where, in the following year, he caused to be executed twenty-six of the citizens of the revolted town, and otherwise treated its inhabitants with great severity. In 1541 he attempted the conquest of Algiers; but his fleet was dispersed in a hurricane, and the emperor was obliged to return unsuccessful. He again entered into a league with England against France; but he was unfortunate in this war, and was glad to conclude a treaty, at Crespi, in 1545. In the following year the Protestant princes of Germany confederated against him, and, after some fighting, and a new war with Henry II. of France, he was forced to sign the treaty of Passau, in August, 1552, by which the Protestants obtained the right to freely exercise their religion in the dominions of the confederated princes. In 1556 he resigned the crown to his son Philip, in the presence of a magnificent assemblage of Spanish and Flemish nobles, in the hall of the palace of Brussels. He then retired to the monastery of Yuste, in Estremadura, where it was long supposed he employed the remainder of his days in religious exercises, mechanical pursuits, and gardening. It is now ascertained, however, that although occasionally giving way to fits of gloomy asceticism, he was almost as much engaged with diplomatic notes and dispatches in his monkish apartments as if he had been in his palace at Madrid. Previous to his death, he had his own funeral obsequies performed in the chapel of the convent in which he spent the last two or three years of his life.

Born at Ghent, 1500; died at Yuste, 1558.

CHARLES VI., the second son of the emperor Leopold I., was declared king of Spain by his father in 1703, a step which led to the famous war of the Spanish succession. (See CHARLES II. of Spain). In 1711 he succeeded his brother Joseph I. as emperor of Germany. He made peace with France in 1714, and two years afterwards declared war against the Turks, in which his general, Prince Eugene, obtained several victories; among which was that of Peterwardein, and the taking of Belgrade. These successes forced the Turks to make peace, which resulted in the treaty of Passarowitz, in 1718, by which large portions of Servia and Temeswar were ceded to Austria. An alliance was now entered into between the emperor, France, Great Britain, and Holland, against Spain; the consequence of which was the wresting of Sardinia and Sicily from that power, and the erecting of the former into a monarchy, under the duke of Savoy. He afterwards entered into a war against his former allies, and by the peace of Vienna, in 1735, lost Naples and Sicily. He was the last male of the line of the Austrian Hapsburgs.

Born 1685; died at Vienna, 1740.

CHARLES VII. was elector of Bavaria, and having married the daughter of the emperor Joseph, claimed to succeed Charles VI., and after some contests was elected in 1742. He had, however, a powerful rival in Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, from whose forces he sustained several defeats.

Born at Brussels, 1697; died 1745.

FRANCE.

CHARLES MARTEL (or "Charles of the hammer"), mayor of the palace under Chilperic and Thierry IV., kings of France. He was the natural son of Pepin d'Heristal, duke of Austrasia, of which he was proclaimed duke in 715. As mayor of the palace, he possessed the whole regal power, which he administered with great success, and gained many victories, the principal of which was over the Saracen general Abdalrahman, between Tours and Poitiers, in 732. (See ABDALRAHMAN.) It was in consequence of this victory that he was called Martel, or the hammer. On the death of Thierry, in 736, no successor was appointed, and Charles conducted the government as duke of the Franks. At his death, he divided his kingdom between his sons Carloman and Pepin. The latter became the first king of France of the Carlovingian race, which name was taken from the founder, Charles Martel.

Born 690; died at Quiercy, on the Oise, 741.

CHARLES THE GREAT, or CHARLEMAGNE, shar'-e-main, king of France, and founder of the Germanic empire, or Empire of the West, was the son of Pepin, and grandson of Charles Martel. On the death of Pepin, he and his brother Carloman succeeded to the throne, and by the death of Carloman in 771, Charles became sole monarch. The greater part of his reign was spent in war. In 774 he conquered the Lombards, and assumed the crown of Lombardy. In 778 he made some conquests in Spain, but at Roncesvalles, where Roland, the hero of continental romance, fell, his vanguard was defeated. After defeating the Saxons and putting an end to the monarchy of the Lombards, he was in 800 crowned emperor of the West by Pope Leo III. Charles was not only a successful warrior but a wise legislator, and promoted learning by all the means in his power; encouraged works of public utility, built palaces and churches, and was famous for his ability and learning all over the civilized world. He was buried at Aix-la-Chapelle, in the church founded by himself. (See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.)

Born 742; died at Aix-la-Chapelle, 814.

CHARLES I., called the Bald, is generally placed by French writers as their first king, the title of emperor having been bestowed upon Charlemagne and his son Louis le Debonnaire. He was son of Louis le Debonnaire, crowned in 840, and elected emperor of the West by the people of Rome in 875. It is supposed he died of poison, at a place called Breisman, on Mount Cenis, in the Alps.

Born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 823; died 877.

CHARLES II. of France, known as Charles III. of Germany, surnamed le Gros, or the Fat, was the nephew of the preceding monarch. He seized the crown of France in 884, at the death of Carloman II., and retained it until 887, when the government was assumed by Eudes, or Hugh, count of Paris, and Charles was sent to the abbey of Reichenau, in Swabia, where it is supposed he was strangled.

Born 832; died 887.

CHARLES III., or the Simple, cousin of the preceding, was crowned at Rheims in 893, and on the death of Louis IV., emperor of Germany, sought to fill the vacant throne. His power was reduced by the usurpations of his nobles and the forcads of the Normans, under Rollo, who took possession of the district afterwards known as Normandy. His minister and favourite, Hagamon, gave such offence to the nobles, that they revolted and drove him from his kingdom, which was seized by Robert, duke of France, who was crowned by the archbishop of Rheims in 922. The same year a battle was fought between the two monarchs, in which Robert was slain; but his son, Hugh the Great, defeated Charles, who fled for refuge to the count of Vermandois. His wife, a sister of Athelstan, king of England, took shelter with her son Louis in that country, and he was imprisoned in the castle of Peronne.

Born 879; died 929.

CHARLES IV., le Bel, or the Handsome, third son of Philip the Fair, obtained the crown of France in 1322. In his reign a fierce war raged between him and Edward II. of England, who had married Isabella, the sister of Charles. The war resulted in the cession of Guienne to Edward. With this sovereign the elder branch of the line of Capet terminated, and was succeeded by the younger, viz., that of Valois.

Born 1294; died 1328.

CHARLES V., called the Wise, was the eldest son of John II., and the first prince who bore the title of dauphin. He succeeded to the crown on the death of his brother in 1364. By his prudence and valour he restored the commerce and agriculture of his country, and gained several advantages over the English. The Royal Library of Paris was founded by this prince, and the Bastille was erected by him.

Born 1337; died 1380.

CHARLES VI., the Well-beloved, or sometimes "the Silly," son of the above, was crowned in 1380, being then only 13 years of age, his uncle, the duke of Anjou, acting as regent until Charles was 20 years old. His reign was unfortunate, owing to the quarrels of his uncles for power during his minority, and the contentions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy for the succession. Henry V. of England took advantage of these disputes to invade France. Charles was subject to fits of insanity.

Born 1368; died 1422.

CHARLES VII., called the Victorious, was the fifth son of Charles VI., and, his elder brother dying young, crowned in 1422, and by his activity drove out the English invaders from all their possessions except Calais. In effecting this, Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans, may be considered to have greatly assisted, as the tide of fortune turned against the English, after her appearance at Orleans. His last days were embittered by the ambition of his son, the cruel Louis XI., and, fearing to be poisoned by him, he starved himself to death.

Born at Paris, 1403; died at Melun, 1461.

CHARLES VIII., called the Affable, was the son of Louis XI., and ascended the throne in 1483, at the age of 13. In 1491 he married Anne, the heiress of Brittany, and thereby annexed that important duchy to the French crown. He conquered Naples after a short war of five months, but lost that kingdom as quickly as he had won it. In 1495, at about ten miles from Piacenza, on his return to France, he obtained a great victory over the Italians, though their army numbered 40,000 strong, against 9,000 of his troops.

Born at Amboise, 1470; died 1498.

CHARLES IX., succeeded to the throne in 1560, on the death of his brother, Francis II. He was the son of Henry II., and his mother was Catherine de Medicis, who was, in effect, the reigning sovereign. She, however, abused the power she possessed, and caused great discontents among her Protestant subjects, who revolted from her authority. This resulted in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, one of the blackest deeds on record, and which must for ever stain with infamy the memory of Charles. Shortly after this event, he died, in his 24th year, smitten by the terrors of an evil conscience. (See CATHERINE DE MEDICIS, COLIGNY, &c.)

Born at St. Germain-en-Laye, 1550; died 1574.

CHARLES X., was Count d'Artois and brother of Louis XVIII. At an early age he married Maria Theresa, of Savoy. He fled from France during the troubles of 1789; but in 1796 he, supported by an English squadron, sailed on an expedition to France. A great rising of royalists was the consequence, but the count had not the courage to land, and left them to their fate, returning to England, where he lived in obscurity until the surrender of Paris to the allies, in 1814, when he appeared there and announced himself as lieutenant-general of the kingdom. During the reign of his brother, Louis XVIII., he exercised considerable influence with the priestly and aristocratic party; and on the death of Louis, was proclaimed king in September, 1824. On his accession to the throne, he endeavoured to make himself popular; but there was a strong party against him, who were intimate with his character, and, therefore, had little faith in the sincerity by which any of his more liberal acts were professedly governed. By the spring of 1830 discontents had increased among the people, and on the 25th July the liberty of the press was suspended. Several other oppressive measures accompanied this, which were energetically protested against, and which roused the mass of the people to take up arms. On July 27, the first encounter took place between the people and the soldiery. On the following day the fighting became general, and the next, Marmont, who was at the head of the Guards, evacuated Paris. On the 30th, the duke of Orleans was proclaimed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and on the 2nd of August, Charles abdicated in favour of the duke of Bordeaux, and set out for Cherbourg. The claims of this duke, however, were not recognized by the chambers, and the duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe) was chosen to reign in his stead. Charles sailed for England, and eventually took up his abode at Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh, where, twenty years before, he had sought and found an asylum. He subsequently removed to Prague, in Bohemia; thence to Goritz, in Styria; and there, in the chateau of Grafenberg, he was soon afterwards attacked by cholera, which carried him off.

Born at Versailles, 1757; died at Goritz, 1836.

SPAIN.

CHARLES I., of Spain. (See CHARLES V. of Germany.)

CHARLES II., the son of Philip IV., succeeded to the throne in 1665. He married twice, but never had any issue. By his will he constituted Philip of France, duke of Anjou, his heir, which, after his death, led to the contest known in Europe as the "War of the Spanish Succession."

Born 1661; died 1700.

CHARLES III., son of Philip V., on the death of his brother Ferdinand, exchanged his kingdom of Sicily for the Spanish dominions. He was a virtuous man, and possessed of considerable administrative abilities. In the war with England he retook Minorca, but saw his commerce ruined, and all his treasure at Havannah fall into the enemy's hands.

Born 1716; died 1788.

CHARLES IV., son of the above, abdicated in favour of his son, who had conspired against him, in 1808.

Born 1748; died 1819.

SWEDEN.

CHARLES I. TO IX. These biographies present nothing remarkable; and, indeed, in the case of the first six, nothing authentic.

CHARLES X., or GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, the son of John Casimir, count palatine of the Rhine, ascended the throne of Sweden on the abdication of Christina in 1654. He turned his arms with success against the Poles, and gained, in 1656, the famous battle of Warsaw, which lasted three days, besides taking a great number of their principal places. The Poles called to their assistance Russia, Holland, and Denmark, obliging the king of Sweden to conclude a peace. War, however, soon broke out again, and after taking Kronenburg, Charles laid siege to Copenhagen; but, his navy being defeated, he was obliged to return to his country.

Born at Upsal, 1622; died 1660.

CHARLES XI. was the son and successor of the above. On his accession, in 1660, a peace was concluded with Denmark; but, in 1674, the latter power declared war against him, and he lost several places, which were restored at the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678. He was a good prince, and gave much of his attention to the regulation of the internal affairs of his kingdom.

Born 1655; died 1697.

CHARLES XII., son and successor of the preceding, had, from his childhood, an ambition to imitate the actions of Alexander the Great. He mounted the throne in 1697, being then only 15, and, at his coronation, snatched the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and placed it on his own head. His youth presented a favourable opportunity to Russia, Denmark, and Poland to enter into an alliance against him, with the view of dismembering his kingdom. The young hero, undaunted by this confederacy, attacked each in turn, beginning with Denmark, whom he compelled to sue for peace. In 1700 he decisively defeated the Russians in an intrenched camp, at Narva, although the odds against him were 80,000 to 8,000. His next enterprise was against Poland, and, after several battles, he dethroned Augustus in 1707, and placed Stanislaus upon the throne. Charles was now at the head of 60,000 men, when he formed the resolution of humbling Peter the Great. At first he obtained some signal advantages, and was joined by Mazeppa, the hetman or chief of the Cossacks, in his attempt to overpower the Czar. After suffering the horrors of a winter campaign in the Ukraine, he laid siege to the town of Pultowa, to the relief of which Peter came at the head of 70,000 men. On the 8th July, 1709, a general battle was fought, in which Charles was completely defeated, and fled, leaving 9,000 men upon the field. He himself was wounded in the leg, and had to be carried off in a litter. He sought an asylum in Turkey, where he was entertained by the grand seignior, who provided for him a residence at Bender. Here his conduct was so violent, that he was ordered to leave the Turkish territories, which he refused to do. On this, the grand seignior directed that he should be forced away; but Charles, with his retinue, formed an encampment, and resisted the attack of the janizaries till superiority of numbers obliged him to take shelter in his house. Thence he sallied out, sword in hand; but being entangled by his long spurs, fell, and was taken prisoner. He was still treated with respect, and after being kept as a prisoner for ten months, he requested leave to return to his dominions, which was readily granted. On arriving in Sweden, he was received with universal joy, but found his kingdom reduced to a state of great wretchedness. Getting together an army, in 1716 he invaded Norway, but after penetrating to Christiana, was obliged to return to Sweden. He resumed the attack in the winter of 1718, but was killed by a cannon-shot at the siege of Frederickshall, on December 11 of the same year. Charles was liberal, active, and firm; but rash, obstinate, and cruel. He was of abstemious habits (in that respect very unlike his famous prototype Alexander), and never intimidated even in the midst of the greatest dangers. At the battle of Narva he had several horses shot under him, and as he was mounting upon a fresh one, he said, "These people find me exercise." When he was besieged at Stralsund, a bomb fell into the house while he was dictating to his secretary, who immediately dropped the pen in a fright. "What is the matter?" said Charles. "Oh, the bomb!" answered his secretary. "The bomb," says the king, "what have we to do with the bomb? go on."

Born at Stockholm, 1682; died 1718.

CHARLES XIII. was the second son of king Adolphus Frederic, and his mother was the sister of Frederick the Great of Prussia. As high admiral of Sweden, he distinguished himself by a great victory over the Russians in the Gulf of Finland in 1788. After the assassination of his brother Gustavus II. in 1792 he became regent, and in 1809 was chosen king. Having no children, he adopted the French general Bernadotte as crown prince.

Born 1748; died 1818.

CHARLES XIV., whose real name was Jean Baptiste Jules Bernadotte, enlisted in a regiment of the French royal marines in 1780, and served two years in Corsica. In 1790, when the revolution began, he was at Marseilles, and when the war broke out with Austria and Prussia, he was dispatched to the Rhine, and, under General Custine, soon distinguished himself. He became chief of brigade, and afterwards general of division, under Kleber and Jourdan. In 1797, with 20,000 men, he reinforced General Bonaparte in Italy, and took a principal part in the battle of Tagliamento. Soon after this, he was chosen by Bonaparte to present to the Directory the standards which had been taken from the Austrians, and, on his return to head-quarters, advised Bonaparte to sign the treaty of Campo-Formio. Being offended at the conduct of Napoleon, who, when he left Italy, took from him one half of his troops, he resigned his command, and was appointed ambassador at Vienna, where he did not hoist the tricoloured flag above his hotel until ordered by the Directory. When this was done, it created a riot, soon after which Bernadotte left for Paris, where, in 1798, he married Eugénie Clary, the younger sister of the wife of Joseph Bonaparte. In the following year he was appointed minister-at-war; but on the return of Bonaparte from Egypt, he was without employment. When Napoleon became first consul, he had command of the Army of the West; and, on the constitution of the empire, he was made a marshal and stationed at Hanover, with the command of the army. Here he repressed irregularities, provided for his soldiers without plundering the people, and laid the foundation of that high character for honour, humanity, and justice, which, at a future day, materially influenced his election to the throne of Sweden. In 1805 he left Hanover to join Napoleon against Austria, and at the battle of Austerlitz broke the centre of the Russians. In the following year he was created Prince of Pontecorvo, which Napoleon designated as the immediate fief of the imperial crown. In the war against Prussia he fought with his usual success, and in 1808 was ordered against Denmark. On the 5th and 6th July, 1809, he fought against the Austrians at Wagram, after which he demanded permission to retire, and obtained it. He had had high words with Napoleon, who, at that battle, had deprived him of his reserve division, and not treated him well. He returned to Paris, but was soon again employed, and notwithstanding several quarrels between him and the emperor, neither of whom ever seems to have quite understood the other, he, in 1810, accepted the governor-generalship of the Roman states. By this time, Gustavus IV., king of Sweden, had, on account of incapacity, been forced to abdicate his crown, and he and his descendants were, by the Swedish States, declared excluded from the throne for ever. The uncle of this sovereign assumed the reins of government as Charles XIII., but was childless; and the States chose Augustus of Holstein-Augustenburg to be heir to the throne. This prince, however, died in 1810, and Charles XIII. proposed Bernadotte to the Swedish diet, as a proper person to be appointed prince royal of Sweden. The choice was unanimously approved, on condition of his accepting the Communion of Augsburg, which he did, and, on the 2nd of November, 1810, entered Stockholm amid the acclamations of the people and the salutes of artillery. He then changed his name to Charles John. In defence of the rights of the country of his adoption, he was soon called upon to take up arms against Napoleon, and from 1812 to the fall of the emperor he was actively engaged in the principal wars and events which occupied the attention of continental Europe. In 1814 Sweden and Norway were united under Charles XIII., and Bernadotte approved as the prince royal. In 1818 Charles XIII. died, when Bernadotte was proclaimed king of Norway and Sweden, under the title of Charles XIV. He was in the May of that year crowned at Stockholm by the archbishop of Upsal, and subsequently at Drontheim by the bishop of Aggerhuus. Having now attained the summit of human ambition, he directed his attention to the development of the resources of his adopted country, and after a long reign of unusual prosperity, he passed quietly from this world, after playing no ordinary part in it, and completing his eightieth year.

Born at Pau, 1764; died 1844.

Naples and the Two Sicilies.

CHARLES I., count of Aragon and king of Naples, was the son of Louis VIII. of France. He married the daughter of the count of Provence, and thereby inherited that country. He accompanied his brother Louis to Egypt in 1248, and both were made prisoners at Damietta at the same time. On his return, he defeated Manfred, the usurper of the Sicilian crown, assumed the title of king of Naples, and put to death Conradin, duke of Suabia, and the duke of Austria, whom he had taken prisoners. After this he laid the prince of Tunis under tribute, and suppressed the Ghibelines. In 1276 the title of king of Jerusalem was conferred on him, after which he meditated an expedition against Constantinople. His arbitrary conduct to the Sicilians caused them to conspire against him, headed by Giovanni de Procida. On Easter Monday, 1282, all the French who could be found in Palermo were massacred at the hour of vespers; and this event is known in history as the "Sicilian Vespers." Sicily was thus lost to Charles, its inhabitants choosing Peter III. of Aragon for their king.

Born 1220; died 1285.

CHARLES II., called the Lame, the son and successor of the above, was, at the time of his father's death, a prisoner in the hands of the Sicilians, who would have put him to death but for the intercession of Constantia, queen of Peter of Aragon. He recovered his liberty in 1288, on condition of renouncing his claim to the Sicilian crown; but being absolved from this condition by the pope, he made several unsuccessful attempts to gain possession of Sicily.

Born 1248; died 1309.

CHARLES III., of Durazzo, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and, by his marriage with Margaret, niece of Joan, queen of Naples, obtained that kingdom from the pope, on the excommunication of Joan in 1380. He put Joan to death, and afterwards quarrelled with the pope, who excommunicated him in his turn. Charles next claimed the crown of Hungary, but fell in attempting to conquer it.

Born 1345; died 1386.

Savoy and Sardinia.

[There have been several dukes of Savoy and kings of Sardinia named Charles, the most remarkable of whom are those mentioned below.]

CHARLES EMMANUEL I., duke of Savoy, called the Great, succeeded his father Emmanuel Philibert in 1580. Taking advantage of the troubles of France, he possessed himself of the marquisate of Saluzzo, and caused himself to be acknowledged by the "leaguers" count of Provence, in 1590. But Henry IV. subsequently succeeded in taking Savoy and a portion of Piedmont. Of a boundless ambition, he laid claims to the empire, after the death of Matthias, then to the kingdom of Cyprus and the principality of Macedon. He died of grief, not being able to accomplish his projects.

Born at Rivoli, 1562; died 1630.

CHARLES EMMANUEL III., 2nd king of Sardinia of the house of Savoy, was the son of Victor Amadeus II., and, in 1730, mounted the throne, on the abdication of his father. In 1733 he united himself to France and Spain, who desired to weaken Austria; and at the head of the allied forces, conquered the Milanese, defeated the imperialists at Guastalla, and obtained, as a reward, Novarese and some fiefs of the empire. In 1742, the promise of an addition to his dominions determined him to take part with the queen of Hungary against France and Spain. He possessed himself of Modena and Mirandola, after evincing great military abilities. He lost, however, in 1744, at Coni, 5,000 men, and subsequently busied himself with the internal affairs of his kingdom.

Born 1701; died 1773.

CHARLES EMMANUEL IV., 4th king of Sardinia, was the son of Victor Amadeus III., and succeeded his father in 1796, just as France had seized the greater portion of his dominions. Mixed up in the misfortunes of the Bourbons, with whom he was connected, Charles Emmanuel vainly exerted himself to suppress the revolutionary elements in his kingdom. He was forced to cede to the French republic his continental possessions, and, in 1798, retired to the island of Sardinia. In 1802 ae abdicated in favour of his brother Victor Emmanuel, and repaired to Rome, where he died.

Born 1751; died 1819.

CHARLES ALBERT, king of Sardinia, was the son of Charles Emmanuel, prince of Carignano. Educated in France, he early imbibed liberal ideas and a desire for the independence of Italy. In 1821 he commanded the Sardinian artillery, on the breaking out of the insurrection in that year. Victor Emmanuel, when he abdicated, nominated him regent till the arrival of the new king, Charles Felix. An Austrian intervention, however, obliged him to retire, and, exiled in Tuscany, he continued there for some time, in disgrace, a victim to the resentment of the Carbonari, who thought he had betrayed them. In 1829, however, he was appointed viceroy of Sardinia, and in 1831 was called to the throne. He now ardently devoted himself to administrative reform in the various departments of law, commerce, and the army. In 1848, the year which witnessed revolutions in nearly all the kingdoms of Europe, he gave his subjects a liberal constitution, and openly embraced the cause of Italian independence and unity. Supporting by the force of arms the insurgents of Lombardy, Venetia, Parma, Placentia, and Modena, he, at first, obtained various brilliant successes, defeating the Austrians at Pastrengo, Goito, Rivoli, and Somma Campagna. He succeeded also in taking Pizzighettone and Peschiera; but, badly seconded by the Lombard troops, he was, in his turn, beaten at San Donato by the Austrian Radetzky, and forced to quit Milan precipitously. He was now compelled to solicit an armistice, the terms of which lost him all his former advantages. Yielding to the remonstrances of the ultra party, he imprudently recommenced the war at the expiration of the armistice; but he now experienced nothing but reverses. Losing, in spite of great personal bravery, the decisive battle of Novara, on 23rd March, 1849, he abdicated on the same day in favour of his son, Victor Emmanuel II. This prince was singularly religious, and it was said of him, "He fought like a hero, lived like a monk, and died like a martyr."

Born 1798; died at Oporto, 1849.

VARIOUS RULERS.

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, called the Bad, was the son of Philip, count of Evreux, who became king of Navarre by his marriage with the daughter of Louis Hutin, king of France. At the age of eighteen, he succeeded his mother, who reigned alone after her husband's death. Of a restless disposition, he passed through a variety of fortune, and ultimately met with a remarkable death. Being ill of a leprosy, the physicians caused him to be wrapped in sheets dipped in spirits of wine and covered with brimstone. These were sewed about his body, and his page, endeavouring to loosen the bandage, accidentally set fire to it with a taper which he held in his hand. The king was so dreadfully scorched, that he died in great agony.

Born 1332; died 1387.

CHARLES "THE BOLD," duke of Burgundy, was the son of Philip the Good, whom he succeeded in 1467. He early displayed great courage, verging on rashness, and was constantly at war with Louis XI., king of France. The latter instigated Charles's subjects (the inhabitants of Liège and Ghent) to revolt against him; but they were defeated, and cruelly punished by the duke. Learning that Louis XI. was again tampering with his people, he seized him, and forced him to assist in suppressing the insurrection. Charles then took Guelderland and Zutphen, and, desirous of increasing his dominions, invaded Switzerland, where he committed the most inhuman outrages. The Swiss, however, collected their forces, and the duke was first defeated at Granson, and afterwards at Morat, 1476, where his army was completely destroyed. In 1477, whilst besieging Nancy, in the territory of the duke of Lorraine, he was killed. (See LOUIS XI.) He left one daughter, Marie, who inherited his estates, and added a portion of them to Austria by her marriage with Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederick III.

Born at Dijon, 1435; died 1477.

CHARLES II., called the Great, duke of Lorraine, was the son of Duke Francis I. and Christina of Denmark, niece of Charles V. Being only three years old at the death of his father, a joint regency was established under Christina and the bishop of Verdun. The prince was the benefactor of his people, and possessed great administrative abilities. He founded the university of Pont-à-Mousson, and the towns of Clermont, Lunéville, and Stenay. He married Claude, daughter of Henry II. of France, and in 1589 aspired to that throne.

Born 1543; died 1608.

CHARLES III., duke of Lorraine, succeeded to the dukedom in 1624, and unwisely incurring the hostility of France, was despoiled of his estates by Louis XIII. He, however, recovered a portion of them by the treaty of St. Germains, in 1641, and that of the Pyrenees in 1659. Having violated these treaties, he was again dispossessed of his provinces. He then joined the army of the emperor, and gained a victory at Trevos, where he took prisoner Marshal de Crequi. By a will, signed 1660, he constituted Louis XIV. of France his heir.

Born 1603; died 1675.

CHARLES IV., duke of Lorraine, nephew of the above, succeeded to his rights in spite of the opposition of Louis XIV. Not being able, however, to retain possession of the dukedom, he took service in Austria. Obtaining the friendship of the emperor Leopold, he received the hand of the archduchess Marie-Eleonora, the emperor's sister. He became one of the first generals of the empire, and gained, amongst many other victories, that of Mohatz over the Turks, in 1687.

Born at Vienna, 1643; died 1690.

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, called the Bad, was crowned in 1349. Descended from Philip the Bold, king of France, he possessed the right to the throne in case of the extinction of the Valois line. He constantly fomented troubles in the kingdom, with the view of arriving at the crown. Allying himself, with this aim, to Henry V. of England, he urged his pretensions to various provinces, raised Paris in insurrection against the dauphin (Charles V.), endeavouring even to poison him, and became, at last, tranquil only when he saw that prince firmly seated in the enjoyment of power. Then turning to Spain, he became entangled in the contest between Peter the Cruel and Henry of Transtamara, who disputed each other's right to Castile. Betraying, in its turn, each party, he was at length compelled to give up a portion of his dominions, in 1379. Adversity at last instructed him, and he passed his latter years in peace, engaged in governing his country.

Born 1332; died 1387.

CHARLES, a county on the S.W. part of Maryland, U.S. It is fertile in the usual cereals, tobacco, cotton, and other products. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 18,548. Port Tobacco is the chief town.

CHARLES CAPE, the most E. point of Labrador, British N. America. Lat. 52° N. Lon. 55° 30′ W.—Another which, with Cape Henry, forms the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. Lat. 37° 18′ N. Lon. 75° 45′ W.

CHARLES CITY, a county of Virginia, United States, bounded on the S. by the James river, and on the N. and E. by the Chickahominy. The capital is Charles City Court House. Area, 184 square miles. Pop. 5,512.

CHARLES ISLAND, in Hudson Strait, British N. America. Ext. 35 miles long by 25 broad. Lat. 62° 44′ N. Lon. 74° 18′ W.—Also one of the Galapagos, in the Pacific, of volcanic formation. Lat. 10° 15′ N. Lon. 90° 31′ W.—Another small island of the name is in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, British North America, with a small but safe harbour on its north side. Lat. 50° 12′ N. Lon. 63° 15′ W.

CHARLES, ST., a county of Louisiana, United States. No longer recognised.

CHARLES, ST., a county in Missouri, United States. Area, 480 square miles. This county is not mentioned in the latest official returns, it appears to have been merged into another county.

CHARLES, ST., LAKE, is in Lower Canada, 12 miles from Quebec. Ext. 5 miles long. A river of the same name has its source here, and joins the St. Lawrence at Quebec.

CHARLESTON, charlz'-ton, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 1,905 square miles. Pop. 102,800.

CHARLESTON, the "Palmetto city," a city and seaport, capital of the county. It is built on a low point of land between the rivers Ashley and Cooper, which unite immediately below and form a spacious and convenient harbour, communicating with the ocean at Sullivan's Island, 7 miles from the city. Near the Ashley river are numerous inlets and small lagoons. The city is regularly laid out in parallel streets, from 35 to 70 feet in width, running from river to river, and intersected by others at right angles, some of which are narrow and unhealthy. Meeting-street, stretching across the peninsula, is the chief business thoroughfare, containing most of the public buildings, and wholesale houses; and there are many fashionable shops in King-street. Some of the streets are very picturesque in aspect, with tall old houses, gable-ends to the streets, and having verandahs and lattices covered with vines and luxuriant creeping plants. The Battery is a fine promenade, by the waterside, lined with handsome buildings of varied architecture. There are thirty-six churches, the most ancient of which is St. Michael's, in the oldest part of the town, near which are some houses of Dutch architecture, erected soon after the foundation of the city. St. Philip's church, near the harbour, and opposite the old cemetery, has a lofty spire. Grace church is the most fashionable. There are an old Huguenot church, with interesting inscriptions; a Roman Catholic cathedral, and two synagogues. Among the other public buildings are the large Orphan House, founded in 1790, a stately edifice, with a statue of William Pitt in the gardens; Charleston Clubhouse, the seat of the Federal Courts; the Court House, the City Hall, South Carolina Hall, and a new Custom-house, built of white marble in the Corinthian style. There is a large college. Just outside the town is the large and beautiful Magnolia Cemetery, containing many fine monuments. Some of the roads leading out of the town are very attractive, embowered in the foliage of magnolias, myrtles, and jessamines, with oaks and palmetto trees. The harbour is very large, enclosed on all sides except the east, where a troublesome bar of shifting sand has formed, but ships drawing 17 feet of water can enter safely. In front of the city is a fort on an island, Castle Pinckney, and the entrance is defended by a battery on Tamar Island, another at the north end of Morris Island, and Forts Moultrie and Fort Beauregard, on Sullivan's Island, a fashionable suburb and summer resort. Fort Sumter, so memorable as the first scene of conflict in the great civil war of 1861—5, is on a rock in the centre of the channel.

Manf. and Commerce.—Phosphate manures are manufactured from the marl which abounds in the vicinity, and building fittings, doors, sashes, &c., and machinery are extensively made, and some ship-building is carried on. The town is the greatest trading mart of the southern states, the famous Sea Island cotton, growing in the locality, and rice, of which the crops are larger than in any other part of the United States, being largely exported. There are two steamer lines between Charleston and New York, and lines to Baltimore, Boston, and Florida. There are terminus stations of the North-Eastern and South Carolina railways.

Pop. 50,000.

Lat. 32° 46′ N. Lon. 79° 55′ W.

History.—Charleston was founded in 1680, and about 1690 was colonized by French refugees, who, on account of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, fled here and settled. In 1779 it was taken by the British, but abandoned in 1782. It has frequently suffered by fire and the ravages of yellow fever. The civil war was begun here in 1861, by the bombardment of Fort Sumter by the Confederate troops. The Federals established a blockade by sinking ships in the harbour, notwithstanding which a great number of ships carrying stores for the Confederates contrived to reach the city. In August, 1863, the Federals bombarded the city, and in February, 1865, the Confederates evacuated it, having first set fire to the upper part.

CHARLESTOWN, charlz'-town, a seaport of Massachusetts, United States, 1 mile N. of Boston. The principal part is beautifully situate on a peninsula, formed by Mystic and Charles rivers, which unite immediately below in Boston harbour. Two bridges across Charles river connect the town with Boston, with which it was incorporated in 1847. Two other bridges across Mystic river join it to Malden and Chelsea. There is also a bridge across a bay of Charles River, on the west side of the town, connecting it with Cambridge. The public buildings are, the state prison, Massachusetts Insane Hospital, an almshouse, townhouse, and houses for public worship. A navy-yard of the United States, with a dry-dock about 80 acres in extent, occupies the south-east part of the town. CHARTRES, shartr, an ancient town of France, in the department of Eure-et-Loire, 47 miles S.W. of Paris. It stands on the Eure, which divides into two channels, between which are promenades, formerly the ramparts. The town occupies the side and the base of a hill, the streets connecting the upper and lower towns being very steep. The houses are mostly old and built of wood, and the streets are narrow and crowded. The cathedral is accounted one of the finest edifices of the kind in France. It is situated on the summit of the hill, and has two spires, one of which is more than 400 feet high. There are 130 painted glass windows, the finest in the country. In it St. Bernard, in 1145, preached the second crusade. St. Pierre's is an interesting church, and there is a monument to the memory of General Marceau. Manf. Woollens, leather, and hosiery. There is a very large weekly corn-market managed by a corporation of women. Pop. 18,250.—This town was long held by the English, from whom it was taken by Dunois, in 1432. Anciently it was the capital of the Carnutes, and also, in the time of the Roman invasion, Autricum, the capital of Celtic Gaul.

CHARYBDIS, ka-rib'-dis, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Sicily, opposite the rocks of Scylla, on the coast of Italy, in the strait of Messina. According to Homer, it proved fatal to part of the fleet of Ulysses. The difficulty of escaping both the whirlpool and the rock gave rise to the proverb of "avoiding Scylla and falling into Charybdis;" meaning, that in our eagerness to fly from one evil, we may fall into another, equally great. According to fable, Charybdis was a Sicilian woman, who having stolen the oxen of Hercules, was struck with Jupiter's thunderbolt, and changed into a whirlpool.

CHASE, SAMUEL, American statesman and judge. He was admitted to the bar at the age of 20, and soon distinguished himself. He was one of the most energetic opponents of the British government, and one of the signers of the American Declaration of Independence. In 1791 he was made one of the judges of the Supreme Court, but some accusations having been made against him, he was impeached and tried before the Senate and acquitted. He continued to discharge judicial functions during the remainder of his life.

Born in Maryland, 1741; died 1811.

CHASHE-LOOMBOO, cha-shee'-loom-boo', a town of Thibet, 160 miles S.W. of Lassa. The Jeshoo Lama resides there, and there is a large Buddhist monastery, consisting of about 400 separate houses. A large manufactory of idols is carried on.

CHASLES, MICHEL, shal, a distinguished French geometrician, who, by his power of generalization, greatly simplified and extended the most important theories. In 1841 he was appointed professor of astronomy and of applied mechanics in the Polytechnic school, and in 1846 was called to the chair of higher geometry, which was instituted in the faculty of Sciences. In 1851 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1854 was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Epernon, 1793.

CHASLES, VICTOR EUPHEMION-PHILARÈTE, a distinguished French litterateur, whose father, from being a professor of rhetoric, became a revolutionist, and subsequently a general in the French army. In his 15th year he was apprenticed to a printer, and at the time of the Restoration, was imprisoned for two months, on account of his master being suspected as a plotter against the security of the state. Chasles was set at liberty through the intercession of Chateaubriand, when he came to England, where for seven years he directed the printing department of the establishment of Mr. Valpy. Soon after this, he returned to Paris, and entered upon a literary career marked by considerable originality and success. His fecundity in authorship has been so great, that it would occupy a considerable space even to enumerate his works. Besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes," the "Revue de Paris," and other publications, he has composed a number of volumes, embracing a wide range of subjects, under the title of "Studies," and is the author of several works on England and its literature. He is also a professor of languages and European literature in the modern College of France, and a knight of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Mainvilliers, near Chartres, 1799; died at Venice, 1873.

CHASSE, DAVID HENDRIK, Baron, chas'-sa, a brave soldier, who, at ten years of age, entered the Dutch army as a cadet, but who subsequently joined the French, and in 1793 became a lieutenant-colonel. In the war with Prussia, in 1806, he greatly distinguished himself, and in the Peninsula received the nickname of "General Bayonet," from the frequency with which he caused that weapon to be used in battle. In 1811, Napoleon I. made him a baron of the empire, and he continued to fight throughout the campaign of 1813 and 1814, and greatly distinguished himself at Waterloo. In 1830 he was appointed governor of Antwerp, and in 1832 defended that city against 75,000 French soldiers, with a garrison of 6,000.

There is a large trade in cattle, grain, and timber. Pop. 3,000.

CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE RENÉ, Viscount de, a distinguished French writer, who was educated in the college at Rennes for the church, but who subsequently entered the army. After passing through some adventures, he, in 1790, went to America in search of the north-west passage, and had an interview with Washington in the United States. His wanderings through the primeval woods of that country have been described in his "René" and his "Atala." On his return to Europe, he joined the army of Condé, was wounded at the siege of Thionville, and, in 1793, was an exile in London, reduced to a state of great misery. He remained in England seven years, suffering great hardships, maintaining himself principally by teaching the French and Latin languages, and translating works for the booksellers. In 1797 his "Essay on Revolutions" appeared in London, and in the spring of 1800 he was enabled to return to Paris. He now published his "Atala" in the columns of the Mercury newspaper, and this was followed by his "Genius of Christianity," which was so fortunate as to attract the attention of the First Consul, who gave him some diplomatic employment. But the murder of the Duke d'Enghien disgusted him, and in 1806 he visited the East. On his return, although Chateaubriand continued to write, he produced little worth noting until the fall of the empire, when he published his celebrated pamphlet "De Bonaparte et des Bourbons," which Louis XVIII. declared was equal to an army of 100,000 men in paving the way for the return of his dynasty to the throne. He was made a peer and minister of state, and became a favourite at the Tuileries. In 1822 he was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the British Court, but was dismissed in 1824. He resigned titles and all he possessed, with the fall of the monarchy of 1830, and sank into a despondency, which deepened with his years. A memorial statue was erected at his birthplace in 1875.

Born at St. Malo, 1768; died 1848.

CHATEAUDUN, sha'-to-du(h)n, an ancient town of France, department Eure-et-Loir, 26 miles S.W. of Chartres. CHATTERTON, THOMAS, chat'-ter-ton, the boy-poet, an extraordinary youth, the posthumous son of the master of a charity-school and sexton at Redcliffe church, Bristol. Thomas was educated in writing and arithmetic at Colston's charity-school; after which he was articled to an attorney. What has given celebrity to this youth, is the real or pretended discovery of poems, said to have been written in the 15th century by Thomas Rowley, a priest of Bristol, and found in Redcliffe church, of which Chatterton's ancestors had been sextons nearly a century and a half. His father certainly removed a number of parchments from an old chest in that church, most of which were used in covering books. Young Chatterton, from the perusal of some of these, is supposed to have formed the design of a forgery. In 1768 appeared, in a Bristol newspaper, an article entitled "A Description of the Friars first passing over the Old Bridge; taken from an Ancient Manuscript." This attracted the notice of a Mr. Barrett, who was engaged in writing the history of Bristol; and he obtained from Chatterton several pieces in prose and verse, purporting to be written by Thomas Rowley and Canynge, the founder of Redcliffe church. The year following, he began a correspondence with Horace Walpole, well known as an antiquary and connoisseur, then engaged in collecting materials for his "Anecdotes of Painting in England." Chatterton manufactured biographies of imaginary painters never before heard of. Walpole was at first delighted, but, on second thoughts, sent the papers to his friends Mason and Gray, who pronounced them forgeries. Chatterton had formed great expectations from the patronage of Mr. Walpole; but finding himself neglected, he wrote him a letter, which Walpole called "impertinent," and their intercourse ended. Rowley's poems were first collected by Mr. Tyrwhitt, in one vol. 8vo, and afterwards in one vol. 4to, by Dean Milles; but the former gentleman gave up the question of their genuineness. A sharp controversy was carried on for some time on the point, between Mr. Warton, Mr. Bryant, Mr. Mathias, and others; but the poems are now generally considered as Chatterton's own productions. At the age of 17, he came to London, determined to gain his living by literature, and wrote incessantly, producing poems, satirical sketches, and political letters in the style of Pope, the essayist of the time, and Junius. They were generally poor productions, and have induced some critics to think that he was incapable of producing the really beautiful ballads which he is generally supposed to have forged. He failed to obtain remuneration, and driven to despair by poverty, committed suicide by taking poison at his lodgings in Brook-street, Holborn.

Born at Bristol, 1752; died 1770.

CHATTOOGA, chat-tod'-ga, a county of Georgia, U.S. It is fertile, yielding wheat, corn, and tobacco. Minerals. Iron, lead, marble, and limestone. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 10,021. The capital is Summerville.

CHAUCER, GEOFFREY, chaw'-ser, the father of English poetry, was (it is generally supposed, although exact information is not forthcoming) the son of a wealthy merchant of London, who gave him a liberal education. He was, for some time, at Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Oxford. Afterwards he improved himself by visiting foreign countries, and on his return, studied law in the Inner Temple, but the only authentic record of this part of his career is that he was fined for assaulting a Franciscan friar in Fleet-street. He afterwards served in the French wars, under Edward III., and was for some time a prisoner of war. In 1370 he was appointed his majesty's shieldbearer, and about that time married Philippa, daughter of Sir Payne Roets, and sister of the lady who afterwards espoused John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster. In 1373, being sent to Genoa to hire ships for the king's service, he obtained, when he came back to England, a grant of a pitcher of wine a day, to be delivered by the butler of England, besides the comptrollership of the customs of London, for wool, &c. Prior to this, he had had a pension of twenty marks (say £240) a year conferred on him. In the succeeding reign, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliffe, he was obliged to go abroad to avoid the resentment of the clergy. He, however, returned privately, but was taken and committed to prison, whence he was not released till he had made his submission, and discovered the names of those who had associated with him in embracing the new doctrines. For having done this, he was afterwards filled with remorse, and, in his "Testament of Love," deplores the disgrace into which his conduct had brought him. In 1386 he was elected knight of the shire of Kent, and, in 1389, clerk of the works at Westminster, of Windsor, and other palaces. He had just lost his wife, and spent the remainder of his life in comparative retirement, partly at Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, consoling himself by composing the famous "Canterbury Tales." He died in London, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, the first of the long line whose ashes repose in Poets' Corner. The poet left two sons, one of whom was speaker of the House of Commons and ambassador to France. Of Chaucer's poems, his "Canterbury Tales" are entitled to the first rank, although many of his other pieces, especially "The Flower and the Leaf," the "Romaunt of the Rose," and "Troilus and Cresside," possess great beauties and merit. There have been several editions of his works, and some of his poems have been modernized by Dryden, Pope, and others.

Born in London, 1328; died 1400.

CHAUDIERE, sho'-de-air, a river of Lower Canada, British North America. It has its source in Lake Megantic, on the border of the state of Maine, very near the sources of the Kennebec river, and, after a course northwards of 102 miles, falls into the St. Lawrence six miles above Quebec.—The FALLS OF CHAUDIERE, 120 feet in their descent, are 4 miles from the mouth of the river.

CHAUDIERE, LAKE, formed by an expansion of the Ottawa river, Canada. It is about 18 miles long and 3 wide.

CHAUMETTE, PIERRE, sho-mette, one of the most extravagant of the sans culottes, who figured in the great French Revolution. He adopted the name of Anaxagoras, because his baptismal name had religious associations, made himself very conspicuous in the "worship of Reason," and seriously proposed that everybody in France should be compelled to wear wooden shoes and live on potatoes. Robespierre and his colleagues were glad of an excuse to get rid of him, and sent him to the guillotine.

Born at Nevers, 1763; died 1794.

CHAUFFAILLES, sho'-fail, a busy manufacturing town of France, in the department of Saône-et-Loire, 15 miles S. of Charolles. Manf. Calico and cotton-spinning. Pop. 4,000

CHAUMONT (SUR LOIRE), sho'-mawng, a town of France, in the department of the Loir-et-Cher, on the left bank of the Loire, 9 miles S.W. of Blois. There is on a hill, a castle, which formerly belonged to Catherine de Medicis, who retired to it with her astrologers, and which was occupied for some time by Madame de Staël.

CHAUMONT (EN BASSIGNY), bas-seen'-ye, a town of France, capital of the department of Haute-Marne, about 2 miles above the confluence of the river Marne with the Suize, and 141 S.E. of Paris. It is well built, with broad streets, and having, among its public buildings, a college, an hospital, hôtel-de-ville, a college, public library, and a kind of triumphal arch, begun under Napoleon I. and finished under Louis XVIII. Manf. Woollen, hosiery, caps, gloves, cottons, wax tapers, leather, and sugar; and there are cotton spinning-mills and bleaching-grounds. Pop. 8,200.—Here, on March 1, 1814, after the breaking up of the congress at Chatillon, the allied powers entered into an agreement against Napoleon I., which afterwards formed the basis of what was called the Holy Alliance.

CHAUNY, sho'-ne, a town of France, in the department Aisne, 19 miles N.W. of Laon. One half of the town stands on an island in the Oise, which is here navigable. Manf. Sacking, worsted, stockings, leather, and chemicals. There are also some cotton-mills, and machines for polishing the plate-glass of St. Gobian. Pop. 5,400.

CHAUSSEY, sho'-se, a group of islands in the English Channel, opposite Granville, about 7 miles from the French coast. They furnish excellent granite, but otherwise are bare and unproductive. Immense numbers of rabbits run wild. Lat. 48° 52′ N. Lon. 1° 49′ W.

CHAUVIGNY, sho-veen'-ye, a town of France, 12 miles from Poitiers. Manf. Druggets chiefly. Pop. 2,000.

CHAUX DE FOND (LA), sho, fawn(g), a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Neufchâtel, 9 miles N.W. of the town of that name. It is built at an elevation of upwards of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, at the foot of a narrow defile of the Jura. Manf. Clocks and watches, of which it is one of the principal seats, more than 150,000 watches having been produced in one year. Pop. 22,456.

CHAVES, cha'-ves, a town of Portugal, provinces of Traz-os-Montes, near the Spanish frontier, on the right bank of the Tamega, which is crossed by a Roman bridge of 18 arches. It is defended by three forts. There are a church, two convents, two hospitals, and a mineral bath. Pop. 3,900.

CHAZZELLES, JOHN MATTHEW, chaz-zel', a French mathematician, who assisted Cassini in drawing the meridian line, and in 1685 was made hydrographical professor at Marseilles. He subsequently paid a visit to Egypt, and measured the pyramids, when he discovered that the four sides of the largest answer to the cardinal points of the compass. He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1695.

Born at Lyons, 1657; died 1710.

CHAZY, shai'-ze, a township of New York, U.S. It stands on Lake Champlain, adjoining Plattsburg, 186 miles from Albany. Pop. 4,500.—Also a river of the same name, falling into Lake Champlain.

CHEADLE, chee'-del, a market-town of Staffordshire, 13 miles N.E. of Stafford. Manf. Chiefly tape, brass, tin, and copper. In the neighbourhood are lime-works, and large collieries. Pop. 4,000. A station on the London and North-Western and Cheshire lines.

CHEAT RIVER, cheet, a river of Virginia, U.S., which rises in Haystack Peak, and after a course of 100 miles, joins West River, an affluent of the Ohio, within the state of Pennsylvania. Total course, about 90 miles.

CHEDUBA, ched'-u-ba, an island in the Bay of Bengal, 25 miles off the coast of Aracan, 16 miles long and 15 broad. Diversified with hills and dales, and attaining, in the south, an elevation of 1,450 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Cotton, sugar, rice, indigo, hemp, and tobacco. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 9,000, mostly of Burman descent. Lat. 18° 51′ N. Lon. 93° 28′ E.—This island was, in 1824, taken from the Burmese by the British. It is now a dependency of Aracan.

CHEERA, che'-ra, a city of the Chinese empire, 70 miles S.E. of Khoten. Excellent silk is produced in the vicinity. Pop. 10,000.

CHEKE, SIR JOHN, cheek, a learned Englishman, who was, in 1540, appointed the first professor of Greek at Cambridge, and in 1544 became tutor to Prince Edward, at whose accession he was rewarded with a pension and a grant of lands. He was also made provost of King's College, Cambridge, and received the honour of knighthood. Subsequently he was much persecuted on account of his Protestant principles, and recanted to avoid burning, dying of grief in consequence. He wrote a number of learned works, and successfully laboured to reform the mode of pronouncing the Greek language.

Born at Cambridge, 1514; died 1557.

CHE-KIANG, che'-ki-ang, a maritime province of China, bounded on the E. by the Pacific Ocean, and on the other sides by the Kiang provinces Ngan-hoei and Fo-kien. It is irregular in its surface, but one of the most fertile and commercial portions of the empire. It is said that 14 large rivers rise in the province. Pro. Cotton, silk, indigo, tea, fruits, camphor, and coal. Manf. Silk fabrics of great beauty, paper, gold and silver stuffs, and crape. Pop. 11,588,692. Lat. between 27° and 31° N. Lon. between 117° and 123° E.—This province comprises the Chusan Islands, and is subdivided into eleven departments. The chief towns are HANG-FOO-CHOO, the capital; NING-PO, Ching-hai, and Chapoo.

CHELICUT, chel'-e-cut, a town of the kingdom of Tigre, Abyssinia. There are a royal palace, and a highly decorated church. Pop. 8,000.

CHELIGOFF, a lake of Alaska, North America, about 80 miles long and 35 miles in average breadth.

CHELM, a town of Russian Poland, district of Lublin. It is the seat of a bishopric of the United Greek Church, and there is a theological seminary. A large proportion of the inhabitants are Jews. Pop. 2,900.

CHELMSFORD, chelms'-ford, the principal town of the county of Essex, near the confluence of the Chelmer and Can. The former river is crossed by a handsome iron bridge, and the latter by one of stone. The church is a fine building, erected in the 15th century, recently enlarged and restored. The public buildings are a shire-hall, a theatre, an assembly-room, a corn-exchange, and a house of correction. There is a free grammar school. The town is the seat of assizes and local courts. Agricultural implements are manufactured. There are hop-gardens in the vicinity, and a considerable trade in malt and corn is carried on. Pop. 9,885.

CHELMSFORD, a township of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, U.S., 26 miles from Boston. Pop. 2,300.—Middlesex Canal opens into the Merrimac river at this place. It has, in its neighbourhood, extensive quarries of fine granite.

CHELSEA, chel'-se, a town and parliamentary borough of Middlesex, on the Thames, forming a populous western suburb of London. Here is Chelsea Hospital, the national asylum for decayed and maimed soldiers, the noblest building, and one of the best foundations of the kind in Europe. This structure, designed by Sir Christopher Wren, was founded by Charles II. in 1682, proceeded with by James II., by William and Mary, and completed in 1692, at a cost of £150,000. Its principal part is a large quadrangle, open on the south side, having in the centre a bronze statue of the founder, Charles II., in Roman attire. The whole length, from east to west, is 790 feet. Attached to it is an inclosure of about 13 acres, besides extensive gardens. The whole extent of the premises is about 50 acres. It supports about 550 in-pensioners and about 70,000 out-pensioners, at an annual expenditure of nearly £1,500,000. Connected with the hospital is a royal military asylum, founded in 1801, by the duke of York, for the education and maintenance of soldiers' children. There are training colleges for male and female teachers. The botanical garden here, belonging to the company of Apothecaries, is enriched with a great variety of plants. It was a present to the company, made, in 1721, by Sir Hans Sloane, who was lord of the manor, and to whom there is a monument in the old church, as there is also to Sir Thomas Moore. There are many old houses, especially on Cheyne Walk, facing the river. It has water-works for supplying London, and a fine suspension-bridge here crosses the Thames. There are also extensive floor-cloth manufactories. Pop. 88,101.—The parliamentary borough of Chelsea, including Kensington, was created by the Reform Act of 1867.

CHELSEA, a township of Suffolk county, Massachusetts, U.S., 3 miles from Boston. There is a ferry from Boston across the harbour to this place, and it is also connected with Charlestown by a bridge. Pop. 21,782.

CHELTENHAM, chel'-ten-ham, a fashionable town, watering-place, and parliamentary borough, in the county of Gloucester, on the Chelt, 7 miles N.E. of Gloucester, and beautifully situated in a valley partially sheltered by the Cotswold Hills. It is noted for its medicinal springs, which are composed of sulphates of soda, magnesia, and lime, chlorides of sodium and manganese, and chloride of sodium, held in solution by carbonic acid. The principal street of the town is about a mile and a half long, and there are other fine streets and squares, planted with trees and shrubs. The promenade, with its avenues of elms, is a beautiful place of resort, and affords one of the finest drives in England. The parish church, St. Mary's, a cruciform structure in the Gothic style, built in the 11th century, was restored in 1801, and there are about 10 other churches, and many chapels. There are Church of England training schools and other educational establishments. Cheltenham College was founded in 1841, and the building, in the perpendicular style, erected in 1843. The chapel, built in 1858, contains memorial windows to the scholars who fell in the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny. The Pittville Spa was built about 1845, at a cost of £60,000. It is classic in design, having on three sides a colonnade in the Ionic style, statues over the grand entrance, and a dome. The Montpellier is another pump-room. There are also a large general hospital and other benevolent institutions, assembly-rooms, baths, museum, libraries, theatre, and other places of resort, and several large and handsome hotels. In front of the Queen's Hotel are memorial guns from Sebastopol. The value of the mineral waters was discovered by accident in 1716, but the place did not rise into notice until visited by George III., in 1786, when it quickly became a fashionable resort. Pop. 43,972, of whom a large proportion are visitors in search of health and pleasure.—A station on the Great Western and Midland Railways.

CHELVA, chel'-va, a town of Spain, on a river of the same name, province of Valencia. The church has a fine façade and lofty tower; the court-house is a handsome edifice, and the town generally is well built, with good streets and squares. Manf. Hempen shoes and linen. Pop. 4,500.

CHEMILLE, she-me'-yai, a town of France, in the department Maine-et-Loire on the Yonne, 20 miles S. of Angers. Manf. Handkerchiefs, calico, cotton yarn, and paper. It has a considerable trade in cattle. Pop. 1,900.

CHEMNITZ, or KEMNITZ, kem'-nits, an old but well-built town of Saxony, on the river of the same name, at its junction with the Kappel, 39 miles S.W. of Dresden. It contains several Protestant and one Roman Catholic church, an hospital, academy, lyceum, school of design, and cloth-hall. It was formerly fortified, but fine promenades are now on the site of the ramparts. Manf. Extensive, Chemnitz being the chief manufacturing town of Saxony. The cotton goods, especially hosiery, are in great demand, and woollen stuffs, linen, and shawls, are also made. There are about 3,000 Jacquard looms in the town, for the weaving of silk, cotton, and wool. The weavers are gratuitously instructed by the state. Cotton-weaving was established in the 17th century, and the art of cloth-printing introduced in 1770. English processes and machinery have been quickly adopted. Chemnitz was for 400 years a free imperial city. Pop. 110,693.—The town is connected by railway with all the principal towns of Germany.

CHEMNITZ, MARTEN, German reformer, who studied at Frankfort and Wittenberg, and was rector of the cathedral school of Königsberg. In 1553 he went back to Wittenberg, and took part with the reformers, and the following year was made a preacher in Brunswick. He wrote many theological works, and induced the Saxon and Swabian church to accept the Lutheran confession of faith.

Born in Brandenberg, 1522; died at Brunswick, 1586.

CHEMOSH, ke'-mosh, a "conqueror," or "subduer," an idol deity of the Moabites, in whose worship the most revolting abominations were practised.

CHEMUNG, che'-ming, a county in the south part of New York, United States. Area, 530 square miles. Pop. 43,065. The capital is Elmira.

CHENANGO, che-nan'-go, a county of New York, U.S. It is fertile, diversified with hill and dale, and watered by a river of the same name, which falls into the Susquehannah. Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 41,000. Norwich is the capital.

CHENAUB, or CHENAB, che-nawb', a river of the Punjab, rising in the Himalayas, estimated at 760 miles long. It is increased in its course by several tributaries, and finally falls into the Indus near Mittun-Kote, in Lat. 28° 55′ N. Lon. 70° 32′ E.

CHEOPS, or CHEOSPES, or CHEFU, ke'-ops, a king of Egypt, after Rhampsinitus, who built the largest of the famous pyramids.

CHEPHREN, kef'-ren, said to be a brother of Cheops, who also built a pyramid. The Egyptians so inveterately hated these two royal brothers that they publicly reported that the pyramids which they had built had been erected by a shepherd.

CHEPSTOW, chep'-sto, a market-town and seaport of Monmouthshire, standing on the right bank of the river Wye, which is crossed by an elegant bridge, 14 miles N.W. of Bristol. It is built on a slope, and has a castle, which was erected soon after the Norman conquest, and of which there are still extensive remains. The public buildings are a church, a fine specimen of the early pointed style, several Dissenting and a Roman Catholic chapel, endowed and national schools, and two hospitals. The Wye is navigable to the town, and as the tide rises from 40 to 60 feet, ships of large size are enabled to reach it. A considerable quantity of timber, bark, iron, and cider are exported. Its imports are wine from Oporto, and planks, hemp, flax, pitch, and tar from the Baltic. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 3,585.—In the castle of this place, Henry Martyn, one of the judges of Charles I., died, after being confined in it thirty years. The scenery in the neighbourhood is very picturesque.

CHER, shair, a river of France, which rises in the department Creuse, and, after a course of 195 miles, joins the Loire immediately below Tours. For the last 50 miles it is navigable.

CHER, a central department of France, inclosed by the departments Allier, Loiret, Nièvre, Loir-et-Cher, and Indre. Generally fertile, level, and well wooded. Pro. Wine and corn; sheep are numerous, and the trade generally consists of country produce. Minerals. Iron, coal, building and lithographic stone and marble. Manf. Iron, metal goods, woollens, earthenware, glass, beet-sugar, and paper. Pop. 351,405. The department is divided into three arrondissements, 21 cantons, and 291 communes.

CHERASCO, she-ras'-ko, a town of Northern Italy, at the conflux of the Tanaro and Stura, 30 miles S.E. of Turin. It is well built, and contains several churches. It was formerly fortified, but the works were demolished by the French in 1801. Its trade is mostly carried on in wine and silk. Pop. 3,500.—In April, 1796, this place was taken by the French, and in the same month, the Sardinian commissioners concluded with Napoleon I. the "Armistice of Cherasco," which gave to the French troops a free passage through the dominions of Sardinia.

CHERBOURG, or CHERBURG, sher'-boorg, an important seaport and naval station of France, in the department La Manche. It is situate on the north coast, at the bottom of a large bay, formed by Capes La Hague and Levi, on the south side of the English Channel, and stands in the hollow of the valley of the Divette, which here falls into the sea. Cherbourg has long been considered one of the principal stations of the French marine, and its improvement has, from time to time, occupied the attention of government, it having been commenced in the reign of Louis XVI. The commercial port consists of a harbour and a basin 1,338 feet long and 416 feet wide. The channel from the harbour to the sea, more than the third of a mile in length and 164 feet wide, is lined by a granite quay, with parapets. The harbour is defended by a breakwater nearly two and a half miles long, the construction of which was begun in 1783, but so great were the difficulties encountered that it was not completed till the reign of Louis Philippe. In the centre are a strong fort and lighthouse; and there are also lights and fortifications at Fort Operque-ville and the Isle of Pelée, at the western and eastern entrances of the harbour. The military port has several large docks, including the great Napoleon Docks, opened in 1858 by the Emperor Napoleon, in the presence of the Queen of England; building slip, dry docks, and extensive factories, and timber-shed. The town mostly consists of narrow and dirty streets, notwithstanding that it has a number of public fountains. Its principal edifices are the arsenals, civil and marine hospitals, churches, a prison, baths, barracks, and the buildings connected with the dockyards. There are schools of navigation and hydrography, college and libraries, a theatre and museum. Manf. Chemicals, sugar, leather, hosiery, and lace. An active trade in cattle, eggs, provisions generally, and wine, is carried on. Pop. 27,439. Lat. 49° 38′ N. Lon. 1° 37′ W.—Edward III. of England unsuccessfully laid siege to Cherbourg in 1346, but in 1418 it was given up to the British. The French regained it in 1450, but the English again took it in 1758.

CHERCHIL, or ZERZAHAL, cher'-chil, a seaport of Algeria, 45 miles S.E. of Algiers, on the coast of the Mediterranean. Since the occupation by the French the town has been greatly improved, and there are several handsome buildings. There is a good trade in grain and iron, copper and gypsum are found in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,000.—In the time of the Romans there was a large and splendid city on this site, Julius Cæsarea, the capital of Cæsarea Mauritania. It was destroyed by the Vandals, but rebuilt by the Greeks.

CHEREPOVETZ, or TCHEREPOVITZ, chere'-po-vetz, a Russian town on the right bank of the Sheksna, in the government of Novogorod. There are a cathedral and other churches. Three great annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,500.

CHERIBON, or TJIRIBON, sher-i-bon', a town on the north coast of the island of Java, 125 miles from Batavia. It is the capital of a province of the same name, and is situate at the end of a deep bay, now nearly deserted. It has a trade in teak-wood, coffee, and indigo; and is the residence of a Dutch governor. Pop. 12,000.

CHERKASK, OLD, or TCHERKASK, cher'-kask, a town of Russia, on an island formed by branches of the Don, 37 miles N.E. of Azov. Many of the houses are of wood, and built on piles, in consequence of the frequent inundations. There are several churches, a town-hall, and other public buildings. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 6,000.

CHERKASK, NEW, or NOVOI TCHERKASK, a town of Russia, 11 miles N. of the preceding, on a hill on the right bank of the river Aksai. The streets are narrow and dirty, and neither paved nor lighted. There are a cathedral, a hospital, an arsenal, and a good gymnasium, or public school. The town was founded in 1806, and the seat of government of the Don Cossacks removed thither from Old Cherkask. Pop. 17,000.

CHEROKEE, cher-o-kee', a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 710 square miles. Pop. 19,108. The capital is Centre.

CHEROKEE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 620 square miles. Pop. 14,325, Canton is the capital.

CHEROKEE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 625 square miles. Pop. 8,240.

CHEROKEE, a county of North Carolina, United States. Iron, lead, and various kinds of marble, are abundant. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 8,182. The capital is Murphy.

CHEROKEE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,740 square miles. Pop. 16,723. The capital is Rusk.

CHERONEA, ker-o-ne'-a, a ruined city of Bœotia, Greece, 5 miles from Lebadea, noted for the defeat of the Athenians by Philip, in 338 B.C., and for that of Mithridates by Sylla, 86 B.C. It was the birthplace of Plutarch.

CHERSO, kair'-so, an island of the Austrian empire, situate in the Adriatic, between the coasts of Dalmatia and Istria. It is 40 miles long and from 2 to 7 broad, irregular, rugged, and stony, but with some fertile spots, where grain, figs and olives are cultivated. There are large forests, whence timber for shipbuilding is obtained.

CHERSO, the chief town of the preceding, at the head of a bay on the west side of the island. There are a cathedral and other churches, two convents, a custom-house, and small dockyard. Pop. 3,500.

CHERSON, or KHERSON, ker'-son, a fortified town of European Russia, the capital of the government of the same name, on the Dnieper, about 90 miles from Odessa. It was founded in 1778, and was intended to be a great seaport on the Black Sea; but from the difficulty of navigating the Dnieper, and the unhealthiness of the climate, it gradually fell into decline, and was completely eclipsed as a commercial station by Odessa. It has still, however, extensive dockyards and an arsenal. Pop. 60,921. Here the philanthropic Howard died, January 20, 1790.—The government of Cherson has an area of 28,305 square miles, with an undulating surface, interspersed with vast steppes and forests. In its W. part it is fertile, and there sheep-rearing is pursued to a large extent. Its other products are tobacco, mustard, liquorice, saffron, salt, flax, hemp, nitre, and corn. Manf. Cloth, leather, cheese, butter, caviare, and tallow. Pop. exclusive of Odessa, 1,865,164. Lat. between 46° and 49° N. Lon. between 29° and 34° E.—There are, in this government, a great number of foreign colonists, chiefly German, and also many gipsies.

CHERSONESUS, ker'-so-ne'-sus, a Greek word, rendered by the Latins "Peninsula." There were many of these among the ancients, of which the most celebrated are the Peloponnesus; the Thracian, at the south of Thrace and west of the Hellespont, where Miltiades led a colony of Athenians; the Taurica, now the Crimea, situate near the Palus Mæotis; the fourth called Cimbrica, now Jutland, in the northern parts of Germany; and the fifth, surnamed Aurea, now Malacca, in Asia.

CHERTA, chair'ta, a town of Spain, in the province of Tarragona. It is well built, with good streets and public squares. The trade is chiefly in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,450.

CHERTSEY, chert'-se, a town of Surrey, near the Thames, which is here crossed by a bridge of seven arches, 19 miles S.W. of London. St. Anne's church, a fine building, with a square tower, contains a tablet to the memory of Charles James Fox, the statesman who resided at St. Anne's Hill, near the town. There are several other places of worship, almshouses, and a school founded in 1725. There was formerly a large Benedictine monastery, and in the abbey church, some traces of which are preserved, Henry VI. was interred. In Shakspeare's Richard III. Lady Anne says to the bearers of the corpse of the king:—

> "Toward Chertsey with your holy load, > Taken from Paul's to be interred there."

Manf. Bricks and tiles. Malting is extensively carried on, and vegetables grown in the vicinity for the London market. Cowley the poet died here, 1667. Pop. 10,829.—A station on the London and South-Western Railway.

CHERUBINI, LUIGI-CARLO-ZENOBI SALVADOR MARIA, kair-oo-be'-ne, an Italian musician, distinguished as a composer of masses, psalms, motets, and operas. He had also a European fame as an instrumental composer, and rose to the highest honours in his profession. Among his celebrated operas are "Ifigenia in Aulide," "La Finta Principessa," and "Giulio Sabino," which he composed in London; "Lodoiska," "Elisa," "Medée," "Les Deux Journées," "Anacreon," "L'Hôtellerie Portuguaise," "Ali Baba," and "Faniska," which last he brought out at the imperial theatre at Vienna. The others were composed in Paris, where he was held in high estimation, and became composer to the Chapelle du Roi, professor of composition at the Ecole Royale, a member of the Académie Royale des Beaux Arts, and a chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur.

Born at Florence, 1760; died at Paris, 1842.

CHESAPEAKE BAY, ches'-a-peek, the largest bay of the United States. It divides the state of Maryland into two parts; and the Susquehannah, Patapsco, Potomac, Rappahannock, James, and York, all large and navigable streams, fall into it. There are many commodious harbours. Ext. 180 miles long, and from 8 to 20 broad.

CHESELDEN, WILLIAM, ches'-el-den, a famous English surgeon and anatomist, surgeon at some of the principal London hospitals, and occupying the very first rank as an operator. He wrote several surgical works of great value.

Born at Barrow-on-the-hill, Leicestershire, 1688; died at Bath, 1752.

CHESHIRE, chesh'-eer, a maritime county of England, bounded N. by Lancashire, N.W. and W. by the Irish Sea, and the counties of Flint and Denbigh, S.E. and E. by the counties of Derby, Stafford, Salop, and part of Flintshire. It is 58 miles in extreme length, by 30 in breadth. The surface is in general flat, with some considerable hills towards the east end, and a high ridge of sandstone crossing it from north to south.

Area.—1,104 square miles.

Rivers.—The Mersey, Tame, Dee, Weaver, and Bollin. It is intersected by several navigable canals.

Pro.—Chiefly dairy produce, this being one of the principal grazing districts of England; Cheshire cheese being famous throughout the United Kingdom.

Minerals.—Copper, lead, cobalt, and coal; but the principal consists of strata of rock-salt, from which about 60,000 tons are taken annually.

Manf.—Silk, cotton, linen, ribbons, thread, buttons, and leather, in various parts of the county.

Pop.—643,237.

Chief Towns.—BIRKENHEAD, CHESTER, CONGLETON, CREWE, MACCLESFIELD, NANTWICH, NORTHWICH, RUNCORN, SANDBACH, and STOCKPORT.

Communications.—It is connected by railway with all the principal parts of the kingdom, and is traversed by the Grand Trunk and Bridgewater canals.

History.—Cheshire was made a county-palatine by William the Conqueror, and remained such until an act of George IV. abolished its independent courts. The Reform Act of 1867 divided the county, for Parliamentary purposes, into North Cheshire, Mid Cheshire, and South Cheshire.

CHESHIRE, a county in the S.W. part of New Hampshire, United States. It is fertile in the usual cerealia. Manf. Woollen and cotton, and there are flour and saw-mills, and iron and glass-works. Area, 770 square miles. Pop. 28,734. The capital is Keene.

CHESHUNT, ches'-hunt, a town of Hertfordshire, 14 miles N. of London. There is a large theological college. Pop. 7,736. A station on the Eastern Counties Railway.—Richard Cromwell, son of the great Protector, retired here after his abdication, and died, 1712.

CHESNEY, FRANCIS RAWDON, ches'-ne, an English major-general, and distinguished explorer in the East. In 1830 he examined the route across the desert from Cairo to Suez; and, in the same year, accomplished a journey in Syria and Palestine, crossing the Syrian desert, and descending the Euphrates on a raft, supported by inflated skins, to the Persian Gulf. In 1836 he received the command of an expedition to examine the route from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates, and the course of that river to the Persian Gulf. Amid great difficulties he accomplished his task, and in December, 1836, took a mail across the Arabian desert, from the Persian Gulf to Beirout, on the Mediterranean, without being accompanied by a single European. In 1846 he was made a lieutenant-colonel, and in 1850 published an account of his survey of the Euphrates, &c. In 1851 he became colonel, and in the following year published a work on "Fire-arms." In 1854 appeared his "Russo-Turkish Campaigns of 1828 and 1829."

Born in Ireland, 1789; died 1872.

CHESTER, ches'-ter, an episcopal city, seaport, and Parliamentary borough, the capital of Cheshire, 18 miles from the sea, on the right bank of the Dee, which is navigable here, and crossed by two bridges. The older part of the town is surrounded by walls about 6 feet wide, forming in some parts a narrow passage between the old and new parts of the town, but in other parts the wall is a favourite promenade, commanding extensive views. Four principal streets lead from four gates, all terminating, as it were, in a centre at the Cross. The "rows," or footway, above the level of the shops, in fact occupying the place of the first-floors of the houses, and connected by flights of stairs with the carriage way, are a peculiarity of the town. The Gothic cathedral, begun in the reign of William Rufus, but not completed till the time of Henry VIII., has a tower 127 feet high springing from four beautiful pillars. The construction of the whole building exhibits many particulars interesting to the architect and antiquary. There are several parish churches, and the Unitarians, Quakers, Baptists, and Methodists have meeting-houses. There are also several almshouses and endowments for charitable purposes. The old castle has been taken down, and a new structure erected. At the north-east end of the castle-yard are barracks; and on the south-west side is an arsenal. This castle is a royal fortress. The more important public buildings are the Linen-hall, erected in 1780; the Town-hall (1869), the County-hall, and jail, in the Grecian style; a training college, in the Tudor style; and the railway station, a building in the Italian style, and one of the finest in the kingdom. There are some interesting old timber houses. Manf. Paint, shot, lead pipes, whips, thread, and glass. Shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent, and cheese, cast-iron, coal, and copper-plates are exported. The imports are wines and other produce. Pop. 36,788.—A station on the Great Western, London and North-Western, North Staffordshire, and Midland Railways.—Chester is a very ancient place, the Caer Lleonvawr of the Britons, the Deva of the Romans, and the Legancester of the Saxons, and its walls appear to have been erected by the Romans. The tombs of Matthew Henry, the commentator on the Bible, and the poet Parnell, are in Trinity Church. The city gives the title of earl to the Prince of Wales; and Eaton Hall, the fine seat of the duke of Westminster, is in its neighbourhood. Races, which are in high repute amongst the lovers of that sport, are held here in the spring of every year on the Rood-eye, or Roodee, a fine open space beneath the walls.

CHESTER, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. It is fertile and highly cultivated. Minerals. Marble, lead, copper, and silver. Area, 738 square miles. Pop. 83,481. The capital is West Chester.

CHESTER, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 24,153. The capital is Chesterville.

CHESTER-LE-STREET, a town of Durham, 6 miles N. of Durham. There is a very handsome church, with a tall spire. Manf. Iron, paper, rope, nails, and tiles. In the neighbourhood are extensive coal-works. Pop. 23,257.

CHESTERFIELD, a town of Derbyshire, at the junction of two small rivers, the Hipper and the Rother, 20 miles N. of Derby. The church is a spacious and handsome edifice in the Gothic style, with a crooked spire. There are two modern churches, and several other places of worship, and there are a grammar-school, several almshouses, a townhall, gaol, union-workhouse, an assembly-room, and literary and mechanics' institutions. Manf. Silk-throwing and cotton-spinning, hosiery, lace, worsted, earthenware, and machinery. In the neighbourhood are coal, iron, and lead mines. Pop. 12,221.—A station on the Midland Railway.

CHESTERFIELD, a county of Virginia, United Sates, on James river. It is fertile in corn, cotton, and tobacco. It has iron-foundries, cotton-factories, and coal-mines. Area, 456 square miles. Pop. 25,085. The capital is Chesterfield Court House.

CHESTERFIELD, a county of South Carolina, bordering on North Carolina. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 16,345. The capital is Chesterfield Court House.

CHESTERFIELD, PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, fourth earl of, was, in his day, considered a man of the finest wit, and a model of bon ton. In early life he was treated almost with indifference by his father, and, at the age of 18, entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his classical studies with great assiduity. In 1714 he left the university, and set out upon the grand tour of Europe. On his return he was made a gentleman of the bedchamber to the prince of Wales, afterwards George II., and was returned member of parliament for St. Germains, in Cornwall. In 1726 the death of his father removed him to the House of Lords, where he was considered one of the most effective debaters of his time. In 1728 he became ambassador to Holland, and was successful in averting a war with Hanover. George II. made him high steward of the household and a knight of the Garter. In 1732 he obtained his recall from Holland, and took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole, who was then at the head of the affairs of the country. After the resignation of that minister, Chesterfield became connected with the administration, in 1745 was re-appointed Minister to the Hague, and soon afterwards he received the appointment of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In this post he greatly distinguished himself, reducing Ireland to a state of tranquillity such as it had not hitherto enjoyed. His meritorious services had now greatly allayed the prejudices of the king, who had previously disliked him, and who recalled him in 1746, and had him appointed secretary of state. His health, never very strong, was now on the decline, and in 1748, much to the regret of the king, he resigned his office. On this occasion, his sovereign offered to confer the dignity of a duke upon him, but the earl declined the honour. Chesterfield still enjoys a certain literary reputation, as much, perhaps, from his being the associate of literary men as from any productions of his own. He was, at different times of his life, the friend of Addison, Arbuthnot, Pope, Swift, Gay, Voltaire, and Montesquieu. His conduct towards Samuel Johnson is as well known as the remarkable manner in which the great doctor resented it. His best known work is his "Letters to his Son," Philip Dormer, an illegitimate child. These famous letters are remarkable for shrewd observation, knowledge of society, and for the indifference to moral obligations other than those sanctioned by the customs of the loose-principled fashionable society of the day. Although Chesterfield never produced any great work, he was credited with the possession of remarkable literary ability, and is one of those to whom the authorship of the "Letters of Junius" had been attributed. No man possessed a more polished manner, or was more emphatically a man of good society, but he was heartless and licentious, and while ambassador at the Hague made a wager that he would seduce two ladies, who were strangers to him. He succeeded, and one of them lived to advanced years an unhappy woman. At his death, Chesterfield left her a legacy of 600*l.*, which she refused to accept.

Born in London, 1694; died 1773.

CHESTERFIELD INLET, a gulf at the N.W. extremity of Hudson's Bay, British North America, which receives the waters of the Cathawchaga and Doobaunk rivers. The length from E. to W. is 245 miles, and the breadth from 15 to 25 miles. There are many small islands, and the upper part is known as Baker's Lake. Lat. 63° 30'. Lon. between 90° and 98° E.

CHESTERTOWN, the capital of Kent county, Maryland, U.S., situate on Chester river, about 18 miles from its mouth in Chesapeake Bay. It is the seat of Washington college, founded 1783. Pop. 1,500.

CHEVALIER, MICHEL, she-val'-e-ai, a distinguished French political economist. When a young man, he was for a short time an earnest literary advocate of the doctrines of St. Simon, and in 1832 was imprisoned, his writings being considered an outrage on public morals. He soon publicly renounced the opinions he had held, and visited, as an engineer, North America and England, inquiring into the system of water and railway communication. In 1838 he published a work on "the Public Roads, Canals, and Railways of France," which has frequently been reprinted. He rose to be Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, Councillor of State, Professor of Political Economy in the College of France, and Member of the Chamber of Deputies, besides receiving other honours. The Revolution of 1848 deprived him of these appointments. In 1848 he put forth his "Letters on the Organization of Labour," which was designed to defeat the revolutionary socialist doctrines then in vogue. The coup d'état of December 2, 1848, replaced him as professor and as councillor of state. In 1861 he was appointed grand officer of the Legion of Honour. Besides the above works, he was the author of many more, social and political; among which may be mentioned the "Gold Question," translated into English by Richard Cobden, and published in 1859.

Born at Limoges, 1806. Died 1879.

CHEVIOT HILLS, a ridge of hills dividing Northumberland from Roxburghshire, in Scotland. Their pasture is excellent, and they produce a breed of sheep of a superior kind. Their highest points are the Cheviot Peak, 2,856 feet, and Carter Fell, 2,020.—From these hills the celebrated ballad of "Chevy Chase," commemorating the battle between Earl Percy and Douglas, takes its name.

CHEVREUL, MICHEL EUGÈNE, chev'-re(r)l, a distinguished French chemist, who studied in Paris under Vauquelin. He became director of the dye-works, and professor of special chemistry at the Gobelins, where he innovated upon the laws of associated colours, and drew up a paper for the use of artists, dyers, and manufacturers. He rose to the highest honours in his profession, and did much to advance the state of chemical science. In 1830 he was appointed professor of applied chemistry in the Museum of Natural History.—He wrote several works of value, and his "Laws of Contrast of Colour" has been translated into English.

Born at Angers, 1786.

CHEWTON, chew'-ton, formerly Forest Creek, a town in the county of Talbot, Victoria, Australia, 72 miles N.W. of Melbourne. The district is of a mining character, and quartz mining is carried on with success. Pop. 1,688.

CHEZY, ANTOINE LEONARD DE, shai'-ze, French Oriental scholar, who taught himself Sanskrit, and became professor of that language in the College of France. He published translations from the Persian and other Eastern languages.

Born at Neuilly, 1773; died 1832.

CHEZY, HELMINA CHRISTIANE, German novelist and poet, wife of the above. At the age of 16 she married a German, from whom she separated a year afterwards. In 1805 she married M. de Chezy, with whom she only lived five years, returning to Germany, where she published many poems and tales of a romantic character, and wrote the libretto of Weber's opera, Euryanthe.

Born at Berlin, 1783; died at Munich, 1856.

CHIABRERA, GABRIEL LO, ke'-a-bra'-ra, a Genoese poet, famous for his lyric productions, which obtained for him the name of the Italian Pindar. He wrote songs in the style of Anacreon, and many epic, dramatic, and pastoral poems, which made him famous.

Born at Savona, 1552; died 1637.

CHIAPAS, ke'-a-pas, the most southern state of the Mexican Confederation, a portion of the table-land of Central America. It is mountainous, three mountain chains traversing the district from E. to W., has immense forests of mahogany and other valuable timber, and the soil is fertile. The Chiapa and other large rivers fall into the Gulf of Mexico; some smaller streams into the Pacific. In the uplands the usual cerealia are raised, whilst the valleys produce sugar, indigo, tobacco, cotton, hemp, maize, pimento, vanilla, and cocoa. Area, 17,800 square miles. Pop. 242,929.

CHIAPAS, a town in the above province, on the right bank of the Grijalva. It is a busy commercial town, and there is a large trade in sugar and logwood. Pop. 15,000.

CHIARAMONTE, ke-ar'-a-mon-tai, a town of Sicily, 32 miles W. of Syracuse. Good wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 8,000.

CHIARAVALLE, ke-ar'-a-val, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, 17 miles S.W. of Catanzaro. Pop. 3,100.—This town suffered greatly from the earthquake of 1783.

CHIARI, ke-ar'-e, a town of Northern Italy, near the Oglio, 14 miles W. of Brescia. It was formerly fortified, and some of the old defences still exist. There are several churches, two convents, a hospital, and a public library. Manf. Silk, linen, cotton, and leather. Pop. 5,300.—In 1701 Marshal Villeroy was here defeated by Prince Eugene.

CHIARI, PIETRO, Italian dramatist. He entered the order of Jesuits, but soon renounced the monastic life, and was appointed poet to the Duke of Modena. He produced more than 60 dramatic pieces, none of them of great merit.

Born at Brescia, 1708; died 1785.

CHIAVARI, a maritime town of Italy, 10 miles S.E. of Genoa. It is an ancient town, and there are several churches, an ecclesiastical seminary, and hospital. Manf. Silk and lace. Wine, olives, and silk are produced in the neighbourhood, and the anchovy fishery is important. Pop. 7,000.

CHIAVENNA, ke-a-ven'-na, a town of Northern Italy, province of Bergamo, beautifully situated in a valley on the Mera. The former palace of the republic of the Grisons is here, and there are six churches and several charitable institutions. Manf. Pottery, silk, cotton, and paper. There is a large transit trade. Pop. 3,800.

CHICACOLE, chik'-a-kole, a town of British India, in the Madras presidency, 107 miles from Ganjam, near the Bay of Bengal. It has a barrack and some mosques. Manf. Muslins, which have long been held in high estimation. Pop. 16,355.

CHICAGO, she-ka'-go, the principal town of Illinois, capital of Cook county, and, in respect of population, the fifth in the United States, on a low plain on the S.W. shore of Lake Michigan, at the mouth of Chicago river, the branches of which divide the town into three portions, connected by bridges. As vessels can ascend each branch of the river for about 4 miles, there are 18 miles of wharfage. The rapid growth of Chicago is unparalleled, notwithstanding disasters of an appalling kind. Between 1830 and 1870 the population rose from 70,000 to about 300,000. In October, 1871, a fire devastated about 2,000 acres, destroying 18,000 houses, and property of the estimated value of £40,000,000. The city was splendidly rebuilt in the course of two years. A second fire, only less terrible, broke out in July, 1874, and buildings covering 60 acres were destroyed. The streets are wide, the public and commercial buildings spacious and handsome. There are about 70 churches, nearly 40 public schools, exchange, chamber of commerce, colleges, and literary and educational institutions. The town is supplied with water by a tunnel from Lake Michigan, and the streets have been raised above the original level so as to afford a sufficient fall for sewage.

Trade.—From its situation it is in direct communication with the districts around the great lakes and the Mississippi valley. The trade in grain and flour is enormous, more than 7,000,000 qrs. annually passing through the city. About 600,000 pigs, and 263,000 cattle are yearly exported, and the packing of beef and pork is carried on very extensively, 100,000 carcases of beef and about 600,000 of pigs being in this manner prepared for export. Chicago is also the largest market for lumber, or rough timber, in the world.

Pop. 503,185.

Lat. 41° 50′ N. Lon. 87° 37′ W.

History.—A stockade fort was erected in 1803, at a place called by the Indians "She-kaw-go," meaning "wild onion." The fort was destroyed by the Indians in 1812, but rebuilt in 1816. A small settlement was established in 1831; the town was formed 1833, and the first charter granted 1837.

CHICHACOTTA, chik-a-kot'-ta, a town of Northern Hindostan, in the province of Bootan, 60 miles from Rungpoor. Lat. 26° 42′ N. Lon. 89° 25′ E. Pop. Unascertained.

CHICHELE, or CHICHLEY, HENRY, chich'-le, archbishop of Canterbury, was, in 1407, sent ambassador to the pope, who gave him the bishopric of St. David's. In 1414 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, and in that high position obtained many privileges for the clergy, resisting at the same time papal encroachments. He was a liberal encourager of learning, and was the founder of All-Souls College, Oxford. He also built, at his own expense, the western tower of Canterbury Cathedral.

Born at Higham Ferrers, 1362; died 1443.

CHICHEN. (See YUCATAN.)

CHICHESTER, chich'-es-ter, a city and parliamentary borough, the capital of the county of Sussex, 55 miles S.W. of London. It is situated on a small eminence, nearly surrounded by the river Lavant, and has an old wall, now formed into a promenade, and shaded with elms. It consists of four wide and well-paved streets, built in the form of a cross, with an octagonal Gothic cross at the point of intersection. The cathedral is an elegant Gothic structure, 410 feet long, with a central tower. The steeple, 297 feet high, fell in 1861, but has been rebuilt. There are nine parish churches, and several other places of worship. The other public buildings are a handsome corn-market, town-hall, and council chamber. There are a grammar-school, infirmary, two colleges, and a mechanics' institution. There are large corn and cattle markets. Pop. 8,059. A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast line.—Chichester was originally a Roman station. In 491 it was partially demolished by the S. CHILDERS, HUGH CULLING EARDLEY, politician. Son of Rev. Eardley Childers, of Cautley, Yorkshire. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Proceeded in early manhood to Australia, where he became a member of the first cabinet of the Victorian Parliament. Returning to England, he entered Parliament for Pontefract in 1859. In 1864 he became a Lord of the Admiralty, and First Lord in 1868; in 1872 Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; in 1880 Secretary for War; in Dec., 1882, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which office he propounded the Budget upon which was defeated the Gladstone Government in 1885. In 1886 he accepted office as Home Secretary, and thus became one of the Gladstone Ministry by whom was brought in the original Home Rule Bill for Ireland, to which Bill he firmly adhered both before and after its defeat.

Born in Brook Street, London, 1827.

CHILI, or CHILE, chil'-e, a republic of S. America, bounded W. and S. by the Pacific Ocean, N. by Bolivia, and E. by La Plata, or the Argentine Confederation and Patagonia. It is about 1,240 miles long, and 20 to 130 broad. The southern portion consists of the archipelago of CHILOE and Auricania. There are many volcanoes. Earthquakes are common. In 1822 one laid Valparaiso, Casa Blanca, Quilleta, and Limachi in ruins. Its shock was felt at distances of 500 miles from its centre. In 1851 another occurred, which destroyed 200 houses in Valparaiso, and many of the principal buildings. Another disastrous earthquake occurred in May, 1875, which destroyed San José de Cucata, and six other towns, and caused a terrible loss of life. The great chain of the Andes runs along the E. limit of Chili, at an average height of from 13,000 to 14,000 feet above the level of the sea. Several mountain passes traverse this chain, the most frequented being that of Aconcagua, which is 12,000 feet above the level of the sea. Another is Portillo, which is 14,000; besides which several others of less note and various heights. The coast is bold and rocky, and the coast line is continually varying from volcanic agency. The principal harbours are VALDIVA, CONCEPCION, VALPARAISO, and COQUIMBO. The climate is healthy. The months of January and February are the hottest, and rain falls only from June to September.

Rivers.—These have mostly their sources in the Andes, and many of them are nothing more than streams, which become dry in the summer season. The largest are the Maule, in the province of the same name; the Biobio, which is 200 miles long, and two wide at its mouth; the Copiapo, the Huasco, and the Chuapa. There are no lakes, properly so called, although collections of water, both salt and fresh, are common.

Zoology.—Chili is not quite so abundant in animals as the other countries of America. Among the beasts of prey, the puma is the most formidable, and the llama and guanaco abound in the plains of the S. provinces. Monkeys are numerous. Almost all the European quadrupeds, such as horses, asses, cattle (immense numbers of which, of a black breed, are reared), sheep, goats, many kinds of dogs, cats, and even mice, have been brought hither by the Spaniards, and have multiplied exceedingly. Birds exist in great and beautiful variety. Parrots and parroquets are abundant. The pelican is found in the coast district, and the great condor and vultures in the mountains. There are but few reptiles or insects. On the coast are caught various kinds of excellent fish, consisting of many species, and some of them peculiar.

Pro.—In the north, vegetation is limited, on account of the dryness of the soil; but in the southern provinces, dense forests spread over the land, and cover the sides of the Andes with their abundant foliage. Flowers of the richest and loveliest hues everywhere delight the eye; whilst the laurel, the cypress, and the myrtle, attain to colossal dimensions. Hard woods also abound; but agriculture, in all its forms, is in a most backward state. In the northern districts, maize is grown, and in the southern, wheat and barley; hemp is also raised, and legumes are abundant. Leguminous vegetables and potatoes are grown in large quantities, also fruits of every description.

Minerals.—These are abundant; consisting of free-stone, flint, rock crystal, and marble. The Chilian marbles are generally of an excellent quality, and take a fine polish. Of spars the species are infinite. The mountains contain precious stones, such as the agate and the jasper; and the rivers wash down rubies and sapphires. All the known kinds of semi-metals are met with in Chili, and are found either in mines by themselves, or combined with metallic ores, and generally in a state of mineralization. Lead is found mixed with gold or silver. There are also mines of tin, which are, however, neglected. The provinces of Coquimbo, Copiapo, and Aconcagua, are rich in iron, of the very best quality; and there are, besides, in the country, gold, silver, and copper mines. Almost all the copper in Chili contains a greater or less proportion of gold. Between the cities of Coquimbo and Copiapo, there were in work, at one time, more than a thousand copper-mines, besides those in the province of Aconcagua. The silver-mines are found only in the highest and coldest parts of the Andes: the richest are in the provinces of Aconcagua, Coquimbo, and Copiapo. Coal is worked near Concepcion.

Manf.—Earthenware, hempen cloths, leather, soap, copper wares, brandy, tallow, and charcoal.

Exp.—Silver, copper, hides, wool, hemp, cotton, grain, and cattle.

Political Divisions.—There are 16 provinces:—Chiloe, Llanquihue, Valdivia, Arauco, Concepcion, Nuble, Maule, Linares, Talca, Curico, Colchagua, Santiago, Valparaiso, Aconcagua, Coquimbo, and Atacama. (See each heading).

Principal Towns.—SANTIAGO (the capital), VALPARAISO, COPIAPO, CALDERA, CHILLAN, COQUIMBO, TALCAHUANO, CONCEPCION, HUASCA, CONSTITUCION, and VALDIVIA. (See each heading).

Area. 131,000 square miles.

Pop. 2,405,041. The aboriginal population, the Chileno Indians, are chiefly to be found in the southern provinces.

Constitution and Government.—The constitution, voted by the representatives of the nation in 1833, establishes three authorities in the state—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The legislative power is vested in two assemblies, called the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. The Senate is composed of 20 members, elected for the term of nine years; while the Chamber of Deputies, chosen for a period of three years, consists of one representative for every 20,000 of the population. The voters must have a property qualification. The executive is exercised by a president, elected for a term of five years.

Religion.—The Roman Catholic is the established religion, and children, even of mixed marriages, must be educated in the national faith. There are about 10,000 monks and nuns in the country.

Railways and Communications.—There are about 1,000 miles of railway in operation. The two most important lines are from Valparaiso to Santiago, 115 miles in length, and from Santiago to Curico, 116 miles long, both state property.

History.—At the time of the Spanish invasion in the 16th century, Chili belonged to the Incas of Peru, but was invaded by the Spanish leaders Almagro and Valdivia. The inhabitants, however, took up arms in defence of their independence, and fought with such resolution, that the Spaniards were unable, for a long period, to subdue them. In 1810 the struggle for independence recommenced, and continued till 1818, when it was decided by the battle of Maypo, and the republic formed. In the beginning of 1859, a strong revolutionary party endeavoured to overthrow the government; but the force under General Vidaurre Leal, in a battle at Coquimbo, defeated the insurgents; which event, with other successes in the south, had the effect of checking, if not entirely suppressing, the revolutionary movement.

CHILICOTHE, chil'-e-koth, capital of Ross county, Ohio, United States, on the west bank of the Scisto, 35 miles from Columbus. The streets are spacious, and cross each other at right angles. It contains a court-house, market-house, banks, gaol, and four churches. In the town and vicinity are many valuable mills and manufactories. Pop. 4,000.

CHILION, kil-i-on, 'finished,' or 'perfect,' a Bethlehemite, who married Orpah, the Moabitess.

CHILKA, LAKE, chil'-ka. (See ORISSA.)

CHILKEEA, chil'-ke-a, a town of British India, in the north-western provinces, 110 miles N.E. of Delhi. It is one of the principal marts of the trade between Kumaon Tibet, and the British territory.

CHILLAN, chil-lan', a town of Chili, capital of the province Nuble, 180 miles S.W. of Santiago. A portion of it is very old, having been built by the Spanish conqueror. Pop. 8,000.

CHILLIANWALLAH, chil'-le-an-wal'-la, a village of the Punjab, 5 miles from the left bank of the Jhelum. This place has obtained celebrity from a sanguinary battle which was fought here on January 13, 1849, between the British, under Lord Gough, and a large army of Sikhs. The greatest valour was displayed on both sides, and the loss of the two armies was terrible. Although the British remained in possession of the field, the victory was dearly purchased, and the annals of Indian warfare do not record a fiercer conflict.

CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM, chil'-ling-wurth, an eminent English divine, who was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and went to Douay for the purpose of embracing the Catholic faith; but the letters of Bishop Laud, his godfather, caused him, in 1631, to return to England and the Protestant communion. The Romanists, after this, attacked him with great severity, and he replied in a work entitled "The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation;" printed in 1635. The same year, after some hesitation as to receiving church appointment, he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and afterwards master of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicestershire. In the civil war he adhered to the royal cause, and, in 1643, was at the siege of Gloucester as an engineer. In the same year he was taken prisoner in Arundel Castle, Sussex, and conveyed to Chichester, where he died at the bishop's palace.

Born at Oxford, 1602; died 1644.

CHILLON, chil'-lon, a town of Spain, in the south-western part of the province of Ciudad Real. It is situated on the crest of a hill, has a handsome parish church, and in the public square a statue of a woman who distinguished herself by persecuting heretics in the 16th century. There are large quicksilver mines in the neighbourhood, which give employment to many of the inhabitants. Pop. 2,400.

CHILO, ki-lo, a Spartan philosopher, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He died through excess of joy, in the arms of his son, who had obtained a victory at Olympia.

Died 597 B.C.

CHILOE, chil'-o, an island on the W. coast of S. America, situate in a large gulf or bay at the S. extremity of Chili. With upwards of sixty smaller islands and a portion of the mainland, it forms a province of the Chilian republic, and many of them have been peopled by the Spaniards or Indians.

They are all adjacent to the main island of Chiloe, from which the archipelago takes its name. This island is about 120 miles in length, and 50 in breadth. It is hilly, but not mountainous, and thickly-wooded, save in the few valleys among the hills, and along the shores, where partial cultivation is carried on. There are several good harbours, the principal being St. Carlos, Chacao, Dalcahue and Castro. Pro. Wheat, barley, potatoes, and some fruits. The forests furnish timber of value for building purposes. Sheep, cattle, and swine are reared; but the inhabitants being naturally indolent, have recourse to fishing for a great portion of their subsistence. Pop. of province, 75,437. Lat. between 41° 40′ and 43° 20′ S. Lon. 74° W. —In 1558 this island was discovered by the Spaniards.

CHILPERIC I. and II., shil'-pe-rik, two kings of France, one of whom reigned from 561 to 584, and the other from 715 to 720.

CHILTERN HILLS, chil'-tern, a ridge of chalky hills, traversing the county of Bucks, and extending from Tring, in Herts, to Henley, in Oxfordshire. Their principal summit is Wendover, which is about 900 feet above the level of the sea. —The office of "the Stewards of the Chiltern Hundreds" was established for the purpose of suppressing bands of depredators, who, in former times, infested the forests with which the sides of these hills were covered; and it has been retained to enable members of the House of Commons to vacate their seats in that assembly by accepting this office under the Crown. Its duties are merely nominal, and the pay nil.

CHIMÆRA, kim'-e-ra, in Greek mythology a celebrated monster, sprung from Echidna and Typhon. It had three heads, a lion's, goat's, and dragon's, and continually vomited flames. The fore part of its body was that of a lion, the middle a goat, and the hinder a dragon. Its usual abode was Lycia, and in the reign of Jobates, it was conquered by Bellerophon, mounted on the horse Pegasus. This fabulous tradition is explained by the account given of a burning mountain in Lycia, whose top was a desolate wilderness, the resort of lions; the middle, being fruitful, was frequented by goats; and, at the bottom, the marshy ground abounded with serpents. Bellerophon is said to have conquered the Chimæra, because he first made his habitation on that mountain. Plutarch says that by it is meant a pirate captain, who adorned his ship with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. (See BELLEROPHON.)

CHIMAI, shé-mai, a town of Belgium, in the south-eastern part of the province of Hainau. There is a large castle on a rock in the centre of the town, surrounded by an extensive park Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, lace, tobacco, leather, and hardware, and iron goods. There are marble-quarries in its neighbourhood. Pop. 3,000.

CHIMBORAZO, chim'-bo-ra-zo. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

CHIMHAM, kim-ham, "as a trouble," a son of Barzillai.

CHINA, or CHINA PROPER, chi'-na, the most important portion of the CHINESE EMPIRE. It occupies the south-eastern part of Asia, forming the eastern slope of the great table-lands of that continent. It extends about 1,480 miles from N. to S., and 1,360 miles from E. to W. On the E. and S. are the Yellow and China Seas, and the Gulf of Tonquin and Burmah; on the W. and N. Thibet, Mongolia, and the other provinces of the empire. (See CHINESE EMPIRE.) The difficulty of obtaining access to the interior provinces greatly limits our knowledge of the geographical features of China, but it may be described generally as a level, fertile, and highly-cultivated region, varied by mountain-chains of considerable magnitude, though they seem to be only lower stages of those enormous masses which stretch across Central Asia. The principal chain is Yun-lin, which runs N. and S., throwing out numerous ramifications of greater or less proportions. The most important of these, known as the Tap-lin, the Northern Mountains, and the Pek-lin, take an E. direction, and become the leading watersheds of the country, dividing it into three great basins, through which the accumulated waters roll in mighty rivers to the sea. Even the average height of these mountains is unascertained, but many of their summits are crowned with perpetual snow. To the south of the great river, the Yang-tze-kiang (which entirely crosses China from E. to W., dividing it into two nearly equal portions), is the great southern or Nan-lin chain, an extension of the Himalaya system, which crosses the entire country, reaching the sea at Ningpo, near 30° N. lat., and forming a barrier, through which are only a few passes at a great elevation, between the south-eastern provinces and the rest of China. Some of the peaks of this chain attain an elevation of 12,000 feet. The coast line of China forms an irregular curve, about 2,500 miles in length, with an immense number of small islands. The most extensive inlet on the east coast is the Gulf of Pechili; but there are numerous smaller bays, especially Hang-chew Bay, which form safe and capacious roadsteads. From Pechili, southward to the Island of Chusan, about lat. 30° N. the coast is low and subject to inundations. Farther south, to the mouth of the Canton river, or Chou-kiang, it is generally rocky and precipitous. Beyond this, to the S.W., it is more varied in character. About lon. 110° the Lwi peninsula, extending to the south, and separated by a narrow strait from the island of Hainan, forms the eastern limit of the Gulf of Tonquin, and to the N.E. of the river is the Great Plain extending to the northern limit of China, with the sea for its boundary on the E.

Rivers.—China is distinguished for the magnitude and extent of its rivers. We have mentioned the great Yang-tze-kiang, which has a course of about 3,300 miles, and enters the sea between N. lat. 31° and 30°, with a broad estuary, in which is the island of Tsunming. The Hoang-ho, or Yellow river, rises in Mongolia, enters China Proper on the N., about lat. 39° 30′ and lon. 112° E., flows southward to lat. 34° 30′, where it takes a sharp turn to the E. and discharges into the Ye'low Sea, having within the last few years somewhat altered its course. The length of this river is about 2,480 miles. These two great rivers have numerous tributaries, several of which equal the greatest rivers of Europe. Besides these, there are the Chou-kiang, which debouches at Canton, and the Yu-ho, having a N. course, and falling into the Gulf of Pechili. In its course it forms a portion of the line of the Imperial Canal, about 700 miles long, constructed to unite the two great rivers and give safe access by water from the southern provinces to the neighbourhood of Pekin, but which is less used than formerly it was.

Lakes.—Numerous, but many of them mere expansions of the rivers. The largest is the Tung-ting, in the province of Honan, which receives a vast number of small streams, and discharges itself into the Yang-tze-kiang. It is upwards of 200 miles in circumference. The Poyang, in the province of Kiangsee, is the next in size, being 90 miles long and 20 broad. The scenery of this lake is described as extremely beautiful. All the lakes are well stored with fish.

Climate.—The climate of China varies between the extremes of heat and cold. The former prevails in the southern provinces, which experience a higher temperature than Bengal, but are subject to sudden and great variations; while the vicinity of Pekin is colder than countries under the same latitude in Europe. In the south, typhoons, or hurricanes of wind, are frequent, devastating the island of Hainan, but not extending far to the north of Canton. Although they usually last twenty-four hours, and seldom longer than forty-eight, their effects are terrific.

Zoology.—The high cultivation of its land, and the density of its population, have long since nearly extirpated whatever wild animals may formerly have existed. The tiger is still found in the forests of Yunnan, and wild cats still prowl through the woods of the south. Bears are said to be occasionally seen, and camels and elephants are largely domesticated. The domestic dog is uniformly of one variety, and there are several species of rats. The deer family are now rare. Bats are numerous, and the feathered tribes abound, and some of them are extremely gorgeous in their plumage. Pheasants are particularly fine, and aquatic birds are plentiful. The reptilia comprise some species of serpents of large size, though not considered dangerous. Tortoises are common, and locusts prove sometimes destructive to the crops. In fish, no country is said to be so abundantly supplied.

Pro.—In China, agriculture takes the lead of every other pursuit; and the emperor himself encourages it, by repairing, at a stated period of the year, to a field, for the purpose of ploughing it. The great object is to bring every spot under cultivation; consequently, every expedient is resorted to for the achievement of this object. Canals are made, and the sides of lofty mountains are formed into terraces, to which the water is conveyed by buckets; or the rain is collected in reservoirs at the top, and allowed to run down by conduits. The chief object of agriculture, and the general food of the empire, is rice. In the more northerly provinces, this is supplied by wheat, barley, and other European grains. The next staple is the tea-plant, of which vast plantations are found in the provinces to the south of the Yang-tze-kiang, especially Poo-keen, Kwang-tun, and Che-keang. In the southern provinces, large tracts are covered with the white mulberry, for the production of silk (silk-worms being reared on the most extensive scale); and for the use of the lower ranks, vast quantities of cotton are raised in the middle provinces, which do not, however, supersede an extensive importation from India. Tobacco, camphor, sugar-cane, rhubarb, ginseng, and a variety of leguminous plants, may be added to the list of Chinese agricultural products. In the southern provinces are cocoa-nut and other palms, and the bamboos, of which there are more than 60 chief varieties, one of the most valuable products of China, being used for an immense variety of purposes. Fruit trees are abundant, and the floral products of the south, among them the azalea, the hydrangea, the passion flower, the rose, and clematis, are of great beauty, and justify the appellation of "the flowery land."

Minerals.—Copper, rock crystal, lapis lazuli, a small but fine species of ruby, agates, iron, tin, sulphur, and coal, both bituminous and anthracite: alum, nitre, gypsum, and kaolin, or porcelain earth, in inexhaustible beds. The possession of this last mineral, and the skill with which it has been worked by the Chinese, gave the name of China to the beautiful ware which, for a long period, monopolized the European markets. This country also abounds with salt. Gold is found in the sand of some of the rivers, and in the highland districts of Sun-wang; and silver of great purity, known as sycee silver, is abundant.

Manf.—Important. The principal are porcelain, which, in the whiteness, hardness, and transparency of its substance, and in the beauty of the colours laid upon it, surpasses any imitation that has been made of it; silks and satins; cottons, in the form of nankeen, which are dyed blue, black, and brown. Linen is not made, there being no flax grown, but "grass-cloth," made from various fibres, resembling linen in appearance, is woven. In the art of carving, great excellence and ingenuity are shown, especially in the cutting of ivory into fans, baskets, &c.; cutting of tortoise-shell and mother-of-pearl; also in silver filigree and lacquered cabinets; and in the mode of ornamenting cabinet-wares and tea-chests; their paper, ink, and printing, may challenge comparison with those of any country in the world.

Commerce.—Tea, porcelain, raw and spun silk, cotton, sugar, rhubarb, embroidery, lacquered wares, and carved articles of domestic ornament, are the chief articles of export. The internal trade is great, the wants of an enormous and generally thriving population creating an active demand.

Public Works.—In these, China is remarkable. No nation can produce a parallel to the Great Canal, to which we have referred. Like the other Chinese canals, it is not constructed on the same artificial and scientific principles as those of Europe, nor composed, like them, of standing water, fed by reservoirs, elevated and lowered by locks. The want of locks obliges the Chinese to conduct the canal, by a winding line, round the different elevations which are encountered in its course. The fertility of the soil, resulting from the internal navigation supplied by this canal and its branches, renders the country through which it is cut the most populous spot on the face of the globe. In different parts of the empire, also, there occur bridges remarkable for their magnitude, and for the difficulties overcome in their construction. The most stupendous of all the public undertakings of China is that known by the name of the Great Wall. This mighty rampart has been drawn along the whole northern, and part of the western frontier, over a vast chain of mountains, the sinuosities of which it follows throughout a course of about 1,250 miles. On the plain it is 30 feet high; but when carried over rocks, 15 or 20 feet are found a sufficient height. The thickness of the whole wall at the base is 25 feet, diminishing to 20 and 15 at the platform. It is defended by towers, placed at given distances, 40 feet square at the base, and nearly the same in height. This immense work was built about 220 years before the Christian era, as a defence against the wandering tribes of Tartars who have inhabited the wild country beyond it from time immemorial. It is constructed of earth or rubbish, cased on each side by stone or brick-work. The empire is traversed in all directions by 20,000 imperial roads.

Area. 1,535,000 square miles.

Pop.—The most trustworthy estimate of the population of China Proper gives the number of the inhabitants at about 404,180,000, or about 260 to the square mile, almost equal to that of Great Britain and Ireland. In physiognomy and general appearance they exhibit unequivocal proofs of Mongol origin, along with some features peculiar to themselves. The face is square and flat, the nose small, but broad at the root, the eye elongated and oblique, and the colour a pale yellow.

Administrative Divisions.—There are 18 provinces, divided into five groups:—

Provinces.	Provincial capitals.
Northern—
Chih-le	Pekin
Shan-tung	Tse-nan-foo
Shan-se	Tae-yuen-foo
Honan	Kae-fung-foo
Eastern—
Keang-soo	Nanking
Gan-hwuy	Gan-king-foo
Keang-si	Nan-chang-foo
Foo-Keen	Fuh-choo-foo
Che-Keang	Hang-choo-foo
Central—
Hoo-pih	Woo-chang-foo
Hunan	Chang-cha-foo
Western—
Shen-se	Se-gan-foo
Kan-suh	Lan-choo-foo
Sze-Chuen	Ching-too-foo
Southern—
Kwang-tung, or Canton	Kwang-choo-foo
Kwang-si	Kwe-lin-foo
Yun-Nan	Yun-nan-foo
Kwei-Choo	Kwei-yang-foo.

Each province is subdivided into districts, departments, and circuits.

Government.—The emperor is spiritual as well as temporal sovereign, and with his representatives and ministers, performs, as high priest of the empire, great religious ceremonies. The administration of the empire is under the supreme direction of the "Interior Council Chamber," comprising four members, two of Tartar and two of Chinese origin, besides two assistants from the Han-lin, or Great College, who have to see that nothing is done contrary to the civil and religious laws of the empire, contained in the Ta-tsing-hwei-tien, and in the sacred books of Confucius. These members are denominated "Ta-hyo-si," or ministers of state. Under their orders are the Li-poo, or six boards of government, each of which is presided over by a Tartar and a Chinese. Independent of the government, and theoretically above the central administration, is the Tu-chah-yuen, or board of public censors. It consists of from 40 to 50 members, under two presidents, the one of Tartar and the other of Chinese birth. By the ancient custom of the empire, all the members of this board are privileged to present any remonstrance to the sovereign. One censor must be present at the meetings of each of the six government boards. There are twelve orders of nobility, the members of which are allied to the imperial family, and five other orders, open to eminent servants of the state. The government officials, governors of provinces, &c., are known as Kwan-fu, or mandarins, of whom there are several grades.

Religion.—The emperor and official classes profess the Confucian religion, or rather philosophy, but there is no established priesthood. The mass of the people are generally considered to be Buddhists, but very little attention is paid to doctrines or observances. There are temples and monasteries, with many thousands of monks, who are really little other than privileged beggars. The worship of ancestors and belief in the virtues of charms and incantations, and in evil spirits, are the chief ingredients of the popular creed. Taoism established about the same time as the philosophy of Confucius (or Kon-fut-zee), and originally a spiritual religion, has degenerated into a superstitious compound of astrology and belief in demons, spells, necromancy, and incantations. The influence of the stars, and lucky and unlucky days, are believed in by all classes. There is perfect mutual toleration between the nominal adherents of the three forms of faith, arising probably more from apathy than from true liberality of feeling. Temples dedicated to Confucius and Buddha are very numerous, but any settled form of public worship is unknown. There are occasional state ceremonies, professing to have a religious character, at which the emperor presides, and sacrifices are offered.

Arts and Sciences.—Literature is, from the highest offices to the lowest, the great passport to political promotion. An annual examination is held, when every candidate, according to the measure of learning which he has displayed, is promoted to a corresponding place in the government. In the case of princes of the blood, or of some Tartar chieftains, interest and favour may operate; but for all the rest, the scrutiny is said to be conducted with very great impartiality. The art of printing from blocks, the mariner's compass, and gunpowder, were known in China before they were discovered in Europe. In science the Chinese have made little progress; whilst the fine arts cannot be considered as in a flourishing state. The public buildings throughout the empire display no sort of taste; and the porcelain tower at Nankin, varnished over like china-ware, and with bells at every corner, can suggest no higher idea than that of a huge toy. In gardening they have attained to greater eminence; but as to painting, they are totally ignorant of its first principles, and can only make a close and servile copy of any natural object. Their music is extremely simple, and destitute both of science and system. The drama is a favourite amusement; but it is not performed in accordance with European ideas of such representations. The players are generally united in companies, and are hired by individuals to enliven the scene of domestic festivity. They ply continually on the canals, waiting for this employment; but their exhibitions, in general, consist of low and disgusting buffoonery.

Language.—Monosyllabic, but many of the words have different meanings, according to the accent or emphasis employed. There are no parts of speech and no inflections. The finest form of Chinese, spoken by the educated classes, is known as "the language of the mandarins." The written character is composed of hieroglyphic and conventional signs. Originally picture-writing was the basis, but in the course of ages, the representation of objects has degenerated into arbitrary signs having little resemblance to the objects at first depicted. It is estimated that there are about 50,000 different characters. In writing and printing, the words are arranged in perpendicular columns, and read from top to bottom.

History.—The early history of China is involved in obscurity. It is certain, however, that at an early period it attained to a great degree of civilization. The native annals which make the nearest approach to historical precision go back to a period of about 2000 B.C., when the Hia dynasty was established. The Tchow dynasty began about 1100 years B.C., and the Confucian philosophy was promulgated in the 6th century B.C. (See CONFUCIUS.) The Tsin dynasty assumed the title of Hoang, or emperor, 247 B.C. It is generally supposed that the name China, or Tsina, is derived from this dynasty; but the prophet Isaiah speaks of the people of a very remote Eastern region as the Sinim, and some commentators imagine that the Chinese are referred to. If so, a name similar to that in present use was known more than 700 years before the Christian era. The most memorable modern conquest was that of Kublai Khan, who, in the 13th century, entered China in all the array and terror of a barbarous conqueror. His successors, however, sought to improve by policy what they had acquired by arms, and diligently applied themselves to repair the ravages made by their first irruption. Their dynasty gradually lost its energy, and was supplanted by one of native Chinese princes, called the dynasty of Ming. In the beginning of the 17th century, this dynasty was overthrown in an irruption of the Mantchoo Tartars, who have ever since continued to hold the sovereignty of the empire. The first attempt made by the British to open a trade with China was in 1637, but it was unsuccessful. Subsequently, the East India Company began to trade with the empire, but no direct recognition of each other took place between the governments till 1792, when Lord Macartney was sent as an ambassador to the Chinese court. In 1816 Lord Amherst was sent on a second embassy, but was treated with such insolence that it greatly irritated the British people. No collision, however, of importance occurred till 1841, when hostilities commenced, to the utter discomfiture of the "Celestials." In the following year, peace was concluded at Nankin, the treaty stipulating that a British consul should be allowed to reside at the ports of Canton, Amoy, Foo-choo, Ningpo, and Shanghai. Other advantages were gained; but, in 1847, fresh outrages, on the part of the inhabitants of Canton, led to the capture of the Bogue Forts and a new convention, by which further redress was obtained. In 1851 a great rebellion broke out in the empire, and many important towns fell into the hands of the insurgents, known as the Taepings, the followers of a man of low origin, named Hung, who claimed to be a divinely appointed prince. In the following year they took Nankin and Amoy, which, however were soon retaken by the imperial troops. In 1853, Shanghai, the next commercial city in importance to Canton, was captured, and success after success seemed to follow their arms in their progress towards Pekin. Here, however, their triumphs ended. They were, after some hard fighting, driven back from the imperial city, and have excited little interest since. In 1856 a misunderstanding between China and Great Britain arose on account of the Chinese boarding a vessel lying in the Canton river, with a British colonial register. This led to the treaty of Tien-tsin, in 1858, which is one of the most important events of the 19th century. By it the Chinese empire is opened to the civilization of the Western world. This treaty was entered into by Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States, on the one side, and by the emperor of China on the other; and although these powers did not all participate in the war, yet they all share in the benefits of the treaty. By its terms many advantages were obtained; but the greatest were—1. The opening of new ports to commerce; 2. the toleration of Christianity and the protection of Chinese converts; 3. the residence at Pekin of our official representative. In 1859 an attempt was made to nullify the treaty; and the British envoy was stopped in the Peiho on his way to Pekin. This led to the occupation of that city by the allied British and French forces in 1860; and in October in the same year the treaty was duly ratified.

On account of the excellence of the composition, he received a piece of gold for each verse from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet.—The other was one of Alexander's flatterers. It is said that that prince promised him as many pieces of gold as there should be good verses in his poetry, and as many slaps on the forehead as there were bad. On examination, scarcely six of his verses were found entitled to the coins, while the rest were rewarded with castigation.

CHOISEUL-AMBOISE, ETIENNE FRANÇOIS, Duc de, shwoi'-zu(r)l-am-bwois. He entered the army, and having attracted the attention of Madame Pompadour, the king's mistress, rose rapidly in royal favour. He was appointed ambassador to Rome and Vienna, created a duke in 1758, and was the principal minister of state during the greater portion of the reign of Louis XV. of France. In 1760 he expelled the Jesuits from France, and is said to have encouraged the British colonies of North America, during the first symptoms of their rebellion against the mother country. He was partial to the arts and literature, being the friend of Voltaire and other men of learning. He had spies in every European court, and exercised a great influence in all diplomatic transactions. Madame Pompadour, as the king's mistress, was adverse to Choiseul, and he found it advisable to retire from office in 1770. The king, however, found it necessary frequently to consult him on state affairs.

CHRISTIAN ISLAND, in the Pacific Ocean, is 60 miles in circumference, and was, in 1777, discovered by Captain Cook. Lat. 1° 41′ S. Lon. 157° 30′ W.

CHRISTIANA, kris-te-a'-na, a township of Newcastle county, Delaware, U.S., on Christiana Creek, 37 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 6,140.

CHRISTIANIA, kree-ste-a'-na, a city and port, the capital or seat of government of Norway, situate at the extremity of a long narrow inlet, Christiania Fjord, about 60 miles from the sea, in the province of Aggershuus. The town, though not large, is the best built and among the most thriving places in the kingdom. The public buildings are the old castle of Aggershuus, with its church and citadel, the new palace of the Crown Prince, in front of which is a memorial statue of King Charles John, erected in 1875, a cathedral, the great military hospital, erected in 1806; a university (with museum), observatory, house of correction, an academy, a military school, and two theatres. There is an excellent harbour, and a considerable trade is carried on. Manf. Coarse cloth, cordage, tobacco, hardwares, and paper. There are, besides, breweries and distilleries. The chief exports are fish, tar, soap, vitriol, alum, iron, copper, and timber. Pop. 128,300. Lat. 59° 55′ N. Lon. 10° 43′ E.

CHRISTIANOPLE, kree'-ste-a-no'-pel, a fortified seaport of Sweden, on Kalmar Sound, 20 miles from Carlscrona. Pop. Unascertained.

CHRISTIANSAND, kre'-ste-an-sand', a fortified seaport of Norway. It is situate on the south coast, on a fiord of the Skagerrack, 160 miles from Christiania. The houses are generally neat and well built, and the streets broad and straight. The most remarkable building is the cathedral. The town has one of the best-sheltered harbours in Norway, defended by several batteries. The inhabitants are principally employed in shipbuilding, and particularly in the repairing of vessels forced, by the storms of the Cattegat, to take refuge here to refit. Lobsters for the London market and timber are the chief exports. Pop. 11,500. Lat. 58° 8′ N. Lon. 8° E.

CHRISTIANSOE, kre'-ste-an-soo', a group of islands in the Baltic, 12 miles N. of Bornholm. There is a secure and fortified haven. Lat. of lighthouse, 55° 19′ N. Lon. 15° 12′ E.

CHRISTIANSTAD, kre'-ste-an-stat', a town of Sweden, about 10 miles from the shores of the Baltic. It is well built, and has a citadel, senate-house, arsenal, and barracks. Manf. Gloves, and linen and woollen fabrics. Pop. 6,500.

CHRISTIANSTAD, a Swedish district, or "lan," of which the above town is the capital. Area, 2,400 square miles. Desc. Fertile, containing the valley of Helge. Pro. Hemp, flax, timber, corn, and hops. Pop. 227,233.

CHRISTIANSTED, kre'-ste-an-stet', a town on the N.E. coast of the island of St. Croix, in the Danish West Indies, of which it is the capital. It is the principal entrepôt for the commerce of Copenhagen, and its harbour, which is difficult of access, is defended by a fort and a battery. Pop. 5,000.

CHRISTIANSUND, kre'-ste-an-soond, a seaport-town on the N.W. coast of Norway, 36 miles W. of Drontheim, built on three rocky islands which enclose an excellent harbour. The surface of the rocks is so irregular that scarcely any of the houses (which are all of wood and painted red) stand on the same level. It has an active fish-trade, chiefly for the Spanish and Italian markets. Pop. 5,800.

CHRISTIAN, or CHRISTIERN, I., king of Denmark, succeeded Christopher of Bavaria in 1448. In the following year he was elected king of Norway, and, in 1456, of Sweden. In the latter kingdom, however, he had but a title without power, and in 1463 was finally driven out by Charles Canutson. In Denmark he became popular by his prudence, moderation, and liberality. He instituted the order of the Elephant.

Born 1425; died 1481.

CHRISTIAN II., called the Cruel, and also the Northern Nero, succeeded his father John on the throne of Denmark, in 1513, and in 1520 declared war against Sweden, captured Stockholm, and was named king of Sweden. The cruelties which he displayed in the latter country alienated all hearts from him, and he was shortly deposed by an insurrection excited by Gustavus Vasa. He afterwards, in 1523, lost the crown of Denmark by an insurrection. In 1531, assisted by the Emperor Charles V. and the Catholic party, he invaded Norway, but in the following year was defeated at the battle of Aggershuus, and imprisoned for 12 years in the castle of Sonderburg.

Born in the island of Funen, 1481; died 1559.

CHRISTIAN III., succeeded to the Danish crown in 1534, on the death of his uncle, Frederick I. He embraced Lutheranism, and made it the established religion.

Born 1502; died 1558.

CHRISTIAN IV., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick II., in 1588. He made war successfully against Sweden, and in 1625 was elected chief of the Protestant league. The following year, however, he was defeated at Lutter, by Tilly, and forced to sign a humiliating peace at Lubeck. At home he was an able administrator. He fostered commerce and industry, built new cities, and left Denmark peaceful and happy.

Born in Zealand, 1577; died 1648.

CHRISTIAN V., ascended the Danish throne in 1670, on the death of his father, Frederick III. He united with the princes of Germany, and declared war against the Swedes, in which he was unsuccessful. In 1673 he allied himself with the Dutch against Louis XIV., and also declared war against Sweden. He took Pomerania from the latter power; but restored it by a treaty made in 1679. In the midst of the wars which he carried on, he compiled a code of laws, which forms the basis of the jurisprudence of Denmark.

Born 1645; died 1699.

CHRISTIAN VI., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick IV., in 1730. During his reign the kingdom enjoyed continuous tranquillity. Copenhagen, which in 1721 had been destroyed by fire, was rebuilt with great magnificence.

Born 1699; died 1746.

CHRISTIAN VII., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick V., in 1766. In the same year he married Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England. He appointed as his minister, his doctor, Struenzée, whose influence soon became paramount. At the end of two years, however, this minister was disgraced, and put to death, all authority passing into the hands of the queen dowager, Julie Marie of Brunswick. The young queen was imprisoned (see CAROLINE MATILDA.) The end of his reign was disastrous. In 1807 Copenhagen was bombarded and taken by the British, and the king's latter days were clouded by insanity.

Born 1749; died 1808.

CHRISTIAN VIII., nephew of Christian VII. ascended the throne, 1839. He was a scholar and author.

Born 1786; died 1848.

CHRISTIAN IX., fourth son of the duke of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glucksburg, succeeded to the crown by the Danish law of succession, 1863. He is the father of the Princess of Wales.

Born 1818.

CHRISTINA, kre-sté-na, queen of Sweden, was the only child of Gustavus Adolphus, whom she succeeded in 1632, when only in her sixth year. She possessed great beauty and talents, and invited to her court the most learned men in Europe. Among these were Grotius, whom she sent ambassador to France; Salmasius, Descartes, Bochart, Huet, Vossius, and Meibom. In 1654, being weary of the labours of state, and the restraint imposed upon her eccentric and wilful disposition, she abdicated in favour of her cousin, Charles Gustavus, although only in her 28th year. It is affirmed, however, that the principal reason was her having embraced the Roman Catholic religion. From Sweden she went to Denmark (where she assumed masculine costume), Holland, and Rome, but after residing there some time, she removed to France, where she was well received by Louis XIV. Whilst residing in that country, she caused Monaldeschi, her favourite master of the horse, to be put to death in her own house, for some alleged crime which, in her estimation, amounted to high treason against his sovereign, whom she still considered herself to be. Even in this act she found defenders, among whom was Leibnitz, who justified the deed in an elaborate pamphlet. Her conduct, however, excited the disgust of the court, when she applied to Cromwell for permission to visit England; but the sturdy Protector turned the shadow of his countenance upon her, and denied the boon. She now returned to Rome, where she resided till the death of Charles Gustavus, when she went to Sweden, with the view of reascending the throne. Her subjects, however, were by this time entirely alienated from her, and she was once more forced to return to Rome. In 1666 she aspired to the throne of Poland, but obtained no support. The remainder of her life, chiefly devoted to collecting objects of art, was passed in Rome, where she died, her funeral being, in accordance with her express desire, of the most magnificent description. Twenty thousand masses were said for the repose of her soul. She left a collection of maxims, and reflections on the life of Alexander the Great, of whom she was a great admirer.

Born 1626; died at Rome, 1689.

CHRISTINA, MARIA, wife of Ferdinand VII. and mother of Isabel II., queen of Spain, took an active part in the affairs of that country from 1830 to 1854. As queen regent she governed arbitrarily, and in 1854 was compelled to quit Spain, when she retired into exile.

Born at Naples, 1806.

CHRISTINEHAM, kre-sté-na-ham, a thriving town of Sweden, in the province of Carlstad, in a bay on the N.E. shore of Lake Wenern. Two small streams, crossed by stone bridges, flow through the town. A large trade is carried on in iron, disposed of chiefly at a large annual fair. There are mineral wells near the town. Pop. 2,000.

CHRISTINESTAD, kre-sté-na-stat, a small seaport of Russian Finland, on the Gulf of Bothnia, on the peninsula of Cappa, 60 miles S.W. of Vasa. There is a good harbour, and timber, pitch, tallow, and butter are exported. Pop. 2,300. Lat. 62° 16′ N. Lon. 69° 6′ E.

CHRISTMAS HARBOUR, a good and safe bay on the N. coast of Kerguelen's Land, in the Indian Ocean. Lat. 48° 41′ S. Lon. 69° 6′ E.

CHRISTMAS ISLAND, in the Indian Ocean, about 9 miles long, and the same in breadth, well wooded, but nearly inaccessible. Lat. 10° 30′ S. Lon. 105° 30′ E.

CHRISTMAS ISLAND, in the North Pacific. It is of coral formation, and about 60 miles in circumference. At the western extremity there are a great number of cocoa-nut trees. In 1777 Captain Cook landed here to observe an eclipse of the sun. Lat. 1° 41′ N. Lon. 157° 15′ W.

CHRISTMAS SOUND, a bay on the S. coast of Terra del Fuego, 120 miles N.W. of Cape Horn, discovered in 1774. Lat. 55° 27′ S. Lon. of the entrance, 70° 16′ W.

CHRISTOPHE, HENRI, negro king of Hayti, began life as a slave and cook at a tavern in Cape Town, St. Domingo. Being of colossal stature, and possessed of considerable force of character, he seemed marked out by nature for prominence among those whose uneducated perceptions enable them to penetrate little beyond what appears on the surface of human character. In 1790 an insurrection of the Blacks in St. Domingo took place. He was employed by Toussaint L'Ouverture, the generalissimo of the Blacks, and was successful in suppressing various revolts, which darkened the dawn of negro freedom. In 1802 he defended Cape Town, with valour, against General Leclerc, and when forced to evacuate the place, burned the greater part of the town, took 3,000 men with him, and joined Toussaint. Christophe now fought vigorously for the liberation of his countrymen, and in 1806 became generalissimo of the army, and president for life of Hayti. In 1811 he was proclaimed king of Hayti, under the title of Henri I., the crown at the same time being made hereditary in his family. He took the French court for his model, and constituted an hereditary negro nobility. In 1812 he was solemnly crowned, and reigned successfully for some years. In 1818 reverses came upon him, and the republican Blacks rose against his authority. Whilst lying ill, from the effects of a stroke of apoplexy, in his fine palace of Sans-Souci, he was surrounded by insurgent troops. The duke of Marmalade, one of the highest of his nobles, proclaimed the abolition of monarchy, and Christophe shot himself through the heart. He left a widow and children, but his eldest son and most of his inferior officers were slaughtered. This sable sovereign was by no means destitute of governing qualities, whilst he encouraged the freedom of the press, and promoted education. He also framed a code of laws, which he dignified with the title of the "Code Henri," in imitation of the "Code Napoléon."

Born 1767; died 1820.

CHRISTOPHER'S, ST., or ST. KITTS, kris'-to-fers, one of the Leeward group of the British W. Indian Isles, 46 miles W. of Antigua. It is 20 miles long, by about 4 in average breadth. Volcanic, and traversed by a mountain-ridge, in the middle of which is the crater of an extinct volcano, and towards the western extremity is Mount Misery, about 3,700 feet high. About half of the island only is fit for cultivation, and at the southern end of the island are a number of salt-ponds. It is, however, remarkably fertile, and produces the most abundant crops of sugar. Area, 68 square miles. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 17° 17′ N. Lon. 60° 42′ W.—This island was, in 1493, discovered by Columbus, and the peace of Utrecht, 1713, gave it to Great Britain. In 1782 it was taken by the French, but restored in 1783.

CHRISTOVAL, SAN, or CHRISTOBAL, kre'-sto-val, a town of Venezuela, capital of the state of Tachira, on the right bank of the river of that name. There are a large church and a convent. Sugar-cane and tobacco are grown in the vicinity. Pop. 3,400. Lat. 7° 20′ N. Lon. 71° 58′ W.

CHRISTOVAO, SANTO, kre'-sto-va-o, a town of Brazil, capital of the province of Sergipe, about 18 miles from the shore of the Atlantic. The governor's palace, four churches and two convents are the principal public buildings. There is a harbour, but the access is difficult. Sugar, cotton and tobacco are exported. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 11° 10′ S. Lon. 36° 8′ W.

CHRUDIM, krw-dim, a walled town of Bohemia, capital of a circle of the same name.

CHRYSOSTOM, ST. JOHN, kre-sos'-tom, The most eloquent of the fathers of the Christian church, and bishop of Constantinople. His father's name was Secundus, but the son is known only by the surname of Chrysostom, or "golden-mouthed." He was reared to the bar, which he quitted for a religious life, and lived as a hermit in a cave six years; after which he returned to Antioch and was ordained in 381. He became so famous for his eloquence, that, on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was, in 397, elected his successor. He there built several hospitals, and gave most of his income to the poor; but in his endeavours to enlarge his episcopal jurisdiction was involved in a dispute with Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria. This churchman gained the empress Eudoxia to his side, and the consequence was, that Chrysostum was deposed and sent into Bithynia, which occasioned an insurrection at Constantinople. He was recalled in triumph, but was again sent into exile on a desolate tract on the Euxine Sea. His death was caused by the sufferings he endured on this forced journey.

Born at Antioch, 347; died 407.

CHUBB, THOMAS, a controversial writer, was the son of poor people in Wiltshire, and became a tallow-chandler. He wrote many treatises on theological subjects, generally attacking the Christian doctrines.

Born 1679; died 1746.

CHUENPEE, or SHAKOK, chu-en'-pe, a fortified port of China, on an island 35 miles from Canton. It was taken by the British in 1841 and the fortifications demolished. Lat. 22° 42′ N. Lon. 113° 38′ E.

CHUMBUL, choom'-bool, a large river of Hindostan, rising in Malwar, in the Vindhyan mountains, and falling into the Jumna 25 miles below Etawch. It has a fine series of falls about 40 miles below Mokundra. It receives numerous tributaries. Length, 570 miles.

CHUNAR, or CHUNARGUR, choo-nar-gur', a town and celebrated fortress of British India, on the Ganges, 16 miles S.W. of Benares. It has an episcopal church and a Roman Catholic chapel. The fortress stands on a lofty rock, rising almost precipitously from the river. Within the walls are the governor's house, the state prison, an hospital, and an ancient Hindoo palace. Pop. 10,000. The territory annexed to this town was, in 1768, ceded to the British.

CHUPPRAH-MOW, choo'-pra, a large town of British India, in the province of Behar, extending for a mile along the left bank of the Ganges, 32 miles N.W. of Patna. There are some large and handsome houses and British factories, but the greater number of the dwellings are merely mud huts. Pop. 51,670.

CHUQUISACA, or SUCRE, choo'-ke-sa-ka, a province of Bolivia, South America, on the south-east of the great table-land. Pop. 273,668.

CHUQUISACA, a city of S. America, and capital of the above province, formerly called Los Charcos, or La Plata. The town is built in a valley 9,300 feet above the sea, and the houses are very roomy and convenient, with pleasant gardens. The streets are well paved, and in the principal square is a fine fountain. There is a large cathedral, ornamented with painting and gilding, in the Moresque style, with lofty towers and a dome, two other fine churches, monasteries, a palace, university, and mining schools. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 19° 30′ S. Lon. 66° 42′ W.

CHUR, or COIRE, capital of the Swiss canton of Grisons.

CHURCH, STATES OF THE. (See ITALY.)

CHURCHILL, JOHN, church'-hill. (See MARLBOROUGH, Duke of.)

CHURCHILL, RANDOLPH HENRY SPENCER, commonly called Lord Randolph Churchill, the second son of the sixth Duke of Marlborough. Educated at Merton College, Oxford. First elected to Parliament for Woodstock at the general election of 1874, when about twenty-five years of age. He was almost a silent supporter of the Conservative government of Lord Beaconsfield, which held office during the whole of that parliament. On the defeat of the Conservative party in 1880, and the consequent return of Mr. Gladstone to the head of the government, Lord Randolph Churchill forthwith took a very prominent and aggressive part in opposition, which culminated in the defeat of the Gladstone ministry in 1885. Lord Randolph had previously made a short visit to India. On the accession of Lord Salisbury to power, Lord Randolph, not being invited to join the government, led a body of Conservatives who ostentatiously voted against their party. He was immediately invited to become a member of the government, and entered the cabinet as Secretary for India. At the general election of 1885, he became a candidate for the new division of Central Birmingham, in opposition to Mr. John Bright, who secured the seat; but his opponent was elected for the new division of South Paddington. Lord Salisbury's government being soon afterwards defeated, immediately resigned, together with Lord Randolph Churchill, who resumed his position as active opponent of the Liberal government until the defeat upon the Irish Home Rule Bill, which again restored Lord Salisbury to the premiership, Lord Randolph becoming Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons, but he suddenly resigned in December 1886, owing to differences with Lord Salisbury on financial and foreign affairs.

Born 1849.

CHURCHILL, SIR WINSTON, an English historian, who wrote a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," published in 1675, folio. He was the father of the celebrated Duke of Marlborough; and his daughter, Arabella, became mistress to James II.

Born in Dorsetshire, 1620; died 1688.

CHURCHILL, CHARLES, an English poet, the son of a curate of St. John's, Westminster. He received his education at Westminster. When only 17 years of age he made a runaway marriage.

At the age of 23 he was ordained, and served a curacy in Wales; but, becoming a dealer in cider, was unfortunate, and fell into bankruptcy. After this he came to London, and in 1758 succeeded his father as curate of St. John's, to which he added the profits of a seminary, in which he taught young ladies to read and write. His first-published literary performance (1763) was a poem called "Rosciad," written against the principal theatrical managers and actors, which had so great a success that it stimulated him to further exertions in the satirical line. This was immediately followed by the "Apology," which was succeeded by "Night," intended to serve as an apology for his own nocturnal habits, which were sometimes marked by such bibacious and other excesses as to damage his reputation. After several other performances, in one of which—"Pomposo"—he attacked Dr. Johnson, he wrote, to please Wilkes, "The Prophecy of Famine, a Scotch Pastoral," which met with great success. There seems nothing, however, more difficult to bear with equanimity than sudden prosperity, and Churchill fell into greater irregularities of conduct than ever. His parishioners were forced to remonstrate strongly with him against his vices, and he quitted the clerical profession. He now gave himself up to a dissipated course of life, parted from his wife, and kept a mistress. He continued, however, the friend of John Wilkes, and wrote further satires. Among others he attacked Hogarth, who revenged himself in his picture of "The Reverend Mr. Churchill as the Russian Bear." In versification he adopted Dryden as his model, and unquestionably exhibited great literary powers, which make it matter for regret that he so misused his abilities.

Born at Westminster, 1731; died at Boulogne, 1764.

CHURCHILL, CAPE, a headland on the W. coast of Hudson's Bay. Lat. 58° 50′ N. Lon. 93° 10′ E.

CHUSAN, choo-san', one of a group of islands off the E. coast of China, about 7 miles from the mainland, and 50 miles N.E. of Ningpo. It is 21 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 6 to 11. It is mountainous, interspersed with highly-cultivated valleys, producing tea, rice, wheat, sweet potatoes, walnuts, chestnuts, cotton, and tobacco. The island is studded with a great many towns and villages. Tinghai is the chief port. Pop. 200,000. Lat. 30° N. Lon. 122° E.—This island, called the "Key of China," was taken by the British in 1840 and 1841, and held by them until the terms of their treaty with China were fulfilled by the latter power.

CHUSAN ISLANDS, a group scattered around the preceding. One of them is the sacred island of Pu-tu; where are many Buddhist temples and monasteries, inhabited exclusively by priests or bonzes.

CIBBER, CAIUS GABRIEL, sib'-ber, a German sculptor, who, about the time of the Cromwellian Protectorate, came to England, and began to pursue his profession in London with some success. The statues of the kings, and of Gresham, in the Royal Exchange, which was burned in 1838, were by him, and also the two figures of "Melancholy" and "Raging Madness," at the principal gate of old Bethlehem Hospital, now at South Kensington (the "Cibber's brazen brainless brothers" of Pope). He also executed the bassi-rilievi on the pedestal of the London Monument. During the latter years of his life, he was chiefly employed by the duke of Devonshire in decorating the seat of that nobleman at Chatsworth. In the revolution of 1688, he took up arms under the duke, in favour of the prince of Orange, and lived to see the cause for which he fought successful, and to accumulate a large fortune.

Born about 1630; died in London, 1700.

CIBBER, COLLEY, an English poet and playwriter, the son of Gabriel Cibber, the sculptor. He served in the army of the prince of Orange at the Revolution, and having offended his father by an imprudent marriage, and so thrown on his own resources, went on the stage; but not attaining to eminence as an actor, turned his attention to dramatic writing. His first play was "Love's Last Shift," which was performed in 1695, and met with great applause; after which he wrote a number of others. His best work is considered to be the "Careless Husband," performed in 1704; but the "Nonjuror" brought him the most fame and profit. George I., to whom it was dedicated, presented him with £200. In 1711 he became one of the patentees of Drury Lane Theatre, retiring in 1730 on receiving the office of poet laureate. His comedies are light, airy, and pleasant, but his royal odes possess many faults. He made "acting versions" of several of Shakespeare's plays, which even now retain a certain amount of popularity. He wrote an "Apology" for his own life, which is very amusing, as it depicts many of his own foibles and peculiarities with considerable candour. He was the hero of Pope's "Dunciad."

Born in London, 1671; died 1757.

CIBBER, SUSANNAH MARIA, was the wife of Theophilus Cibber, son of the preceding, and the sister of Dr. Thomas Arne, the musical composer. She, as an actress, became a great favourite with the public, and was considered by many as the best representative of the tragic muse in her time on the stage. She was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

Born 1714; died 1766.

CIBRARIO, LUIGI, che-brair'-e-o, Italian historian and politician. He studied at the university of Turin, where he took the degree of doctor of laws. In 1848 king Charles Albert appointed him extraordinary royal commissioner at Venice, and made him a senator of the kingdom. Under king Victor Emmanuel, he was superintendent-general of the customs, and negotiated a treaty of commerce with France. In 1852 he was minister of public instruction, and in 1855 of foreign affairs. He wrote a history of the monarchy of Savoy, a treatise on the political economy of the Middle Ages, and various historical and biographical works.

Born at Turin, 1802; died at Salo, 1870.

CICERO, MARCUS TULLIUS, sis'-e-ro, a learned philosopher, and the greatest of Roman orators, honourably descended both by his father and mother's side. He was instructed in the language and literature of Greece by the orator Crassus, in philosophy by Philo, in law by Mutius Scævola, and acquired his military knowledge under Sylla, in the Marsian war. At the age of 16 he was admitted to the full rights of citizenship. When young, he translated the Greek poem "Phænomena," of Aratus, into Latin, of which some fragments remain. At the age of 26 he appeared at the bar, and pleaded the cause of Quinctius, and a year afterwards defended Roscius of Ameria in such a manner as won the applause of the Romans. He then travelled into Greece and Asia, and spent some time at Athens with his friend Atticus in studying the best models of Grecian oratory. On his return to Rome he became distinguished above all other pleaders. After passing through the offices of ædile and prætor, he offered himself as a candidate for the consulship; and, though powerfully opposed, was successful. One of his competitors was the famous Catiline, whose conspiracy against the state he was afterwards the great means of unveiling; for which he was called by the citizens "the father of his country, and the second founder of the republic." (See Catiline.) His vehemence, however, against Clodius, who was accused of having violated the mysteries of the Bona Dea (see Cæsar, Julius), brought upon him a train of evils, which finally forced him into voluntary exile; but his banishment was of short duration, for the Clodian faction becoming odious, the senate and people unanimously recalled him. In the quarrel between Cæsar and Pompey, he espoused the side of the latter, and followed him into Greece; but, after the battle of Pharsalia, returned into Italy, and obtained the friendship of Cæsar. He now retired from the arena of politics, and devoted himself to the calmer elegancies of literary pursuits, but the assassination of the dictator once more called him upon the political stage. He advised the senate to grant a general amnesty; but when he saw Antony gaining the ascendancy, he removed to Athens, to escape the effects of the enmity of that general. In a short time, however, he returned to Rome, and seemed to enjoy the friendship of Octavius, who nevertheless was induced to sacrifice him to the malice of Antony. Cicero was at Tusculum when he received the news of his proscription. In order to escape the vengeance of his enemies, he set out in a litter for the seacoast, but was overtaken and slain. His head and hands were carried in triumph to Antony, who was mean enough to place them on the rostra in the Forum, where Cicero had so often defended the lives, fortunes, and liberties of the Roman people. The talents of this great man have been the subject of universal admiration, and he possessed eminent public and private virtues, although they were, in some degree, obscured by his excessive vanity, and his want of courage and resolution led him into many acts of meanness. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a son and daughter. His second wife was a young woman to whom he was guardian.

Born at Arpinum, 106 B.C.; died 43 B.C.

CID CAMPEADOR, The, sid kam-pai'-ador, from the Arabic el seid, "the lord," and the Spanish campeador, "champion," was a Castilian hero, whose exploits are so largely mingled with fable and romance, that it is difficult, now, to determine how much of his life was true. It would appear, however, that his real name was Don Roderigo Diaz de Bivar, and that he was reared in the court of the kings of Castile. On account of the great prowess he displayed in early years, the honour of knighthood was bestowed on him; and, in 1063, he proceeded with Don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro, king of Aragon, who was slain in battle. On the accession of Sancho, he accompanied him to the siege of Zamora, where the king was killed by treachery, and the Cid led back the troops to Castile, carrying with him the dead body of his monarch. Alfonso, the brother of Sancho, was then placed on the throne; and in 1074 the Cid married Donna Ximena Dias, daughter of Count Diego Alvarez, of the Asturias, whom he had slain in single combat, to avenge an insult which Diego had once offered to his father. Soon after this he revolted against Alfonso, and committed great ravages in Aragon, penetrating nearly as far as Saragossa, and fixing his residence in a fortress still called Peña del Cid, "the rock of the Cid," where he became an independent chief. At one time, it is said, though on doubtful authority, he assisted the Moorish king of Saragossa, but afterwards fought against the Moors. In 1094 he took Valentia, and held it till the time of his death. Corneille has written a famous tragedy, embodying the exploits of this warrior. Southey also published a "Chronicle of the Cid," illustrative of his adventures. There is, however, a Spanish poem of the Cid, which was written in the 12th century by the "Homer of Spain," of whom we have no further knowledge; but whose performance is said, by Southey, to be "the oldest poem in the Spanish language, and, beyond comparison, the finest." Lockhart's "Spanish Ballads," in which the Cid figures prominently, are well known.

Born at Burgos, 1026; died 1099.

CIENFUEGOS, se'-an-foo-ai'-gos, a town of Cuba, in the midst of extensive sugar plantations. Pop. 7,400.

CIENFUEGOS, Nicosio Alvarez de, Spanish poet and dramatist, who was, in 1808, for a political offence, banished to France by Murat. His tragedies are considered his best works.

Born at Madrid, 1764; died in France, 1809.

CIEZA, se-ai'-za, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, near the right bank of the Segura. The streets are wide, and there are three squares. There are a large church, two convents, town-house, and other public buildings. Manf. Linen, soap, saltpetre, wine, and oil. Silkworms are reared, and there is a large annual fair. Pop. 10,000.

CIGNANI, Carlo, Italian painter, whose pictures have been thought worthy of association with those of the Caracci, Guido, and Correggio. He generally chose Scriptural subjects.

Born at Bologna, 1628; died at Forli, 1719.

CIGOLI, Ludovico Cardi da, ché-go-le, an Italian painter and architect, many of whose finest works are preserved in the galleries of Florence and Rome. He designed several of the Florentine palaces.

Born at Empoli, 1559; died at Rome, 1613.

CILICIA, si-lish'-e-a, an ancient division of Asia Minor, now comprised in the Turkish pashalic Itshili. Formerly, its boundaries were the Taurus range on the N., the Cilician Sea on the E., the Gulf of Issus on the S., and Pamphylia on the W. Lat. between 36° and 38° N. Lon. between 32° 10' and 37° 8' E.

CILLY, CILLI, or ZILLI, sil'-le, a town of the Austrian empire in Styria, 40 miles N.W. of Agram, near the confluence of the Kodingbach and Sann. There are several churches, a fine old gothic chapel, two convents, a high school and gymnasium. Being an important position on the road between Trieste and Vienna, with which places it is connected by railway, a considerable trade is carried on. The mineral waters of Rohitch and coal mines are in the vicinity. There is an old castle near the town. Pop. 4,000.

CIMABUE, chim'-a-boo-ai, a Florentine painter and architect, considered as the restorer of the art of painting in Italy. He was instructed by the Greek painters whom the senate had summoned to Florence; but he very quickly surpassed his masters. There are still some remains of his works in fresco and distemper, showing signs of genius. His principal picture, however, is the "Madonna," painted for the church of St. Maria Novella. This production, when finished, was escorted to the church by a triumphal procession of the citizens.

Born at Florence, 1240; died 1300.

CIMAROSA, DOMENICO, chim-a-ro'-sa, an Italian musician, who early achieved, by his compositions, great success, and was invited to the courts of the German sovereigns, and also to the court of Russia. He is the author of more than 120 operas, serious and comic; amongst which may be remarked "Abraham's Sacrifice," "Penelope," the "Horatii and the Curiatii." He principally excelled, however, in the opera buffa, and his Il Matrimonio Segreto is still popular.

Born at Naples, 1755; died at Venice, 1801.

CIMBRI, or KIMBRI, sim'-bri, a Teutonic race, who originally occupied Jutland and part of Denmark, and who probably belonged to the same family as the Cimmerians of the Greeks and the Cymri of the Gauls.

CIMINNA, se-mé'-na, a town of Sicily, in the province of Palermo, 18 miles S.E. of Palermo. Pop. 6,000.

CIMMERIANS, or CIMMERII, sim-mé'-ri-ans, a barbarous people of eastern Europe, who for a time inhabited the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis (Sea of Azof). Driven out of Asia by the Scythians, they spread themselves along the east coast of the Black Sea, and then turned to the west and south-west, taking possession of Cappadocia, &c. They even penetrated into Lydia, but Alyattes conquered them, 617 B.C., when they disappear from history.

CIMON, si'-mon, an Athenian general, the son of Miltiades. He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and was afterwards appointed to the command of all the naval forces of Greece. He defeated the Persian fleets and took 200 ships, and totally routed their land forces on the same day, near the river Eurymedon, in Pamphylia. He was shortly after, by the intrigues of Pericles, banished Athens, but was recalled, and adjusted the dispute existing between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. He was now appointed to carry on the war against Persia, in Egypt and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ships; and, on the coast of Asia, gave battle to the enemy, and totally destroyed their fleet. He died while besieging the town of Citium, in Cyprus, occupied by the Persians.—He may be called the last of those Greeks whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He fortified and embellished Athens with the captured spoils, and has been highly extolled by his biographers, as well for his liberality as his valour.

Born 510 B.C.; died 449 B.C.

CINALOA, a town in Mexico, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Gulf of California. It was once a handsome and populous town, with a large cathedral, having an altar-piece of solid silver, but has been nearly destroyed by a tremendous flood, which swept away the greater part of the church and other buildings. Pop. 3,000.

CINCINNATI, sin'-sin-na'-te, the capital of Hamilton county, Ohio, U.S., situate on the N. bank of Ohio river, 20 miles above the mouth of the Great Miami. In respect of population, it ranks as the eighth city in the Union, and is increasing with marvellous rapidity. It is in a pleasant and healthy situation, and is one of the most flourishing towns W. of the Alleghany mountains. The town is built on a plateau, surrounded by hills, on the slope of which the upper part is situated. Its public buildings are a city-hall, lyceum, mechanics' institute, museums, theatres, a Roman Catholic cathedral, upwards of one hundred churches (some very handsome), several colleges, many schools, insurance companies, offices, and banks. The city is somewhat irregular in plan, but the streets are wide, and some of them planted with trees. A reservoir for supplying the city with water has been constructed at an immense cost. The river is crossed by a suspension-bridge, 100 feet above low water. The town was founded in 1788, but at the commencement of the present century was an insignificant place, with less than 800 inhabitants.

Trade and Manufactures.—Cincinnati is the great pork market of the United States. Pigs are killed and packed for exportation on the most extensive scale, and the annual export of pork is estimated to be of the value of nearly £2,500,000. There are numerous distilleries, and more than 500,000 barrels of whisky, besides a large amount of other spirits, are yearly exported. Wine made from the Catawba grape is now an important production. Grain, cattle, hides, and timber are also exported. The manufactures include machinery, hardware, cotton and woollen goods, furniture, paper, leather, saddlery, tobacco, soap, candles, and hats.

Pop. in 1880, 255,139, of whom at least 80,000 are of foreign birth, including a large number of Germans and Irish. The rapid increase of population has been, with the exception of Chicago, almost unparalleled.

Communications.—The Miami canal connects the city with Lake Erie; the river Ohio offers very great facilities, about 450 steamers, many of them of large size, being engaged in the traffic; and there is railway communication with nearly all the great commercial centres of the States.

CINCINNATUS, LUCIUS QUINCTIUS, sin'-sin-nai'-tus, a celebrated Roman, who, according to legendary history, was made consul in 460 B.C., and two years afterwards was informed, as he was in the act of ploughing his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this, he left his farm, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. Conquering the enemy, he returned to Rome in triumph. Sixteen days after his appointment, he laid down his office, and resumed his agricultural pursuits. In his 80th year he was again summoned against Præneste as dictator; and, after a successful campaign, once more resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate.

Died about 440 B.C.

CINNA, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, sin'-na, a Roman consul, who procured the impeachment of Sulla, and, with Marius, filled Rome with the blood of their slaughtered enemies. He was consul four successive years. In 84 B.C. he advanced to meet Sulla, who was on the march to Rome to vindicate his rights, and was killed by his own soldiers. His daughter Cornelia was the wife of Julius Cæsar.

Died at Brundusium, 85 B.C.

CINQ-MARS, HENRY COIFFIER, Marquis of, sank-mars, a favourite of Louis XIII., befriended by Cardinal Richelieu, who introduced him to the king. Cinq-Mars, however, irritated against the cardinal for his opposition to his marriage with Maria de Gonzagua, instigated Gaston, duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebellion. Between them a secret treaty was set on foot, by which Spain was to render them assistance; but the plot being discovered by Richelieu, the marquis was seized and beheaded.

Born 1620; died at Lyons, 1642.

CINQUE PORTS, THE, sink ports, certain seaports of England, on the coasts of Kent and Sussex: viz. Dover, Sandwich, Hythe, and Romney, in Kent; and Rye, Winchelsea, Hastings, and Seaford, in Sussex. They were originally five in number, as their name imports (Rye, Winchelsea, and Seaford having been added at a later period), and were, in former times, bound to furnish to the sovereign a certain number of ships of war in any emergency, in return for which their freemen were styled barons, and ranked among the nobility. Each of the ports sent two members to parliament, and enjoyed other privileges and immunities.—Their first charter was granted by William the Conqueror, in 1067. An officer is appointed over them, who is called the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. The appointment is a sinecure, and is generally held by some distinguished person. In recent times, the Duke of Wellington and Lord Palmerston have been wardens.

CINQUEFRONDI, sink-fron'-de, a town of Italy, province Reggio, 44 miles S.W. of Calanzaro. The old town was destroyed by an earthquake in 1783. Pop. 4,500.

CINTEGABELLE, sint'-ga-bel, a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, 17 miles S. of Toulouse, at the confluence of the Lers with the Ariége. Pop. 4,000.

CINTRA, or SINTRA, sin'-tra, a town of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, 15 miles N.W. of Lisbon. It is built on the slope of the mountain-chain of Cintre, which terminates at Cape Roca, and is most beautifully situated. There are a royal palace, with fine gardens, and many country houses and villas. Fruit-trees abound in the neighbourhood, and there are marble-quarries. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,300. Here was concluded, after the battle of Vimiera, in 1808, the convention between Sir Hugh Dalrymple and the French marshal Junot. By it the French were suffered to evacuate Portugal unmolested, and great indignation was excited, but the Duke of Wellington opposed the course adopted.

CINTRUENIGO, sin-tru-a-ne'-go, a town of Spain, province of Navarre. It is well and openly built, with good houses. There are a fine church, chapels, and a town-hall. Oil is expressed in large quantities, and a trade in grain and fruits carried on. Pop. 2,200.

CIOTAT, LA, se'-o-ta, a town and seaport of France, in the department Bouches-du-Rhône, on the Mediterranean, 15 miles S.E. of Marseilles. It is built on the N. side of the bay of Lèques, surrounded by an old wall, and has an agreeable promenade overlooking the sea. The port, which is large and commodious, is defended by batteries. Manf. Cotton and machinery. A large trade in muscatel wine, oil, grain, and fruits is carried on, and sardines and anchovies are caught along the coast. Pop. 10,000.

CIPRIANI, GIAMBATTESTA, seep-re-a'-ne, Italian painter and engraver. Having obtained a high reputation in Rome, he came to London, and was one of the first members of the Royal Academy. His style was graceful in design, and harmonious in colouring.

Born in Florence, 1727; died in London, 1785.

CIRCASSIA, or TCHERKESSIA, sir-kash'-e-a, a country of Asia, occupying a great part of the territory between the Black and Caspian seas. It comprises the northern and part of the southern declivity of the Caucasus, and is now nominally embraced within the limits of the Russian empire. It is mountainous, intersected by extensive fertile valleys, producing wheat, grapes, and most of the fruits of the temperate zone. Cattle-rearing, however, is the principal branch of industry, and the breed of horses is of superior quality.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, nitre, and salts.

Pop. 2,361,475 divided into five distinct classes, chiefs, nobles, freemen, vassals, and slaves. Their habits are wandering and predatory, and their religion, nominally Mahometan among the upper classes, is with those of lower grade a strange compound of some Christian observances with a vast amount of heathenish superstition. Physically the Circassians are a fine race, and the beauty of the women is highly appreciated by Oriental possessors of harems. The Circassians call themselves Adighé; the Tartar name, Tcherkess, signifying robbers. (See CAUCASUS.)

Lat. Between 42° and 45° N. Lon. 37° and 47° E.

History.—The Circassians are probably of Median origin. In 1424 they asserted their independence, but were afterwards subject to Tartar domination until 1705. Since about 1780, there have been frequent wars with Russia, which entirely subdued the Caucasus in 1864.

CIRCE, sir'-se, in Greek legend a daughter of Sol and Perse, celebrated for her skill in magic and poisonous herbs. She married a Sarmatian prince of Colchis, whom she murdered to obtain the kingdom; but was expelled by her subjects, and carried by her father to an island called Æa, on the coast of Italy. Ulysses, on his return from the Trojan war, visited her coasts; and all his companions, who ran headlong into pleasure and voluptuousness, were changed by Circe's potions into swine. Ulysses, fortified against all enchantments by an herb called moly, which he had received from Mercury, demanded from Circe the restoration of his companions to their former state. She complied, loading the hero with honours; and, for one whole year, he forgot his glory in his devotion to pleasure. (See ULYSSES.)

CIRENCESTER, si-ren-sest'-ter, commonly pronounced sis'-is-ter, a market-town and parliamentary borough of Gloucestershire, on the Churn, 18 miles S.E. of Gloucester. The church is scarcely surpassed in magnificence by any structure of the same kind in the kingdom. It has a tower 132 feet high, and contains many interesting monuments. It was restored in 1867. There is a fine public hall in the Italian style. The Roman station, Corinium, was here, and many remains, including an amphitheatre, have been discovered. Pop. 7,703.

CIREY-LES-FORGES, se'-rai-lai-forge, a town of France, department Meurthe, at the foot of the Vosges. Manf. Plate-glass, paper, and earthenware. Pop. 2,300.

CIRIE, che'-re-a, a town of Northern Italy, on a branch of the Stura, 13 miles N.W. of Turin. Three are three churches, and several convents. Pop. 4,600.

CIRO, che'-ro, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, 3 miles from the Ionian Sea. It is fortified, has three churches, an episcopal palace, and a school. Pop. 2,900.

CIRTA. (See CONSTANTINE, Algeria.)

CISALPINA GALLIA, sis-al-pi'-na, a part of Gaul, called also Citerior and Togata. Its farthest boundary was near the Rubicon, and it touched the Alps on the Italian side.

CISALPINE REPUBLIC, sis-al'-pine, a state of Italy, founded by Napoleon in 1797, and merged into the kingdom of Italy, 1805. It comprised parts of Mantua, Milan, the Valteline, the Venetian territory W. and S. of the Adige, Modena, and the N. part of the Pontifical States.

CISNEROS, ALPHONZO DE. (See XIMENES.)

CITHÆRON, si-the'-ron, in Greek legend, a king, who gave his name to a mountain of Bœotia. This mountain was at the south of the river Asopus. It was sacred to Jupiter and the Muses. Actæon was torn to pieces by his own dogs upon it; and Hercules there killed an immense lion. It is now called Elatea, from the Greek name of a fir tree, has an elevation of 4,600 feet, and forms a part of the boundary between Attica and Thebes.

CITTADELLA, se'-ta-dail-la, a town of Italy, province of Vicenza, on the Brentella, 15 miles N.E. of Vicenza. Manf. Linen and paper. Pop. 6,500.

CITTA-DI-CASTELLO, cheet'-ta, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Tiber, 25 miles N.W. of Perugia. There are a cathedral, nine churches, several convents, and a citadel. Manf. Silk twist. Pop. 7,000.

CITTA DELLA-DI-PORTO, a strongly fortified town of Italy, on the Mincio, opposite Mantua. Pop. 2,900.

CITTA VECCHIA, vek'-ke-a ("old city"), a strong town of Malta, situate on a hill in the centre of the island, 7 miles S.W. of Valetta. Before the rise of Valetta, it was the chief town of the island; now the palaces and fine residences are almost deserted. The cathedral, dedicated to St. Paul, is a handsome building, and in one of the suburbs are the catacombs used by the early Christians. Tradition asserts that St. Paul preached in one of the caves, and a large figure of the apostle is supposed to mark the spot where he stood. Pop. 1,000.

CITTA-VECCHIA, a town of the Austrian empire, on the north-west coast of the island of Lesina, in Dalmatia. There is a large harbour, and ship-building is carried on. Pop. 2,300. The town occupies the site of the ancient Pharia, and many Greek and Roman antiquities have been found.

CIUDAD, or CIVIDAD RODRIGO, thé-oo-dath-reth-ree'-go, a fortified town of Spain, province of Leon, on the Agueda, which is here crossed by a magnificent bridge, 15 miles from the frontier of Portugal. The streets are tolerably regular, and the public buildings numerous. The principal are a citadel, governor's residence, cathedral, and other churches. On the Plaza Mayor, or principal square, are three Roman columns, with inscriptions. Pop. 4,800. It was taken by the French in 1810, and in 1812 the British retook it by storm.

CIUDAD-REAL, rai'-al, a province of Spain, occupying the S. of New Castile, and inclosed by Toledo on the N., Albacete on the E., Cordova and Jaen on the S., and Badajos and Caceres on the W. It is mountainous and sterile, except on the banks of the rivers, where maize, wheat, barley, oats, rye, and flax are grown. Live stock are also reared to a considerable extent. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, antimony, silver, coal, granite, jasper, and marble. There are many mineral springs. Manf. Woollens, cottons, linens, silk, saltpetre, soap, hardware, and earthenware. Pop. 273,974.

CIUDAD-REAL, the capital of the above, 100 miles S. of Madrid. The streets are broad, straight, and well paved. The principal square, Plaza Mayor, is large and handsome. The principal church, Santa Maria, is one of the finest in Spain. Manf. Woollens, linen, and watches; and there is a trade in mules, wine, fruits, and oil. Pop. about 13,589.

CIUDAD-REAL, the-oo-dad', a town of Mexico, capital of the province of Chiapos, on the Rio de los Zeldales. There are a cathedral, several monasteries, and a Roman Catholic college; and there is a stalactite cavern in the vicinity. A trade is carried on in cocoa, cochineal, cotton, and wool. Pop. 4,300. This town has at various times been named Villa-Real, Villa-Viciosa, San Christoval de los Llanos, and Ciudad de los Casos.

CIUDADELA, thé-oo-da-dai'-la, a seaport on the west coast of the island of Minorca. It is surrounded by walls, and entered by five gates. There are a cathedral, several convents, and municipal buildings. Manf. Woollen goods, oil, and wine. Pop. 7,300. Lat. 39° 58′ N. Lon. 3° 52′ E.

CIVIDALE, che-ve-da'-le, a town of Italy, in the province of Venetia, on the Natisone, which is crossed by an ancient stone bridge. The town is walled, and there are five suburbs. The cathedral, Santa Maria, is a very interesting Gothic edifice, containing a handsome altar-screen and some fine paintings. Manf. Silk and cotton. Pop. 6,000.

CIVILIS, si-vi'-lis, a brave chief of the Batavians, the ancient inhabitants of a portion of Holland, who, about 70 B.C., put himself at the head of his countrymen, and drove out the Romans, beating many of their best generals. He finally made peace with Cerialis, Vespasian's commander.

CIVITA CASTELLANA, ché-va-ta kas-tel-la'-na, a town of Italy, 28 miles N. of Rome, near the Rio-Maggiore, which is crossed by a lofty and handsome bridge. There are a cathedral, convents, a college, and state prison. Pop. 4,000.

CIVITA-DI-PENNE, de-pan-na, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, on two hills, 29 miles N.E. of Aquila. The cathedral is a fine edifice, and there are seven monasteries, two nunneries, and a hospital. Manf. Leather. Pop. 8,800. It was the royal city of the early kings of the Two Sicilies.

CIVITA SANT'-ANGELO, sant an'-ai-lo, a town of Italy, in the province of Abruzzio Ulteriore, about 4 miles W. of the Adriatic. There are a collegiate church, four convents, and a hospital. Manf. Leather, wine, and oils; and there are five annual fairs. Pop. 6,000.

CIVITALI, MATTEO, che-ve-ta-le, Italian sculptor and architect. Some of his finest productions are in the cathedrals of Lucca and Genoa.
Born at Lucca, 1435; died 1501.

CIVITA VECCHIA, ché'-ve-ta vek'-ke-a, a seaport of Italy, built on a bay of the Mediterranean, 38 miles N.W. of Rome, of which it is the port. It has a good harbour, inclosed by two moles; and a breakwater on the S., at the extremity of which there is a lighthouse. Its chief building are churches and convents, a theatre, arsenal, building-docks, and a convict establishment. Exp. Wheat, cheese, grain, skins, alum, staves, and bark. There is regular steam communication with the principal Mediterranean ports. Pop. 11,317—The port was the ancient Portus-Trajanus. Lat. 42° 5′ N. Lon. 11° 44′ E.

CIVITELLA, che-ve-tal'-la, a town of Italy, on an affluent of the Tronto, 9 miles N. of Teramo. It is strongly situated on a rock, and defended by a castle. There are a collegiate church and three convents. Pop. 6,600.

CIVRAY, seev'-vai, a town of France, department Vienne, on the right bank of the Charente, 29 miles S. of Poitiers. There are a Romanesque church, with curious sculptures, a communal college, and the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 2,100.

CLACKMANNAN, the capital of Clackmannanshire, 9 miles E. of Stirling. It stands on an eminence, not far from the confluence of the Devon with the Forth. Pop. 4,653.

CLACKMANNANSHIRE, klak-man'-nan, the smallest county of Scotland, bounded S.E. by Fife, S. and S.W. by the river Forth, W. by Alva, an isolated district of Stirlingshire, and on every other side by Perthshire. It is about 10 miles in length, and 4 in breadth. The northern district is traversed by the Ochil Hills; and the principal rivers are the North and South Devon. The soil is fertile, many acres of rich carse land having been recovered from the Forth by means of embankments. Minerals. Coal, iron-stone, and green-stone. Pop. 25,677.

CLAGENFURT. (See KLAGENFURTH.)

CLAIBORNE, klai'-born, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 740 square miles. Pop. 16,768. The capital is Port Gibson.

CLAIBORNE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 13,373. Tazewell is the capital.

CLAIR, ST., klair, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 726 square miles. Pop. 14,462. Asheville is the capital.

CLAIR, ST., a river and lake of N. America, lying between the territories of Great Britain and the United States. The river is the channel of communication between lakes Huron and Erie.—The lake is of sufficient depth for ships of the largest burden. It is 30 miles long, and 12 broad. Area, 360 square miles. It has many islands, and receives numerous streams.

CLAIRAC, klair'-ak, a town of France, in the department of Lot-et-Garonne, on the right bank of the Lot, 17 miles N.W. of Agen. It has a trade in fruits and wines. Pop. 2,400. This town owes its origin to a Benedictine abbey founded in the 8th century. Under Louis XIII., during the religious wars, this place was taken and burnt several times, more particularly in 1621.

CLAIRAUT, ALEXIS, klair'-o, a precocious French mathematician, who, at the age of 4, could read and write, at 9 had made some progress in algebra and geometry, and solved several difficult problems; and at 11 produced a memoir on curves, which appeared in the "Miscellanea Berolinensia," with an honourable certificate of the Academy of Sciences. That learned body admitted him an associate at the age of 18; and he was one of the academicians who went to the north to measure a degree, with the view of ascertaining the figure of the earth. He wrote Elements of Geometry and of Algebra, a treatise on the Figure of the Earth, Tables of the Moon, &c.

Born at Paris, 1713; died 1765.

CLAIRE, ST., belonged to a noble family of Assisi, in Italy. She believed that she received direct inspiration, and founded an order of nuns in 1212. Two years after her death she was canonized by Pope Alexander IV.

Born 1193; died 1253.

CLAIRFAIT, COUNT DE, klair'-fai, a famous Austrian general, who first distinguished himself against the Turks. In the wars which signalized the close of the 18th century, he fought with great valour against the French; and, in 1795, commanded the army of Mayence, which attacked the French camp formed before that city. This he forced, and took a number of prisoners. Whilst following up his success, he received, at Mannheim, an order to retire, on which he resigned his command. Subsequently, he became a member of the Aulic council of war, and shortly afterwards died at Vienna, 1798. Clairfait was considered by the French the ablest general opposed to them during the war.

Born at Brussels, 1733; died 1798.

CLAIRON, CLAIRE JOSEPHINE DE LA TUDE, klair'-awng, a distinguished French actress, who, in her 12th year, first made her appearance on the stage. She subsequently became the greatest tragic performer of her age and country, but lived a licentious life.

Born near Condé, 1723; died 1803.

CLAMECY, kla-mai'-ce, a town of France, department Nièvre, on the left bank of the Yonne, at the confluence with the Beuvron. The suburbs are on the opposite bank of the Yonne. The parish church, founded at the end of the 15th century, has a fine tower and interesting sculptures. Manf. Cloth, leather, and pottery. Pop. 5,200.

CLANWILLIAM, a division of the western province of Cape Colony, South Africa, including a portion of the fertile valley of the Olifants river, and a large extent of mountain and elevated land on each side of it. The surface of the country is rugged, and the climate intensely hot. The chief town is of the same name, 160 miles N. of Cape Town. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

CLAPHAM. (See LONDON.)

CLAPPERTON, HUGH, Captain, klap'-per-ton, a distinguished African traveller. He entered the mercantile service when young, but afterwards served in the royal navy, in which he rose to the rank of lieutenant. In 1822 he accompanied Lieutenant Denham and Dr. Oudney on an expedition to Central Africa; and, on his return, received a captaincy. In this enterprise, he and Denham determined the positions of Bournou, Houssa, and Mandara. Oudney had died at an early stage of the journey, in 1824. The principal object of the expedition had been to ascertain the course and the termination of the Niger; but, as they were unsuccessful, he was dispatched again, in 1825, on the same journey. He and his party landed, in the month of November, in the Bight of Benin; but they were all more or less attacked with a sickness which proved fatal to several of them. He had proceeded to Changary, a village four miles from Soccatoo, where he was seized with dysentery, which carried him off.

Born at Annan, Scotland, 1788; died 1827.

CLARA, SANTA, klair'-a, a town of the island of Cuba, 45 miles N.W. of Trinidad. Pop. about 6,000, of whom a sixth are slaves.

CLARE, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Munster. It is separated by the river Shannon from the county of Limerick on the S.E.; the Atlantic Ocean bounds it on the W., the Bay of Galway on the N., and a portion of the counties of Galway and Tipperary on the E. It is mountainous, except in the south and south-west, and the soil light, but extremely fertile, producing potatoes, oats, and barley. There are 220 miles of coast, partly along the sea, and partly on the estuary of the Shannon. The coast is generally rocky, rising in some places to a height of 500 feet, and there are many islands and detached rocks. It is watered by the Fergus and its affluents. Minerals. Lead, iron, and extensive coal-mines in the south-west. Manf. Coarse linens, hosiery, friezes, and flannels. Pop. 141,210.

CLARE, a market-town of Suffolk, on the right bank of the Stour, 12 miles S.W. of Bury St. Edmunds. There are a handsome church, and other places of worship; a large corn-exchange, and remains of an old castle and priory. Manf. Straw-plait. Pop. 1,500. A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

CLARE ISLAND, at the entrance of Clare Bay, in the county of Mayo, Ireland. It is nearly 5 miles long and 2 broad. At the north-eastern extremity is a lighthouse 487 feet above the sea. Lat. 53° 49′ N. Lon. 9° 55′ W.

CLARE, JOHN, the son of a Northamptonshire farm-labourer, who was early sent to work in the fields, whilst in by-hours he received occasional instruction at a neighbouring parish school. When he became able to read, he purchased a few books, and, by degrees, initiated himself into composition in verse. In 1818 he produced a "Sonnet to the Setting Sun," which attracted the notice of a bookseller at Stamford, and led to the publication of a small volume entitled "Poems descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery," which was favourably received. He subsequently produced the "Village Minstrel, and other Poems;" the "Shepherd's Calendar, and other Poems;" and in 1836 the "Rural Muse." These are all pleasing effusions, but exhibiting neither strength nor much originality. Clare unfortunately lost his reason, brought on by brooding over some unsuccessful trading speculations, which, although comparatively trifling, to a mind like his were sufficiently overwhelming.

Born at Helpstone, Northamptonshire, 1793; died 1864.

CLARE, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 4,187.

CLAREMONT, a town of Cheshire county, New Hampshire, U.S., on Connecticut river, 11 miles from Charlestown. Pop. 4,704.

CLARENCE, klar'-ence, a settlement on the N. side of the island of Fernando Po, on the Bight of Biafra, S. Africa, on a bay of the same name. In the town many liberated negroes live. There is a large hospital. Lat. 3° 46′ N. Lon. 8° 47′ E.

CLARENCE, an island off the W. coast of Terra-del-Fuego, South America, 55 miles long and 23 broad, the coast much indented by bays. Lat. 54° S. Lon. 72° W.

CLARENCE STRAIT, the channel between Melville Island and the N.W. coast of Australia.

CLARENCE, GEORGE, duke of, brother of Edward IV. of England. He took part with the Earl of Warwick against his brother. He opposed his brother Richard, Duke of Gloucester, and was sent to the Tower, and condemned to death by Parliament. Before the sentence could be executed he was found dead in his prison. Popular, but not very authentic, history asserts that Richard caused him to be drowned in a butt of Malmsey wine.

Died 1478.

CLARENDON, EDWARD HYDE, earl of, klar'-en-don, lord high chancellor of England, and historian, was educated at Oxford, and studied the law under his uncle, Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the King's Bench. He was a member of the Long Parliament, and for some time spoke on the side of the popular party, but attached himself, during the civil war, to the cause of Charles, and greatly contributed to the Restoration. He became lord chancellor when Charles II. ascended the throne, was elected chancellor of the university of Oxford, and in 1660 created Baron Hyde, and soon afterwards Viscount Cornbury and Earl of Clarendon. In the exercise of his judicial functions his conduct was above reproach, yet he became unpopular, and was forced to resign his official situations. To escape the penalties of a threatened impeachment, he prudently retired into exile. He sent an "Apology," or explanation of his conduct to the House of Lords, but Parliament ordered it to be burned by the hangman. He passed the remainder of his days in France, but his remains were brought over and interred in Westminster Abbey. Clarendon wrote the well-known "History of the Rebellion," which is held in high estimation, and will transmit his name to a distant posterity. His daughter Anne was married to the duke of York, who by her had two daughters, Mary and Anne, both of whom ascended the English throne.

Born at Dinton, Wiltshire, 1608; died at Rouen, 1674.

CLARENDON, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK VILLIERS, fourth earl of, and one of the ablest of modern statesmen. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1823 was appointed a commissioner of excise in Dublin, in which capacity he displayed abilities sufficient to recommend him to some higher employment by the government. Accordingly, in 1831, he arranged a commercial treaty with France, and in 1833 became minister plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid. When he succeeded to his title, in 1838, he came to England, and took his seat in the House of Lords. Here he soon distinguished himself, and in 1840 became lord privy seal in the Melbourne administration, and, before the end of the same year, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In the following year Sir Robert Peel came into power; but in 1846, when Lord John Russell was appointed to the premiership, Lord Clarendon was made president of the Board of Trade, which office he resigned for the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, on the duties of which he entered in the following year. He continued to exercise his viceregal authority through a very trying course of years till 1852, when, with the other members of the ministry, he resigned. On the accession to power of the Coalition ministry, under the earl of Aberdeen, he accepted the seals of the Foreign Office, which he also continued to hold, under the administration of Lord Palmerston, until 1858, and held the same office again in 1865 and 1868, retaining it until his death.

Born 1800; died 1870.

CLARK, SIR JAMES, klark, physician. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school of Fordyce, a maritime parish of Scotland, and afterwards entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he took his degree of M.A. He then went to Edinburgh, where he pursued his medical studies, and, in 1809, received an appointment in the navy, in which he remained till 1815, when he returned to Edinburgh, and, in two years more, took his degree of M.D. in the university of that city. In 1826 he came to England, and settled in London; and was, shortly afterwards, made physician to St. George's Parochial infirmary. In 1832 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1835, physician to the Duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria. On the accession of her Majesty to the throne, he continued her physician. In 1838 he was created a baronet. As a medical author he occupies a very high rank. His most important treatises are "On the Sanative Influence of Climate," and "On Pulmonary Consumption."

Born at Cullen, Banffshire, 1788; died 1870.

CLARK, WILLIAM TIERNEY, a civil engineer, who, in 1808, went as a draughtsman from Bristol to London, and entered into the service of Mr. Rennie, with whom he remained till 1811, when he was appointed engineer to the West Middlesex Waterworks. This post he retained throughout his life, making great improvements in the establishment, and realizing large profits to the company. In 1819 he undertook the completion of the Thames and Medway Canal, which he successfully accomplished; and in 1824 commenced the suspension bridge over the Thames at Hammersmith. In 1827 he finished this work, after which the duke of Norfolk employed him to construct another over the Arun. In 1839 he began another over the Danube, at Pesth, which was not completed till 1849, at a cost of £622,000. This was the greatest work of his life, and it gave so much satisfaction to his royal patron, the emperor of Austria, that he presented him with a box set in brilliants. For a design for a suspension-bridge over the Neva, the emperor of Russia sent him a first-class gold medal. He was a member of several learned societies.

Born in Somersetshire, 1783; died 1852.

CLARK, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 21,894. Capital, Darwin.

CLARK, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 210 square miles. Pop. 12,115.

CLARK, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 15,031. Quitman is the chief town.

CLARKE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 41,948. Springfield is the capital.

CLARKE, SAMUEL, a learned English philosopher and divine. He was educated at Cambridge, and became chaplain to Bishop Moore, of Norwich, and received from that prelate the rectory of Drayeot, in Norfolk. In 1701 he published his "Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. Matthew," which was afterwards extended to the remaining Gospels. In 1706 he brought out a translation of Newton's "Optics," for which Sir Isaac complimented him with 500*l*. About this time he was presented to the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, London, and appointed chaplain to Queen Anne. In 1709 he obtained the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, and took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge. From this period he continued to publish works upon various subjects, some of them of a doctrinal, and others of a deeply philosophical kind. A work on the Trinity, in which he denied that that doctrine was held by the early Church, excited much attention, and the attention of convocation was called to it, but on Dr. Clarke promising that he would refrain from farther controversy on the subject, no action was taken. He entered into a long correspondence with Leibnitz, which was afterwards published. In 1727 he was offered the place of master of the mint, vacant by the death of Sir Isaac Newton, but refused it. He was previously presented to the mastership of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicestershire. He edited Cæsar's "Commentaries," and in 1729 published the first twelve books of Homer's "Iliad," with a Latin version and annotations. The remaining books were published by his son in 1732.—Dr. Clark was a profound scholar, a close reasoner, an acute critic, well versed in mathematics, philosophy, and metaphysics. He was also a man of unaffected manners; mild, amiable, and charitable to those who differed from him.

Born at Norwich, 1675; died 1729.

CLARKE, ADAM, an eminent divine, deeply skilled in Oriental languages and Biblical antiquities. He was a native of the north of Ireland, but his studies were pursued at the school founded by John Wesley, at Kingswood, near Bristol, and at the age of 18 he became a travelling preacher in the Methodist connection. In the ministerial character, his preaching was both attractive and useful; but it is principally on account of his writings that he is noticed in this work. In 1802 he published, in six volumes, "A Bibliographical Dictionary," which at once procured for him a literary reputation. He continued to produce other works, among which were a "Narrative of the Illness and Death of Richard Porson;" "Memoirs of the Wesley Family;" "Baxter's Christian Directory," which he edited, and several others of a religious class. His industry was very great; for, besides these and many pamphlets and sermons, he wrote four reports on the state of the public records, and edited the first volume of a new edition of Rymer's "Fœdera." He also published an edition of the Bible, with commentary and critical notes, which he considered to be the great work of his life, and which is highly valued.

Born 1762; died 1832.

CLARKE, EDWARD DANIEL, LL.D., a distinguished modern traveller, who in 1794 accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy, and in 1799 commenced a tour through Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Russia, Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece. In 1802 he returned by Germany and France, bringing with him many valuable manuscripts, which he presented to the library at Cambridge. He also presented to this university a fragment of the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres, of the best period of Grecian art, and brought with him, besides, a sarcophagus of Alexander, and a magnificent collection of mineralogical specimens. In 1808 he was appointed professor of mineralogy at Cambridge, in which city and its neighbourhood he passed the rest of his life. He published very interesting accounts of his travels, and after his death the University of Cambridge purchased his fine collection of Greek and Oriental MSS.

Born at Willingden, Sussex, 1769; died in London, 1822.

CLARKE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 1,270 square miles. Pop. 17,806. The capital is Clarkesville.

CLARKE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. 11,702.

CLARK, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 28,610. Charleston is the capital.

CLARKE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 11,513.

CLARK, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 516 square miles. Pop. 15,031. Alexandria is the capital.

CLARKE, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 208 square miles. Pop. 7,682. The capital is Berrysville.

CLARK'S RIVER rises in the Rocky Mountains, United States, and after a course of 500 miles joins the Columbia, in lat. 48° 40′ N.; lon. 117° 30′ W.

CLARKSON, THOMAS, klark'-son, an English philanthropist, one of the first advocates of the emancipation of the negroes, was educated at Cambridge University with a view to the Church, but relinquished his chances of preferment, to advocate the abolition of negro slavery. He laboured, in conjunction with Mr. Wilberforce and other benefactors of mankind, in the cause he had espoused, and lived to see a law for the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves passed on the 25th March, 1807. It took the labour of another twenty years, however, to effect the abolition of slavery in the islands of the West Indies; but it was accomplished in 1833, when the Emancipation Act liberated, for a compensation of twenty millions to the owners, nearly a million of slaves. He took an active part in many benevolent schemes, especially for the benefit of sailors.

Born at Wisbeach, 1760; died at Playford Hall, Sussex, 1846.

CLARY, klair'-e, a small town of France, department du Nord, 9 miles S.E. of Cambray. It was once a place of importance, defended by a strong castle. Manf. Lace, tulle, thread, gauze, pottery, and leather. Pop. 2,300.

CLATSOP, klat'-sop, a county of Oregon, United States. Pop. 7,222.

CLAUDE, ST., klode, a town of France, in the department of the Jura, at the confluence of the Bienne and Tacon, 25 miles S. of Lons-le-Saunier. There is a fine cathedral. The town was almost destroyed by fire in 1799. Manf. Cotton, paper, leather, pottery, toys, jewellery, watches, hardware, buttons, and articles of ivory, horn, and wood. Pop. 6,000.

CLAUDE LORRAINE, klawd, a famous painter, so called from the place of his birth. His real name was Claude Gelée, and the poverty of his parents early compelled them to find some employment for their child; and accordingly he was made a pastrycook. Receiving some instructions in drawing, however, he went to Rome, and was employed by the painter Tassi, who grounded him in the principles of his art. Determined to take nature for his master, he passed whole days in the fields, watching their various aspects under the mutations of the skies, and became one of the greatest of landscape painters. He painted in fresco as well as in oil. His works are numerous, and to be found in most of the principal galleries of Europe.

Born in Lorraine, 1600; died at Rome, 1682.

CLAUDIANUS, or CLAUDIUS, klaw'-di-ai'-nus, a Latin poet, of Egyptian birth, who, at an early age, settled in Italy, and attached himself to Stilicho, the minister of the emperor Honorius, but was in 408 disgraced, together with his patron. He enjoyed, amongst his contemporaries, so distinguished a reputation, that they proclaimed him equal to Homer and Virgil; but modern critics entertain a less exalted idea of his merits.

Born at Alexandria, about 365; died at the beginning of the 5th century.

CLAUDIUS, a name common to many Roman emperors, consuls, generals, censors, &c.; of whom the most worthy of remark are the following:—

CLAUDIUS I., TIBERIUS DRUSUS NERO, surnamed Germanicus and Britannicus, the fourth emperor of Rome, stepson of Augustus. He was, in childhood, sickly, and brought up in privacy. But he studied art, and wrote several works now lost. He was elected emperor by the soldiers after the murder of Caligula. He made himself popular at first by adorning and beautifying the city with buildings. He passed over into Britain, and received a triumph for victories which were gained by his generals, whilst he was more devoted to studies. He married four wives, one of whom, named Messalina, who for some time exercised a great and disastrous influence over him, he put to death on account of her lust and debauchery. He was, at last, poisoned by another, called Agrippina, who had made him name her son, Nero, as his successor.

Born at Lyon, 10 B.C.; died at Rome, 54 A.D.

CLAUDIUS II., surnamed the Goth, was a Dalmatian, and succeeded Gallienus, in 268. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed no less than 300,000 in a battle. This prince has been called the second Trajan, as much on account of his valour in battle, as his justice in administration.

Died in Pannonia, 270.

CLAUDIUS, APPIUS, a Roman Decemvir, became enamoured of Virginia, the daughter of Virginius, an officer in the army employed against the Æqui. Endeavouring by every base means in his power to prevail over her virtue, but being constantly baffled, he had recourse to the extraordinary expedient of suborning a man named Claudius to demand her, under the pretence that she was the child of his slave, and brought up as her own by the wife of Virginius. This claim was brought before the tribunal of the Decemvir, who decreed, that till all the witnesses should appear, Virginia should be delivered to the claimant. The people opposed this decree, when Virginius was privily sent for, and appeared before the tribunal. Being unable, however, to get the sentence revoked, he snatched up a butcher's knife, and stabbed his daughter to the heart. An insurrection ensued. The army having joined Virginius, the senate was unable to resist them. Accordingly the decemvirate was dissolved, and Appius committed to prison, where he died. Upon these events, James Sheridan Knowles founded his celebrated tragedy of "Virginius," and Macaulay one of his most vigorous "Lays of Ancient Rome." Other dramatists and poets have adopted the sad story.

Died 449 B.C.

CLAUDIUS, MATTHIAS, a German poet, author of many popular songs and other poetical productions, marked by humour, satirical power, and scorn of folly and vice. He filled several public offices, but in his late years became a convert to religious mysteries, and lived a retired life.

Born in Holstein, 1741; died at Hamburg, 1815.

CLAUSEL, BERTRAND, Count, klo'-sel, entered the French army at an early age, and as aide-de-camp to General Pérignon, served in the army of the Pyrenees in 1794-95. With General Leclerc he went to St. Domingo, and there commanded a division in endeavouring to suppress an insurrection of the Blacks. He next served in Spain, and was severely wounded at the battle of Salamanca, after which he succeeded General Marmont in the chief command. In 1813 he was almost daily engaged with the English during the retreat of the French, before Wellington, into France. On the return of Napoleon I. from Elba, he rejoined his standard, was made a peer, and commander of the army of the Pyrenees; but on his fall, he was compelled to leave his country and retire to America. He subsequently returned, and in 1830 was appointed commander-in-chief in Africa, and, in the following year, was created a marshal. In 1832 he was made governor of Algeria, but, being baffled in his attempt on Constantine, in 1836 he returned to Paris with a broken spirit, from which he never revived.

Born at Mirepoix, 1772; died at Seccourien, 1842.

CLAUSENBURG, KLAUSENBURG, or KOLOSVAR, klo'-sen-boorg, one of the free royal capital cities of Transylvania, and of a county of the same name, on the Little Szamos, 70 miles from Hermanstadt. It contains a handsome public square, and several elegant streets, churches, and private houses. The gardens and public walks are also elegant. It is divided into Old and New, and is inclosed by a wall and ditch. It is the seat of the Transylvanian diets, of the Unitarian superintendence of Transylvania, and of a Protestant consistory. Manf. China-ware, woollens, and paper. Pop. 29,923.—This was the birth-place of Mathias Corvinus, king of Hungary.

CLAUSTHAL, or KLAUSTHAL, klo'-stal, a town of Hanover, in the Upper Hartz, close by Zellerfeld. The public buildings are, a mine-office, two churches, a public school, an orphan-house, a museum, and a mint. It is the principal mining town in the Hartz, and near it are the richest lead and silver mines in that country. Pop. about 10,000.

CLAVIGERO, FRANCESCO SAVERIO, klave-ha'ro, Mexican historian, who was for 36 years a Jesuit missionary among the Mexican Indians. On the suppression of the Jesuits in South America, in 1767, he went to Italy, where he passed the remainder of his life. He was versed in the languages, traditions, and antiquities of the tribes among whom he had lived, and wrote in Italian a "History of Mexico."

Born at Vera Cruz, 1720; died 1793.

CLAVIJO Y FLAJARDO, JOSEPH, kla've-cho e flai-yar-do, a Spanish writer, who was named keeper of the royal records, and translated from the French the Natural History of Buffon, a work highly esteemed. This procured for him the vice-directorship of the Cabinet of Natural History of Madrid, which post he retained till his death. Behaving very unworthily to a sister of Beaumarchais, a French writer, the latter fought a duel with Clavijo, and made the Spaniard sign a declaration that he had been guilty of a misdeed, and Clavijo was, in consequence, disgraced by the king for a term. This episode has been dramatized by Göthe and others.

Born in the Canary Isles, 1730; died at Madrid, 1806.

CLAY, a county of Alabama, United States. Pop. 12,938.

CLAY, a county of Florida, United States. Pop. 2,835.

CLAY, a county of West Virginia, United States. Pop. 3,460.

CLAY, HENRY, an American statesman, the son of a Baptist preacher. He was called to the bar at an early age, and distinguished himself as an advocate. In 1803 he was elected member of the Kentucky legislature, in 1806 a member of Congress, in 1809 a senator, and in 1811 speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1814 he was one of the commission sent to Ghent to negotiate peace with Great Britain, and in 1825 was appointed, by President Adams, foreign secretary. In 1828 he contested the presidency with General Jackson, but was defeated, and again in 1832, 1836, and 1844 he was a candidate, but did not meet with success. Retiring, for a time, from public affairs, he returned to take his seat in the senate, and there enjoyed, until a short time before his death, a very great influence. Henry Clay was the head of the Whigs. Of a conciliatory disposition, he on two occasions, in 1820 and in 1850, succeeded in effecting a compromise (known as the "Missouri Compromise") between the slave states and the abolitionists, and his death was felt as a public loss.

Born in Virginia, 1777; died 1852.

CLAYTON, klai'-ton, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 758 square miles. Pop. 28,829. Garnaville is the capital.

CLAYTON, a township in New York, on the St. Lawrence, 12 miles from Waterton. Pop. 4,300.

CLEANTHES, kle-an'-thes, a Grecian Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Zeno. While pursuing his studies, he maintained himself by his manual labour—succeeded his master in the school, and had for pupils kings Antigonus and Chrysippus. His "Hymn to Zeus" is considered to be one of the finest specimens of Greek poetry. He starved himself to death at the age of 80.

Born 300 B.C.; died 220 B.C.

CLEARCHUS, kle-ar'-kus, a Lacedæmonian general, who was condemned to death for having abused his authority at Byzantium, where he had been sent as an ally. Retiring into Persia, he offered his services to the younger Cyrus, and raised a body of Greek mercenaries, with whom he acted against Artaxerxes, the brother of Cyrus, and king of Persia. After the battle of Cunaxa, where Cyrus fell, and whilst he was leading the retreat of the 10,000 immortalized by his successor Zenophon, Tissaphernes, the Persian general, inveigled him into an interview, and slew him.

Died 401 B.C.

CLEARFIELD, kleer'-feeld, a county in the central part of Pennsylvania, U.S., on a creek which runs into the W. branch of the Susquehannah. Area, 1,425 square miles. Pop. 43,408. The capital is Clearfield.

CLEAVELAND, kleve-land, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 16,571. The capital is Shelby.

CLECKHEATON, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles W. of Leeds. Manf. Woollen cloth and worsted, machinery for the wool manufacture. There are iron foundries. Pop. 10,653. A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

CLEEF, JOSEPH VAN, kleef, a Dutch painter, remarkable for the beauty of his colouring; which rivalled that of the most eminent Italian masters. His preposterous vanity and strange demeanour obtained for him the surname of "The Fool."

Born at Antwerp, 1480; died 1529.

CLEEF, JOHN, an eminent painter of the Flemish school, many of whose works are in the churches of Ghent. His works are remarkable for beauty of design and colouring, and he was eminently successful in painting beautiful females and children.

Born at Rome, 1646; died 1716.

CLÉMENCE, ISAURE, klaï-mawnce, a wealthy and illustrious lady of Toulouse, who was descended, it is supposed, from the counts of that city. Towards the year 1490, she instituted (in memory of a dead lover, with whom she used to communicate by means of flowers) at Toulouse the "Jeux Floraux" (Floral Fêtes), and left considerable revenues for the support of these gatherings. These fêtes were established to encourage the art of poesy, and at them were distributed prizes for the best effusions. These prizes consisted of different flowers in gold or silver. Something of the same kind had been commenced in 1322, and in 1695 an academy was founded from the funds.

Born about 1450; died 1500 or 1513.

CLEMENS, or CLEMENT, TITUS FLAVIUS, klem'-ens, a father of the Christian church, sometimes named Clemens Alexandrinus. While young he studied philosophy and travelled much, and afterwards joined the Alexandrine church. His works were of a philosophical and liberal character, indeed exposed him, in some quarters, to the charge of holding heretical opinions. One of his hymns is preserved. Origen was one of his pupils.

Died about 213.

CLEMENT, the name assumed by 14 bishops and popes of Rome.

CLEMENT I., or St. Clemens Romanus, to whom is ascribed the authorship of two epistles to the Corinthians.

Died 102.

CLEMENT II., Suger, bishop of Bamberg, elected 1046.

Died 1047.

CLEMENT III. (Paulino Scolaro), succeeded Gregory VIII. in 1187; proclaimed the third crusade, 1189.

Died 1191.

CLEMENT IV. (Guy Foulquois), was elected in 1265. He signed, with St. Louis of France, the "Pragmatic Sanction," which put an end to the differences existing between Rome and France.

Died at Viterbo, 1268.

CLEMENT V. (Bertrand de Goth) was elected in 1305, and removed the residence of the popes from Rome to Avignon. He was the tool of Philip the Fair of France, and, at his desire, suppressed the order of Knights Templars, in 1312.

Born 1264; died 1314.

CLEMENT VI. (Pierre de Roger) was elected in 1342. In his pontificate, Rienzi attempted to establish the republic at Rome. This pope was a learned man, and had a prodigious memory.

Born 1292; died 1352.

CLEMENT VII. (Giuliano de Medici), cousin of Leo X., succeeded Adrian VI. in 1523. He entered into the "holy league" with Francis I. of France, the Italian princes, and Henry VIII. of England, against the emperor Charles V. In the war which ensued, Rome was taken and plundered, and the pope himself was shut up in the castle of St. Angelo. He had, consequently, to make terms with Charles. Subsequently, Henry VIII. having repudiated Catherine of Aragon and married Anne Boleyn, Clement excommunicated him in 1534. This occasioned a schism, and ultimately resulted in the separation of England from the Romish church.

Died 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. (Ippolito Aldobrandini) was elected in 1592. He absolved Henry IV. of France, upon that monarch making public profession of Catholicism, and was chiefly instrumental in bringing about the peace of Vervins in 1598. He elevated to the rank of cardinal, Baronius, Bellarmin, and other distinguished men, and was a learned and sagacious pontiff. The most accurate edition of the Vulgate was published under his superintendence.

Born 1536; died 1605.

CLEMENT IX. (Giulio Rospigliosi) was elected in 1667. During his pontificate, Candia was taken from the Venetians by the Turks.

Born 1600; died 1670.

CLEMENT X. (Emilio Altieri) was the successor of the above in 1670. Being 80 years of age, the government was left in the hands of Cardinal Paluzzi, a distant relative.

Born 1590; died 1676.

CLEMENT XI. (Giovanni Francesco Albini) was elected in 1700. His pontificate was disturbed by the quarrels of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, and on issuing the famous bull "Unigenitus," which condemned Jansenism, a schism was produced, which lasted many years, between France and Rome.

Born 1649; died 1721.

CLEMENT XII. (Lorenzo Corsini) succeeded Benedict XIII. in 1730, and reformed many abuses of the church.

Born 1652; died 1740.

CLEMENT XIII. (Carlo Rezzonico) was elected in 1758. The Jesuits having been expelled from France, Spain, Portugal, and Naples, he made great but useless efforts to reinstate them. In 1768 he lost Avignon and Benevento. There is a splendid mausoleum to him in St. Peter's, executed by Canova, who was eight years employed on it.

Born 1693; died 1796.

CLEMENT XIV. (Giovanni Vincenzo, otherwise Fra Lorenzo, Ganganelli) was the successor of the above. Of a conciliating disposition, he, notwithstanding many difficulties he experienced on first assuming the pontificate, lived on good terms with all the European courts, and recovered Avignon and Benevento, which had been lost under the preceding pontiff. Pressed to decide the question of the abolition of the order of the Jesuits, he, in 1773, after temporizing for several years, issued the bull ordaining their suppression; but lived afterwards in constant terror, which caused his death. He possessed learning and literary tastes, and founded the Clementine Museum in the Vatican.

Born near Rimini, 1705; died 1774.

CLEMENT, FRANCIS, a learned French Benedictine monk, who continued the "Literary History of France," commenced by Rivet. He composed the 11th and 12th volumes of that compilation, and also published the 12th and 13th volumes of the collection of French historians begun by Boquet. His greatest achievement, however, was the extension and improvement of the work entitled "L'Art de vérifier les Dates après J.C.," which had been originated by Dantine, and re-written and published by Clémencet. After thirteen years' labour, he raised it to three large vols. folio, which appeared from 1783 to 1792. He was meditating the production of a similar work on ancient chronology, with the title of "L'Art de vérifier les Dates avant J.C.," when he died, in 1793. Clement was a laborious writer, and was the author of several other works besides those mentioned above.

Born at Bèze, in Burgundy, 1714; died 1793.

CLEMENT, JACQUES, a Dominican monk, who was induced to become the assassin of Henry III. He was killed on the spot, and afterwards his body was torn asunder by horses. The people, instigated by the priests, regarded him as a martyr, and Pope Sixtus V. pronounced an elaborate panegyric on him before a conclave of cardinals.

Born at Serbonnes, 1567; died 1589.

CLEMENTE, SAN, a town of Spain, province of Cuença, and 42 miles S.W. of the town of that name. It is surrounded by walls, is well built, with open squares, and has a handsome church, partly ancient and partly modern. A large annual fair is held. Pop. 2,200.

CLEMENTI, MUZIO, kle-men'-te, an eminent Italian musical composer, and considered the father of pianoforte music. At an early age he evinced a decided predilection for his art, and even in his ninth year passed his examination as an organist. In his thirteenth, he wrote a mass for four voices, and attracted the notice of Mr. Peter Beckford, an English gentleman, travelling in Italy, who became his patron, and took him to his seat in Dorsetshire, in England. Here he devoted himself to other studies, and became accomplished in several languages, as well as in various branches of science, without neglecting the cultivation of his talents in the more particular art in which he seemed, by nature, designed to excel. In his 18th year he composed his famous "Op. 2," which is considered the basis on which the whole fabric of modern pianoforte sonatas is founded. His fame now extended to the continent, and he rose to the highest rank in his profession. In 1800 he engaged in the music trade, still continuing, however, to devote himself to his art throughout the remainder of his days. He was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

Born at Rome, 1752; died in London, 1832.

CLEOBIS and BITON, kle'-o-bis, bi'-ton, in Greek legend, two youths, sons of Cydippe, the priestess of Juno, at Argos. When oxen could not be procured to draw their mother's chariot to the temple of Juno, they put themselves under the yoke, and drew it, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, who congratulated the mother on the piety of her sons. Cydippe entreated the goddess to reward them with the best gift that could be granted to mortals. When Cydippe came forth from the temple, she found her sons "asleep for ever" in each other's arms.

CLEOBULUS, kle-o-bu'-lus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was the son of Evagoras, of Lindos, and was famous for his fine form. His maxims were, "Do good unto your friends, that you may attach them to you the more; do good unto your enemies, that you may make friends of them."

Died 560 B.C.

CLEOMBROTUS, kle-om'-bro-tus, king of Sparta, gave battle, at Leuctra, to the Thebans, headed by Epaminondas, and was there killed. This battle, where the Spartan army was almost entirely destroyed, put an end to the pre-eminence of Sparta in Greece.

Died 371.

CLEOMEDES, kle-o-me'-des, a Greek astronomer, of whose personal history nothing whatever is known. He wrote a treatise which showed he had a clear conception of the spherical shape of the earth, and of the revolutions of the moon.

CLEOMENES III., kle-om'-e-nes, king of Sparta, succeeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprising spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lycurgus in its full force, by banishing luxury and intemperance. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, 222 B.C., retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Euergetes, where his wife and children had gone before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes killed himself, and his body was flayed and exposed on a cross, 219 B.C.—There were others of this name, but of inferior note.

CLEON, kle'-on, an Athenian, who, though originally a tanner, became, by his intrigues and eloquence, a very influential person. In 427 B.C. he induced the Athenians to consent to the massacre of 2,000 Mytilenæan prisoners; and with Demosthenes shared the command of an expedition against the Lacedæmonians, for which he claimed a great amount of glory, although the general opinion is that the credit of the success is due to Demosthenes. He was then appointed general of the armies of the state. He took Thoron, in Thrace, and was killed at Amphipolis, in a battle with Brasidas, the Spartan general. Aristophanes and Thucydides represent him as a vain, boastful coward, but perhaps party feeling influenced their portraiture.

Died 422 B.C.

CLEOPATRA, kle-o-pa'-tra, queen of Egypt, famous for her great beauty, crimes, and misfortunes, was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who died 51 B.C., leaving his eldest son, Ptolemy Dionysius, and his daughter, Cleopatra (who, according to the incestuous custom of the time, were married), to reign conjointly over the kingdom. They, however, disagreed, and Cleopatra was compelled to seek for safety in Syria. Here she met Cæsar, whilst engaged in the pursuit of Pompey, after the battle of Pharsalia, and, by her fascinating manners, completely won him over to her cause. Accordingly, he determined that she should be reseated on the Egyptian throne, which led to an attack upon his own quarters by the king's troops. This resulted in the overthrow of her brother's forces, and himself being drowned in the Nile. Cleopatra then ascended the throne in conjunction with her younger brother Ptolemy, a mere boy, whom she also married, and whom she subsequently poisoned. On the return of Cæsar to Rome, she followed him, and lived there till his assassination, 44 B.C. After this event she returned to Egypt, and about 40 B.C., after the battle of Philippi, was summoned by Antony, to answer the charge alleged against her, of having assisted Brutus. When she made her appearance before him, however, he could not resist her charms, and was induced to marry her, repudiating his former consort, Octavia, the sister of Augustus. War now ensued between Augustus and Antony, and, at the battle of Actium, Cleopatra fled, and her paramour was defeated. The fallen queen, to escape the humiliation of gracing the triumph of Augustus, applied an asp to her breast, and died of the wound. She was buried by the side of Antony, and her children by him were adopted by Octavia, Antony's wife. She was a woman of genius, versed in several languages, but ambitious and voluptuous, although in her greatest extravagances there was a splendour and grandeur which seemed almost to refine them. With her ended the dynasty of the Greek monarchs in Egypt, which began with Ptolemæus, the son of Lagus, 323 B.C. (See ANTONY and CÆSAR.)

Born 69 B.C.; died 30 B.C.

CLEOSTRATUS, kle-os'-tratus, an ancient philosopher and astronomer of Tenedos. He is said to have introduced the constellations of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calendar.

Lived between 548 and 432 B.C.

CLERC, JEAN LE, klair, scholar and theologian. He was the son of a clergyman of Geneva, and in 1680 took orders. Having adopted what were considered heterodox opinions, he, in the following year, came to London, where for several months he preached to the Savoy congregation, and was afterwards professor of philosophy, classical literature, and Hebrew at Amsterdam. He was the author of several valuable bibliographical works, and of many theological treatises, which show his tendency to Socinianism, and he published editions of several classical authors.

Born at Geneva, 1657; died 1736.

CLERK, JOHN, klerk, the sixth son of Sir John Clerk, of Penicuick, although not a sailor, was the inventor of an improved system of naval tactics, in reference to what is called "breaking the line." This idea was first acted upon by Sir George (afterwards Lord) Rodney, on the 12th April, 1782, when the French, under De Grasse, were defeated in the W. Indies. His plan was subsequently acted upon by both Howe and Nelson, and uniformly met with success. He published an account of his system in "An Essay on Naval Tactics, &c.," but his claim to the originality of the idea has been disputed by General Sir Howard Douglas, whose father was captain of Rodney's fleet at the time of the action, and who claims the merit for Lord Rodney.

Born in Scotland; died 1812.

CLERMONT, a county in the S.W. of Ohio, U.S., on Ohio river. Fertile in the usual cerealia. Area, 484 square miles. Pop. 36,713. Capital, Batavia.

CLERMONT-FERRAND, klair'-mawnt, a town of France, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme, situate between the rivers Bedal and Allier, at the foot of a range of extinct volcanoes, and about five miles from the peak of Puy-de-Dôme. It has rather a gloomy appearance, and may be said to consist of two towns, Clermont and Montferrand, united by an avenue of trees about a mile long. The cathedral, which stands in the centre of the town, is one of the finest in France, though it is in an imperfect state. The college is a beautiful edifice, and there are a corn and linen-hall, a cabinet of natural history, a botanic garden, a neat theatre, and several hospitals. There are four public squares, the largest of which serves as a market-place. In one of them is an elegant obelisk, erected by the town to the memory of General Dessaix, who was born in the neighbourhood; and there is a statue of Pascal, also a native of the town. In one of the suburbs is the mineral fountain of St. Alyre, which for 700 years has deposited its incrustations upon one spot, until they have formed a singular natural bridge 21 feet long, over a rivulet. There are many other mineral springs in the neighbourhood. Manf. Paper, hats, leather, pottery, linen, serge, ratteens, druggets, and other woollen stuffs. Pop. 32,256.—Here, in 1095, Peter the Hermit, assisted by Pope Urban V., proclaimed the first crusade.

CLERMONT-DE-LODÈVE, a French town, department of Hérault, on the slope of a hill, crowned by the ruins of an old castle, 23 miles N.W. of Montpellier. Manf. Woollen cloth, cotton, silk, handkerchiefs, hosiery, cutlery, pottery, chemicals, leather, brandy, and vinegar. Pop. 5,500.

CLERMONT-TONNERE, or MINERVA ISLAND, an island of the Pacific Ocean, presenting a slight elevation above the sea. It is 10 miles long, by about 2 broad, and is one of the beautiful ring or lagoon islands, so common in the Pacific and Indian Oceans. The inhabitants are a fine athletic race. Lat. 18° 33′ S. Lon. 136° 20′ W. The French claim its discovery by Admiral Duperry in 1825.

CLEVELAND, a subdivision of the North Riding of the county of York. (See YORKSHIRE, NORTH RIDING.)

CLEVELAND, a city in Ohio, United States, and second only to Cincinnati in commercial importance. It stands on the south shore of Lake Erie, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga, and has a large and secure harbour. There are 35 churches, a marine hospital, colleges, and other educational institutions. The city is supplied with water from Lake Erie, by means of works constructed at a great cost. Manf. Coal oil, nails, and rolled iron. Copper-smelting is a great industry, and ship-building is extensively carried on. There is communication by water with Lake Superior and the Atlantic Ocean, and by means of a canal with the Ohio, and so with the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico; and railway communication with most of the great commercial centres. Pop. 160,146, and more than doubling every ten years. The city was founded in 1796.

CLEVELAND, or CLEIVELAND, JOHN, an English poet, joined the army of the cavaliers, and was the first poet who sung in favour of the royal cause. In 1655, being taken prisoner, he was released by Cromwell, to whom he sent a moving petition. He achieved great popularity, but his poems are now little admired or read.

Born at Loughborough, 1613; died in London, 1659.

CLEVES, klaives, a town of Rhenish Prussia, about 2½ miles from the Rhine, and 12 miles from Nimeguen. It is neatly built in the Dutch style, and surrounded by walls, but not strongly fortified. There is an old castle in which Ann of Cleves, one of the wives of Henry VIII., was born. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, silk, hosiery, and tobacco. Pop. about 9,000.—Cleves was formerly the capital of the ancient duchy of Cleves, which formed a portion of the German empire.

CLEW BAY, kloo, an inlet of the Atlantic, in the county of Mayo, Connaught, Ireland, 15 miles deep and 8 wide. Opposite its entrance is CLARE ISLAND, and at its upper end an archipelago of about 300 small fertile and cultivated islands.

CLIFTON, klif'-ton, formerly a village of Gloucestershire, 1 mile from Bristol, now a suburb of that city. Pop. 28,702.

CLINTON, HENRY, K.C.B., an English general, who, in 1778, was appointed to the command of the army in N. America, but in 1781 was so unsuccessful that his conduct was severely censured, and he returned to England in the following year. Soon after, he published a narrative of his conduct, which was replied to by Earl Cornwallis, and again vindicated by Sir Henry. In 1784 he published a farther defence of himself. He then filled the appointment of governor of Limerick, and was just made governor of Gibraltar when he died.

Died 1795.

CLINTON, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 18,714. The capital is Carlyle.

CLINTON, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 23,472. Frankfort is the county town.

CLINTON, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 696 square miles. Pop. 36,763. De Witt is the capital.

CLINTON, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 7,212. Albany is the capital.

CLINTON, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 28,100. The capital is De Witt.

CLINTON, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 16,073. Plattsburg is the capital.

CLINTON, a county of New York, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 50,897. Capital, Plattsburg.

CLINTON, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 467 square miles. Pop. 24,756. Wilmington is the capital.

CLINTON, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 26,278. The capital is Loch Haven.

CLIO, kli'-o, in Greek mythology, one of the nine muses, who presides over history and epic poetry. She is represented crowned with laurels, holding in her right hand a trumpet, and in the left a scroll.

CLISTHENES, klis'-the-nees, an Athenian, of the family of Alcmæon. It is said that he invented the ostracism, and that he was the first who was banished by that institution.

CLITHEROE, klith'-e-ro, a town and parliamentary borough of Lancashire, on the Ribble, 28 miles N. of Manchester. It is built at the base of Pendle Hill, which rises 1,800 feet above the level of the sea. Its public buildings are two churches and other places of worship, a grammar-school, founded in 1554 by Queen Mary, a mechanics' institute, and a gaol. There are the ruins of a castle founded by the Lacys in the time of William Rufus. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 10,127. A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

CLITUS, kli'-tus, a friend and foster-brother of Alexander the Great. He had saved the king's life in a battle, yet Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, when he was intoxicated, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. Alexander was afterwards inconsolable for the loss of a friend whom he had so wantonly sacrificed in the hour of drunkenness.

Born 380 B.C.; died 328 B.C.

CLIVE, OR PLASSEY, ROBERT, Lord, kliv, was educated at several schools, but with so little success, that his father, despairing of his becoming eminent in any profession, obtained him a place as a writer in the Honourable East-India Company's service. Disgusted with this occupation, however, he quitted the desk in 1747, and entered the army, in which he so highly distinguished himself at the taking of a fort belonging to the rajah of Tanjore, that he obtained the post of commissary-general. Soon afterwards, the French, under Dupleix, began to discover their ambitious designs on India, which roused the jealousy of the English, when war was entered upon, and when the genius of Clive had many opportunities of displaying itself. The French and their allies, however, gained numerous advantages. In 1751, Trichinopoly, the seat of Ali Khan, the ally of the English, was besieged by the French; on which Clive's superior genius suggested the advantage of attacking the city of Arcot, and the attempt succeeded beyond expectation. This circumstance drew off the enemy from Trichinopoly to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that the siege was raised. This success was followed by a series of victories, and the overthrow of the enemy. In 1753 Clive embarked for England, to rest awhile and recruit his health, when he was presented, by the Court of Directors, with a sword set with diamonds. In 1755 he returned to India as governor of Fort St. David, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and, shortly after, he assisted Admiral Watson in reducing Angria, the pirate, taking Gheriah, his capital, and all his treasures. In the mean time, Surajah-u-Dowlah, the nabob, had made a successful attack on the British, captured a number of prisoners, and immured upwards of a hundred of them in the "Black Hole" of Calcutta. This brought Clive at once to that place, which he took, completely defeating the army of Surajah, whom, after the victory of Plassey, in 1757, he compelled to sue for peace. Clive now entered Moorshedabad, and placed Meer Jaffier, one of the nabob's officers, on the throne. The Mogul conferred on him the title of omrah of the empire, with a grant of lands, said to produce £27,000 a year. In 1759 he destroyed a large Dutch armament, sent against him, in Bengal; and in the following year returned to England, and was created an Irish peer. In 1764 he went, as president, to Bengal, where he soon restored tranquillity, and returned home in 1767. In 1769 he was made knight of the Bath. In 1773 a motion was made in the House of Commons to resolve that, "in the acquisition of his wealth, Lord Clive had abused the powers with which he had been intrusted." He defended himself with spirit and modesty; and the motion was not only rejected, but the House resolved, that "Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." This ungrateful treatment, however, greatly depressed him, an effect perhaps increased by indulgence in the habit of opium-eating, and in a fit of gloom he put an end to his existence. Lord Chatham called him "a heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time." He represented Shrewsbury in parliament from 1760 to his death. He left £70,000 to the invalids in the Company's service. His lordship married a sister of Dr. Maskelyne, astronomer-royal, by whom he had five children.

Born near Market Drayton, Shropshire, 1725; died in London, 1774.

CLIVE, CATHARINE, better known as Kitty Clive, a famous comic actress, the daughter of an Irish gentleman named Raftor, who lost his estate by his adherence to the cause of James II. He was exiled for some time, but returned to England, obtained a pardon, and married the daughter of a tradesman on Fish-street Hill. At the age of 17 young Kitty obtained an introduction to Colley Cibber, and appeared in a small part at Drury Lane Theatre. Her rise in the profession was rapid. In 1732 she married, but soon separated from her husband, without any scandal, and for forty years was the reigning favourite of the London stage. She enjoyed the friendship of Johnson, Garrick, Horace Walpole, and most of the literary celebrities of the time. In 1769 she took her leave of the stage, and retired to a cottage at Twickenham, where she resided until her death. She was the author of one or two slight dramatic pieces, a vivacious actress, and admirable singer.

Born in London, 1711; died 1785.

CLOACINA, klo-a-si'-na, a goddess at Rome, who was supposed to preside over the cloacæ, or receptacles for the filth of the whole city. Public officers, called curatores cloacarum urbis, were chosen to take care of the cloacæ.

CLOCH, or CLOUGH POINT, klok, a headland of Renfrewshire, Scotland, 4 miles S.W. of Greenock. It has a lighthouse upon it, 70 feet above the water-line.

CLODIUS, PUBLIUS, klo'-de-us, a turbulent Roman citizen, descended from a patrician family of the Claudii. He made himself notorious by his licentiousness, avarice, and ambition. He introduced himself in women's clothes into the house of J. Cæsar, whilst Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, or Bona Dea, at which no man was permitted to be present. Tried for this violation of human and divine laws, he succeeded in corrupting his judges. From a patrician he became a plebeian, in order to be eligible for a tribune; and was an inveterate enemy to Cato and Cicero. By his influence he procured the banishment of the latter, who was, however, soon afterwards recalled. Clodius was killed by the slaves of Milo in a quarrel.

Died 51 B.C.

CLODOALD, or ST. CLOUD, klo'-do-ald, son of Clodomir, and grandson of Clovis, king of France. After the death of his father, and the murder of his two brothers (see CLODOMIR), he became a monk, and found refuge in a monastery near Paris, which took from him the name of St. Cloud.

Died at St. Cloud, 560.

CLODOMIR, klo'-do-meer, son of Clovis, succeeded, on the death of his father in 511, to the kingdom of Orleans. He fought against Sigismund, king of Burgundy, took him prisoner, and put him to death. He himself was afterwards slain in a battle with Gondemar, Sigismund's successor, in 524.—He left three children, of whom two were murdered by their uncles, and the third, Clodoald, saved himself by flight.

CLOGHEER, klog-ere', a town in Tipperary, Ireland, 14 miles S.W. of Clonmel. Pop. 2,884.

CLOGHER, klog'-er, an ancient episcopal city of Ireland, in county Tyrone, on the Launy, a tributary of the Blackwater. It has greatly fallen into decay; but has still a cathedral, bishop's palace, and court-house, and is the head of a poor-law union. The see is now united with that of Armagh. Pop. 1,000.

CLON, klon, a prefix to numerous places in Ireland. It signifies a fertile strip of land, entirely inclosed by water on the one side and a bog on the other.

CLONAKILTY, klon'-a-kil'-te, a town on Ireland, in the county of Cork, situate in a bay of the Atlantic, called Clonakilty Bay, 26 miles S.W. of Cork. Its public buildings are a church, court-house, barracks, bridewell, and a linen-hall. It has a good market for yarn, and an export trade in grain is carried on. The harbour is only adapted for small vessels. Pop. 3,000.

CLONES, klones, a market-town in the county of Monaghan, Ireland, 12 miles W. of Monaghan. There are the remains of a monastery built in the 5th century, and of a round tower. Manf. Linen. There are corn-mills and a brewery. Pop. 2,150.

CLONMEL, klon-mel', a town and parliamentary borough of Ireland, in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary, pleasantly situate on both banks of, and an island in, the river Suir, 14 miles S.E. of Cashel. The river is crossed by several bridges, and the main street is a mile long. The principal buildings are a picturesque old parish church, Roman Catholic and other chapels, an asylum, court-house, gaol, infirmary, mechanics' institute, and several banks. Manf. Cotton fabrics. There are large flour-mills, and agricultural produce and cattle are exported. Pop. 9,325.

CLONTARF, klon-tarf', a town of Ireland, in the county of Dublin, and about 3 miles N.E. of the capital. It is much frequented for sea-bathing. Pop. 3,442. In the neighbourhood of this village the troops of Brian Boru defeated the united forces of the Irish and the Danes in 1014, he himself, however, being slain.

CLOOTS, JOHN BAPTISTE VON, Baron, kloots, better known by the name of "Anacharsis Cloots," was a Prussian baron, who, at the beginning of the French revolution, distinguished himself by his impiety and extravagances. After performing various feats of madness, calling himself Anacharsis, and the "Orator of the Human Race," he gave a large sum to the Constituent Assembly, of which he was a member, to make war against all kings, and demanded that a price should be put on the king of Prussia. He also denied the authority of all rulers, even that of the Creator, and published a work to that effect. Guillotined under Robespierre.

Born at Cleves, 1755; died 1794.

CLOTAIRE I., klo-tair', king of France, was the son of Clovis and Clotilda. He, at first, was only king of Soissons, in 511, but became, in 558, master of the whole of France, on the death of his brothers.

Born 497; died 561.

CLOTAIRE II. succeeded his father, Chilperic I., in the kingdom of Soissons, at the age of four months. His mother maintained the kingdom for him against the efforts of Childebert, and afterwards becoming possessed of Austrasia, he reigned over the whole of the kingdom.

Born about 575; died 628.

CLOTAIRE III. came to the throne of Burgundy in 656, on the death of his father, Clovis II. Batilda, his mother, governed during his minority with great wisdom.

Born 652; died 670.

CLOTAIRE IV. reigned only in name from 719 to 720, Charles Martel, mayor of the palace, having the real power.

Died 720.

CLOUD, ST., kloo, town of France, in the department of the Seine-et-Oise, and situate on the banks of the Seine, 5 miles W. of Paris. Pop. 2,400.—The town owes its origin to Clodoald, a grandson of Clovis, who, in 551, founded a monastery here, and the historical associations are intimately connected with the royalty of France. Its palace, which is very beautiful, was built by Cardinal Mazarin, and was the property of the dukes of Orleans until 1782, when Marie Antoinette became the owner. It was for a long period the summer residence of the kings of France. Its fountains are extremely elegant, and its park extensive. Here, in 1799, Napoleon I. dismissed the Assembly of Five Hundred, and caused himself to be proclaimed first consul. It was the headquarters of Blucher in 1815, after the battle of Waterloo; and here was concluded the military convention by which Paris was surrendered to the allies. Here, too, in 1830, Charles X. put his signature to the ordinances which cost him his throne. During the siege of Paris in October, 1870, it was destroyed by the French artillery.

CLOVIS I., klo'-vis, chief of the Franks, founder of the French monarchy, succeeded Childeric, his father, in 481. His kingdom then was bounded by the sea and the river Scheldt on the N. and E., on the W. by the dioceses of Thérouanne and Boulogne, and on the S. by Cambray. He was not, however, slow in extending these territories. In 486 he attacked Soissons, and made that place his capital. In 493 he took Paris, and removed his residence to that city. Three years later he turned his arms against the Germans, and defeated them at Tolbiac. After that victory he embraced Christianity, at the solicitation of his wife Clotilda, and was baptized at Rheims. He afterwards defeated the king of Burgundy, and, in 507, gained a great victory over Alaric, king of the Goths, whom he killed with his own hand, thus obtaining Aquitaine. He was now at the height of his power; but he sullied the successes of his reign by putting to death several chiefs, whose ambition he feared. At his death he divided his estates between his four children, Thierry, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotaire.

Born 465; died 511.

CLOVIS II., second son of Dagobert, king of Neustria and Burgundy, whom he succeeded in 638.

Born 633; died 656.

CLOVIS III., the son of Thierry III., king of France, whom he succeeded in 691, at the age of nine, and reigned five years, under the guardianship of Pepin Heristal, mayor of the palace.

Died 695.

CLOYNE, kloin, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, 15 miles S.E. of Cork. Its chief buildings are an ancient parish church, a Roman Catholic chapel, monastery, nunnery, and round tower. In its neighbourhood are some valuable marble-quarries. The town was formerly the seat of a bishopric, united to that of Cork in 1835. Pop. 1,800.

CLUNES, kloons, a town in Victoria, Australia, on Creswick Creek, 120 miles N.W. of Melbourne, in the centre of a quartz mining district. The town lies low, and in the winter is subject to floods. The waterworks are the most perfect in the colony, and there is railway communication with Melbourne. Pop. 4,717.

CLUNY, a town of France, department of Saône-et-Loire, 11 miles N.W. of Macon. It stands on the banks of the Grosne, which is here crossed by two bridges, and was formerly fortified. Portions of the old wall, and of the famous Benedictine abbey, remain. Manf. Druggets, leather, paper, hardware, earthenware, and oil. It has also a considerable trade in corn, cattle, and timber. Pop. 3,500.

CLUSES, kloose, a town of France, department Haute Savoie, 22 miles S.W. of Geneva. Manf. Clocks and watch-movements. Pop. 2,000.

CLUSONE, kloo-so'-nai', a town of Northern Italy, on the left bank of the Serio, 17 miles N.E. of Bergamo. In its neighbourhood are copper-foundries and vitriol-works. Manf. Linen. Pop. 5,500.

CLWYD, kloo'-ud, a river of N. Wales, running through Denbighshire and Flintshire, and falling into Abergele Bay, about 6 miles below St. Asaph. Its valley is one of the most beautiful in Wales.

CLYDE, klide, one of the largest rivers, and by far the most important, commercially, of Scotland, rising in the S. part of Lanarkshire, and formed by the junction of several small streams, about 12 miles below which it becomes a considerable river, and takes the name of the Clyde. About two miles above Lanark the beautiful falls of the Clyde begin—Bonniton fall, 30 feet; Cora Lin, three cascades, together 80 feet; and Stonebyres, also three falls, 80 feet. The river is navigable for vessels of the largest size at Glasgow. At Dumbarton it expands into the Firth of Clyde, the length of the river to that point being about 98 miles. Beyond Greenock, where the Firth is 4 miles wide, it turns south and expands into the open sea, including the islands of Bute, Cumbraes, and Arran. The scenery along the whole course of the river is very beautiful. (See GLASGOW and GREENOCK.)

CLYDE, a river of British North America, falling into Baffin's Bay. Lat. 70° 10′ N. Lon. 69° W.

CLYDE, COLIN CAMPBELL, Lord, was the son of a Glasgow cabinet-maker, named Macliver. His mother's maiden name was Campbell, which Colin afterwards assumed to gratify an uncle. Colin entered the army as ensign in 1808, and served throughout the Peninsular war. He was in the battle of Vimiera, was twice wounded at San Sebastian, and also received a hurt at the passage of the Bidassoa. In 1814-15 he went to America, but does not appear to have been in much active service till 1842, when he commanded the 98th foot regiment in the Chinese war. In 1848 he was sent to Hindostan, where he remained till 1852, being present at Chillianwallah and Goojerat, and received for his services the thanks of the East-India Company and the British parliament, and the order of K.C.B. In 1854 he became brigadier-general, colonel of the 67th regiment, and a major-general, and accompanied the army sent to the aid of Turkey, having the command of the Highland brigade. At the battle of the Alma he greatly distinguished himself; and at Balaclava ranged the 93rd Highlanders into a "thin red line" of single file, which, by the deadly precision of its fire, succeeded in repelling a charge of Russian cavalry. In 1857 he was dispatched to India as military commander-in-chief, to endeavour to stay the torrent of the sepoy rebellion, which was then desolating that part of the British empire. Here his measures were characterized by great prudence and sagacity. He gradually but effectually drove the rebels from their strongholds, and in November of the same year relieved the garrison of Lucknow, with Sir James Outram and Sir H. Havelock at their head. For this, in conjunction with his other brilliant deeds and the whole tenor of his conduct in India, he was raised to the peerage in 1858, with the title of Baron Clyde, and raised to the rank of general, receiving also an annuity of £2,000. A statue, by Foley, was erected in Glasgow in 1868.

Born at Glasgow, 1792; died in London, 1863.

CLYTEMNESTRA, klī'-tem-nes'-tra, according to Homer, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda, and the wife of Agamemnon, king of Argos. (See AGAMEMNON.)

CNIDUS, nī'-dus, one of the six cities of the Doric league. It was situated on the promontory of Triopion, the modern Cape Krio, Caria, Asia Minor. There is a large harbour, protected by two moles. In the town were several temples of Venus, on one of which was the famous statue by Praxiteles. Extensive ruins now mark the site of the city.

CO, COOS, or COS, kos, one of the Cyclades, situate near the coasts of Asia, about 15 miles from Halicarnassus. It gave birth to Hippocrates and Apelles, and was famous for its fertility, and the wine and silk-worms which it produced.

COA, ko'-a, a river of Portugal, which rises in the Sierra de Gata, and, after a course of 80 miles, falls into the Douro 5 miles from Torre de Moncorvo.

COAHOMA, ko-a-ho'-ma, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 13,568. The capital is Delta.

COAHUILA, ko'-a-oo-e-la, a state of the Mexican confederation, inclosed by the departments of Nuevo-Leon, Durango, and Zacatecas, except on the N., where it is separated from Texas by the Rio Bravo del Norte. Area, 50,890 square miles. It is mountainous, intersected by fertile valleys. Cattle-rearing is the principal branch of industry. There are some silver mines. The chief towns are SALTILLO, the capital, Coahuila, and Santa Rosa. Pop. 144,594. Lat. between 24° and 30° N. Lon. between 100° and 103° W.

COANZA, ko-an'-za, a large river of Lower Guinea, in Western Africa. After a rapid course of perhaps about 500 miles, it falls into the Atlantic, in lat. 9° 10′ S., lon. 14° 22′ E.

COATBRIDGE, a town in Scotland, in the county of Lanark, 9 miles E. of Glasgow. Manf. Pig and malleable iron, iron tubes, machinery, railway-carriages, preserves, and confectionery. Pop. 17,500.

COBAN, ko'-ban, a city of the republic of Guatemala, Central America, on the Rio Dulu, 90 miles from Guatemala. Pop. 14,000, nearly all aborigines.

COBB, kob, a county in Georgia, U.S. Area, 520 square miles. Desc. Fertile in corn, wheat, oats, and cotton. Pop. 20,748.

COBBETT, WILLIAM, kob'-bet, one of the boldest and most vigorous English political writers, was the son of a small farmer and publican in Sussex. He was bred to country life, but going to Portsmouth, in 1782, he first beheld the sea, which seems, at once, to have unsettled all his notions of rural existence, for the next day he made application for employment on board a man-of-war. In this, however, he was not successful, and in the following year, being at Guildford fair, he took the sudden determination of proceeding to London, where he was engaged as a copying clerk to an attorney. Becoming disgusted with this employment, he went to Chatham, where he enlisted in the 54th regiment of foot, and, in a short time, was, as a corporal for good conduct, landed on the shores of New Brunswick, N. America. Here he rose to the rank of sergeant-major, and after a service of eight years, returned to England, where, at his own earnest request, he got his discharge, on account of his good behaviour and the services he had rendered the regiment. Shortly afterwards he went to France, to avoid prosecuting a charge which he had preferred against four officers of his regiment for peculation. He then sailed for America, where he arrived in 1792, and settled in Philadelphia. Two years after this, he commenced his political career as a writer, by attacking Dr. Priestley, who had just arrived from England, and whom he fiercely denounced in a pamphlet entitled "Observations on the Emigration of a Martyr to the cause of Liberty, by Peter Porcupine." This pamphlet was rapidly followed up by others in the most violent anti-democratic strain. He now became as bold as he was unsparing in his sarcasm, upon all who offered opposition to his views; and the consequence was several prosecutions for libel, which forced him to leave America, and return to England in 1800. Here he commenced, in London, a daily Tory paper, which did not succeed. He next started his "Weekly Political Register," which commanded a large circulation, and which, we believe, without the intermission of a single week, he continued till the day of his death, a period of thirty-three years. It was commenced as an aid to the Tory party; but it began to change its views in 1803, and finally became thoroughly Radical in its principles. The style of writing was violent, even ferocious. Cobbett was lavish of personalities and abuse, and emphasized articles with abundant capitals and italics. The "Register" bore on its front the symbol of a gridiron, to show the pleasure he took in "roasting" his opponents. In 1804 two verdicts were obtained against him by the government for libel, and, in 1810, another for a paper which he had written against flogging some local militia-men at Ely. On this occasion he was condemned to pay a fine of £1,000 to the king, and to be imprisoned for two years. Having suffered this punishment, he came forth from the house of his confinement as vigorous as ever, and, as might be expected, more hostile against the powers that had incarcerated and amerced him. To annoy the administration, he, at once, began his "Twopenny Trash," a series of political papers, which had a circulation of 100,000 copies. In 1817, to escape impending danger, he once more visited America, yet still continued the "Register" by transmitting his "copy" regularly across the Atlantic. In 1819 he returned, and commenced a daily paper, which lived only two months. He was again cast in two actions for libel, when, in 1820, he first tried to get into parliament. In this, however, he did not succeed till 1832, when he was returned to the first reformed parliament for Oldham, which he continued to represent till his death. Cobbett passed an active life, and wrote excellent Grammars of the English and French languages, and many valuable works on rural and economical subjects, and lectures to young men, besides his continual productions on political and financial topics.

Born at Farnham, Surrey, 1762; died 1835.

COBDEN, RICHARD, kob'-den, English politician, was the son of a small Sussex farmer, who died whilst Richard was a boy. He was, therefore, taken charge of by an uncle who had a wholesale warehouse in London, into which Richard was, in due time, introduced. He afterwards became a partner in a Manchester printed-cotton factory, and occasionally "took the road," as commercial traveller for the house. He subsequently visited Egypt, Greece, and Turkey, and in 1835 went to N. America. The result of his observations in this country, to some extent, appeared in a pamphlet entitled "England, Ireland, and America," by a Manchester Manufacturer. Another pamphlet of his, entitled "Russia," also appeared about this time. In 1837 he contested the borough of Stockport, but was unsuccessful, and then he made a journey through France, Belgium, and Switzerland. In the following year he went through Germany, and, soon after his return, commenced his advocacy of the repeal of the taxes on corn, inducing the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to petition Parliament for the repeal of the corn duties. In 1839 the National Anti-corn-law League was formed, and in 1841 Mr. Cobden was elected member of Parliament for Stockport. He now continued to advocate, with all his energy, the repeal of the corn laws, and, as he was an effective public speaker, he won over a great many to his views. His influence gradually rose in the House of Commons, where, on June 29th, 1846, Sir Robert Peel made his memorable speech, wherein he gave all the credit of the repeal of the corn laws to Mr. Cobden. "The name which ought to be," said Sir Robert, "and which will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of a man, who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has advocated their cause with untiring energy, and by appeals to reason, enforced by an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned,—the name which ought to be and will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of Richard Cobden." After this, Mr. Cobden once more visited the continent, and £70,000 was collected by his grateful countrymen and presented to him. In 1847 he became member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, which he continued to represent until 1857, when his opposition to the Chinese policy of Lord Palmerston cost him his seat. In 1859 he revisited America, and during his absence was chosen member for Rochdale. On his return he was offered the presidency of the Board of Trade, under the Palmerston administration, which he refused to accept, as he had been, for many years, a decided opponent of the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston, which he designated as a warlike one. In 1859 and 1860 he was engaged in arranging a treaty of commerce between this country and France.

Born at Dunford, near Midhurst, 1804; died 1865.

COBIJA, or PUERTO-LA-MAR, ko-bé'-ja, a seaport of Bolivia, South America. The trade is inconsiderable. Pop. about 2,000. Lat. 22° 34′ S. Lon. 70° 21′ W.

COBLENZ, or KOBLENZ, ko-blentz', a fortified town of Prussia, at the conflux of the Rhine and Moselle, opposite the great fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, 36 miles from Mentz. The bridge across the latter river is of freestone, but that over the Rhine is of boats. The new part of the town is well built, the streets being regular, the houses of stone, and the public buildings handsome. The chief of these are the Church of St. Castor, founded in the 9th century, the magnificent palace erected in 1779 for the residence of the elector of Treves; Government establishments, an ancient Jesuits' college, a Catholic seminary, and theatre. The two handsome quays on the Rhine and the Moselle are used as public promenades, while round it are several detached forts. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, furniture, and Japan ware. There is a large trade in corn, wine, iron, mineral waters, and millstones, and the vine is cultivated. Pop. 36,240. exclusive of the garrison.—In 1794 this place was taken by Napoleon I., and made the capital of the department Rhine and Moselle.

COBLENTZ, a district of Rhenish Prussia, bounded on the N. by the government of Cologne, on the W. by Treves and Aix-la-Chapelle, on the S. by Rhenish Bavaria, and on the E. by the duchies of Nassau and Hesse-Darmstadt. Area, 1,754 square miles. Pop. 556,000.

COBURG, ko-burg, a province of the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. Area, 230 square miles. Pop. with Gotha, 198,607. (See SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA.)

COBURG, the capital of the duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, in Germany, on the river Its or Itsch, 26 miles from Bamber. In the old part of the town the streets are narrow and crooked, but the new part is laid out with great taste. It has an old castle (twice besieged in the Thirty Years' War, and famous as the retreat of Luther), government offices, the Ehrenberg Ducal Palace, completed in 1816, containing a collection of paintings; another palace, the property of the Duke of Edinburgh; a fine gymnasium, or high school; the church of St. Moritz, built in the 15th century; an observatory, arsenal, a theatre, and a workhouse. It is the seat of the high courts of the duchy. About five miles from the town is the pretty chateau of Rosenaus, the birthplace of Prince Albert. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen goods, gold, silver articles, and marquetrie. There are bleaching and dye works, stone-quarries, besides an active general trade. Pop. 15,791.

COBURG, a town in Canada, on the N. shore of Lake Ontario. There are about ten churches and a college. The harbour is large and safe, and a considerable trade in flour, wheat, butter, and lumber is carried on. There are saw-mills and tanneries. Pop. 7,000.

COBURG PENINSULA, an irregular strip in Australia, separated from Melville Island by Dundas Strait, and connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus to the west of the Gulf of Carpentaria. On the N.E. side is Port Essington. Ext. 50 miles long by 20 broad. Lat. 11° 22′ S. Lon. 132° 10′ E.

COCCEJI, or COCCEUIS, HEINRICH FREIHERR VON, kok-sé'-je, German jurist. He studied jurisprudence and philosophy at Leyden and in England, and in 1672 became professor of the law of nations at Heidelberg. In 1689 he was chosen for the chair of jurisprudence at Utrecht, and in 1690 appointed to a similar professorship at Frankfort, on the Oder. He was elevated to the dignity of baron in 1713. His legal works are held in the highest estimation as authorities.

Born at Bremen, 1644; died 1719.

COCCEJI, or COCCEUIS, SAMUEL, youngest son of the above, also a jurist of eminence. He was professor at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and rose to be great chancellor of Prussia, which office he held at the time of his death. He reformed the administration of justice, and compiled a code.

Born at Heidelberg, 1679; died 1755.

COCCEJUS, JOHANNES, kok-se-jus, German theologian, professor of Hebrew at Bremen, and afterwards of Hebrew and theology at Frankfort. In 1650 he was appointed professor of theology at Leyden, and retained the chair till his death. He compiled an elaborate dictionary of the Hebrew language, and was the author of some theological works which excited considerable opposition.

Born at Bremen, 1603; died 1669.

COCHABAMBA, ko-cha-bam'-ba, a province of the republic of Bolivia. It is fertile, producing sugar, cotton, dyewoods, timber, and the precious metals. Area, 55,120 square miles. Pop. 352,392. Lat. between 17° and 19° S. Lon. between 65° and 68° W.

COCHABAMBA, the chief town of the above province, stands at the foot of the Andes, 145 miles from Chuquisaca. Manf. Cotton fabrics and glass wares. Pop. 14,705, COCHIN, ko'-chin, a seaport of British India, presidency of Madras, on the west coast of the peninsula of Hindostan. There is a harbour with 25 feet of water, but a bar at the mouth prevents the entrance of ships of large size. Ship-building is carried on. Under the Portuguese, who erected here their first fort in India, the town rapidly grew into importance. In 1663 the Dutch obtained possession, converted the fine Portuguese cathedral into a warehouse, and an immense trade was carried on. The British forces captured the town in 1796, and in 1814 demolished the fortifications. There are a rajah's palace and two Jewish synagogues. Pop. 20,000, of a very mixed character, including Mahometans, Hindoos, Jews, English, Dutch, Arabians, Armenians, and Persians. Lat. 9° 58′ N. Lon. 76° 18′ E.

COCHIN, a remarkable district of Hindostan. It is one of the most humid regions of the world. The country is well wooded, and some parts mountainous, with a considerable elevation above the sea. A number of shallow lakes, called backwaters, intersperse the country, and inclose low alluvial islands. Pro. Rice, arrowroot, yams, coffee, sugar, cotton, pepper, ginger, and fruit. The principal sources of wealth are the forests, which are extensive and valuable, abounding in cocoa-nut trees, cedar, teak, and other hard woods. In later returns the district is no longer recognised by the same name, but is absorbed into other districts.

COCHIN-CHINA, the south-eastern province of Anam. (See ANAM.)

COCHIN-CHINA, LOWER, or FRENCH, the southern extremity of the eastern portion of the Indo-Chinese peninsula, formerly a portion of the kingdom of Anam, but taken possession of by the French in 1861 and 1867. In the former year, the Anamese provinces of Saigon, Bienhoa, and Mytho were annexed, and by a treaty signed in 1867, the three provinces of Vinhlong, Chandor, and Haytien were added, forming together the French colonial possessions of French Cochin-China.

Area.—33,718 square miles.
Pop.—1,682,984.
Zoology.—Tigers, deer, apes, and serpents. Birds are numerous and fish abound.
Pro.—Sugar-cane, tobacco, maize, indigo, tea, cocoa-nut oil, spices, and silk.
Minerals.—Iron, alum, and salt.
Chief Town.—SAIGON, the capital, and Bienhoa.
History.—The French annexation was caused by the persecution and murder of Catholic missionaries.

COCHRAN, ROBERT, kok'-ran, a Scotch architect, who was employed by James III. of Scotland in building several great structures. That monarch created him earl of Mar, and distinguished him by so many marks of his favour, that several of his nobles rose, seized the favourite in the royal presence, and made short work of him. They summarily hanged him on the bridge of Lauder.
Died 1482.

COCHRANE, CAPTAIN JOHN DUNDAS, R.N., kok'-ran, a traveller, who made a journey on foot "through Russia and Siberian Tartary, from the frontiers of China to the Frozen Sea and Kamtschatka." He published, in 1824, a narrative of this extraordinary undertaking, and afterwards went to America, where he died, in Columbia. The original intention of this explorer was to travel round the globe, as nearly as it could be done, by land. When he left London for St. Petersburg, his design was to cross from Northern Asia to America at Behring's Straits, and the whole of the journey was to be accomplished on foot; "for the best of all possible reasons," he says,—"that my finances allowed of no other."
Born 1780; died 1825.

COCHRANE, LORD. (See DUNDONALD, Earl of.)

COCKBURN, HENRY THOMAS, Lord, ko'-burn, was the son of Archibald Cockburn, of Cockpen, one of the barons of the Exchequer of Scotland. He studied at the university of Edinburgh, was called to the bar in 1800, and became in Scotland one of the lords of Session. In 1830 he was made solicitor-general for Scotland, and in 1834 was promoted to the bench. As a member of the Scottish bar he achieved many triumphs, and was an early contributor to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review." He also wrote a life of his friend Lord Jeffrey, which was published in 1852. Two years after his death appeared "Memorials of My Time," and in 1874 "Journal of Henry Cockburn," lively autobiographical reminiscences containing many sketches and amusing anecdotes of contemporaries.
Born at Edinburgh, 1779; died 1854.

COCKBURN, SIR ALEXANDER JAMES EDMUND, lord chief justice, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1825 he was admitted of the Middle Temple, and in 1829 was called to the bar. In 1841 he became queen's counsel, and on account of the great ability with which he defended Lord Palmerston's foreign policy in the Don Pacifico debate, and the assistance which he gave to the Liberal party from time to time, he was appointed solicitor-general, in 1850, by Lord John Russell, and received the honour of knighthood. He then became attorney-general under Lord Aberdeen, and subsequently chief justice of the court of Common Pleas. On the overthrow of the Derby administration, in 1859, he was appointed to the lord chief justiceship of the Queen's Bench by the government of Lord Palmerston. As a judge he holds the highest rank. His summings up in important cases, involving the analysis of a tangled mass of evidence—notably in the great Tichborne case—are models of perspicuity and logical deduction.
Born in London, 1805. Died 1880.

COCKBURN, ADMIRAL THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR GEORGE, G.C.B., entered the navy in 1781, and early began to distinguish himself. After serving on the East-India, home, and Mediterranean stations, in 1795 he shared in the blockade and capture of Leghorn. He subsequently served in the West Indies, where he was the principal means of Martinique being ceded to Britain as a colony. For this he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1812, the duty of reconciling Spain and her transatlantic colonies was committed to him, and in 1813 and 1814 he was actively engaged in the American war. After Waterloo, he was deputed to convey Napoleon to St. Helena, and in 1818 entered Parliament, representing Portsmouth, Weobley, and Plymouth, till 1830. In 1841 he was returned for Ripon, for which he sat till 1846, when he retired from public life. Before his death he inherited the baronetcy of his brother.
Born 1772; died 1853.

COCKBURN ISLAND, in the Pacific Ocean, S. of Cape Horn, of great elevation, but only about a mile in diameter. It is barren and uninhabited, but a great resort of sea-birds. It was discovered by Sir James Ross in 1843. Lat. 64° 12′ S. Lon. 59° 49′ W.

COCKBURN SOUND. (See WESTERN AUSTRALIA.)

COCKE, kok, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 374 square miles. Pop. 14,808.

COCKER, EDWARD, an industrious schoolmaster and penman. He published fourteen copybooks, a small English dictionary, a book for writing, called "Cocker's Morals," and a useful treatise on commercial arithmetic, which had a great success. Almost every similar treatise since his time has been "according to Cocker."

Born 1631; died 1677.

COCKERELL, CHARLES ROBERT, kok'-e-vel, an eminent architect, who made the usual tour of the continent, and in Italy, as well as in Asia Minor, made the grander architectural remains a subject of study. From Ægina and Phygalia, and other places, he brought to England several antiquarian fragments, which have found a place in the British Museum. He early attracted notice in his profession, and has had a great many public buildings intrusted to him. Among these may be named the New Library at Cambridge, the university galleries at Oxford, the college at Lampeter, and several others in the provinces. St. George's Hall, and the assize courts at Liverpool, were also carried out by Mr. Cockerell; and many other buildings of public interest. In 1829 he was chosen an A.R.A., in 1836 R.A., and in 1840 he became professor of architecture in the Royal Academy, an appointment which he resigned in 1856. In 1860 he was elected president of the Institute of British Architects.

Born in London, 1788; died 1863.

COCKERMOUTH, kok'-er-mouth, a market-town and parliamentary borough in Cumberland, at the confluence of the Cocker and Derwent, each crossed by a stone bridge, 24 miles S.W. of Carlisle. The streets, though spacious, are irregular; yet many of the houses are neatly built. The public edifices are a parish church, built in 1850 on the site of an older edifice destroyed by fire, other places of worship, a grammar-school, town-hall, house of correction, court-house, and market-house. There are several excellent schools, and a dispensary for indigent patients. The castle, formerly of great strength, but dismantled by the parliamentary forces in 1648, is beautifully situated at the junction of the two rivers. Manf. Hats, coarse woollen cloths, shalloons, checks, coarse linens, and leather. Wordsworth the poet was born here. Pop. 5,354. Station on the London and North-Western railway.

COCLES, PUBLIUS HORATIUS, ko'-klees, in legendary history, a celebrated Roman, who, alone, in 506 B.C., opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companions were destroying it behind him. When this was effected, Cocles, though wounded by the darts of the enemy, and impeded by his arms and armour, leapt into the Tiber, and swam safely across. This episode forms the subject of one of Macaulay's most spirited "Lays of Ancient Rome."

COCO ISLANDS, GREAT and LITTLE, ko-ko, two islands in the Bay of Bengal. The larger is about 6 miles long and 2 wide, and is nearly covered with cocoa and other trees. Little Coco, nearly 3 miles long and half a mile broad, is about 9 miles to the south. There are many monkeys and squirrels on both islands. Lat. between 13° 58′ and 14° N. Lon. 93° 25′ E.

COCONATO, a town of Italy, 17 miles N.E. of Turin. An annual fair is held. Pop. 2,500.

COCOS ISLANDS, or BORNEO CORAL ISLANDS, ko'-kos, a group in the Indian Ocean, forming a circle, and enclosing a lagoon or harbour, known as Refuge Port, or Port Albion. The only entrance for ships is on the northern side, and is 2 miles wide. Cocoa-nut trees abound on the islands. Lat. 12° S. Lon. 98° E.—Small groups having the same name are in the Indian Ocean, off the W. coast of Sumatra, and in the South Pacific Ocean.

COCOS, an island of the North Pacific, about 30 miles in circumference, and of considerable elevation. There is good anchorage in Chatham Bay, on the north side of the island. Lat. 5° 33′ N. Lon. 86° 58′ W.

COD, CAPE, a sandy peninsula, the south-eastern extremity of Massachusetts, United States, stretching east and north for 65 miles, and about 4 miles in average breadth, enclosing Cape Cod Bay. There are many thriving villages, inhabited chiefly by fishermen. The name is taken from the immense number of cod-fish taken off the coast. The cape was discovered in 1602 by Goswold, an Englishman. Lat. of lighthouse at northern extremity 42° 2′ N. Lon. 70° 4′ W.

CODOGNO, ko-done'-yo, a town of Northern Italy, 17 miles S.E. of Lodi, near the conflux of the Adda and Po. Manf. Silk and linen. There is a large trade in cheese. Pop. 9,600.

CODRINGTON, ADMIRAL SIR EDWARD, G.C.B., kod'-ring-ton, entered the British navy in 1783, and in 1793 became lieutenant. On June 1, 1794, he served under Lord Howe in the Queen Charlotte, when the French were defeated off Brest, and was deputed to be the bearer of the duplicate dispatches to England. For this service he was promoted to the rank of captain, and continued to be actively employed till 1797. From this period till 1805 he was unemployed; but in that year he received the command on the Orion, 74, and fought at Trafalgar. In 1808 he was appointed to the command of the Blake, and, under Lord Gardner, accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and in 1809 forced the Scheldt. For this service he was publicly thanked. In the three following years he was employed off the coast of Spain, and in 1813 returned to England. In 1814 he sailed for N. America, and took part in the attack on New Orleans. In 1815 he returned to England, and was created a knight commander of the Bath. His services had now been considerable, and in 1821 he was made a vice-admiral. In 1826 he was appointed to command the squadron in the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Russian and French fleets, destroyed the Turco-Egyptian fleet at the battle of Navarino, fought October 20th, 1827. For this he was made a knight grand cross of the Bath, but was recalled from the Mediterranean in 1828. In 1832 he was elected member of parliament for Devonport, which he represented in several successive parliaments. In 1837 he was made an admiral, and in 1839 resigned his seat, on being appointed commander-in-chief at Portsmouth.

Born 1770; died in London, 1851.

CODROIPO, ko'-dro-e-po, a town of Italy, in the province of Venetia, on the right bank of the Stella, 24 miles S.W. of Udine. Manf. Woollens and canvas. There is a considerable transit trade. Pop. 3,500.

CODRUS, ko'-drus, the last king of Athens, celebrated for his patriotism, was the son of Melanthus. Having learnt from the oracle that, in the war waged by the Dorians against Athens, victory would remain with those whose chief should fall in battle, he threw himself into the midst of the conflict, and was slain.—To pay more honour to his memory, the Athenians made a resolution, that no man after Codrus should reign in Athens under the name of king; and therefore the government was put into the hands of perpetual archons. (See ATHENS.)

Born 1160; died 1132 B.C.

COEL, ko'-el, a town of British India, 50 miles N.W. of Agra. There is a great mosque, on an elevated site in the centre of the town, and a large round tower, the origin of which is unknown. Lat. 27° 54′ N. Lon. 78° E.

CŒLE SYRIA, or EL BUKAA, se'-le-sir'e-a, a valley of Syria, between the mountain-ranges of Anti-Lebanon and Lebanon. The length of the valley is about 100 miles, and the average breadth 10. In one part it is 2,800 feet above the sea-level. It is traversed by the river Libany, the ancient Leontes, and contains the towns of Baalbec, Bekaa, and Zahleh.

CŒLUS, or URANUS, se'-lus, the heavens personified, and the most ancient of the gods, was, at the same time, the offspring and the husband of Terra, the earth, by whom he had eighteen children. Amongst them were Saturn, the Cyclops, and the Titans. His children rebelling against him, wounded him; and from the blood which sprinkled the ground sprang the giants, furies, and nymphs.

COFFEE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 1008 square miles. Pop. 8,119. The capital is Wellborn.

COFFEE, a county of Georgia, United States. Pop. 5,070.

COFFEE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 276 square miles. Pop. 12,894. Manchester is the capital.

COFFEY, a county of Kansas, United States. Pop. 11,438.

COFFIN'S ISLAND. (See MAGDALEN ISLANDS.)

COGGESHALL, kog'-ge-shal, a town of Essex, 44 miles N.E. of London, on the left bank of the Blackwater, which is here crossed by an ancient bridge. It has several charities, a fine church, recently restored, and an endowed grammar-school. In Little Coggeshall, on the opposite side of the river, are the remains of a Cistercian abbey, founded in 1142, by King Stephen. Manf. Silk and velvet. Pop. 2,916.

COGNAC, kone-yak', a town of France, in the department of Charente, on the Charente, 20 miles from Angoulême. This is the great entrepôt of the brandy of the Charente, called Cognac, and which has an extensive sale. Manf. Paper, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 13,096.—Francis I. of France was born here, and often made it his residence, and in 1526 was signed here the treaty of the "Holy League."

COGOLETO, ko'-go-lai-to, a town of Italy, 14 miles S.W. of Genoa. Near the town is a large foundry of shot and shells. Pop. 2,300.—This is the birthplace of Columbus.

COHASSET, ko-has'-set, a seaport in Norfolk county, Massachusetts, U.S., 20 miles from Boston. Pop. 1,800.—COHASSET ROCKS, which have been fatal to many vessels, lie off this place, 3 miles from the shore.

COHORN, or COEHOORN, MENNO, Baron van, ko'-horn, an engineer, surnamed the Dutch Vauban, who early became a soldier, and rose to the ranks of general of artillery, director-general of fortifications, and governor of Flanders. At the siege of Grave, in 1674, he employed with success the small mortars, or "cohorns," so named after himself. In 1692 he defended the fort of Namur against Louis XIV. with great gallantry, although he was forced to surrender. He defended other places with equal bravery, and was a skilful engineer. The fortifications of Bergen-op-Zoom are considered his masterpiece.—In 1685 he published his "New System of Fortifications," which is adapted only to the defence of ground of little elevation above the sea-level.

Born in Friesland, 1641; died at the Hague, 1704.

COIMBATORE, ko-im-ba-tore', the capital of a district of the same name in the Madras presidency. It stands at an elevation of 1,480 feet above the sea-level, on the southern slope of the Neilgherries, near the point of junction with the Western Ghauts. It is defended by a citadel or small fort, and contains a handsome mosque, built by Tippoo Sahib. Pop. 38,967.

COIMBATORE, a district of British India, in the Madras presidency, 50 miles long and 45 broad. It is bounded on the N. by Mysore; S. by Dindigal; E. by Salem and Trichinopoly; and W. by Malabar.

Desc.—A high table-land, with mountains (a portion of the Neilgherry range), attaining the elevations of from 8,000 to 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. The soil is fertile.

Pro.—Cotton, rice, tobacco, and the plant from which castor oil is extracted. Cattle and sheep are reared, and elephants are bred for the sake of their tusks.

Minerals.—Iron, salt, and nitre.

Manf.—Cottons and woollens.

Pop. 1,657,600, chiefly Hindoos, but including about 600 of the Toders, or aborigines, physically a fine race, and some of them have fair complexions.

Lat. Between 10° 8′ and 12° 48′ N. Lon. Between 76° 50′ and 78° 10′ E.

COIMBRA, ko-eem'-bra, an ancient city of Portugal, the capital of the province of Beira, on the right bank of the Mondego, which is here crossed by an elegant stone bridge, with a double row of arches, 60 miles S. of Oporto. The situation is very picturesque, but in the interior it is narrow, ill-paved, dirty, and very steep. It is the see of a bishop, and has, exclusive of the cathedral, several parish churches, a number of convents, and a famous university. This is the only institution of the kind in Portugal, and was founded originally at Lisbon, in 1290, but transferred here in 1537. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, earthenware, and combs. Pop. 18,200.—The town was originally built by the Goths, and passed into possession of the Moors. For more than two centuries after the establishment of Portugal as a separate kingdom, it was the capital, and was for many years the residence of the Portuguese kings, and their tombs may be seen here. In 1755, the earthquake which destroyed Lisbon, considerably damaged this town.

COIN, ko-een', a town of Spain, 21 miles W. of Malaga. It is well built, and there are excellent public walks and gardens. Manf. Linen and woollen goods, soap, and paper. Marble and jasper are obtained in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,200.

COIRE. (See CHUR.)

COJUTEPEQUE, ko-joo'-te-paik, a town of the republic of San Salvador, Central America. Pop. 15,000.—A LAKE of the same name, several miles distant, takes in windy weather a deep-green colour, and frequently casts great quantities of dead fish upon its shores.

COKE, SIR EDWARD, koke, an English lawyer, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Clifford's Inn, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. In 1578 he was called to the bar, and chosen reader at Lyon's Inn, in which office he so soon distinguished himself by his learning and intelligence, that his practice became enormous. In 1586 he was chosen recorder of Norwich, and in 1591-92 was unanimously elected to the same office in London. This, however, he resigned in 1592, on receiving the appointment of solicitor-general. In 1594 he became attorney-general, about which time the enmity, which continued throughout the life of Lord Bacon, arose between him and that distinguished man. In 1600 he prosecuted the earl of Essex, in which he behaved with uncommon asperity. Three years afterwards, he received the honour of knighthood, and, in 1603, conducted the prosecution of Sir Walter Raleigh in such a manner as severely to reflect upon his character for prudence and humanity. His speeches at the trial of Father Garnett, and the other conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, in 1605, are deemed his forensic master-pieces, and with them his career as an advocate terminated. In 1606 he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, and in 1613 was removed to the King's Bench, at which time he was sworn of the privy council. In the prosecution of the murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury, in 1615, he conducted himself with such spirit as to raise him many enemies, and soon afterwards fell into disgrace for opposing the king's prerogative, and holding his opinion with an honesty and determination of purpose which, in the eye of posterity, must do him high honour. In 1616 he was removed from his office, as Lord Chancellor Egerton, one of his enemies, said, on account of his "excessive popularity." After this Sir Edward never filled a judicial situation, although he was, in some measure, restored to the royal favour. He was now engaged in several commissions of a public nature, and in 1620 was returned member of parliament for Liskeard, in Cornwall. In this parliament he joined the popular side against the court, and was greatly instrumental in getting the Commons to pass the celebrated resolution "that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England." For this and other alleged causes the king was highly incensed against him, and had him committed to the Tower, where he was imprisoned for seven months, and never recovered the good opinion of King James. In 1628 he was chosen member for Suffolk and Buckingham, but he took his seat for the latter, and, although in his 79th year, defended the constitutional rights of the people with all the vigour of youth and the experience of age. He was the principal framer of the Bill of Rights, and mostly through his influence both the lords and the king were brought to assent to its becoming the law of the land. One of the last acts of his public life was to denounce the duke of Buckingham as the author of all the calamities of the nation; and, on the dissolution of parliament, he retired to his seat in Buckinghamshire, where he spent in peace the remainder of his days. The first part of his reports appeared about 1600, and the last, or thirteenth, about 1635. His "Institutes of the Laws of England" are invaluable; the first is a translation and comment on Sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures, and is commonly known as "Coke upon Littleton, or the First Institute." There are also other legal works and law reports of his in print.

Born at Mileham, Norfolk, 1551; died 1633.

COL, kol, signifying 'a neck,' is the name, with various affixes, of many passes across the Alps of Savoy and Piedmont. (See ALPS.)

COLAC, ko'-lak, a town in Victoria, Australia, 92 miles S.W. of Melbourne, in an agricultural district. Pop. 1,500.

COLAPOOR. (See KOLAPOOR.)

COLBERG, or KOLBERG, kol'-bairg, a seaport of Prussia, in the province of Pomerania, near the mouth of the Pasante. It stands on a hill surrounded by swamps, with a harbour in the Baltic. The chief edifices are the town-house, a large cathedral, several churches, and a house of correction. Manf. Woollens. It has several distilleries, salt-works, and a lucrative salmon and lamprey fishery. Pop. 13,200.—It was besieged in the Thirty Years' War, again in the Seven Years' War, and in 1807 it was invested by the French, but without success.

COLBERT, JOHN BAPTIST, kol'-bair, a distinguished French statesman, was the descendant of a Scottish family, was apprenticed to a woollen-draper at Rheims, and afterwards went to Paris, where, in 1648, he became clerk to Le Tellier, secretary of state, whose daughter he married. He next entered into the service of Cardinal Mazarin, who sent him to Rome on some important business, which he managed with great dexterity. The cardinal, at his death, recommended him to his master, Louis XIV., as the most proper person for comptroller-general of the finances, which post he obtained, and effected amazing reforms, and increasing the revenue. He is generally considered as the inventor of the theory of the balance of trade. In 1664 he was appointed superintendent of the buildings, and greatly improved Paris by erecting elegant structures. But architectural pursuits did not engross the whole of his attention. He laboured to improve the state of the arts, and to extend French commerce and manufactures. He founded Quebec and Cayenne, made settlements in India and Africa, and fostered the colonies of St. Domingo and Martinique. He also founded the dockyards of Brest, Toulon, and Rochefort, and, in every possible manner, gave a new impetus to the commerce of his country. Besides these works, he instituted the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and the Academy of Sciences, and, by his recommendation, the Royal Observatory was built. In 1669 he was made secretary of state and marine minister, which offices he discharged to the satisfaction of his sovereign and the benefit of the people. Notwithstanding the immense benefits which Colbert had conferred on his country, he had to be buried in the night with a military escort, as, on account of the taxes he was forced to impose for the wars and pleasures of Louis, the people threatened to tear his body in pieces. He was, however, a great man, with a fine as well as a comprehensive mind. The gardens of the Tuileries, the Hôtel des Invalides, the façade of the Louvre, the triumphal arches of the Boulevards, St. Denis and St. Martin, were all executed under him.

Born at Rheims, 1619; died 1683.

COLBY, THOMAS, kol'-be, an eminent English engineer, and a major-general in the army. He rose successively through the various subordinate ranks, and surveyed a large portion of England and Ireland. He accompanied Biot, the French engineer, on his trip to Shetland, in 1817, and afterwards assisted in connecting the French with the English triangulation across the Straits of Dover. In 1821 he was made a major, and, in 1825, became lieutenant-colonel. In 1846 he rose to the rank of major-general, when his connection with the survey ceased. He was a member of several scientific associations, and took an active part in establishing the Astronomical Society; but, perhaps, his greatest work was a series of tidal observations, which he made round the coast of Ireland, "and which," said the astronomer-royal, "are the most important that ever were made."

Born at Rochester, 1784; died at Liverpool, 1852.

COLCHAGUA, kol-chag'-oo-a, a department of Chili, extending from the Andes to the Pacific, and having N. and S. the departments Santiago and Maule. Area, 8,130 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the plains, and watered by the Maypù and the Maule. Pop. 161,012. Lat. between 34° and 35° S. Lon. between 70° and 72° W.

COLCHESTER, kol'-ches-ter, a parliamentary borough and river port of Essex, on the Colne, here crossed by several bridges, at a distance of 12 miles from the sea. It has been encircled by walls, still partly standing, though greatly decayed, and contains a castle and 16 churches, several very old, and recently restored. St. Peter's is considered the chief, and existed previous to the Norman conquest. There are numerous other places of worship, some architecturally attractive, various charitable foundations, and the other public buildings are a town-gaol, a custom-house, barracks, a theatre, a county house of correction, market-house, and literary and scientific associations. A new cemetery has been laid out to the south of the town. There are the ruins of an abbey and priory. Manf. Silks; and it has a malting trade. Oysters, dredged from the Colne, are carried, as an article of traffic, to London, Colchester "natives" being there highly esteemed; but they are less abundant than they formerly were. There is a fine quay on the river, at Hythe, a little below the town, and vessels of 150 tons can approach it. Pop. 28,395.—A station on the Great Eastern Railway.—It is the Camulodunum of the British and the Roman Colonia. A great number of Roman relics have been found. In 1648 it sustained a siege of seven weeks' duration by the parliamentary forces under Fairfax.

COLCHESTER, CHARLES ABBOT, Lord, speaker of the House of Commons, was the younger son of the Rev. John Abbot, D.D., rector of All Saints, Colchester, and was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1777 he won the chancellor's medal for Latin verse, and in 1783 took his degrees, and shortly afterwards was called to the bar. In 1795 he became clerk of the rules in the Court of King's Bench, and, in the same year, was returned member of parliament for Helstone, in Cornwall. He now laboured in introducing practical reforms of the law, and the improvement of the public records. In 1800 he obtained leave to bring into the house a bill for taking a census of the population of the kingdom, and, the following year, the census was taken, and has continued to be taken ever since, decennially. He was appointed chief secretary for Ireland, and keeper of the Irish privy seal; but these offices he scarcely held a year, for in 1802 he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, which he continued to be till 1817, when, in May, a stroke of erysipelas forced him to resign. He was raised to the peerage as Baron Colchester, with a pension of £4,000 a year, and £3,000 a year to his next successor to the title.

Born at Abingdon, 1757; died in London, 1829.

COLCHIS, a country of Asia, famous in Greek legend for the expedition of the Argonauts, and for being the birthplace of Medea. It is now comprised in the Russian government of Trans-Caucasia.

COLDITZ, or KOLDITZ, ko(r)l'-ditz, a town of Saxony, on the Mulde, 25 miles S.E. of Leipsig. There are two churches and a castle. Manf. Linen, paper, and earthenware. Pop. 3,400.

COLDSTREAM, kold'-strem, a town of Berwickshire, Scotland. It stands on the N. bank of the Tweed, where it is crossed by a bridge, about 15 miles S.W. of Berwick. It has a church, several libraries, and benevolent institutions. Pop. 1724.—The ford of Tweed, so celebrated in history as the crossing-place of the former armies of England and Scotland, is in the vicinity. The "Coldstream Guards" take their name from the regiment having originally been raised here by General Monk in 1659-60. The town was formerly noted for the celebration of clandestine marriages.—A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

COLE, a central county of Missouri, United States. The surface is broken, and in some parts too rocky for cultivation, but the valleys are fertile. Area, 440 square miles. Pop. 15,515. The capital is Jefferson City.

COLEBROOK DALE, kole'-brook, a district of England, in Shropshire, on the Severn, 2 miles from Brosely. It is noted for its iron-works, and for the magnificent cast-iron bridge which was thrown over the Severn here in 1799. The extensive iron-works in this district caused, in 1620, railroads of wood to be here first used. A century later these were supplied by iron plates placed upon the wooden rails; both of which inventions may be viewed as the gradual progress made towards the railway system now adopted throughout the country.

COLEBROOKE, HENRY THOMAS, an eminent Oriental scholar, at an early age entered the service of the East India Company, and was in 1782 sent out to Calcutta, where, after serving several years, he became attached to the revenue department at Tirhoot. He was afterwards removed to Purneah, and began to devote himself to the study of those languages in which he afterwards attained to considerable eminence. Shortly after the foundation of the college at Fort William, he was appointed professor of Sanscrit, from which situation he was raised to a judgeship at Mirzapore. He next became president of the Board of Revenue, and a member of the Supreme Council of Bengal. He published a great number of papers connected with Hindoo literature and science, a dictionary and grammar of the Sanscrit language, and was president of the London Asiatic Society.

Born 1765; died 1837.

COLEFORD, a town in Gloucestershire, 17 miles S.W. of Gloucester, pleasantly situated on the slope of a hill, near the Forest of Dean. Pop. 2,600, chiefly engaged in mining and quarrying.

COLENSO, JOHN WILLIAM, D.D., bishop and Biblical critic. Educated at St. John's, Cambridge; appointed in 1838 mathematical master at Harrow; in 1846 became rector of Forncett St. Mary, Norfolk. At this time he had achieved great reputation by numerous elementary works on algebra and arithmetic, which are accepted as standard books of high value, and had attracted some attention by the publication of some small religious works, in which the extreme evangelical party discovered a tendency to daring criticism. He held for some time the position of secretary to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and in 1853 was consecrated to the new bishopric of Natal, South Africa. He laboured hard in his new sphere, studying the Zulu language, and teaching and preaching incessantly, but became involved in disputes with Dr. Gray, bishop of Cape Town, who claimed a jurisdiction over Colenso's see. In 1862 he published "The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua critically Examined," which, by the boldness of its criticism, excited a controversy of the most intense character among the orthodox churches. This was followed by other works further exhibiting the views held by Colenso. In 1863, Bishop Gray instituted proceedings at Cape Town against Colenso for heresy, and obtained a decree of deposition from his see. Against this Colenso appealed to the Privy Council, and the Judicial Committee decided that Bishop Gray had no jurisdiction, and the decree of deposition was invalid, and Dr. Colenso returned to his see. In 1874 he took an active part in obtaining a reversal of a sentence passed by the Colonial Government on a Kaffir chief, and visited this country to represent the case to the Home Government. His remonstrance was successful.

Born at St. Austell, Cornwall, 1814. Died 1883.

COLERAINE, kole-rain, a seaport and parliamentary borough of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, agreeably situate on both sides of the river Bann, about 4 miles from the sea, and 25 N. of Londonderry. Here is one of the most extensive salmon-fisheries. The town is of tolerable size, is neatly built, and has a barrack. Manf. Fine linen, cotton, soap, leather, and paper. The trade of the port is considerable. Pork-curing is carried on extensively Pop. 5,899. A station on the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway.

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR, kole'-ridj, was the son of the vicar of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, the youngest of a large family, and an orphan at the age of nine. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and in 1791 he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, and obtained a prize for a Greek ode; but owing to a disappointment in love, he left during the second year of his residence, came to London, and, under the name of Comberbatch, enlisted in the 15th Dragoons. From the position of a soldier he was almost immediately released by his friends purchasing his discharge. He then went to Bristol, and, shortly after, started a periodical called the "Watchman," which enjoyed an existence only to its ninth number. With several enthusiastic friends, among whom was Southey, he proposed to emigrate to America, and establish, on the banks of the Susquehanna, a settlement where the highest ideal of human existence should be realized; but the project was never carried out, the commonplace difficulty of want of money standing in the way. In 1795 he married Miss Sarah Fricker (whose sister married Southey on the same day), and in the following year published a small volume of poems, which went through a second edition. By this time he had gone to live in a cottage at the foot of the Quantock hills, in Somersetshire, where, in conjunction with Mr. Wordsworth, who was his neighbour, he formed the plan of the famous Lyrical Ballads. In 1797 he wrote his "Ancient Mariner," the first part of "Christabel," and his tragedy of "Remorse." About the same time he was preaching in a Unitarian chapel. In the following year, through the kind liberality of the Messrs. Wedgewood, he was enabled to visit Germany, in company with Wordsworth, and at Gottingen he attended Blumenbach's lectures on physiology, at the same time making himself intimately acquainted with German literature. On his return, in 1798, he took up his residence at the Lakes, where both Southey and Wordsworth had settled, and published his translation of Schiller's "Wallenstein." In 1800 he began to contribute to the London Courier newspaper, which he continued to do till 1814. In the interval he had visited Malta, had lectured on the fine arts at the Royal Institution, and had produced "The Friend," a periodical which did not live beyond its twenty-seventh number. He now published several works on different subjects, and achieved a great reputation, but impaired his fine powers by indulging in opium-eating. He broke up his domestic circle, and, during the latter years of his life, became domesticated with his friend Mr. Gillman, of Highgate Grove. For some years, as an academician of the Royal Society of Literature, he was in the receipt of £100 a year from George IV., which, on the death of that sovereign, he lost. He was a man of marvellous ability, but possessed a dreamy, undecided nature, which prevented him achieving any really great and worthy work. Some of his poetry is exquisite; his criticisms are profound, and his learning vast. He was one of the greatest talkers that ever lived, and he exercised an extraordinary influence over some of the most gifted minds of the age. In his later years he renounced the Unitarianism he once professed, and accepted the doctrines of Trinitarian Christianity.

Born at Ottery St. Mary, 1772; died 1834.

COLERIDGE, HARTLEY, the eldest son of Samuel Coleridge, was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he obtained the Oriel Fellowship, but forfeited it by intemperance, produced some excellent poems, and from 1820 to 1831 was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine." He also wrote some admirable biographies of "The Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire." He lived mostly in the neighbourhood of the lakes Grasmere and Rydal, pleasing himself, rather than pleasing others, by the indulgence of his unfortunate propensity, which never left him through life.

Born at Clevedon, near Bristol, 1796; died at Ambleside, in the Lake district, 1849.

COLERIDGE, SARA, was the only daughter of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and inherited much of the genius of her father. Her education was superintended mostly by Southey, to whose fostering care the whole family of Coleridge owed a deep debt of gratitude. She was reared under his roof, and, as she grew up, she endeavoured to lighten the literary labours of Southey by giving him all the assistance she could. In 1822 she produced "An Account of the Abipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, from the Latin of Martin Dobrizhoffer." This was her first literary performance, and had been undertaken at the suggestion of Southey, who pronounced it admirable. In 1829 she married her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, and on the death of her father, in 1834, in conjunction with her husband, undertook the task of giving to the world the poet's unpublished works. Whilst engaged in this duty, her husband died, when the completion of the task they had undertaken together devolved wholly upon herself. She, however, proved quite equal to its performance, and executed it with great ability. It is upon her commentaries on her father's works that her fame chiefly rests, although she produced the "Phantasmion," a fairy tale, rich in invention, and redolent of poetic beauty.

Born at Keswick, 1803; died 1852.

COLEROON, kole-roon', the largest and most northern branch of the Cauvery river, in British India. It enters the Bay of Bengal between Trichinopoly and Tanjore, after a course of 93 miles.

COLES, a county of Illinois, United States. A large portion consists of prairies. Area, 864 square miles. Pop. 27,042. Charleston is the capital.

COLESBERG, kolez'-berg, the most northern division of the Eastern Province of Cape Colony, South Africa. It is generally an elevated plain, devoid of timber, but well adapted for sheep and ostrich farming. Area, 6,082 square miles. Pop. 8,000.—The principal town, of the same name, is about 12 miles S. of the Orange river. Pop. 1,400.

COLESHILL, a market-town of Warwickshire, on the right bank of the river Cole, here crossed by a bridge, 7 miles N.E. of Birmingham. The church is a beautiful specimen of the decorated Gothic style, and there are several other places of worship. Pop. 5,122. A station on the Midland Railway.

COLET, JOHN, kol'-et, an English divine, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he obtained his degree of D.D. In 1505 he was installed in the deanery of St. Paul's, where, by his preaching and other labours, he greatly advanced the Reformation, a course which subjected him to considerable obloquy. He was a liberal encourager of learning, particularly of the Greek language, and founded St. Paul's school. He died of the sweating sickness, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, where a monument was erected to his memory, but was destroyed in the fire of 1666. He wrote some grammatical pieces for the use of his school, and was the author of several religious tracts of a practical kind.

Born in London, 1466; died 1519.

COLICO, ko-lé'-co, a town of Italy, on the N.E. side of Lake Como, at the junction of the roads over the Splügen and Stelvio. Pop. 2,700.

COLIGNY, GASPARD DE, ko-leen'-ye, a French admiral and statesman, greatly distinguished in the religious wars of his country. He served in Italy under Francis I., in the campaign of 1543, and was at the battle of Ceresole in 1544. In 1552 he was made admiral of France. He served in Flanders, where he greatly contributed to the victory at Renty, and subsequently prosecuted the war with vigour against the Spaniards in Artois and Picardy. He valiantly defended St. Quentin, and after the death of Henry II. joined the Huguenots, and, next to the prince of Condé, was at the head of the Protestant party. He now took up arms against the Guises, and fought at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, Jarnac, and Moncontour. In these conflicts he was unsuccessful, but showed great celerity in repairing his losses, and in always being ready again to meet the enemy. In 1570 he made an advantageous peace for the Huguenots, and afterwards was invited to court. Here he was graciously received only to be betrayed. Charles IX. affected great regard for him; but, a few days after the marriage of the king's sister with the young king of Navarre, Coligny was wounded by a musket-ball, shot from a window. This attempt was instigated by the duchess of Nemours, whose first husband, Francis, duke of Guise, was assassinated by a Huguenot fanatic, and Coligny was unjustly suspected of being the mainspring in the deed. Two days after this attempt on the life of Coligny, the massacre of St. Bartholomew took place, and he was among the first of its victims. Whilst sitting in his room, a party, headed by Besme, one of the domestics of the duke of Guise, rushed into his room with a drawn sword, and piercing him, the admiral fell, wounded to death, at the feet of the duke. His body was hung by the feet at a gibbet, and his head cut off and sent to Catharine de' Medici.

Born at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 1517; died 1572.

COLIMA, ko-lé'-ma, a state of the Mexican confederation, extending about 100 miles along the coast of the Pacific Ocean, south of the department Xalisco. It is fertile, but exceedingly hot. Area, 3,743 square miles. Pop. 72,591. Lat. between 19° and 20° N.—The volcano of Colima, rising to a height of 12,000 feet, is in this district.

COLIMA, the capital of the above state, is a fertile plain to the south-west of the volcano. Pop. 26,251.

COLIMA, a seaport of the above state, on the Pacific, 40 miles S.W. of the capital.

COLIN, ALEXANDER, ko'-la, a Belgian sculptor, who executed the celebrated tomb of Maximilian I., at Innspruck. The sculpture on this tomb records the principal acts and victories of the emperor Maximilian, and is surrounded by twenty-eight gigantic statues of the heroes of the middle ages. He also executed two monuments of his patron, the archduke Ferdinand of the Tyrol, and his first wife, Philippa. These are likewise to be seen at Innspruck, and are extremely elaborate works. He became court sculptor to the emperor Ferdinand I., and also to his son, Ferdinand of the Tyrol.

Born at Mechlin, 1526; died at Innspruck, 1612.

COLL, or COLLA. (See HEBRIDES.)

COLLATINUS, LUCIUS TARQUINIUS, kol-la-ti'-nus, a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia, to whom Sext Tarquin offered violence. He and Brutus drove the Tarquins from Rome, and were made the first consuls. He afterwards laid down his office and retired to Alba in voluntary banishment. One of the seven hills of Rome.

Born 509 B.C.

COLLE, kol'-lai, a town of Italy, on the Elsa, 22 miles S.W. of Florence. There are a cathedral and a castle. Manf. Paper, olive oil, wine and silk. Pop. 7,500.

COLLESANO, kol-la-sa'-no, a town of Sicily, 37 miles S.E. of Palermo. Pop. 3,000.

COLLETON, kol'-le-ton, a county of South Carolina, United States, on the Atlantic. It is fertile and productive in rice and cotton. Area, 2,100 square miles. Pop. 36,386.

COLLIANO, kol-le-a'-no, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, 9 miles N.E. of Campagna. Pop. 3,200.

COLLIER, ARTHUR, kol'-yer, English divine and metaphysician, educated at Oxford, and in 1704, appointed to the rectory of Langford Magna, Wiltshire, which had been held by his father and grandfather. His most famous metaphysical work is "Clavis Universalis; a Demonstration of the Non-existence or Impossibility of an External World," which, strange as it may seem, absurd even to the verge of insanity to non-metaphysical minds, has been highly commended by distinguished writers, British and foreign. His theological works, especially one on the "Logos, or word of God," exhibit his peculiar metaphysical tendencies.

Born at Langford Magna, 1680; died 1732.

COLLIER, JEREMY, a learned divine and nonjurer, the son of a clergyman in Cambridgeshire. He was educated by his father, and then removed to Caius College, Cambridge, where, in 1676, he took his degree of M.A., and entered into orders. In 1679 he received the rectory of Ampton, in Suffolk, which he afterwards resigned, and came to London, where, in 1685, he was chosen lecturer at Gray's Inn. At the Revolution, he not only refused the oaths, but wrote in vindication of the abdicated monarch, for which he was imprisoned in Newgate. He was, however, discharged without being brought to trial. In 1692 he was again committed to the Gate-house, on suspicion of corresponding with the exiled king; but was, shortly afterwards, admitted to bail. In 1696, when Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were executed for what was called the Assassination Plot, Mr. Collier and two other nonjuring clergymen attended them to the place of execution, where all three joined in absolving them by the imposition of hands. This circumstance made a great noise, and two of the ministers were arrested, but Mr. Collier absconded, and was declared an outlaw. When the storm subsided, he published three volumes of excellent Essays upon Miscellaneous Subjects. These appeared severally in 1697, 1705, and 1709, and passed through many editions, being valued not only on account of the freedom of their style, but for the wit and humour with which they abounded. He next directed his attention to the immorality of the stage, which was very licentious. This drew him into a controversy with several eminent writers, amongst whom were Dryden, Congreve and Farquhar; but Dryden made an honest confession of his fault, and Collier came off completely victorious. The town was on his side, and the dramatic writers afterwards wrote with more regard to decency. His next work was a translation and continuation of Moreri's "Historical Dictionary," under the title of "Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical," which met with a very favourable reception, and was, in 1721, completed in 4 vols. folio. At the accession of Queen Anne, he had great offers of preferment, which he steadily refused. In 1714 he published, in 2 vols. folio, "The Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain," brought down to the death of Charles II.; and, in 1713, was privately consecrated a bishop by Dr. George Hickes, who had been himself consecrated suffragan of Thetford by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough, in 1694. Old age was now fast drawing upon him; but he did not cease his active labours till affliction put it out of his power to do more than he had done. Besides the above works, he published a volume of sermons, a translation of Marcus Antoninus, and numerous pamphlets. He was buried in St. Pancras churchyard.

Born at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeshire, 1650; died in London 1726.

COLLIER, J. PAYNE, an ardent labourer in the field of dramatic literature, was educated for the bar. In 1820 appeared his "Poetical Decameron; or, Ten Conversations on English Poets and Poetry, particularly of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I." These conversations indicated the prevailing direction of his taste; and in 1825 he issued an allegorical poem, entitled "The Poet's Pilgrimage," which will hardly transmit his name to posterity. In 1827 appeared his edition of Dodsley's "Old Plays," to which were added some others; and, in 1831, his "History of English Dramatic Poetry, &c." This has been pronounced a valuable record of the British stage. In 1835-6-9 appeared successively "New Facts regarding the Life of Shakspeare;" and, in 1844, his edition of Shakspeare, founded upon an entirely new collation of the old editions. Being an active member of the Shakspeare Society, Mr. Collier had an extensive knowledge of the dramatic literature of his country, and largely contributed to extend the taste which now generally exists for the works of England's great national dramatist. In 1848 appeared "Shakspeare's Library; a Collection of the ancient Romances, Novels, Legends, Poems, and Histories used by Shakspeare as the Foundation of his Dramas." This work was accompanied with introductory notices, and must be pronounced a treasure to the Shakspearian antiquary. In 1849 he purchased an old folio Shakspeare of 1632, which had many emendations, and the publication of which had excited great controversy. Latterly, Mr. Collier has produced a series of reprints of early poets and other writers, and taken an active part in the various Shaksperian discussions which have arisen.

Born in London, 1789. Died 1884.

COLLIN, kol'-lin, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 916 square miles. Pop. 25,983. The capital is M'Kensey.

COLLINGWOOD, CUTHBERT, Lord, kol'ling-wood, an English admiral, who, in his eleventh year, entered the navy, and gradually rose through the subordinate ranks. In the action of June 1, 1794, he was flag-captain to Admiral Bowyer, on board the Prince. In 1797 he commanded the Excellent at the battle of Cape St. Vincent, and subsequently rose to the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. This placed him second in command to Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar, where, on October 21, 1805, in the Royal Sovereign, he was the first to attack and break the enemy's line. It was on this occasion that Nelson exclaimed, "See that gallant fellow, how he carries his ship into action!" When England's greatest naval hero fell, mortally wounded, Collingwood completed the victory, and continued in command of the fleet. His services were deemed worthy of a peerage, which he received. For nearly three years he continued the blockade of Cadiz, the Straits of Gibraltar, and the neighbouring coasts, and evinced a perseverance almost unexampled in the annals of naval warfare. Remaining at his post to the last, he sailed up the Mediterranean, where he became involved in some political complications, which, however, he managed with great sagacity. The private character of Collingwood was admirable in every relation of life, affectionate, kindly, just, and heroically brave.

Born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1750; died near Port Mahon, in his ship, the Ville de Paris, 1810.

COLLINGWOOD. (See MELBOURNE.)

COLLINS, ANTHONY, kol'-lins, a free-thinking writer on theological subjects. He was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. His writings were numerous, and excited great attention. He criticized the doctrines held by the orthodox sects with great power, but all acknowledged his sincerity and high character.

Born at Heston, Middlesex, 1676; died 1729.

COLLINS, WILLIAM, English poet, the son of a hatter of Chichester, was educated at Winchester school, whence he removed to Queen's College, Oxford. In 1741 he was chosen demy of Magdalen College, where he took his degree of B.A., and, while there, published his "Oriental Eclogues." About 1744 he went to London, where he suffered extreme poverty; but an uncle, dying, left him £2,000, which saved him from utter wretchedness, although he did not live to enjoy it. Before his death, his mind was overpowered by a persistent melancholy. His odes and eclogues are exquisite for musical versification and grace.

Born at Chichester, 1720; died 1756.

COLLINS, WILLIAM, R.A., a modern English artist of high eminence. In 1807 he entered a student at the Royal Academy, and, in the same year, became an exhibitor, by contributing two small "Views on Millbank." From that time, for nearly forty years, he was an annual exhibitor, with the exception of a couple of years, when he was pursuing his studies in Italy. At first he distinguished himself by his groups of rustic children, engaged either in play or some juvenile trick; but after he had become an associate of the academy in 1814, he began his representations of coast scenery, in which he gained a most distinguished position. Amongst the numerous works which time well employed, enabled him to produce, we may mention, as perhaps the most popular, his children swinging on a gate, and entitled "Happy as a King;" "The Stray Kitten;" "Putting Salt on the Bird's Tail;" and "The Newly-found Nest."

Born in London, 1787; died 1847.

COLLIOURE, kol-le-oor', a seaport of France, department Pyrénées-Orientales, on the shores of the Mediterranean, 15 miles S.E. of Perpignan. It is defended by several forts. The port is only suitable for small vessels. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the tunny and sardine fishery, and there is a good trade in fish and wine. Pop. 3,000.

COLLO, a town of Algeria, province of Constantine, on a bay of the same name, 62 miles W. of Bona. Pop. 2,500.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, JEAN MARIE, kol'-lo dair'-bwaw, a ferocious French revolutionist, was for twenty years a strolling player. In 1792, however, he received a prize from the Jacobin society, became one of its members, and also of the Convention, of which he was appointed president. He was the first who moved for the abolition of royalty, and, on the trial of the king, sat next to Robespierre. In 1793, he accompanied Fouché to Lyons, and was one of the principals in the destruction of 1,600 persons by the guillotine and artillery. History hardly presents us with such a monster as this. He actually made it a crime to show sympathy, by the countenance, for the unfortunate. In proof of this, he issued an order "that all those whose countenance testified to any inward emotions of grief or pity, should be treated as suspected." In 1794, an attempt made to assassinate him only increased his popularity. He took part in the impeachment of Robespierre, and aided in bringing him to the scaffold; but his own time had come. He was denounced in the October of 1794, and in the following March was transported to Cayenne, where he shortly afterwards died of the fever natural to the climate. He was the author of the "Almanack of Father Gerard," which obtained for him the prize from the Jacobin society, and some dramatic pieces, the best of which is an imitation from the Spanish of Calderon, entitled "Le Paysan Magistrat."

Born in Paris, 1750; died 1796.

COLLUMPTON, kol-lump'-ton, a town of Devonshire, on the Culme, 11 miles from Exeter. It consists chiefly of one long street. The church is a respectable Gothic structure. Pop. 3,410.

COLMAN, GEORGE, kol'-man, usually called the "Elder," was the son of Thomas Colman, Esq., resident at the court of the grand-duke of Tuscany, by a sister of Anna-Maria Pulteney, the countess of Bath. He received his education at Westminster school, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he engaged with Bonnel Thornton in writing a periodical paper called "The Connoisseur." On leaving the university, he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar, but quitted the law for dramatic composition. In 1760, his first piece, "Polly Honeycomb," was successfully performed at Drury-lane theatre; and the next year his comedy of the "Jealous Wife" was similarly received. In 1761 he became a patentee of Covent-garden theatre, but afterwards sold his share, and purchased Foote's theatre in the Haymarket, which he held to his death. In 1764, Lord Bath died, and left him an annuity, which was increased by General Pulteney. Besides the above pieces, he wrote, in conjunction with Garrick, the "Clandestine Marriage," and altogether adapted and wrote upwards of thirty pieces for the stage, besides translating "Terence," and "Horace's Art of Poetry," with a considerable degree of elegance and fidelity.

Born at Florence, 1733; died 1794.

COLMAN, GEORGE, the "Younger," son of the preceding, was also designed for the profession of the law, but soon commenced writing for the stage. On the demise of his father, George III. transferred the patent of the Haymarket theatre to him. He produced a number of plays and farces; among which may be mentioned "John Bull," "Inkle and Yarico," "The Heir-at-Law," "Love laughs at Locksmiths," "The Iron Chest," "The Poor Gentleman," and "Blue Beard." He also published his own "Memoirs," up to the time of his undertaking the management of the Haymarket. George IV. appointed him exon of the yeoman of the guard, but he resigned this, and became lord chamberlain's examiner of plays, which office he retained till his death.

Born in London, 1762; died 1826.

COLMAR, kol'-mar, a town of Germany, formerly the capital of Upper Alsace, at the confluence of the Lauch and Fecht, 41 miles S. of Strasburg. It contains a cathedral, a handsome church of the Dominicans (now used as a corn-market), college, court-house, town-house, a hospital, an arsenal, and very agreeable public walks. Manf. Cotton, ribbons, hosiery, leather, paper, and combs. Pop. 23,000.

COLNE, koln, three rivers of England.—1. In Hertfordshire, falling into the Thames at Staines. —2. In Essex, passing Colchester, and expanding into an estuary near that town.—3. In Gloucester, after a course of 25 miles, joining the Isis, near Lechlade.

COLNE, a market-town of Lancashire, 32 miles N.E. of Manchester. The parish church is a fine old building, and the Piece-hall is a good building in the Elizabethan style. Manf. Chiefly calicoes. Coal, slate, and lime are plentiful in the neighbourhood. Pop. 11,970. The Leeds and Liverpool Canal passes this town. It is a station on the Midland, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways.

COLOCSA. (See KALOCSA.)

COLOGNA, ko-lone'-ya, a town of Italy, 20 miles S.E. of Verona. Manf. Silk, leather, and cordage. Pop. 6,200.

COLOGNE, ko'-lone, an ancient city and free port of Prussia, formerly the capital of the electorate of the same name, is situate on the left bank of the Rhine. A suburb, Deutz, is on the opposite bank of the river, communication being afforded by a bridge of boats and a fine iron bridge. It is built in the form of a crescent, close to the river. The walls have a number of towers, and form a circuit of nearly seven English miles; and beyond them are promenades, gardens, and vineyards. The streets are in general narrow, winding, and gloomy, and the houses ill built. Its public edifices are a cathedral, 27 churches, chapels, a town-hall, court-house, an archbishop's palace, built in the 15th century, now partly used as a storehouse; the Tempelhaus, a Byzantine building, used for public meetings; exchange and arsenal. The cathedral, which is of great size, is a most magnificent structure, of Gothic architecture. It was begun on the site of an older structure, in the 13th century, but the work proceeded slowly, and indeed the structure is even now in course of completion. For nearly six centuries the superb choir was the only finished portion. In 1842 the foundation stone of the transept was laid, and that part was opened in 1848. In 1860 a central spire of iron was added, and except the tower, still in progress, and intended to be 500 feet high, the work was completed in 1863. The cathedral is 511 feet in length and 231 in breadth, and the completion and restoration will have cost about three quarters of a million sterling. Among the relics preserved are the bones of the sainted personages known as "the three kings of Cologne," according to the traditions of the church, those of the Wise Men of the East, who were guided to Bethlehem by the star. Some of the other churches are equally rich in relics. In St. Ursula's are preserved the bones of 11,000 virgins who were slaughtered by the Huns, who could not overcome their chastity. They were companions of St. Ursula, whose tomb is in the "Golden Chamber." There are more bones in the church of St. Gereon, which possesses the mortal remains of 6,000 martyrs killed by order of Diocletian. The church of St. Mary has many antiquities, and St. Peter's possesses a splendid altar-piece by Rubens. In the arsenal are shown many curious specimens of ancient armour. Its university was established so far back as 1388; but the French suppressed it, and erected in its place a central school, or lyceum.

Manf.—The principal are linen, cotton yarns, woollen, and silk stuffs, with lace, thread, the famous eau de Cologne (of which a million and a half bottles are annually exported), tobacco, hats, wax-lights, needles, clocks, and gold and silver articles. A large trade is carried on, about 8,000 vessels visiting the port annually, and various lines of railway facilitate the traffic.

Pop.—144,772.

History.—Cologne was the Colonia Agrippina of the Romans. In the 4th century it was made a bishopric, and in the 8th, an archbishopric. In 870 it was united to the German empire; and in 957 was declared, by Otho the Great, a free and imperial city; and, from the 12th to the 15th century, it held a high rank amongst the cities of the Hanseatic league. Its archbishops, who were very powerful, had the title of electors. Their intolerant and persecuting spirit, however, finally brought about its ruin, and in 1792 it ceased to be a free city. Taken by the French in 1795, it was, from 1801 to 1814, the capital of the department of the Roer. Since that date it has belonged to Prussia.

COLOMBANO, San, ko-lum-ba'-no, a town of Italy, province of Milano, on the right bank of the Lambre, 10 miles S. of Lodi. Fine granite, porphyry, and limestone, containing fossils, are found in the vicinity. Pop. 6,000.

COLOMBIA, ko-lom-be'-a, formerly New Granada, now officially known as the United States of Colombia, a republic of South and Central America, including the north-western part of the continent and the Isthmus of Panama. A large portion of the district is at an elevation of from 5,000 to 10,000 feet, enjoying a temperate and agreeable climate, but surrounded by a belt of low-lying land, which renders access difficult. In the south, the great range of the Andes divides into two branches, one of which, the Cordillera de la Costa, is parallel to the sea shore. The other, farther to the E., again divides, enclosing the valley of the Magdalena. Some of the peaks on these mountain ranges attain an elevation of more than 13,000 feet, and in the central range is Tolima (18,270 feet), the highest peak of the Andes north of the Equator. The valleys are very fertile; but the plains or llanos in the eastern part are swamps or deserts, and near the western sea-coast and on the isthmus are extensive forests.

Rivers.—The Magdalena, rising about two degrees N. of the equator, after a course of 700 miles unites with a rapid mountain stream, the Cauca (the source of which is near that of the Magdalena), and reaches the Caribbean Sea, by several mouths, in lat. 9° 11′ N. The Magdalena is partially navigable by flat-bottomed boats. The rivers which flow westward to the Pacific rise in the Cordilleras, and are small mountain streams of little importance. Of the rivers which, rising in the Cordilleras, take an eastward direction, the Guaviare, Vichada, and Meta flow into the Orinoco, and the Uaupe and Rio Negro are tributaries of the Maranon. A small stream, the Femza, or river of Bogota, in the Cundinamarca, has a remarkable cataract. There are numerous small mountain lakes.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, platina, mercury, emeralds, small diamonds, and coal; but these natural riches are greatly neglected.

Climate.—Extremely varied. In the district watered by the lower course of the Magdalena the heat is perhaps more intense than at any other portion of the earth's surface; the atmosphere is oppressive, and the water unwholesome. Yellow fever is prevalent and the mortality is great. In the elevated districts the climate is delightful, and healthy, although extremely cold in the mountain regions.

Pro.—The forests abound with valuable timber, the cinchona, or Jesuits' bark, is abundant, and in the mountain regions palm trees reaching a height of 200 feet are common. In the coast districts, rice, cotton, tobacco, cocoa, sugar-cane, and tropical fruits are cultivated; and on the elevated plains, maize, wheat, and European fruits and vegetables thrive; but only a small portion (less than one-tenth) of the land is as yet under cultivation.

Zoology.—The tapir, the largest of the wild animals, is found in the more elevated districts, and the bear, puma, jaguar, sloth, anteater, armadillo, and deer are among the other quadrupeds. In the swampy regions are alligators, snakes, including the large boa constrictor, and mosquitoes; and the forests abound with monkeys, mostly with prehensile tails. The birds are numerous and beautiful.

Commerce.—The most important articles of export are raw cotton and Peruvian bark. The transit trade across the Isthmus of Panama is estimated to be of the value of £17,000,000 annually.

Area.—455,673 square miles.

Pop.—4,000,000, composed of Spaniards; mixed races, Creoles, Mulattoes, Mestizoes, and others; Indians and a few negroes.

Political Divisions and Government.—The Republic consists of nine states:—Panama, Santander, Cauca, Boyaca, Cundinamarca, Antioquia, Tolima, Bolivar, and Magdalena. (See each heading.) The representatives of these states, previously constituting the state of New Granada, concluded a convention at Bogota, in September, 1861, by which the federative republic of the United States of Colombia was constituted. The executive authority is vested in a president elected for two years, having at his side a vice-president, acting as chairman of the senate, and his executive functions must be exercised through four ministers, or secretaries, responsible to Congress. The legislative power rests with a Congress of two houses, called the Senate and the House of Representatives. The Senate is composed of representatives of the nine states, each deputing three senators; the House of Representatives is elected by universal suffrage, each state forming a constituency and returning one member for 50,000 inhabitants, and a second for every additional 20,000. Besides the central government thus created, each of the nine states has its own legislature and chief executive officer, the latter called governor in all except Panama, which gives him the title of president.

Chief Towns.—Bogota (the federal city and seat of government), Antioquia, Carthagena, Pamplona, Panama, Popayan, Parificacion, Santa Marta, and Tunja. The chief ports are Panama and Aspinwall.

COLOMBO, the capital of Ceylon, a seaport and episcopal city, on the western side of the island. It is strongly fortified on the land side and protected towards the sea by batteries. The fortified part is the seat of the residence of the military authorities, but the Europeans generally live in the attractive suburb Colpetty. Many of the poorer inhabitants occupy mud huts beyond the walls, and a large number of the native population live in the Black Town, the oldest portion to the north of the fort. Pop. 100,000, including Portuguese, Dutch, mixed races, Arabs, and Malays, besides the native Singalhese. Lat. 6° 59′ N. Lon. 80° 4′ E. —This place came into the possession of the English in 1796. Previously, it had been successively occupied by the Portuguese and the Dutch. Early travellers gave it the name of Kalamba, from the native name of the river Kalany-ganga; and that name was modified by the Portuguese into Colombo in honour of Christopher Columbus.

COLOMERA, kolo-mai'-ra, a town of Spain, on a river of the same name, crossed by a stone bridge, 13 miles N.E. of Granada. There is a trade in grain, oil, and fruits. Pop. 3,000.

COLONIA DO SANTISSIMO SACRAMENTO, ko-lo'-ne-a do san-tees'-se-mo sa'-kra-main'-to, a maritime town of Uruguay, on the N. bank of the estuary of the Plata, nearly opposite Buenos Ayres. Pop. 2,500.—The English and French fleets took this town from the troops of Rosas, in 1845.

COLONNA, CAPE, ko-lon'-na, the most southern point of Attica, in Greece, 25 miles from Athens. Lat. 37° 38′ N. Lon. 24° 1′ E.—It takes its name from the remaining "columns" of a temple of Minerva, which anciently occupied a site here.

COLONNA, CAPE, on the east coast of Calabria, Italy, at the entrance of the Gulf of Tarento. Lat. 39° 6′ N. Lon. 17° 29′ E.—This is the Lacinium Promontorium of the ancients.

COLONNA, the name of an old and illustrious family of Italy, which, in the middle ages, produced many distinguished members, among whom were the following:—

COLONNA, PROSPERO, an Italian general, who, with Fabricio, a relative, entered the service of Charles VIII., king of France, and assisted him in the conquest of Naples. They afterwards left him and contributed to the recovery of that kingdom for the house of Aragon. Prospero, after distinguishing himself in many battles, was, in 1515, made prisoner at Villafranca. On regaining his liberty, he attacked the French with vigour, and having defeated them at the battle of Bicocca, relieved Milan in 1522.

Born 1452; died 1523.

COLONNA, POMPEO, a Roman cardinal, who, although a follower of the church, was strongly imbued with a military disposition. After he became bishop of Rieti, he had a quarrel with a Spaniard, whom, on account of his profession, he dared not fight, and therefore revenged himself upon his own episcopal garments, by tearing them to pieces. On a false rumour of the death of Pope Julius II. in 1512, Colonna, with Savillo, a young nobleman, excited the Roman people to a revolt, and seized the Capitol, for which he was deprived of his preferments. He recovered the pope's favour afterwards, and Leo X. made him a cardinal. In 1526 he engaged in another conspiracy to surprise Rome, and to put the pope to death, which, however, was defeated, and he suffered deprivation. This occurrence was the occasion of the sack of Rome by the constable Bourbon. Colonna, however, had sufficient influence to obtain the liberty of the pope, who restored him to his rank. He afterwards became viceroy of Naples. He wrote a poem entitled "De Laudibus Mulierum."

Died 1532.

COLONNA, MARC ANTONIO, duke of Paliano, served with such reputation in the famous battle of Lepanto, gained over the Turks in 1571, as to be honoured with a triumphal entry into Rome by the pope. He was made constable of Naples and viceroy of Sicily.

Died 1584.

COLONNA, FABIO, an Italian philosopher, who made great progress in the languages, mathematics, law, and the fine arts; but applied himself principally to physic and botany. At the age of 24 he published an elegant botanical work, the plates of which he executed himself. In 1610 he issued another, which was not completed till 1616. He was the first who distinguished the petals of flowers by names distinct from the leaves, and used the method of arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. He was also the inventor of a musical instrument called a pentachordon.

Born at Naples, about 1567; died 1647.

COLONNA, VITTORIA, Italian poetess, daughter of Fabrizio Colonna, high constable of Naples. At the age of 17 she married, but was left a widow at the age of 35, and then devoted herself to poetry, her late husband being the chief subject of her muse. Her poems are graceful, true in sentiment, and religious in tone.

Born 1490; died 1547.

COLONNELLA, ko-lon-nel'-la, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, near the right bank of the Tranto. There are five churches and a convent. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

COLONSAY. (See HEBRIDES.)

COLOPHON, kol'-o-fon, a town of Asia Minor, 9 miles N. of Ephesus, at a small distance from the sea, first built by Mopsus, the son of Manto, and colonized by the sons of Codrus. It was the native country of Mimnermus, Nicander, and Xenophanes, and one of the cities which claimed the honour of having given birth to Homer. Apollo had a temple in it.

COLORADO, ko-lo-ra'-do, one of the United States of America, W. of the Rocky Mountains; bounded on the N. by Nebraska and the territory of Wyoming; E. by Kansas, W. by Utah, and S. by the territory of New Mexico. It is quadrangular in shape, and traversed from north to south by the Rocky Mountains. There are several large and fertile valleys or basins in the centre, and in the southern part the remarkable valley of San Luis, or San Luis Park, as it is generally named. It is an immense depression, with smooth and concave bottom, forming a nearly regular ellipsis 210 miles long and 100 miles wide, with an area of 9,400 square miles. On the east side the mountains rise abruptly to a great altitude; on the west the sierras rise in broad ledges, in the form of an amphitheatre. Some of the peaks of the surrounding mountains are 16,000 feet high. Around the depression, no doubt at some remote time the basin of an inland sea, is a broad belt of level ground, the former beach, which, with the lower slopes of the mountains, affords good pasturage. There is abundant vegetation on the mountain sides up to about 6,000 feet, when it abruptly ceases, leaving bare peaks of granite crowned with perpetual snow. The average height of the plain above the sea level is 6,000 feet. The only practicable entrance to San Luis Park is by the Poncho Pass on the south.

Rivers.—The Arkansas, Grand del Norte, Grand Costilla, Sampa, and a branch of the Nebraska.

Minerals.—The state is rich in gold, which has induced great "rushes" of miners; silver, copper, iron, coal, salt, gypsum, and limestone. There are many mineral springs.

Area.—105,000 square miles.
Pop.—194,327.
Chief Towns.—DENVER, Golden City (the state capital), Central City, and Montgomery City. There are a large number of settlements which sprang into existence after the influx of miners. Manitou and Idaho are much resorted to on account of the mineral springs.
History.—Colorado was established as a territory in 1861, and admitted as a state of the Union in March, 1875.

COLORADO, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 16,673. Columbus is the capital.

COLORADO RIVER, an immense river of North America, formed principally by the junction of the Green and Grand rivers, rising in the Rocky Mountains, the former near Fremont's Peak, and the latter about 5 miles to the W. of Long's Peak. Each of these rivers has its source in mountain lakes fed by the snows of the lofty mountain ranges. Hundreds of smaller streams swell the volume of the Colorado, the region through which they flow being one of the most remarkable and picturesque in the world. Each stream cuts its way through the mountain ranges making narrow channels or "canons," or "gulches," and lofty perpendicular walls. The Colorado itself, a broad stream, flows with great velocity and with many cataracts and rapids for about 1,100 miles through a series of these canons of the most stupendous character. The perpendicular walls are in many parts more than 2,000 feet in height, and in more open parts are ranges of lofty mountains having the appearance of huge fortifications, and isolated masses like colossal towers. After a course of nearly 2,000 miles this wonderful river discharges into the Gulf of California.

COLORADO RIVER. (See TEXAS.)

COLORNO, ko-lor'-no, a town of Italy, province of Parma, on a river of the same name, which is crossed by two bridges. There are two large and handsome churches, a town-hall, palace, and several educational establishments. Manf. Woollen fabrics, candles, saltpetre, and wine. There is a trade in cattle, grain, and fruits, and an annual fair is held. Pop. 2,000.

COLQUITT, a county of Georgia, United States. Pop. 2,000.

COLOSSÆ, ko-los'-se, an ancient city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 65 A.D. The inhabitants were noted for their skill in dyeing wool.

COLUMBA, ST., ko-lum'-ba, early Irish missionary. His parents were of noble birth, and related to some of the chiefs of Ireland, and the West of Scotland. He studied under St. Finnan, who ordained him, and at an early age he exhibited great piety, and while yet young founded monasteries at Derry and Dunrow. Having offended some important persons, he was exiled, and settled in the Scottish island of Iona, or Hy, where he established a monastery, and then devoted himself to the conversion of the Pictish tribes beyond the Grampians. He was the first bishop of Dunkeld, the see of which he established. In the course of his labours he founded 37 churches in Ireland and 53 in Scotland.

Born at Donegal, 521; died 597.

COLUMBANUS, ko-lum-ba'-nus, another early Irish missionary, who, having studied in the monastery of Bangor, in Ulster, went to France with some companions, and founded monasteries at Annegray, Luxeuil, and Fontaine. His outspoken denunciation of vice in high places caused him to be expelled from France, and he went to Lombardy, where he founded the monastery of Bobbio, in the Apennines. He was remarkable for learning and eloquence.

Born in Leinster, 545; died at Bobbio, 615.

COLUMBIA, DISTRICT OF, the federal district of the United States, on the left bank of the Potomac river, 120 miles from its mouth, between Maryland and Virginia. Area, 60 square miles. Pop. 177,624 two-thirds white and one-third coloured.—It was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia, in 1790, and in 1800 became the seat of the general government. It is under the direct government of Congress. The district contains WASHINGTON, the capital of the United States, and GEORGETOWN.

COLUMBIA, ko-lum-be-a, a county of Arkansas, United States. Pop. 14,000.

COLUMBIA, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 2,400 square miles. Pop. 9,589. Alligator is the capital.

COLUMBIA, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 10,465. The capital is Appling.

COLUMBIA, a county of New York. United States. Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 47,500. Hudson is the capital.

COLUMBIA, a county of Oregon, United States. Pop. 2,042.

COLUMBIA, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 375 square miles. Pop. 32,409. The capital is Bloomsburg.

COLUMBIA, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 727 square miles. Pop. 29,000. Portage City is the capital.

COLUMBIA, the capital of South Carolina, United States. It occupies a commanding position in the centre of the state, on the left bank of the Congaree, and is regularly laid out with wide streets, crossing at right angles. It is the seat of a university, the buildings of which are extensive and handsome, and has a court-house, 12 churches, state lunatic asylum, and other fine public buildings. It is one of the most beautiful cities in the Southern States, and the climate rivals that of Italy. Pop. 12,000.

COLUMBIA, a town of Pennsylvania, United States, on the left bank of the Susquehanna, crossed by a bridge more than a mile long. There are 12 churches, a town-hall, market-hall, and other good buildings, and a large trade is carried on in coal, iron, lumber, and agricultural produce. Pop. 8,312.

COLUMBIA RIVER, or OREGON, the largest stream on the west side of America, is formed by the junction of two rivers, the Columbia Proper (mostly within British territory) and the Snake, rising in the Rocky Mountains, which unite in lat. 46° 5′ N., lon. 118° 55′ W., and enter the Pacific in about the same degree of latitude. There are many falls and rapids which much impede navigation, and the harbour at the mouth has a bar, which makes access difficult. The length of the river is about 1,000 miles.

COLUMBIA, BRITISH, a province of the dominion of Canada, British America, including Vancouver Island. (See VANCOUVER ISLAND.) The mainland portion lies between the Rocky Mountains on the E. and the North Pacific on the W., and north of the boundary of the United States, or the 49th parallel of N. latitude. The Rocky Mountains in this portion of the range attain an elevation of from 15,000 to 18,000 feet, and parallel ranges occupy the eastern portion of the province, forming a barrier broken only by a few difficult passes. Near the Pacific are ranges of hills, some of the peaks rising to 10,000 feet. There are large plains affording excellent pasturage, and parts of arable land of great fertility, and extensive forests. The coast is broken with long and narrow inlets, the largest of which are named Burrard, Bute and Millbank Sounds.

Rivers.—The rivers have the character of mountain torrents, flowing with great impetuosity through gorges. The most important at present is the Fraser, which rises on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, about Lat. 53° N. and Lon. 119° W. At first it flows in a north-westerly direction, then makes a rapid bend to the south, and receives on the left bank another rapid stream, the Thompson, after which it makes a sharp turn westward, and enters the Pacific through the Gulf of Georgia, a few miles below New Westminster, the capital of the province. It is navigable for steamers to about 90 miles from its mouth. The COLUMBIA flows through the south-eastern part of the province, and enters the United States. The Pease river, in the northern part, joins the Finlay, one of the rivers which mark the northern limit of the province. The Skrena, partly navigable by steamboats, is another river in the north. There are several long narrow mountain lakes, the chief of which are Babine, Upper Arrow, Kamloops, Stuart, and Okangar.

Pro.—The timber, a most important part of the natural wealth of the province, includes pine, fir, cedar, oak, maple, cypress, alder, and cottonwood. The fisheries are among the richest in the world, both on the coast and in the rivers; but as yet, for the want of access to markets and the greater attraction of gold mining, have been little developed.

Minerals.—The province is very rich in gold, the accidental discovery of which, in 1848, caused a "rush" of miners; the Cariboo district, near the junction of the Fraser and Thompson rivers, rivals the gold fields of Australia in productiveness, the precious metal being found not only in the beds of the rivers, but in the gulches and elevated districts around, in some cases not more than a foot below the surface. Indeed gold abounds in all the eastern part of the province, and recently the Ominica and other diggings in the north have been worked with great advantage. The value of the total yield for one year, with very imperfect appliances, reached £300,000. Silver is found over the lower portion of the Fraser river, and mines are now worked. There are also copper, coal, and iron.

Zoology.—Buffaloes, bears, elks, deer, goats, and sheep; and among valuable fur bearing animals the black, silver, and red fox, beaver, marten, sea-otter, and fur seal. Snipe and grouse are abundant.

Climate.—Near the sea it is moderate, the temperature seldom rising above 80°; but it is much colder in the elevated districts. The winter is very short and not severe.

Area (including Vancouver Island), 213,000 square miles.

Pop. 49,459.

History.—Previous to 1866, British Columbia and Vancouver Island were separate colonies, the former being a portion of the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1871 the colony became a portion of the Dominion of Canada, in the parliament of which it is represented by three senators and six members of the House of Commons; but it has a local legislature and a lieutenant-governor.

COLUMBIANA, ko-lum'-be-a'-na, a county of the United States, in the E. part of Ohio. Area, 740 square miles. Pop. 48,602. New Lisbon is the capital.

COLUMBUS, ko-lum'-bus, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 525 square miles. Pop. 14,439. Whitesville is the capital.

COLUMBUS, the capital of the State of Ohio, United States, on the east bank of the Scioto, near the centre of the State. It has a handsome capital, or State house, in the Doric style, 17 churches, colleges, educational institutions, asylum, and a large prison. Standing at the junction of five railways, and on the Ohio Canal the means of communication are ample, and an extensive trade is carried on. Pop. 51,647.

COLUMBUS, the capital of Muscogee county, Georgia, on the left bank of the Chattahoochee, which separates the State from Alabama. It is regularly and attractively laid out with good public buildings, and is a very busy commercial centre. Manf. Cotton, machinery, iron, and agricultural implements. Large quantities of cotton are shipped. The river is crossed by a handsome bridge. Pop. 10,123 nearly half being coloured.

COLUMBUS, the capital of Lowndes county, Mississippi, United States, on the left bank of the Tombigbee, and the centre of a fertile district. Cotton is extensively shipped, and a large trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER, a celebrated Genoese navigator, the son of a woolcomber of Genoa, named Colombo (of which Columbus is the Latinized form). He learned something of astronomy and navigation at Paris, and early in life made some voyages in the Mediterranean. In 1470 he settled at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was employed as a maker of charts. Here Christopher married the daughter of an Italian naval commander, called Palestrello, who had been employed in voyages of discovery. From the journals and charts of this seaman, he acquired a considerable share of nautical knowledge, and traded, himself, several years to the Canary islands, Madeira, the Azores, and the coast of Africa. Meanwhile, he began to entertain the idea of the existence of a new continent beyond the Atlantic Ocean. The more he considered the subject, the more he became confirmed in his opinion, and he applied, about 1482, to John II., king of Portugal, who dishonourably sent other navigators to test the value of the scheme of Columbus, but they made only short voyages and returned to Lisbon. The great Genoese was enraged at such treatment, and dispatched his brother Bartholomew to Henry VII. of England; but, on the voyage, he was taken by pirates. The scheme was proposed to the authorities at Genoa, who regarded it as extravagant. After many disappointments he obtained an audience of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. These sovereigns received him favourably, and in 1492 granted him three vessels to prosecute discoveries in those regions which, it was generally believed, had no existence, save in his own imagination. The conditions stipulated between him and his royal employers were, "that if he made no discoveries, he should have no reward; that if he did, he should be viceroy by land and admiral by sea, and have the tenths of the profits of all the countries discovered by him; and that these privileges should descend to his family." On August 3, 1492, Columbus and his little squadron set sail on their perilous voyage, from the bar of Saltes, near Palos, and, after some misgivings and many trials, on account of the superstitious terrors of his crew, landed, October 12, on an island, and erected the Spanish flag. This island, one of the Bahamas, he called St. Salvador. Thence he sailed to Cuba, and afterwards to Hispaniola (now Hayti). Having discovered other islands and taken possession of them in the name of their Catholic majesties, Columbus set sail for Europe on January 4, 1493, bringing with him some of the natives. On March 15 he arrived at Seville, and immediately went to Barcelona, where Ferdinand and Isabella received him under a canopy of cloth of gold, and made him sit beside them whilst they conferred on him several marks of favour. Columbus sailed on his second voyage from Cadiz, September 25, 1493, and discovered the Caribbee islands, Puerto Rico, and

Jamaica. On his return he suffered great hardships from sickness and disaffection among his men. Nevertheless, he conducted himself manfully, and arrived at Cadiz, June 11, 1496. On his arrival, he found that, during his absence, calumny had been doing its work against him; but he refuted all that had been alleged, and, on May 13, 1498, embarked on his third voyage with only six vessels. In this expedition he discovered the island of Trinidad, the mouths of the Orinoco, the coast of Paria, the Margarita, and the Cubagua islands, but on his arrival at Hispaniola, found the colony which he had settled there, in a state bordering on civil war. He succeeded in restoring peace; but some of the settlers, envious of him and his brother Bartholomew, whom he had appointed his lieutenant, sent home such accusations against them that Queen Isabella revoked the appointment of Columbus, and sent out Francis de Bovadilla to take his place. This man, on his arrival, caused the brothers to be put in chains, and, in that condition, sent them to Europe. The captain of the ship in which Columbus was now a prisoner would have taken off his fetters; but he refused to be liberated, except in the presence of his sovereigns. "I will wear them till the king otherwise commands, and then I will preserve them as memorials of his gratitude;" an expression indicative of a mind by far too lofty to be in the power of kings to humiliate. All Spain felt, with indignation, the insult offered to so great a man. He was instantly set at liberty, and rewarded, instead of being punished, Ferdinand himself avowing shame at the transaction. Columbus, however, always preserved his fetters, and ordered that they should be buried with him. In 1502 he made another voyage, in which he traced the coast of Darien, thinking to find a passage to the East Indies, coasted Honduras, the Mosquito shore, Costa Rica, and Veragua. He returned to Spain in 1504, and found Queen Isabella dead, and the king once more prejudiced against him. Worn out in body and broken in spirit, he lingered out the short remainder of his existence in neglect, poverty, and pain. His remains were interred in the cathedral of Seville, where a monument was erected to his memory, bearing this inscription: "To Castile and Leon, Columbus has given a new world."

Born at Genoa, 1440; died at Valladolid, 1506.

COLUMELLA, LUCIUS JUNIUS MODERATUS, kol'-u-mel'-la, a native of Gades (Cadiz, in Spain), who wrote twelve books on agriculture, of which the tenth, on gardening, is in verse. The style is elegant, and the work displays the genius of a naturalist and the labours of an accurate observer.

Lived in the 1st century.

COMACCHIO, ko-mak'-ke-o, a fortified town of Italy, province of Ferrara, on the midst of a large salt lagoon, 3 miles from the Adriatic. The great industries are the manufacture of salt, for which the situation of the town gives great facilities, and the culture of eels, of which about 1,000,000 lbs. weight is annually taken. Other fish are admitted into the lagoon by canals cut to the Adriatic, and the fishery, especially of soles and mullets, is valuable. Pop. 6,000. The right of maintaining a garrison in this town and Ferrara was ceded to Austria by the treaty of 1815.

COMAYAGUA, or VALLADOLID-LA-NUEVA, ko-ma-yag'-u-a, a town of Honduras, Central America, on the left bank of the Sirano. There are a fine church, several convents, a college, and a large hospital. The district is famous for a breed of cattle. Pop. 12,000.

COMBACONUM, kom-bac'-o-num, a town of British India, 30 miles E. of Tanjore, the ancient capital of the Chola dynasty. It is considered to be a place of great sanctity, and thousands of Hindoos resort to it to wash in the tanks supposed to be filled by a subterranean passage and water from the Ganges. There are many temples, and the permanent inhabitants are chiefly Brahmins. Pop. 40,000.

COMBE, GEORGE, koom, a distinguished Scotch phrenologist and moral philosopher, was educated for the legal profession, in which he practised for 25 years. Made a convert to the principles of Gall and Spurzheim, when about thirty years of age, he began to apply himself zealously to their further elucidation, and in 1819 published his "Essays on Phrenology." From that time he continued to expound the phenomena of mental organism, and in 1828 published "The Constitution of Man, in relation to External Objects." This work became extremely popular, and both in Britain and America enjoyed a large circulation. In 1833 appeared his lectures on "Popular Education," which he had previously delivered in various parts of Britain, and which have been translated into several continental languages. In 1836 he became a candidate for the chair of logic and metaphysics in the university of Edinburgh, but the honour was awarded to Sir William Hamilton. Subsequently, Mr. Combe made a tour through the United States, lecturing to distinguished audiences, and, at the same time, keeping himself before the public eye by the publication of several pamphlets. He also visited Germany, and in 1845 published "Notes on the New Reformation in Germany, &c.," and an essay on the "Relation between Religion and Science." In 1850 he edited the "Life and Correspondence" of his brother Andrew, and in 1855 produced a work entitled "Phrenology applied to Painting and Sculpture." These are his prominent labours in literature and moral science; but he has written upon educational and other kindred subjects. He married Cecilia, daughter of Mrs. Siddons, the great actress.

Born, 1788; died, Aug. 14, 1858.

COMBE, ANDREW, brother of the preceding, a distinguished medical practitioner. He wrote and published several excellent works on physiological science, especially on the management of infancy and the "Principles of Physiology applied to the Preservation of Health," which have passed through many editions. He suffered for many years from pulmonary disease, and his death was hastened by the foul atmosphere of a ship in which he made a voyage to America.

Born in Edinburgh, 1797; died 1847.

COMBE, WILLIAM, a humorous and miscellaneous writer, educated at Eton and Oxford, author of a great number of works, of which the best known is the "Three Tours of Doctor Syntax," He supplied the text for many illustrated works of topography. He ran through a fortune, and his life was passed in pecuniary difficulties.

Born at Bristol, 1741; died in London, 1823.

COMBERMERE, STAPLETON COTTON, Viscount, was the eldest son of Sir R. S. Cotton, M.P. for Cheshire. At the age of 17 he entered the army. Engaged, first in Flanders, next at the Cape of Good Hope, and then in India, he saw a good deal of service, when he returned to England, and accompanied the Duke of Wellington to the Peninsula. Here he greatly distinguished himself, and in 1810 was appointed, under the duke, to the command of the cavalry of the allied forces. He continued actively engaged till the close of the war, when he received the thanks of Parliament, and in 1814 was raised to the peerage as Baron Combermere. In 1817 he was appointed governor of Barbadoes, with the command of the forces in the W. Indies. This position he, in 1822, exchanged for the command of the British troops in India, and in 1825 distinguished himself at the siege and capture of the fortress of Bhurtpore, for which he was raised to the rank of viscount. On the death of the Duke of Wellington, in 1852, he became constable of the Tower of London, and lord-lieutenant of the Tower Hamlets. In 1855 he became a field-marshal, and also held the appointment in the court as gold stick in waiting on her majesty, Queen Victoria.

Born in Denbighshire, 1773; died 1865.

COMBOURG, kom'-boorg, a town of France, in the department of the Ille and Vilaine, 20 miles from St. Malo. Pop. 5,100.

COMENIUS, JOHN AMOS, ko-ma'-ne-us, German educational reformer, and bishop of the Moravian brethren. He published a method of teaching languages, which was extensively translated; and went to Sweden and Hungary, where he matured plans for the organization of schools, and afterwards settled at Amsterdam. He produced the first picture-book for the education of children. In his latter years he became a fanatical believer in the immediate commencement of the Millennium.

Born 1592; died at Naarden, Holland, 1671.

COMISA, ko-mé'-sa, a town of the Austrian empire, in Dalmatia, on the W. side of the island of Lissa. There is a harbour, defended by a town. The sardine fishery gives employment to a great number of the inhabitants. Pop. 2,400.

COMISO, ko-mé'-so, a town of Sicily, 40 miles S.W. of Syracuse. Manf. Paper. Pop. 19,305.

COMITAN, or COMITLAN, a town of Mexico, in the state of Chiapas, on the Grijalva, 40 miles S.E. of San Christoval. Pop. 10,000.

COMMERCY, kom'-mer-se, a town of France, department Meuse, on the left bank of the Meuse, 20 miles E. of Bar-le-Duc. This town was formerly fortified, and had a fine castle, which serves now as a cavalry barracks. Manf. Cotton, hardware, iron, and leather. Pop. 3,400.

COMMERSON, PHILIBERT, kom'-mair-sawng, a celebrated French botanist, who made a voyage round the world, and collected a vast variety of plants. He did not live long enough to describe his discoveries, but his collection and drawings were deposited in the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris.—To him we are indebted for the beautiful flower "hortensia," which came originally from China.

Born at Châtillon, Ain, 1727; died at Mauritius, 1773.

COMMINES, or COMINES, kom-meen, a town of Belgium, in the province of West Flanders, 8 miles S.E. of Ypres. It stands on the frontier, and is connected by a bridge across the Lys with the French town of the same name. Manf. Ribbons, handkerchiefs, cotton goods, leather, thread, and tobacco. There are dyeworks, bleaching grounds, and oil-mills. Pop. 3,500.

COMMINES, a town of France, situate on the Lys, opposite the Belgian town of the same name, of which, previous to the cession of French Flanders to France, in the 17th century, it formed a portion, 9 miles from Lille. Manf. Thread, ribbons, and leather. Pop. 3,000.

COMMINES, or COMYNES, PHILIP DE, a French statesman and historian, who was descended from a noble family, and became eminent at the court of Louis XI. He was first attached to Charles the Bold, of Burgundy, but, in 1472, transferred his services to Louis. After the death of this monarch, he joined himself to the party of the duke of Orleans, who afterwards became Louis XII., but was unfortunate in being imprisoned and having his property confiscated. Shortly after the accession of Louis XII., who did not please to remember the sacrifices he had made for him, he retired to the country, and passed the remainder of his days in writing his memoirs, which show a great knowledge of men and things, an acuteness of judgment in tracing circumstances to their causes, and are enriched with a variety of excellent observations. He is introduced into Scott's novel "Quentin Durward."

Born near Commines, 1445; died at Argenton, Poitou, 1509.

COMMODUS, LUCIUS AURELIUS ANTONIUS, kom-mo'-dus, a Roman emperor, son of Marcus Aurelius, succeeded his father in 180. He was naturally depraved and licentious, committing the most terrible cruelties and crimes. Of great stature and strength, he would fight with the gladiators, who were allowed only soft leaden weapons, while he had a sharp sword, and of course was victor, never failing to kill his opponents, and boasted of his dexterity in killing wild beasts in the amphitheatre. He claimed to be worshipped as a god under the title of Hercules Romanus. Marcia, one of his concubines, whose death he had meditated, and his chamberlain, Eclectus, attempted to poison him, but failing, caused him to be strangled.

Born 161; died 192.

COMMORRO ISLANDS, kom-mor'-ro, a group in the Mozambique Channel, between Madagascar and Africa. It consists of several mountainous and fertile islands, producing all the crops of a tropical climate. Large herds of cattle are reared upon them, and the rivers abound in fish. Pop. 80,000. Lat. between 11° and 13° S. Lon. between 43° and 45° 30′ E.—A British consul has now a residence on these islands.

COMNENUS. (See ALEXIS, ANNA, ISAAC, &c.)

COMO, ko'-mo, an old episcopal city of Northern Italy, at the S. extremity of the lake of the same name, 20 miles from Milan. The houses are neatly built of stone, and the public buildings and palaces of the nobility magnificent. There are several churches, exclusive of the cathedral, which is entirely of white marble, and a beautiful town-hall. The port is formed by two handsome piers. Manf. Velvet, taffetas, cotton, gloves, stockings, soap; here are also metal-foundries and statuaries. Pop. 25,560. The town was the Roman Comum Novum. It was destroyed in the 12th century, during the wars with Milan, but rebuilt by Frederick Barbarossa about 1155. It was a republic for two centuries. Pop. of the compartment, 533,011.

COMO, LAKE, situate at the foot of the Alps. Ext. About 35 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 3. The promontory of Bellagio divides the lake into three portions, the northern of which is sometimes named Bellano, the longer southern branch Como, and the shorter Lecco. It is the most distinguished for the beauty of its scenery of all the northern Italian lakes, and many beautiful villas are on its shores. The river Adda enters it at the foot of the Lepontine and Rhætian Alps, and leaves it at Lecco.

COMODO, ko-mo-do', an island of the Malayan Archipelago, 35 miles long, and 16 wide, in the strait which separates the islands of Sambawa and Flores. Lat. 8° 22′ S. Lon. 119° 37′ E.

COMORIN, CAPE, kom'-o-rin, the S. extremity of the Indian peninsula. Lat. 8° 5′ N. Lon. 77° 37′ E.

COMORN, or KOMORN, ko'-morn, a royal free town of Hungary, on the island of Schütt, at the junction of the Waag and the Danube, 50 miles N.W. of Pesth. The fortifications extend for seven miles along the rivers, and the citadel is considered one of the strongest in Europe. The town is irregularly built, with narrow streets. Manf. Woollens and leather. A trade in corn, wine, timber, and fish is carried on. Pop. 12,500, nearly all Magyars.—This place withstood successfully a long siege by the Austrians in 1849.

COMORO ISLES, ko'-mo-ro, four islands in the Mozambique Channel, between Africa and Madagascar, known as Angaziya, or Great Comoro; Anjonan, or Johanna; Mayotta, and Mohilla. They are mountainous, and of volcanic origin, but fertile. Mayotta was ceded to France in 1842, and sugar is extensively cultivated there. Anjonan is frequented by ships for supplies of provisions. Manf. Firearms, jewellery, and coarse cloths. Pop. 86,000, chiefly Mahometans. Lat. between 10° and 13° S. Lon. 43° and 45° 30′ E.

COMPIEGNE, kom'-pe-ain, a town of France, in the department of the Oise, on the Oise, 35 miles S.E. of Beauvais. There is a handsome stone bridge over the river. Its palace was built by Louis XV., after designs by Gabriel, and restored by Napoleon I. The parks and forests by which it is encompassed cover 30,000 acres. The other chief buildings are the abbey of St. Corneille and the Hôtel-de-Ville. Manf. Hosiery, ropes, and boat-building. There is a trade in timber and corn. Pop. 11,116. Here Joan of Arc was, in 1430, made prisoner, and sold to the English, and here Napoleon I., in 1810, married the archduchess of Austria. It was possessed by the English from the early part of the 15th century till they were expelled by Charles VII. Under Napoleon III., the festivals at Compiègne, after the manner of the court of Louis XIV., attained quite a celebrity.

COMPOSTELLA. (See ST. JAGO DE COMPOSTELLA.)

COMPOSTELLA, a town of the Mexican confederation, in the department of Xalisco, and 100 miles from Guadalaxara. There are silver-mines in its neighbourhood, but its climate is very unhealthy.

COMPTON, HENRY, kom'-ton, an English prelate, son of the earl of Northampton, who fell in the royal cause at the battle of Hopton Heath. Originally in the army, he entered into orders, and, in 1674 was preferred to the bishopric of Oxford, and, the year following, translated to London. He now had the charge of educating the princesses Mary and Anne, afterwards queens of England. James II., on the bishop's refusal to suspend Dr. Sharpe, removed him from his episcopal functions; but, before the Revolution, he was restored. On the landing of the prince of Orange, he conveyed the princess Anne from London to Nottingham, and exhibited great zeal in placing William and Mary on the throne, at whose coronation he officiated, instead of Archbishop Sancroft. This prelate was fond of botany, having the finest garden of exotics in England, and greatly assisted Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists.

Born 1632; died at Fulham, 1713.

COMTE, AUGUSTE, konte, a modern French speculative philosopher, the founder of the "Positive" philosophy, who commenced his public life as a follower of Saint-Simon, and, in 1820, prepared a work explanatory of the system of that enthusiast. He subsequently became mathematical professor at the Polytechnic school, but, in consequence of some disputes with his colleagues, he resigned in 1825. Between 1830 and 1842 he published, in six large volumes, his "Course of Positive Philosophy," the object of which was to show that the human mind passes through three successive stages in its meditations upon all subjects. The first is the theological; the second, the metaphysical; and the third, the positive, in which the mind is supposed to have attained its great power of comprehending all things connected with those laws by which the universe is governed, to abandon inquiries as to the causes of things, and to restrict itself to the investigation of phenomena. In 1843 he published a mathematical work, and, in the following year, a "Discourse," intended to enforce the views of his larger work. M. Comte's theories, whatever may be their value, attracted a considerable number of ardent admirers, especially amongst the disciples of Saint-Simon and Fourier. At Paris a kind of institution was formed for inculcating the doctrines of the "religion of humanity," of which he himself was the high priest, and of which all the members worked, with much activity, to spread the ideas of their master. These ideas were developed in a series of works, of which the first was his "Positive Philosophy." He has many followers among the intellectual men of his own country, France, and Germany.

Born at Montpellier, 1795; died at Paris, 1857.

COMUS, ko'-mus, in legend, the god of revelry, feasting, and nocturnal entertainments. He is represented as a youth, flushed with drinking, and crowned with roses.

CONCAN, kon-kan', the name given to a narrow district of S. India, in the Bombay presidency, bounded E. by the Western Ghauts, and W. by the Arabian Sea. It is 330 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 25 to 52. The surface of the country, especially the eastern portion, is rugged and rocky, intersected with ravines, covered with jungle, and fields fertile in rice. Lat. between 15° 44′ and 20° 22′ N. Lon. between 72° 52′ and 73° 45′ E. —The Concan became British territory on the fall of the Peishwa of the Mahrattas in 1818.

CONCARNEAU, kon-kar-no', a seaport-town of France, department Finistère, on a small island in the bay of La Foret, 12 miles S.E. of Quimper. It is fortified, and contains some old houses. There is good anchorage for small vessels. The pilchard fishery is a most important industry. Pop. 3,500.

CONCEPCION, kon-sep'-shon, a town and port of Chili, capital of a province of the same name, on the N. shore of the Biobio. At its commencement it flourished greatly; but in 1751 it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake and an influx of the sea. A new city was then founded, at the distance of 3 miles from the sea, in a beautiful plain. This new city also suffered greatly from an earthquake in 1835; but has been rebuilt, and is now a very handsome place, with a cathedral and other fine public buildings. The port is at Talcahuano, where is the best harbour on the Chilian coast. A large foreign trade, especially in hides and tallow, is done, and great commercial advantage has been derived from the discovery of coal-fields in the vicinity. Pop. 1,900. Lat. 36° 50′ S. Lon. 73° 5′ W.

CONCEPCION, province of, between the Andes and the coast, consists of extensive plains, some of them almost deserts, and forests of small stunted trees. Area, 3,850 square miles. Pop. 174,885.

CONCEPCION, or LA VEGA, a town of Hayti, West Indies. The ruins of the old town, founded by Columbus, and destroyed by an earthquake in 1564, are about 3 miles to the west. Pop 5,000.

CONCEPTION BAY, a large bay on the E. side of Newfoundland island. It extends inland 38 miles, and has an average breadth of 20 miles. Lat. 48° N. Lon. 53° 30′ W.

CONCHAS, or CONCHOS, kon'-chas, a river of Mexico, in the state of Durango, rising in lat. 28° N., and after an estimated course of 300 miles, joining the Rio del Norte in lat. 30° 30′ N.; lon. 104° W.

CONCHES, kawnsh, a town of France, in the department of the Eure, 10 miles S.W. of Evreux. Manf. Agricultural implements, nails, leather, and pottery. There are mineral springs in the neighbourhood. Pop. 1,700.

CONCINI, CONCINO, kon-se'-ne, known as Marshal d'Ancre, went, in 1600, from Florence to France, with Mary de Medici, wife of Henry IV. After the death of that king he obtained a marquisate and some considerable appointments. At the same time, he was first minister of the young king, Louis XIII., over whom he exercised great influence. He, however, incurred the jealousy of the nobles, and, at their instigation, Concini was assassinated. His wife was afterwards condemned to death for the practice of sorcery, and their son declared by the parliament, disennobled, and incapable of holding any estates in the kingdom.

Died 1617.

CONCORD, kon'-kord, the capital of New Hampshire, United States, on the Merrimac, 63 miles N.W. of Boston. There are a fine state house, a city hall, several churches, a state lunatic asylum, and other good public buildings. Manf. Carriages, woollen and cotton goods, cabinet work, and musical instruments. There are valuable quarries of granite in the neighbourhood. Pop. 13,000.

CONCORD, a town of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, United States, 22 miles N.W. of Boston. Here, on April 19, 1775, one of the first conflicts took place between the Americans and the British troops. Pop. 3,922.

CONCORDIA, kon-kor'-de-a, the goddess of peace. The Roman dictator Camillus first raised a temple to her in the Capitol; and in it the magistrates often assembled.

CONCORDIA, a town of the Argentine Confederation, on the right bank of the Uruguay, 60 miles above Concepcion. A large transit and foreign trade is carried on. Pop. 2,500.

CONDE, kon'-dai, a town of France, in the department Nord, at the junction of the Haine and Scheldt, 6 miles N.E. of Valenciennes. It is strongly fortified, and has a church, town-hall, military arsenal, and a hospital. Manf. Leather, chicory, soap, cotton goods, cutlery, nails, and starch. Pop. 2,800. In 1793 this town was taken by the Austrians.

CONDE-SUR-NOIVEAU, mwaw'-o, a French town, department of Calvados, 25 miles S.W. of Caen, at the junction of the Noiveau and Durance. Manf. Cotton goods, leather and cutlery. There is a large cattle trade. Pop. 6,400.

CONDE, LOUIS, the first prince of, a chief of the Huguenots, was the son of Charles de Bourbon, duke of Vendôme. He took an active part against the house of Guise, and engaged in a conspiracy against Francis II., but was taken prisoner and condemned to be executed, from which fate he was saved by the death of the king. Charles IX. pardoned him, and made him governor of Picardy. He became so discontented with the measures of the dukes de Guise, that he joined the Huguenot party. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Dreux, in 1562, and slain in that of Jarnac.

Born 1530; died 1569.

CONDE, LOUIS II., prince of, known as the "Great Condé," was the son of Prince Henry II. of Condé, and was first known as duke d'Enghien. In early years he showed great military genius, and at 22 entirely defeated, in 1643, the Spanish at Rocroy, although very inferior to them in numbers. The following year he gained the battle of Friburg, and, in 1645, that of Nordingen, in Germany. Less fortunate in Catalonia, he failed in his attempt to take Lerida, but, soon after, defeated the archduke Leopold at Lens, which led to the peace with Germany, in 1648. During the troubles of the Fronde, Condé, who had at first, taken part with the court, afterwards sided against Mazarin. In 1650 he was arrested and deprived of his liberty for thirteen months. Set free, he hastened to avenge his wrongs, and, levying a body of troops, marched on Paris, but after some successes, was beaten by Turenne, in the faubourg St. Antoine. He then joined the Spaniards in the Netherlands, when, in 1649, the peace of the Pyrenees restored him to his country. War afterwards breaking out between France and Spain, he, in 1668, conquered Franche-Comté in three weeks, and in 1673 evinced great talents in the war with Holland. The hard fought battle of Senef was his last exploit. His closing days he spent at Chantilly, enjoying the friendship of Boileau, Molière, and Racine. Bossuet delivered his funeral oration, which is considered a masterpiece of eloquence.

Born at Paris, 1621; died 1686.

CONDE, JOSE ANTONIO, a Spanish Orientalist, who distinguished himself, in 1796, by his translations of some of the Greek Minor poets, and in 1799 by a translation of "Al-Edrisi's Description of Spain," from the Arabic. He subsequently became a member of the Spanish Academy, and superintended, in conjunction with two other littérateurs, the continuation of the collection of early Castilian poetry by Sanchez. When the French invaded his country, he was appointed by Joseph Bonaparte chief librarian of the Madrid library. After the French were expelled from the Peninsula, he went to Paris, where he resided for some years, but returned to Spain only to pass the remainder of his days in obscurity, neglect, and poverty.

Born at Paraleja, in the province of Cuença, 1765; died at Madrid, 1820.

CONDESUYOS, kon-da-su-yos', a district of Peru, in the province of Arequipa. There is excellent pasturage on the high grounds, and wine, grain, and cochineal are produced in the valleys. There are gold mines in the vicinity. Pop. 20,000.

CONDILLAC, ETIENNE BONNOT DE, Mably de, kon-de'-yak, a distinguished French metaphysician, whose admiration of the English philosopher John Locke led him, in 1746, to publish his "Essay on the Origin of Human Perceptions," which, in 1749, he followed by his "Treatise on Systems." The former was designed to advance the opinions of Locke, and the latter to oppose the abstract theories of Leibnitz and Spinosa, as being opposed to ideas received from experience. His third work was a "Treatise on the Sensations," which is considered his master-piece, and in which his philosophical system is fully unfolded. After the publication of these works, he was appointed tutor to the prince of Parma, and, in this situation, published his "Course of Studies," which he divides into the arts of writing, reasoning, and thinking, followed by a general history of men and empires. When he had finished the education of his royal pupil, he resigned himself once more to philosophical meditations, in which he passed the remainder of his days. Previous to his death, however, he published a work on "Logic."

Born at Grenoble, 1715; died 1780.

CONDOM, kon'-dom, a town of France, in the department of Gers, 28 miles S.E. of Bordeaux. The parish church, formerly the cathedral, is a fine Gothic edifice. Manf. Woollen yarns, leather, corks, brandy, and earthenware. Pop. 4,000.

CONDORCET, JEAN ANTOINE NICOLAS DE CARITAT, marquis of, kon-dor'-sai, a French philosopher, educated at the college of Navarre, where he soon distinguished himself as a geometer. In 1765 he published his first work, "On Integral Calculations," which was received with approbation by the Academy of Sciences. In 1767 he published his treatise, "Of the Problem of Three Bodies;" and the year following his "Analytical Essays." In 1769 he was chosen member of the Academy, and in 1777 secretary. His "Life of Turgot" is reckoned an admirable piece of biography; but that of Voltaire, of whom he was an original disciple, is flattering beyond bounds. At the Revolution he was member for Paris in the Legislative Assembly, of which he was chosen president. He was subsequently a member of the National Assembly, and of the Jacobin club. He offered many insults to King Louis in his misfortunes, though he opposed his being brought to trial. When Robespierre arrived at power, Condorcet was denounced as a Girondist, and concealed himself for some time in the house of Madame Verney, and while there he wrote his "Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind." Fearing, however, that she might suffer on his account, he voluntarily quitted her roof, and became a houseless wanderer in the country around Paris, with nowhere to lay his head. At last the necessities of hunger drove him into a small inn at the village of Clamart, where he was taken and committed to prison. On the following morning he was found dead in his cell, having terminated his existence by taking poison, which, to save himself from the ignominy of the scaffold, he always carried about with him. Besides the works we have mentioned, he contributed to the Encyclopédie, and wrote a "Tract on Calculation," and an "Elementary Treatise on Arithmetic." He had a lofty mind, and endeavoured to make his philosophy applicable to the happiness of his fellow-men, and influential in ameliorating the severities of social institutions. His manners were cold, but his heart was warm. D'Alembert said of him that he was a volcano covered with snow.

Born near Nion, in Dauphiny, 1743; died in the prison of Bourg-la-Reine, 1794.

CONDRIEU, kon-dryuh, a town of France, department of the Rhone, on the right bank of the river of that name, 21 miles S. of Lyons. Manf. Silk, wine, leather, and casks. Boat-building and dyeing are carried on. Pop. 3,109.

CONECTE, THOMAS, ko-nec'-te, a Carmelite monk of Rennes, whose preaching exercised an extraordinary influence,—women throwing their ornaments, and men their dice and cards, into huge bonfires lighted for the purpose. But he ventured also to denounce the licentiousness of the priests, and of the papal court, and he was charged with heresy and burnt.

CONECUH, koné'-ku, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 1,476 square miles. Pop. 12,605.

CONEGLIANO, ko-nel-ya'-no, a town of Northern Italy, 12 miles N.E. of Treviso. It is picturesquely situated on the slope of a hill, and has a citadel and a cathedral. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics. Pop. 6,500.

CONFEDERATION OF THE RHINE, a confederation of 16 of the states of Germany, formed in 1806 under the protection of Napoleon I. On the fall of the emperor of the French, these united with the other German states to constitute the Germanic Confederation.

CONFLANS, kon-flahn', a town of France, department Haute-Savoie, 24 miles N.E. of Chambéry. In its neighbourhood are smelting works for silver ore, found in the vicinity. It was formerly fortified, but was dismantled by the French in 1536. Pop. 1,500.

CONFOLENS, kawn'-fo-lens, a town of France, in the department Charente, 27 miles W. of Limoges. It stands on the Vienne, which is here crossed by a bridge, and it has a trade in cattle, corn, and timber. Pop. 2,300.

CONFUCIUS, or KON-FU-TZE, or KONG-FU-TSE, kon-fu'-she-us, a Chinese philosopher. He lost his father before his third year; but he had a learned man for his grandfather, who bestowed great pains upon him, and early brought his understanding to maturity. While quite a youth he held the important public appointments of inspector of corn-markets and of flocks and pastures, in performing the duties of which his energy and integrity were conspicuous. At the age of 23 his mother died, and he then resigned his appointments, gave himself to study, and formed the project of a general reformation in the kingdom. At that time the Chinese empire was not consolidated under one sovereign, but seems to have been divided into several separate kingdoms. Notwithstanding the respect which the king and the people of Lu, his native country, had for the great wisdom of Confucius, he was driven from the country, and became an outcast and a wanderer. He continued, however, to disseminate his doctrines, passing through several states, endeavouring to bring mankind to wisdom and happiness. His followers became numerous, and of them he selected ten as his chosen disciples, to whom he imparted the treasures of wisdom. These assisted in spreading his tenets, until they were almost universally adopted by the people, and they became the great authority of Chinese politics and morals. When the king of Lu was informed of the death of the great philosopher, he burst into tears and said, "that Heaven, being displeased with him, had taken away Confucius." From that time his memory was cherished as that of a saint, and several magnificent structures were raised to his honour. His proper name was Kong, but his followers added the words "fu-tse," meaning master or teacher. His books are regarded by the Chinese as the fountain of wisdom; and, according to all authorities, they deserve the praise bestowed upon them, as far as regards a pure morality. Their instructions are cherished not only by the Chinese, but by the Cochin-Chinese and the Coreans, and other people. His descendants are held in veneration, and enjoy extra privileges, at this day.

Born at Shang-ping, 551 B.C.; died 479 B.C.

CONGLETON, kon'-gel-ton, a market-town of Cheshire, on the Dane, 8 miles S. of Macclesfield. It has several chapels, a gaol, a market-house, and an assembly-room. Manf. Silks and ribbons. There are coal-mines in the vicinity. Pop. 11,344.

CONGO, kon'-go, an extensive country in the S.W. of Africa, bounded on the N. by the river Zaire, or Congo, which separates it from Loango; on the W. by the Atlantic; on the S. by the Dande, and on the E. by the countries in the interior. It formerly embraced Angola, Benguela, and Loango; but is now understood to consist of a limited tract of about 180 miles of coast line. Near the coast, the country is level, and well watered, but intolerably hot. Farther inland is an elevated district, very fertile, and with a mild climate. Its capital is Banza, or San Salvador. Pro. Maize, millet, yams, sugar, oil palms, tobacco, cabbages, spinach, pepper, the orange, the lime, and the pine-apple. Pop. 500,000. — It was first discovered in 1484, by Diego Cam, a Portuguese.

CONGOON, kon-goon, a seaport of Persia, on the Persian Gulf, 130 miles S.E. of Shiraz. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 27° 45′ N. Lon. 52° 12′ E.

CONGO RIVER (See ZAIRE).

CONGREVE, WILLIAM, kon'-greve, an English dramatic poet, brought up in Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; after which, he entered at the Middle Temple, but never followed the law. His first literary production was a romance called "Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled," written at the age of seventeen. In 1691 appeared his comedy of the "Old Bachelor," which was received with great applause at Drury Lane, and drew from Dryden the remark that he had never seen such a first play. It was the means of recommending him to the earl of Halifax, who made him a commissioner of the hackney-coach office. His next performance was the "Double Dealer;" and in 1695 he brought out his "Love for Love," and two years afterwards his "Mourning Bride." His next piece was "The Way of the World," which was so ill received, that it disgusted him with the stage, and determined him no longer to write for it. The great peculiarity of the comedies of Congreve is the brilliant wit of the dialogue. They are mostly founded on intrigue, and partake of the coarseness of his time. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Besides the above pieces, he wrote the "Judgment of Paris," a Masque; "Semele," an opera, and some poems. He left his fortune to Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough.

Born at Bardsey, near Leeds, Yorkshire, 1672; died in London, 1729.

CONGREVE, SIR WILLIAM, baronet, entered the army, and in 1816 was made a lieutenant-colonel, when he retired from the service. In 1808 he invented the congreve rocket, for which he received from the emperor of Russia the decoration of St. Anne, for the effects it produced at the battle of Leipsic in 1813. It proved similarly effective at Waterloo; but before either of these battles, it was employed by Lord Cochrane in his attack on the French fleet in the Basque Roads and at Walcheren. Sir William sat in Parliament for various constituencies, and was inspector of the royal laboratory at Woolwich. In 1826 he engaged in some mining transactions, which resulted in a suit in chancery and a decision against him of fraudulence. Sir William hastened to Toulouse, where, eleven days afterwards, he died.

Born in Middlesex, 1772; died 1828.

CONI, or CUNEO, ko'-ne, a town of Italy, the see of a bishop and the capital of the province of Cuneo, at the conflux of the Stura and Gesso, 48 miles S.W. of Turin. The principal street is tolerably wide, but the others are short and narrow. There are several churches, convents, and palaces. Manf. Silk and woollen cloths. A considerable trade in agricultural produce is carried on. Pop. 23,948.—This was a place of great strength till it was dismantled by the French after the battle of Marengo, in 1800. The ramparts now serve for promenades.

CONINGTON, JOHN, ko-ning'-ton, English classical scholar, educated at Rugby and Oxford, where he became professor of Latin literature in 1854. He translated several of the plays of Æschylus, edited Virgil and Horace, and contributed to the leading publications. He was considered to be the first classical scholar of his day.

Born at Boston, 1825; died 1869.

CONJEVERAM, CONDIVERAM, or CANCHIPURA, kon-jev-e-ram', "the golden city," a town of British India, 48 miles S.W. of Madras. It is built in a straggling manner, interspersed with gardens and cocoa-nut tree plantations. There are two splendid pagodas, one dedicated to Vishnu and the other to Siva, and many smaller pagodas. The town is surrounded by a thick hedge of aloe. Pop. 37,275.

CONN, LOUGH. (See MAYO.)

CONNAUGHT, kon'-nawt, the smallest of the four provinces into which Ireland is divided, bounded E. by Leinster, W. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. and N.W. by the ocean and Ulster, and S. by Munster. It contains the counties of Galway, Roscommon, Mayo, Sligo, and Leitrim. Mountainous in the west, north, and south, but almost level in the centre. On the west shore there are a great many peninsulas, indented with bays, whilst off the coast are numerous islands. Rivers. The Arrow, Bonnet, Moy, Clare, Renicon, and the Shannon forming its east boundary. Lakes. The Conn, Corrib, Carra, and Mask. Pro. The usual cerealia, vegetables, and roots. Pop. 817,197.—This was formerly one of the native Irish kingdoms, and the O'Connors were kings of Connaught. In 1590 it was brought under the administration of the English, and divided into counties.

CONNECTICUT, kon-nek'-te-kut, one of the United States, bounded N. by Massachusetts, E. by Rhode Island, S. by Long-Island Sound, and W. by New York. The surface is diversified by hills and valleys, and the soil, generally, rich and fertile, though interspersed with portions that are comparatively thin and barren.

Rivers.—The Connecticut, Thames, and Housatonic.

Pro.—Indian corn, rye, wheat in many parts, oats, barley, buckwheat, flax in large quantities, tobacco, some hemp, potatoes, pumpkins, turnips, pease, beans, &c. Orchards are very numerous, and cider is made for exportation. The state is, however, generally better adapted to the purposes of grazing than to those of tillage. The quantity of butter and cheese made annually is great, and of well-known excellence.

Minerals.—Marble, freestone, iron, and plumbago.

Manf.—Carpets, clothing, cotton and woollen goods (in very large quantities), silks, clocks, firearms, hardware, carriages, hats, indiarubber and elastic goods, iron castings, machinery, paper, plated ware, sewing machines, and tin ware, are among the leading manufacturing products.

Area, 4,750 square miles.
Pop. 622,700.

Lat. between 41° and 42° N. Lon. between 72° and 73° 50′ W.

History.—Connecticut was granted to Lord Say and Brooke in 1630, and two settlements were made a few years afterwards. They were united by a charter granted by Charles II. in 1665. It was one of the 13 States of the Union at the time of the declaration of independence in 1776. The present constitution was adopted in 1818.

CONNECTICUT RIVER, the largest in New England, United States, rises near the borders of Lower Canada, and running south, divides New Hampshire from Vermont. It then passes through Massachusetts and Connecticut, and flows into Long-Island Sound, between Saybrook and Lyme, in lat. 41° 16′ N. It has a course of about 400 miles, and a fall of nearly 1,600 feet. It is navigable for vessels of small size as high as Hartford, 50 miles from its mouth. The valley of the Connecticut is greatly admired for the beautiful scenery. The W. branch of this river forms the boundary-line between the United States and Canada, in lat. 45° N.

CONNEMARA, kon-ne-ma'-ra, "the bays of the ocean," a district occupying the W. portion of the county of Galway, Ireland. It consists mostly of bogs, mountains, and lakes. Ext. 30 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 15 to 20. The population is extremely scattered, and is found principally along the coasts and on the islands. The interior is almost desolate. During the famine of 1847, the result of the failure of the potato crop, the inhabitants suffered extreme privations; but, since then, great exertions have been made to promote the fisheries, whilst the operation of the Encumbered Estates Act was a great means of improving the district.

CONON, ko'-non, a famous general of Athens, who became governor of all the islands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lysander, near Ægospotamos. (See Ægospotamos.) He voluntarily went into banishment to Evagoras, king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, by whose assistance he delivered his country from the Spartan yoke. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidus, in an engagement where Pisander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a strong wall.

Died about 393 B.C.

CONRAD I., kon'-rad, count of Franconia, was elected king of Germany in 911.

Died 918.

CONRAD II., son of Herman, duke of Franconia, was elected king of Germany in 1024. In 1027 he was crowned at Rome, as emperor. He also obtained, in 1033, the kingdom of Burgundy by the will of King Rodolphus III.

Died 1039.

CONRAD III., son of Frederick, duke of Suabia, was crowned king of Italy 1128, and elected emperor of Germany in 1138. After a long war with the duke of Saxony and Bavaria, he, in 1147, set out with Louis VII. of France for the Holy Land, laying siege unsuccessfully to Damascus.

Born 1093; died 1152.

CONRAD IV. was elected emperor of Germany after the death of his father, Frederick II., in 1250. Pope Innocent IV., who claimed the right of disposing of the crown, nominated William of Holland, and preached a crusade against Conrad. Conrad thereupon marched into Italy, took Naples, Capua, and other places, but died in the midst of his victories.

Born 1228; died 1254.

CONRAD V., or CONRADIN, kon-rad'-in, was the son of Conrad IV., and the acknowledged duke of Suabia; but his inheritance of Sicily and Apulia passed from his family finally by the battle of Benevento, in 1266. In 1267, in his sixteenth year, Conradin took the field at the head of 1,000 men, and, after various successes, met Charles of Anjou at Tagliocozzo, where he was defeated, in 1268. He fled from the field, and, after passing through a series of misfortunes, was caught and delivered into the hands of Charles for a sum of money. He was taken to Naples, and, with Frederick of Austria and several of his followers, was beheaded. The mother of Conradin, when she heard of her son's capture, hastened from Germany to ransom him. She, however, was too late; when she applied the money to the founding of the great convent del Carmine, where, behind the great altar, the remains of Conradin and Frederick were deposited.

Died 1268.

CONRAD, Marquis of Montferrat, a crusader, who, in 1186, defended Constantinople against the barbarians, and in the following year defeated Saladin before Tyre. He was elected king of Jerusalem in 1190, but was assassinated.

Died 1191.

CONSALVI, Ercole, kon-sal'-ve, Cardinal. He was secretary of state to Pope Pius VII. from 1800 to 1806, when Napoleon demanded his dismissal from office as opposed to his interests. The pope unwillingly consented; but Consalvi again held office after 1815, and distinguished himself as a reformer of abuses, and in the suppression of monopolies and oppressive taxes. He was an adroit diplomatist, and a liberal patron of literature and the arts.

Born at Rome, 1757; died 1824.

CONSCIENCE, Hendrik, kon'-shense, Belgian novelist. He was the son of a dealer in old books at Antwerp, and at the age of 18 entered the army, which he quitted after four years' service. His first novel was published in 1837, and was followed by others, which obtained the notice of the king, who appointed him registrar of the Royal Academy of Antwerp. In 1845 he was appointed to instruct the royal children in Flemish. He has written many novels, several of them founded on historical incidents. Several of them have been translated into German, French, and English, and he holds the highest place as a reviver of Flemish literature.

Born at Antwerp, 1812.

CONSEGNIANA, kon'-sen-[illegible]'-na, a volcano of Central America, in Nicaragua, 10 miles from the Pacific. The crater is a mile and a half in circumference, and has a height of nearly 4,000 feet from the mean level. In 1835, when its last irruption occurred, a large tract of pasture land was rendered waste.

CONSIDERANT, Victor Prosper, kon-se-dai'-ran(g), French socialist, who served for a short time in the army, but afterwards succeeded Fourier as the leader of the Societarians. After some attempts to establish his system, he was in 1849 compelled to leave France, being accused of high treason, and went to Texas, where he founded a Socialistic community, which ultimately failed.

Born at Salons, 1805.

CONSTABLE, John, kun-sta-bel, an eminent English artist, who began life as a miller with his father, but whose genius early led him into a very different pursuit. Having discovered a decided taste for drawing, he received much encouragement from Sir George Beaumont, and took instructions from R. R. Reinagle, R.A. Landscape-painting became his profession, and in 1795 he went to London, but does not seem to have received much encouragement. In 1799 he again visited the metropolis, and in 1800 was admitted a student in the Royal Academy. Previous to this he had chiefly lived in Suffolk. He now became a steady exhibitor at the Royal Academy, and gradually worked himself into notice and fame. It was not, however, till 1829 that his merits received the acknowledgment they had long deserved. In that year he was elected a Royal Academician.—Constable made nature his study, and he painted many admirable pictures.

Born at East Bergholt, Suffolk, 1776; died at Hampstead, 1837.

CONSTANCE, or KONSTANZ, kon'-stance, an ancient town of the grand-duchy of Baden, the capital of the circle of the same name, situate on the Lake of Constance, near the junction of the upper and lower lakes, 35 miles from Zurich. It is the see of a bishop, and contains an old episcopal castle, with a cathedral church, erected in the 11th century, in which are several fine specimens of Gothic sculpture, and a market-hall, formerly the place where the councils met. Manf. Silk and cotton fabrics, watches, and other goods.—Constance is memorable for the meeting of the famous council, between 1414 and 1418, which deposed three rival popes, and condemned John Huss and Jerome of Prague to the flames. The House where Huss was arrested, and where there is a bust of him, is still shown. The annexation of Constance to the Austrian dominions took place in 1549, and to Baden in 1805. Pop. of the district, 282,332.

CONSTANCE, LAKE, the German Bodensee, is on the north side of the Alps, at the junction of Baden, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, Tyrol, and Switzerland, and is traversed from E. to W. by the Rhine. It is at an elevation of about 1,300 feet above the sea-level, is 44 miles in length, 9 miles in greatest breadth, and more than 900 feet deep, and the area is estimated at 200 square miles. It is divided into the upper and lower lakes. It is subject to the phenomenon of suddenly rising and falling, and only freezes when the winters are very severe. Great fertility exists upon its banks, which are remarkable for the many picturesque views they present. The lake is traversed by steam vessels.

CONSTANT, DE REBEQUE, HENRI BENJAMIN, French political writer and orater. Studied first in Germany, afterwards at Edinburgh and Oxford. In 1796 he published in Paris a political pamphlet which attracted attention, and Napoleon gave him an appointment, but shortly afterwards banished him for opposing his views. He then settled in Germany until 1814, when he returned to Paris, and published pamphlets in praise of constitutional liberty and attacking Napoleon, on the return of whom, however, he accepted the position of councillor. In 1819 he was elected a deputy, and became leader of the opposition. He became very popular on account of his opposition to the despotic measures of the ministers of Charles X. He did not approve, however, of the revolution of 1830, which he did not long survive. He was buried in the Pantheon. He was the founder of the Constitutionnel newspaper, a powerful writer, eloquent speaker, and author of many works, among the best known of which are the "History of the Hundred Days," and elaborate works on the source and development of religion and the connection of Roman polytheism with the Greek philosophy and Christianity.

Born at Lausanne, 1767; died at Paris, 1830.

CONSTANTINA, kon-stan-té-na, a town of Spain, defended by a strong castle, 40 miles N.E. of Seville. Manf. Leather and soap. In its neighbourhood are silver-lead mines. Pop. 7,000.

CONSTANTINE, kon'-stan-teen, a large province, composing the eastern part of the territory of Algiers, now belonging to the French. It is bounded E. by Tunis, W. by Titteria and Algiers proper, S. by the desert, and N. by the Mediterranean. Pop. 1,291,418.

CONSTANTINE, the capital of the above province, stands on the site of the ancient Cirta, celebrated as the bulwark of Numidia, and as the birthplace of Massinissa and Jugurtha. It is built upon a high rock, formed into a species of peninsula by the Rummel, and is 2,100 feet above the sea. Here are found many beautiful remains of antiquity. Besides its natural strength, Constantine is defended by excellent walls built of stones taken from the ruins of the old Roman town, and a Roman bridge crosses the ravine. There is an old church in the Byzantine style; the streets are straight, but dirty; the houses low and without windows. The original town was destroyed 311 A.D., but a new town was built by Constantine the Great, from whom the name is taken. Manf. Woollen, cloth, and saddlery. Pop. about 38,379. Lat. 36° 22′ N. Lon. 6° 37′ E.

CONSTANTINE I., FLAVIUS VALERIUS AURELIUS, the son of Constantius, and surnamed "the Great," from the grandeur of his exploits. He served in the Egyptian expedition and Persian war, and on the death of his father in 306, was nominated his successor; but he had five rivals, whom, however, he subdued, except Licinius, who became emperor of the East, and married the sister of Constantine. Quarrels broke out, which resulted in the overthrow and death of Licinius and the undisputed sway of Constantine as emperor of the entire Roman empire. It is said that, as he was going to fight against Maxentius, one of his rivals, he saw a cross in the sky, with an inscription in Greek, meaning "In this I conquer." This was about the year 312, when he became nominally a convert to Christianity, ever after adopting a cross or labarum as his standard. But he was not baptized till three years before his death. He soon began to reform the state. He prohibited nocturnal assemblies, and abolished many of the obscenities of paganism. In 321 he ordered the observance of the Sunday, and abstinence from work on that day; caused the Christian churches which war had destroyed to be rebuilt, and in 325 assembled the first universal council of Nicæa; abolished the consulting of oracles, and the fights of gladiators; but in 324, upon a false accusation, caused his son Crispus to be beheaded for attempting to seduce Fausta, his own stepmother. She herself, however, was afterwards put to death. In 328 he founded the city where Byzantium formerly stood, and called it by his own name, Constantinopolis. Here he transported part of the Roman senate; and, by keeping his court in it, raised it to be the rival of Rome, in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial capitals began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and soon after the age of Constantine, a separation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the western, and Constantinopolis the capital of the eastern.—This emperor has been distinguished for personal courage, and praised for the protection he extended to the Christians; but the murder of his son Crispus has been deservedly censured. His remains were carried to Constantinople, where he was sumptuously interred. He was placed by the senate of Rome among the gods, and by the Christians of the East, among the saints. His festival is celebrated on the 21st of May by the Greek, Russian, and Coptic churches. He left three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire.

Born at Naissus, 274; died 337.

CONSTANTINE II., called the "Younger," eldest son of the above, received, as his share of the empire, on the death of his father, Gaul, Spain, and Great Britain. Desirous, however, of possessing himself of the territory of his brother Constans, he invaded Italy, but was defeated, and killed near Aquileia.

Born 312; died 340.

CONSTANTINE III., or "NOVUS," son of the emperor Heraclius.

Died 641.

CONSTANTINE IV., surnamed Pogonatus, or the "Bearded," emperor of the East, mounted the throne in 668, with his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, on the death of their father, Constans II. He waged war successfully against the Saracens, but rendered himself odious by the murder of his two brothers. It was under this prince that the "Greek fire" was first employed.

Died 685.

CONSTANTINE V., succeeded his father, Leo the Isaurian, in 741. He sided with the Iconoclasts, who hurled down the images of the saints, and persecuted the followers of the Romish church. He died of the plague, in an expedition against the Bulgarians.

Born 719; died 775.

CONSTANTINE VI., succeeded his father, Leo IV., in 781, his mother Irene being regent. She at length took complete possession of the throne, and was cruel enough to put out the eyes of her young son.

Born 771; died 797.

CONSTANTINE VII., surnamed Porphyrogenitus, son of Leo the Wise, mounted the throne in 911, at the age of six, under the regency of his mother Zoe. He was deposed in 944, regained the throne in 945, but was poisoned by his son Romanus. —This prince cultivated literature, and was the author of some works.

Born 903; died 959.

CONSTANTINE VIII., son of Romanus I., reigned with his father and his two brothers, from 919 to 945, during the time that Porphyrogenitus was deposed.

Died 947.

CONSTANTINE IX., son of Romanus II., succeeded John Zemisces, and was proclaimed emperor of the East, with his brother, Basilius II., who held the principal authority till 1025, when he died. Constantine was, after that, sole emperor. (See BASILIUS II.)

Born 961; died 1028.

CONSTANTINE X., surnamed Monomachus, obtained the empire in 1042, having married the empress Zoe, widow of Romanus III. This prince is known alone for his debaucheries. He allowed the Turks to increase their territories at his expense, and to establish themselves in Persia.

Born 1000; died 1054.

CONSTANTINE XI., surnamed Ducas, succeeded, in 1059, Isaac Comnenus, who had adopted him. In his reign the Scythians ravaged the empire, and some cities were destroyed by earthquakes.

Died 1067.

CONSTANTINE XII., also named Ducas, son of the above, succeeded his father.

Died about 1080.

CONSTANTINE XIII., Palæologus, the last emperor of the East, the son of Manuel II., succeeded his brother John Paleologus in 1448. In 1453, Mahomet II. laid siege to Constantinople with a formidable army. Constantine defended the city bravely, but, abandoned by the princes of Christendom, he was unable to hold the place, and died, fighting like a hero, in the breach. His death was followed by the capture and pillage of Constantinople, and Mahomet made it the capital of the Ottoman empire.

Born 1394; died 1453.

CONSTANTINE, FLAVIUS JULIUS, an usurper, who was proclaimed, in 407, although a private soldier, emperor of the East, by the Roman soldiery in Great Britain, and for some time sustained his dignity by the victories he won. He fixed his court at Arles, in France; but the emperor Honorius laid siege to this place, forced him to surrender, and put him to death, 411.—This usurper does not take rank with the Constantines.

CONSTANTINE, PAULOVITCH, the second son of the emperor Paul of Russia. The name of Constantine was given him at baptism, in the hope that he would one day reign at Constantinople. This, however, was not destined to come to pass, for, from some unaccountable cause, he took a disgust at the honour designed for him, and at the age of seventeen, married a sister of the duchess of Kent, with whom, however, he did not live happily. In four years they parted by mutual consent. In 1799 he fought under Suwarrow in the Italian campaign, and distinguished himself by his personal bravery, though not by his capacity for command. In 1805 he headed the reserve on the field of Austerlitz, where he withstood the fierce and energetic charges of Bernadotte, and, when the battle was lost, retreated in good order. Throughout the remainder of the wars with Napoleon I. he preserved the character of a brave and resolute soldier. At the close of the war he became generalissimo of Poland, but had little sympathy with the nation over whose destinies he held the military power. In 1820 he procured a divorce from his wife, and married a beautiful Polish lady. In 1825 the emperor Alexander died, and Constantine was the presumptive heir to the throne. When the news of the death of the emperor reached St. Petersburg, the grand duke Nicholas called the council of the empire together, and required them to take the oath of allegiance to his brother. The council, however, produced a paper in which Constantine renounced his claim to the throne, and desired that it might be transferred to the next heir, who was the grand-duke Nicholas, and who, consequently, ascended the throne. Constantine was present at the coronation of his brother in Moscow, after which he returned to his government of Poland at Warsaw. Here he continued to reside till 1830, when an insurrection of the Poles took place, and he was driven from his palace of the Belvedere, and forced to quit Poland. War now commenced between the Russians and the Poles; and Constantine returned with the army of reserve, but was seized with a fatal attack of cholera.

Born at St. Petersburg, 1779; died at Vitebsk, 1831.

CONSTANTINE, NICHOLAEVITCH, grand-duke, the second son of the emperor Nicholas of Russia, was designed for the navy, and in 1831, when only four years of age, was declared admiral of the fleet. He devoted himself to the profession, commanded the Russian fleet in the Baltic in the war with England and France in 1854; and in 1865 was appointed president of the council of the empire.

Born 1827.

CONSTANTINOPLE, or STAMBOUL, kon'-stan-te-no'-pel, the capital of the Turkish empire, has a circumference of about 13 miles, formerly completely guarded by walls, which, except on the western or land side, where they are maintained in repair, are now ruinous, and is beautifully situate on the W. side of the Bosphorus, or Straits of Constantinople, between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora, having a sea front of about 8 miles in extent. It stands chiefly on an undulating slope, having a gradual ascent, and presenting a fine view to the approaching spectator. Its harbour, the "Golden Horn," or "Sweet Waters," is not on the side of the sea, but is a capacious inlet about 5 miles long, and in no part more than half a mile in breadth, running along the north side of the city. It is of sufficient depth for the largest vessels, and is capable of receiving 1,200 sail of the line. The city of Stamboul has the form of a triangle, one side being on the harbour, another on the Sea of Marmora, and the third and longest towards the land. On the opposite side of the Golden Horn, and connected with Stamboul by two pontoon bridges and another bridge recently constructed, is the suburb or town, of GALATA, the commercial district, spreading around the base of a hill, on the summit of which is Pera, the residence of the foreign ambassadors. Further to the East, on the Bosphorus, is the suburb of Tophaneh, where are the imperial cannon-foundry and a beautiful mosque. On the eastern side of the Bosphorus (which is not more than a mile wide at this part), is SCUTARI. The Greek residents collect at St. Demetrius, to the north of Pera, and there are some fine residences belonging to Europeans at Therapia and Buyuhdere; and on both sides of the Golden Horn are new stone houses, handsomely built in the European style. In Stamboul, there are some good streets and open spaces in the eastern part, between the seraglio and the seraskeer's palace, and around some of the principal mosques, frequent fires having cleared the ground; but the streets are in general narrow, gloomy, and slanting, badly paved, and encumbered with dust or mud; whilst the houses are mostly low, and built of wood and earth. The summit of the hill at Pera is traversed by a narrow street, the Grand Rue, and the sides of the hill are covered with steep narrow streets. The objects of greatest attraction in Stamboul are the bazaars or market-places, one of which, the "great bazaar," consists of long avenues, covered with brick arches, and lighted from the roof; the fountains, and the baths. The Cisterna Maxima is situate near St. Sophia; its pillars and arches supporting the roof still remain, and the area beneath them is very extensive, and devoted to purposes of usefulness. The aqueduct by which the city cisterns were principally supplied, was first erected by Adrian, and subsequently repaired by one of the Constantines and Solyman the Magnificent. It consists of a double tier of arches, built with alternate layers of stone and brick, like the walls of the city. The seraglio stands on the eastern side of the city, at the apex of the triangle, on the site of the ancient Byzantium, and is about three miles in circumference. It consists not only of the apartments of the women, but of the palace, and a vast range of buildings, inhabited by the sultan, his court, and the government officers. In the first, or outer court, are the mint, the principal mosque, a hospital, and offices connected with the palace. In the second are a divan, an arsenal, a hall of justice, the imperial kitchen and stables, the Corinthian column of Theodosius, and the principal offices of government. In the third are the apartments of the women, the terraces and flower-gardens of rare beauty, which are solely devoted to the use of the sultan and his harem. This court is entered from the city by a ponderous gate, called the "Porte," which now serves as a synonym for the divan of the sultan. In Constantinople there are 346 mosques, and 36 Greek, Protestant, and Catholic churches. The principal mosques are to be met with in the squares and public places, and are generally surrounded with cypress-trees, and provided with fountains. The oldest and most interesting is that of St. Sophia, which was originally built as a Christian cathedral by Constantine the Great, and, after being destroyed by fire, rebuilt with greater sumptuousness by the emperor Justinian. Its four minarets were added by the Turkish emperor Selim II. The building is in the form of a Greek cross, 269 feet long, 243 broad, and 180 feet high. It has a very beautiful flattened dome. In 1848 it was renovated by an Italian architect. Of the Turkish mosques, the finest are those of Solyman the Magnificent and of Sultan Achmet. There are others, however, of great beauty, especially the Valide mosque, built by the mother of Mahomet IV., constructed of white marble, with two elegant minarets, and a lofty dome resting on four of smaller size. The Christian churches in Constantinople and its neighbourhood have externally the appearance of private houses, no spires nor bells being permitted upon them. One of the finest of these is the patriarchal church of the Greeks, in which are the remains of St. Euthymia, and of the empress Theodora. There is one large open space, Al Meidan, occupying the site of the ancient hippodrome, a quadrangle, 260 yards long and 150 wide, containing some noble obelisks of granite, remains of the ancient structure. There are about 130 commodious public baths in the city, and about 200 khans, or lodging-houses, of great size, chiefly occupied by foreigners. There are a large number of "imarets," or kitchens for the poor, benevolent institutions, where food is supplied to the poor, and various hospitals for the sick of different nations. A university was established in 1847, with naval, military, and medical colleges. There are several public libraries, about 300 schools in connection with the mosques, and 400 elementary schools. The barracks are large, and well constructed. The cemeteries are numerous and extensive, especially on the western side of the city. They are thickly planted with trees, and the graves of the Mahometan population are marked with white stones. One of the cemeteries near Pera is a great resort of the European, or Frank population, as it commands extensive and beautiful views. The cemeteries of the Armenians and Franks, to the north-east of Pera, are also resorted to, and pleasure-fairs are held near. The custom-house is at Galata, and at Tophano is a large vegetable and fruit-market. There is an underground-railway, about a mile long, from Pera to Galata, tramways on each side of the Golden Horn, and omnibuses ply in the principal streets. The Roumelian railway promises to afford communication with the railway system of Western Europe, and the line to Ismid, in Asia Minor, is in course of extension. The castle of the Seven Towers is now used as a military storehouse, and stands near the Sea of Marmora, at the S.W. angle of the city.

Manf.—Morocco leather, carpets, saddlery, shoes, cherry-tree pipe-tubes, mouth-pieces, and meerschaum pipe-bowls.

Pop. estimated at 700,000, of whom about one-half are Mahometans, one-fourth Greeks and Armenians, and the remainder Jews and Europeans.

Lat. 41° N. Lon. 28° 59′ E.

History.—This city stands on the site of the ancient Byzantium, and was originally founded by Byzas, 656 B.C. In 330 it was rebuilt by Constantine, and named after him. It has been many times besieged, but has only been taken twice: the first time in 1204, by the Crusaders; and the second, in 1453, by the Turks, who then extinguished the Roman empire in the East. There have been several great fires in modern times, which have swept away some of the most crowded parts of the town and suburbs, and given room for architectural improvements. The most destructive of these fires were in September, 1865; May, 1866; June, 1870, and July, 1874. See GALATA, BYZANTIUM, TURKEY, &c.

CONSTANTINOPLE, STRAITS OF. (See BOSPHORUS.)

CONSTANTINOVSKAIA, kon-stan′-te-nov′-ski-a, a town of Russia, on the right bank of the Don. The vine is extensively grown in the vicinity. Pop. 4,300.

CONSTANTIUS I., CHLORUS, kon-stan′-shi-us, a Roman emperor, was adopted, in 292, by Maximian, and became emperor in 305. He reduced the Britons, who had risen against the Romans, to subjection. He was the father of Constantine the Great.

Born 250; died 306.

CONSTANTIUS II. was the third son of Constantine the Great, and had, for his share of the empire, the East and Greece. His brothers having died in the West, he, after defeating Magnentius and Vetranion, became, in 350, sole possessor of the empire. He died on his march against the emperor Julian, who had been proclaimed by the soldiery.

Born 317; died 361.

CONSTANTIUS III., made co-emperor of the West with Honorius, but died a few months afterwards.

Died 421.

CONSTITUCION, kon′-ste-tu′-shon, a seaport of Chili, at the mouth of the river Maule, 160 miles S.W. of Valparaiso. It is a compact and well-built town, ship-building is extensively carried on, and there is a good coasting trade. Pop. 4,500.

CONSUEGRA, kon-soo-ai′-gra, a town of Spain, province of Toledo, and 35 miles S.E. of the town of that name. There are the ruins of an ancient castle, built by the Roman emperor, Trajan, and of a Roman amphitheatre. Pop. 4,800.

CONSUS, kon′-sus, a deity worshipped at Rome, who presided over counsels. His temple, in the Maximus Circus, was covered, to show that counsels ought to be secret and inviolable. Romulus instituted festivals to his honour, called Consualia, during the celebration of which the Romans carried away the Sabine women.

CONTARINA, kon-ta-ré′-na, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, on the left bank of the Po. Pop. 2,800.

CONTARINI, kon-ta-ré′-ne, the name of a noble Venetian family, seven members of which attained the dignity of doge, and others exhibited great ability in diplomacy, learning, and the arts.

CONTESSA, kon-tes′-sa, a town of Sicily, 25 miles S.W. of Palermo. Pop. 3,000.

CONTI, FRANCOIS LOUIS, kon′-te, prince De la Roche-sur-Yon, and nephew of the great Condé, under whom he was educated to the profession of arms. He greatly distinguished himself in Hungary, and afterwards at Steinkirk and Neerwinden. He was disliked by the king, Louis XIV., who was, however, compelled to avail himself of his great military abilities, and, in 1709, gave him the command of the army in Flanders, an appointment little more than nominal, for the death of Conti occurred almost immediately afterwards. He was one of the most popular men in the kingdom.

Born in Paris, 1664; died 1709.

CONTICH, kon′-teech, a town of Belgium, 7 miles S. of Antwerp. Manf. Linen and hats. There are corn and oil mills. Pop. 3,800.

CONTRA COSTA, a county of California, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 12,525. The capital is Martinez.

CONTURSI, kon-toor′-se, a town of Southern Italy, 21 miles E. of Salerno. Pop. 3,000.

CONVERSANO, kon-vair-sa′-no, a town of Italy, 20 miles S.E. of Bari. It has a cathedral, a bishop's palace, a foundling asylum, several convents, and a hospital. Wine, oil, almonds, and cotton are produced in the district. Pop. 10,500.

CONWAY, kon′-wai, a river of Wales, which, after a course of 30 miles, falls into Beaumaris Bay at Aberconway.

CONWAY, or ABERCONWAY, a seaport and parliamentary borough of Caernarvonshire, North Wales, 22 miles north-east of Caernarvon, on the left bank of the Conway river. It is surrounded by massive walls, and the castle, a remarkably strong structure, is on a precipitous rock overhanging the river. It was rebuilt by Edward I. in 1283. The Plas Maur, or "Great Mansion," erected in the 16th century, is a noble building. Near the town the Conway is spanned by a fine suspension-bridge, erected in 1826, and a tubular iron railway-bridge, constructed in 1848. Pop. 2,000. A station on the London and North-Western Railway.

CONWAY, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 1,860 square miles. Pop. 12,755. Springfield is the capital.

CONYBEARE, Very Reverend WILLIAM DANIEL, kon′-e-beer, was distinguished as a geologist, and was one of the earliest promoters of the Geological Society. He discovered the antediluvian monster called Plesiosaurus, for which he was highly complimented by Cuvier. He also directed his attention to the coal-fields of several districts, and pointed out many facts in their physical geography, which enabled practical adventurers to proceed upon more certain data in making their mineralogical discoveries. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and became dean of Llandaff in 1845.

Born in London, 1787; died 1857.

CONZA, a town of Italy, 35 miles S.E. of Benevento. There are a cathedral and an archbishop's palace. Pop. 2,000.

COOK, ELIZA, English poetess, the daughter of a tradesman in Southwark. She early displayed great poetic abilities, and, in 1837, became a regular contributor to the Weekly Dispatch newspaper, and achieved an immense popularity. Her chosen subjects, national, domestic, and rural, and her songs and poems exhibit great force of expression and intensity of homely feeling. "The Englishman," the "Old Farm Gate," "The Old Arm-Chair," are familiar specimens of the hundreds of poetic effusions and stirring songs which have made her name a household word in England. In 1864 she received a pension of £100 a year on the Civil list.

Born in Southwark, 1818.

COOK, JAMES, Captain, kook, a celebrated navigator, was son of an agricultural labourer, and at an early age was apprenticed to a shopkeeper at Staith, in Yorkshire, but being inclined to the sea, his master gave up his indentures, and he bound himself to a Mr. Walker, a shipowner in the coal-trade at Whitby. He served nearly seven years in this line, after which he became mate in the same employ. On the breaking out of the war, in 1755, he entered on board the Eagle man-of-war, and in 1759, in the capacity of master of the Mercury sloop of war, was at the reduction of Quebec by Wolfe. While on that station, he was employed in taking the soundings of the river St. Lawrence, and, afterwards, was engaged in making a chart of the same river, which he executed with great accuracy. He was next with Lord Colvil as master, in the Northumberland man of war, and was at the retaking of Newfoundland, of which coast he made a survey. In 1764, when Sir Hugh Palliser was appointed governor of Newfoundland, Cook became marine surveyor of that coast and of Labrador. The manner in which he performed his duties in this situation was the principal cause of his being chosen to conduct an expedition for astronomical and geographical purposes into the South Pacific Ocean. Accordingly, with the rank of lieutenant, he entered on board the Endeavour, a small vessel, and set sail in August, 1768. He was accompanied by Mr. Green, as astronomer, Sir Joseph Banks, and Dr. Solander, and arrived at Otaheite (Tahiti), where the transit of Venus was observed, and where he remained till July, 1769, when he resumed his voyage, and discovered a number of islands, to which he gave the name of Society Islands, and reached New Zealand, which he circumnavigated. Thence he sailed to New Holland, which he named New South Wales, his account of which was the cause of the settlement of Botany Bay, so long known as a penal colony. He then visited New Guinea, Java, and Bolivia, returning by the way of the Cape of Good Hope to England, which he reached in June, 1771, and he was shortly afterwards appointed a commander in the navy. An account of this voyage was published from the captain's journals and those of Mr. Banks, by Dr. Hawkesworth. The existence of a southern continent being still an undecided question, in order, if possible, to ascertain that point, Captain Cook was employed in another voyage, and sailed with two ships, the Resolution, commanded by himself, and the Adventure, by Captain Furneaux, in the July of the following year. In this voyage they explored the southern hemisphere as high as latitude 71° 10′, and, after making many additions to our geographical knowledge, but without attaining the main object, he arrived safe at Spithead in July, 1775, having lost only one man out of 118. He was now raised to the rank of post captain, and appointed to a post in Greenwich Hospital. The Admiralty having resolved to determine the disputed question as to there being a northern communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, Captain Cook volunteered his services for the enterprise, and in the July of 1776 sailed from Plymouth in the Resolution, accompanied by Captain Clarke, in the Discovery. After sailing as high as Lat. 74° 44′ N., the ships were obliged to shift their course to the south, and in November, 1778, reached the Sandwich Islands to pass the winter. Here Captain Cook was slain in a quarrel with the natives, at Owhyhee (now Hawaii), the largest of the Sandwich Islands. The account of Cook's voyages became one of the most popular of books of travel. His widow and children received pensions, and the Royal Society struck a gold medal in commemoration of him.

Born at Marlow, Yorkshire, 1728; died at Hawaii, 1779.

COOK, a county of Illinois, United States, on Lake Michigan. Area, 886 square miles. Pop. 607,524. Capital, Chicago.

COOKE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 5,800 square miles. Pop. 20,390. Capital, Cook Court House.

COOK ISLANDS, or THE HARVEY ARCHIPELAGO, a group in the Pacific Ocean, lying to the S.W. of the Society Islands, between Tahiti on the E., and the archipelago of Tonga on the W. The principal islands are Harvey, Raratonga, Atron, and Mangeia. The inhabitants are of the Malay race, and English missionaries have, in some degree, been successful in converting many of them to Christianity. Pop. Unascertained, perhaps 50,000 Lat. 22° S. Lon. 158° W.

COOK'S LAND. (See MORETON BAY.)

COOK STRAIT separates the two principal islands of New Zealand, and was discovered in 1770 by Captain Cook.

COOK'S INLET, a large inlet on the N.W. coast of North America. Length, 130 miles, with a varying breadth up to 70. Lat. between 58° and 61° N. Lon. between 151° and 154° W.

COOKE, GEORGE FREDERICK, an English actor, who was bred to the trade of a printer, at Berwick-upon-Tweed; but imbibing a passion for the stage, made his first public appearance at Brentford, in the character of Dumont, in "Jane Shore." In 1778 he appeared in London, but was not successful. After an absence of twenty-two years, however, he re-appeared in the character of Richard III., at Covent Garden, with the most complete success. He continued for a number of years to perform the leading parts of the drama, when, in 1810, he sailed for New York, in the United States. Here the violent excesses in drinking, to which he had long given way, proved too much even for his constitution, which had been one of the most powerful, and caused his death. Edmund Kean, his great successor in tragedy, during one of his visits to America, had a monument erected over Cooke's grave.

Born, 1756; died, 1812.

COOKSTOWN, a town in the county of Tyrone, Ulster, Ireland. It stands on the Ballinderry. Pop. 3,653.

COOMASSIE, koo-mas'-se, the capital of the kingdom of Ashantee, Western Africa. It is situated on a rocky hill, and is about 4 miles in circuit. The houses are little more than clay huts with palm-leaf roofs. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 7° N. Lon. 2° 16′ W. (See ASHANTEE.)

COOMPTAH, koom'-ta, a seaport of British India, presidency of Madras, 100 miles N.W. of Mangalore. The export of cotton is extensive. Pop. 7,000.

COOPANG, COUPANG, or KŒPANG, koo'-pang, a Dutch settlement on the S.W. coast of the island of Timon, in the Indian archipelago. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000 Lat. 10° 10′ S. Lon. 123° E.

COOPER, SIR ASTLEY, koop'-er, a distinguished surgeon and anatomist, who studied under Clive and John Hunter, the most famous anatomists of the day, and in 1787 was appointed demonstrator of anatomy at St. Thomas's Hospital. In 1792 he was appointed professor of anatomy at Surgeons' Hall, in 1800 surgeon at Guy's Hospital, and in 1813 became professor of comparative anatomy in the College of Surgeons. He rapidly rose to the summit of his profession, and in 1820 was called in to attend George IV., from whose head he removed a tumour. In the same year he received a baronetcy, which, it was stipulated, was to descend to his adopted son and nephew, Astley Cooper, he himself being without a son. In 1822 he was elected one of the court of examiners of the College of Surgeons, and in 1827 president of the college. In 1828 he became serjeant-surgeon to the king, and in 1830 vice-president of the Royal Society. In 1834 he received from Oxford the honorary degree of doctor of civil laws, and subsequently visited Edinburgh, where the university made him a LL.D., and the freedom of the city was voted to him. He wrote several works on surgical subjects, which greatly enhanced his reputation, and as an operator was pre-eminent among the surgeons of his day. A statue by Bailey was erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born at Brooke, Norfolk, 1768; died, 1841.

COOPER, SAMUEL, a celebrated English painter, who excelled in miniature portraits, insomuch that Louis XIV. of France offered £150 for his picture of Oliver Cromwell. He was called Van Dyck in Little. He was buried in old St. Pancras church, where his epitaph, in Latin, described him as the Apelles of his age. His wife was the sister of the poet Pope's mother, and he had a brother, Alexander Cooper, who became painter to Queen Christina of Sweden.

Born in London, 1609; died, 1672.

COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE, a distinguished American novelist, whose father was a judge in the state of New York. After passing through Yale College, he, in 1802, entered the navy as a midshipman, and for six years followed the sea, when he retired and married. He afterwards took up his abode in Cooperstown, a village founded by his father, on Lake Ostego, in Western New York. It was not, however, till 1821 that Mr. Cooper ventured to appear as an author. Then he produced his "Precaution," which made little impression; but which, being shortly afterwards succeeded by his "Spy," it may be presumed gave him courage to proceed in the style of novel-writing. This second production was a decided success, and led the way to a long list of fictions, which it would occupy a considerable space even to name. Among them we may specify the "Pilot" and "Pioneers," "The Last of the Mohicans," "Lionel Lincoln," "The Red Rover," and "The Water-witch," as sufficiently indicating the characteristics of his genius. He also wrote several novels, the scenes of which are laid in Europe, where he resided for several years. Cooper wrote in other paths besides those of the imagination. He produced "Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers," "Sketches of Switzerland," "Gleanings in Europe," and several other works. Many of his stories have been translated both into German and French; and it is also affirmed that some of them are to be found, even in one or more of the Oriental tongues.

Born at Burlington, New Jersey, 1789; died at Cooperstown, New York, 1851.

COOPER, a county of Missouri, United States, watered by a river of the same name. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 21,000.

COOPER-PORT, or TOKO-LABO HARBOUR, on the east coast of the Middle Island, New Zealand.

COORG, koorg, a division of British India, inclosed by Mysore, Canara, and Malabar. Mountainous, and covered with forests. The lowest part of the country has an elevation of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and is watered by the Cauvary and its tributaries. The inhabitants of this country are a handsome race, and mostly devoted to agricultural pursuits. Among them is the peculiar custom of the wife of the eldest brother in a family, being the common property of all the younger brothers, whose wives, in their turn, become the common property of all the rest. In 1834 Coorg was annexed to Great Britain. The province is remarkable for very ancient artificial ramparts, in some parts 25 feet in height, and protected by wide ditches. These ramparts are in many places covered with trees of great size, and are of unknown origin. Area, 2,000 square miles. Pop. 178,302.

COOS, ko-os', a county of New Hampshire, United States. Area, 1,600 square miles. Pop. 18,580. Capital, Lancaster.

COOSA, koo'-sa, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 864 square miles. Pop. 15,113. Rockford is the capital.

COOSSY, koos'-se, a river of British India, rising in the district of Ramghur, and, after a course of 240 miles, falling into the river Hooghly, below Calcutta, in lat. 22° N.; lon. 88° 4′ E.

COOSY, a river of India, rising in the peaks of the Himalaya, and, after a course of 330 miles through Nepaul falling into the Ganges, in lat. 25° 19′ N.; lon. 87° 19′ E.

COOTE, SIR EYRE, koot, an English general, who entered the army at an early age, and fought against the followers of Charles Stuart in 1745. In 1754 he went to India, where he distinguished himself in many important actions, particularly at the siege of Pondicherry. On account of his conduct here, the directors of the honourable East-India Company presented him with a diamond-hilted sword. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the Company's forces; but quitted Madras at the end of the following year, and returned to England, where he was appointed governor of Fort St. George, and made knight of the Bath. In 1781 he proceeded again to India as commander-in-chief, and, at the head of 10,000 men, defeated Hyder Ali, whose forces numbered 150,000. There is a fine monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Ireland, 1726; died in Madras, in 1783.

COOTEHILL, koot'-hill, a market-town of Cavan, Ireland, on the Cootehill river, 28 miles N.W. of Dundalk. It has a church, a court-house, a bridewell, and several schools. Pop. 2,000.

COPAN, ko-pan', a ruined city of Guatemala, Central America, remarkable for the traces of an immense temple, and colossal figures.

COPENHAGEN, ko'-pen-hai'-gen, (in Danish, Kjöbenhavn, "merchant's haven,") the capital of Denmark, and one of the best-built cities in Europe. It stands on the islands of Seeland and Amager, or Amak, on the W. side of the Sound. The city consists of two parts, Copenhagen proper in Seeland, on the N. of the harbour (which is the channel between the islands), and Christianshavn, in Amager, on the S. Copenhagen proper is again divided into the old and new town, the limits of each being marked by the Gothersgade (or Goths-street), a broad thoroughfare running in a northwesterly direction from the harbour to the lofty wall with strong bastions which surround the town. The old town is to the west of this street, thickly populated and very irregularly built, with narrow crooked streets. The new town is regularly laid out, and the buildings are handsome and of modern construction. Christianshavn, on the S. side of the harbour is also protected by a strong wall with a ditch, and connected by two drawbridges with Copenhagen. The citadel of Frederickshavn, at the north-east angle of the town is an immense polygon, supposed to be almost impregnable. In the old town, near the harbour, is the royal castle of Christiansborg, the erection of which was commenced in 1828, occupying the site of an older palace, destroyed by fire in 1794. It is adorned with sculptures by Thorwaldsen, and magnificently decorated and furnished. Behind the palace are the large royal stables, and in the vicinity the chief government offices. The ordinary residence of the royal family is in a part of the new town called Amalienburg, rebuilt by Frederick V. between 1746 and 1765. It is extremely beautiful, and consists chiefly of an octagon, known by the name of Frederick's-square, and opening into four broad rectangular streets. In the centre is a fine bronze statue of Frederick V. on horseback, weighing 45,000 lb. In this square are the Amalienburg and four other palaces. In the north part of the new town, near the wall is Rosenburg Palace, a building in the Gothic style, designed by Inigo Jones. Here are kept the royal jewels and the throne of solid silver. The castle is surrounded by beautiful gardens, which, with the ramparts, is the fashionable promenade. The cathedral (Frue Kirke) in the north part of the old town is in the Greco-Roman style, enriched with some of the masterpieces of Thorwaldsen. The tower is 200 feet high. The old cathedral was destroyed in the memorable bombardment by the British. St. Peter's, Trinity, the Church of the Holy Ghost, and the Mariners Church are other prominent and very interesting edifices. The university, the town-house, the old exchange, and the splendid Thorwaldsen museum, near the castle of Christiansborg, are among the most noticeable public buildings. Not far from Amalienburg-square is the king's new market, a spacious but irregular area, containing in one of its sides the castle of Charlottenburg, formerly the residence of the queen, but now appropriated to the Royal Academy of Fine Arts. Here also are the theatre, the artillery-house, the great hotel, and other stately buildings, besides an equestrian statue of Christian V., erected in 1688. There are many ecclesiastical and other public edifices, a university, a royal library, containing upwards of 500,000 volumes, and, it is said, 16,000 MSS., and a museum of northern antiquities. The harbour is capable of containing 1,000 sail, and, although the entrance is so narrow that one ship only can enter at a time, its depth is sufficient to admit vessels of the largest size.

Manf.—Linens, woollens, sail-cloth, porcelain, tobacco, spirituous liquors; and it has anchor-foundries, roperies, and dockyards.

Pop.—273,323.

Lat. 55° 41′ N. Lon. 12° 35′ E.

History.—Copenhagen is the residence of the sovereign, and the seat of the court. It was founded in 1168, and was originally constructed of wood. In the battle of the Baltic it was taken by Nelson, in 1801, and in 1807 again bombarded by the British. Then above 300 houses, and twice that number were damaged, and the cathedral and university destroyed

COPERNICUS, NICOLAS, ko-per'-ni-kus, Prussian astronomer. His family was noble, and his uncle bishop of Warmia. He was educated at Cracow, where he became a doctor of medicine. He afterwards went to Italy, and in 1500 obtained a professorship of mathematics at Rome. He subsequently returned to his native country, where he became a canon in the church of Frauenburg. Here he passed the remainder of his days a quiet and grave man, deeply immersed in astronomical researches, whilst healing the poor by his medical knowledge, and comforting them by his ecclesiastical duties. The result of his solitary vigils appeared in his great work entitled "De Revolutionibus Orbium Cœlestium," which overturned a great portion of the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, and established for himself an enduring fame. He believed in a "centrum mundi," round which the earth and other planets revolve. The MS. of his great work remained in his possession some years before he would publish it. At length he gave it to the world, and only lived to see a printed copy of it a few hours before his death. He was buried in the cathedral to which he belonged.

Born at Thorn, in Prussia, 1473; died 1543.

COPIA, ko'-pe-a, the goddess of plenty among the Romans, represented bearing a horn (the cornucopia, or horn of Copia,) filled with grapes, fruits, &c.

COPIAH, ko'-pi-ah, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 960 square miles. Pop. 27,552. Gallatin is the capital.

COPIAPO, ko'-pe-a-po', the capital of a district of the same name in Chili, in the province of Coquimbo, on the river Copiapo, about 30 miles from the Pacific Ocean. Pop. 14,000. Copper, cobalt, and silver are largely exported from Copiapo. The Copiapo Railway is the highest in the world, being 4,479 feet above the Pacific.

COPLEY, SIR JOHN SINGLETON, kop'-ley, a distinguished artist, born in America. By the force of nature he became a painter, and rose to eminence in his profession on both sides of the Atlantic, before he had visited either England or Italy. In 1776, however, he arrived in London, and took up his residence in George-street, Hanover-square. During the previous year he had visited both England and Italy, and had now determined to settle in the former. In 1777 he became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1783 a member. He devoted much of his attention to illustrations of history, and his "Death of Lord Chatham" is, perhaps, his best work. He was the father of the late Lord Lyndhurst.

Born at Boston, United States, 1737; died 1815.

COPPERMINE RIVER rises near Great Bear Lake, runs through a part of British North America, and after a course of 250 miles, with numerous falls and rapids, falls into the Arctic Ocean in lat. 68° N., and lon. 116° W.—The Coppermine mountains are to the west of it.

COQUIMBO, ko-keem'-bo, a province of Chili, South America, inclosed by the Aconcagua on the S., the desert of Atacama on the N., the Andes on the E., and it has the Pacific on the W. Barren and dry, but rich in mines. Pop. 173,205; consisting of Spaniards, people of colour, and some Indians. Lat. between 25° 30′ and 31° S. Lon. between 69° and 72° W.

COQUIMBO, or LA SERENA, the capital of the above province, at nearly a mile's distance from the Pacific Ocean. It is one of the principal seaports, and stands at the mouth of the Coquimbo river. Some French mercantile houses are established in it, and it has smelting-furnaces. Chinchilla skins are largely exported. A railway, opened in 1862, connects the town with the mining districts. Pop. 6,000.

COQUEREL, ATHANASE LAURENT CHARLES, ko'-ke-ral, French Protestant divine, who was for many years one of the most popular preachers, in Paris, and in 1848 was elected by the department of the Seine as a representative in the National Assembly, but he retired from politics after the coup d'état of 1851. He was considered to be the greatest preacher in the French Reformed Church, and was the author of numerous works, especially in reply to the German Rationalists, and in vindication of Christian orthodoxy.

Born at Paris, 1795; died 1868.

COQUEREL, ATHANASE JOSUÉ, son of the above, and also a very eminent preacher. In 1864 he was charged with holding heterodox opinions, and suspended from his ministerial functions by the Consistory of Paris; but he continued to preach. Among his numerous works the most remarkable are, "The Origin and Development of Catholicism and Protestantism," and a work on the influence of Catholicism on Italian art. He travelled and lectured in England and America.

Born at Amsterdam, 1820; died at Paris, 1875.

CORA, or CORI, ko'-ra, a town of Italy, 30 miles S.E. of Rome. It occupies the site of an ancient town, one of the chief cities of Latium, and portions of the old wall, two temples, and a bridge remain. It is romantically situated on a lofty hill in the midst of olive plantations, and surrounded by a wall. Pop. 4,000.

CORAIS, ADAMANTIOS, ko-ra'-is, Greek scholar, son of a merchant of Smyrna. At first engaged in commercial pursuits he relinquished them early in life and went to Paris, where he resided until his death. He edited many of the Greek authors, and translated some Italian poems into modern Greek. His sympathy with the Greeks, in their efforts to achieve independence, was warmly expressed.

Born at Smyrna, 1748; died at Paris, 1833.

CORAL SEA, kor'-al, that part of the Pacific Ocean which has Australia on its W. and the New Hebrides on its E.; and so called from the coral reefs it contains.

CORAM, THOMAS, CAPTAIN, kor-am, an English philanthropist, who instituted the London Foundling Hospital, besides causing an establishment to be formed in N. America for the education of Indian girls. He was bred to the sea, in the merchant service, and spent all that he had on these and other benevolent schemes, so that in his old age he was obliged to be supported by the contributions of several noble patrons, among whom was Frederick, prince of Wales. He was buried in the Foundling Hospital, on the gate of which there is a statue of him.

Born 1668; died in London, 1751.

CORBACH, or KORBACH, kor'-bak, the capital of the principality of Waldeck, on the Itter, 70 miles from Cologne. Manf. Principally woollen stuffs. Pop. 2,300.—Near here, in 1760, the French defeated the Hanoverians.

CORBEIL, kor'-bai, a town of France, 18 miles from Paris, in the department of the Seine and Oise. It stands where the Essonne joins the Seine, at the head of a branch of the Paris and Orleans Railway. Manf. Shawls, cashmeres, and printed goods. Pop. 5,000.

CORCYRA, kor-si'-ra, an island in the Ionian Sea, on the coast of Epirus, famous in Greek poetry for the shipwreck of Ulysses, and the gardens of Alcinous. It is the modern Corfu. (See CORFU.)

CORDAY D'ARMANS, MARIE ANNE CHARLOTTE, kor'-dai, better known as Charlotte Corday, was born of a good family, who resided principally at Caen, where she was greatly admired for her beauty and spirit. She had a lover named Belsunce, a major in the French army, who was denounced by Marat, and caused to be assassinated. This event animated Charlotte with sentiments of vengeance against Marat, whom she regarded as the oppressor of her country. She hastened to Paris, and on being, after some difficulty, admitted to his presence, stabbed him to the heart, July 12, 1793. Far from attempting to escape, she confessed the fact, and was condemned to suffer death. Accordingly she was guillotined. This circumstance was attended by another equally extraordinary. As she was being conducted to the scaffold, a deputy of the city of Mayence, named Adam Lux, was so transported with admiration of her beauty and heroism, that he hastened to the tribunal, and demanded to suffer death in her stead. This, however, was not conceded to him; but he was also condemned and executed with the same instrument.

Born at St. Saturnin, 1768; died 1793.

CORDILLERA, kor-dil-lair'-a, the Spanish name for a mountain-chain.

CORDOVA, or KORDOBA, kor'-do-va, the capital of a province of the same name, and formerly the capital of a kingdom, in a plain on the Guadalquiver, 120 miles N.E. of Cadiz. It forms an oblong square, built like an amphitheatre, and is surrounded by Moorish walls, flanked with large towers, and encompassing a large area, extensively occupied by gardens. There is a cathedral, which was anciently a mosque, built by Abderahman I., king of the Moors, on the site of a Roman temple of Janus, about 760, and is still one of the most remarkable edifices in Spain. More than 800 columns of coloured marble, jasper, and porphyry remain. Several other churches are worthy of notice, either for their architecture or their paintings. There is a bridge across the Quadalquiver, which was built by the Moors. It consists of 16 arches, and is commanded by a Saracenic castle. Manf. Paper, hats, barrels, silken fabrics, silver and filigree work, and a kind of leather, called, from this town, Cordovan, or Cordwain. The manner of preparing it was here invented by the Moors. Its sale, has now, however, dwindled into insignificance. Pop. 49,755.—Cordova, the ancient Corduba, was, in 711, taken by the Moors, and, for several centuries, remained in their possession. In 1236 it was captured by Ferdinand III., and was constituted capital of one of the four old provinces of Andalusia, with the title of kingdom. In 1808 it was occupied and pillaged by the French. It was the birthplace of the two Senecas, and of Lucan the poet.

CORDOVA, a province of Spain, formerly a portion of the old province of Andalusia, inclosed by Badajos and Ciudad Real on the N., by Jaen on the E., on the S. by Granada, and on the W. by Seville. It is mountainous in the N., and in the S. comparatively level, with great fertility in the plains and valleys, and rich in minerals in the highlands. Area, 4,159 square miles. Pop. 394,661.

CORDOVA, one of the central provinces of the Argentine Confederation, South America. The surface is mountainous, and there are extensive barren flats. Maize and fruit are the chief products, and large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats are reared. Area, 54,000 square miles. Pop. 320,000.

CORDOVA, capital of the above province, situate on the Rio Primero, and has a handsome cathedral, and several other churches and monasteries. Manf. Cotton and woollen cloths. Pop. 49,600. Lat. 31° 26′ S. Lon. 63° 55′ W.—It was founded by the Spaniards in 1573.

CORDOVA, or CORDOBA, a town of the Mexican confederation, 57 miles S.W. of Vera Cruz. It has numerous domes, towers, and steeples, and there is a large square in the centre of the town, with Gothic arcades, on three sides, the cathedral on the fourth, with a fountain in the middle. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics, and leather; and it has a trade in coffee and sugar. Pop. 49,755.

COREA, ko-ré-a, a large country of Asia, situate E. of China, and consisting of a peninsula, formed on one side by the Yellow Sea, and on the other by the Sea of Japan. It is fertile along the coasts. Little is known of the interior, but it is supposed to be mountainous, and well-wooded and watered.

Pro. Rice, millet, wheat, hemp, cotton, tobacco, ginseng, fruits, cattle, and timber.
Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, coal, gold, and silver.
Manf.—Similar to those of the Chinese, whose habits and customs are nearly the same. Their commeree is principally with Japan; but they also pursue a contraband trade with China
Gov.—Despotic; and the public acts must be approved by the emperor of China, to whom, every four years, a tribute is paid.
Area.—90,000 square miles.
Pop. estimated at 8,000,000.
Lat. between 34° and 42° N. Lon. between 125° and 129° E.
History.—The Mongol conquerors of China subdued Corea; but the native dynasty was subsequently restored. Towards the end of the last century, Jesuit missionaries obtained a footing there, followed by others, and in 1852, 11,000 of the population professed Christianity. In 1866, some French missionaries having been murdered, a French force was landed, but obtained no successes, and since, the American expeditions have been equally fruitless. The Coreans have an almost unsurmountable objection to intercourse with foreigners.

CORELLA, ko-rel'-la, a town in Spain, on the left bank of the Alhama, 12 miles W. of Tudela. Manf. Soap, wax, earthenware, cordage, wine, oil, and liquorice. There is a good trade in grain, fruit, and cattle. A yearly fair is held. Pop. 4,000.

CORELLI, ARCANGELO, ko-rel'-le, called by his countrymen "the divine," was an Italian musical composer, who visited Paris and Germany. His greatest work is his "Concerti Grossi," or twelve Concertos. As a violinist, he was unrivalled, and his compositions for that instrument are regarded as of standard excellence.
Born at Lusignano, 1653; died at Rome, 1713.

CORENTIN, ko-ren'-tin, a river of Guiana, in S. America. It rises in Mount Acarai, 24 miles E. of the Essequibo, and enters the Atlantic in lat. 6° N.; lon. 57° W., by an estuary 25 miles wide. It is navigable for boats about 150 miles from its mouth, when it is impeded by cataracts.

CORESUS, ko-ré-sus, a priest of Bacchus at Calydon, in Bœotia, was deeply enamoured of the nymph Callirhoe, who treated him with disdain. He complained to Bacchus, who visited the country with a pestilence. The Calydonians were directed by the oracle to appease the god by sacrificing Callirhoe on his altar. Accordingly, the nymph was led to the altar, and Coresus, who was to sacrifice her, forgot his resentment, and stabbed himself. Callirhoe, conscious of her ingratitude to the love of Coresus, killed herself on the brink of a fountain, which afterwards bore her name.

CORFE CASTLE, korf, a small town in Dorsetshire, situate in the peninsula or the isle of Purbeck, 24 miles S.E. of Dorchester. It is chiefly noted for its castle, at the gates of which King Edward the Martyr was assassinated, March 18, 979, at the instigation of his stepmother, Elfrida. Subsequently, King John, in his wars with the barons, deposited his regalia in it for security. In the civil war it was defended for the king by Lady Bankes, wife of Lord Chief Justice Sir John Bankes; but, in 1645-6, it fell into the hands of the Parliamentarians, who dismantled it. There is an ancient stone cross in the market-place. The large and handsome church was rebuilt in 1860. A great quantity of potter's clay is dug in the neighbourhood and sent to Staffordshire. Pop. 2,000.

CORFU, kor-foo', the most northerly of the Ionian islands, situate at the entrance of the Gulf of Venice, on the coast of South Albania, from which it is separated by a channel varying from 2 to 6 miles in width. It is 38 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 3 to 20. It is mountainous, the highest summit being nearly 4,000 feet in elevation; but there are fertile valleys. Pro. Corn, wine, and olive-oil, oranges, lemons, honey, wax, and salt. Pop. 106,109.—This is the ancient Coreyra. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CORFU, the capital of the above island, is situate on the east coast, and built in the form of an amphitheatre. It is extremely strong, being defended by a detached citadel, two forts, and other works. The harbour is rather small, but the road is capacious and secure. In front of Corfu, at the distance of about a mile, is the island of Vido, upon which is built one of the above forts, and where the lazaretto is kept. It is protected by a triple range of batteries, and forms a strong outwork to the fortifications of the harbour. A Greek archbishop and a Latin bishop reside in the town. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 39° 37′ N. Lon. 20° E.—It has communication by steam with Athens, Otranto, Trieste, Gibraltar, and England.

CORFU, CHANNEL OF, is an arm of the Mediterranean, between the coast of Epirus and the island of the same name. Ext. 30 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 16 miles.

CORIA, ko'-re-a, a town of Spain, on the Alagon, 30 miles N.W. of Caceres. It is inclosed by walls, and contains a fine Gothic cathedral, and two palaces. Manf. Linen and chocolate. There are three annual fairs. Pop. 2,900.

CORIA-DEL-RIO, a town of Spain, province of Seville, on the right bank of the Guadalquiver. Manf. Soap, tiles, oil, wine, and liquorice. Pop. 3,200.

CORIGLIANO, ko-reel-ya'-no, a town of Italy, in the Calabrian province of Cosenza, 24 miles N.E. of Cosenza, 4 miles from the Gulf of Taranto, beautifully situated on the slope of a hill crowned by an old castle. Manf. Woollen and cloth, caps, and soap. It has a considerable trade in liquorice, fruit, and wine, which form the produce of the neighbourhood. Pop. 12,340.

CORIGLIANO, a town of Italy, between the Misa and Cesano, 24 miles W. of Ancona. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

CORINGA, ko-rin'-ga, a town of British India, in the presidency of Madras, near the mouth of the Godavery. It is the best port on the Coromandel coast, but is subject to inundations when the wind is high from the N.E. Both in 1787 and 1832, most of its inhabitants were drowned. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 16° 49′ N. Lon. 82° 29′ E.

CORINNA, ko-rin'-na, a lyric poetess of Bœotia, in Greece. She was the rival of Pindar, from whom she bore away, on five several occasions, the poetical prize. There have come down to the moderns only a few of her verses. She lived principally at Thebes.

Lived about 500 B.C.

CORINTH, kor'-inth, a town of Greece, the capital of a department of the same name, situate on the Isthmus of Corinth, 50 miles from Athens. It was one of the most famous towns of antiquity, eminent for wealth and cultivation of the arts; eminent, too, for the licentiousness which prevailed. In the temple of Aphrodite a thousand female slaves were maintained for the purpose of prostitution. It now presents more the appearance of a village than a town, the houses being scattered and separated by gardens and corn-fields. The traces of the ancient walls are still discernible, but the principal and only interesting monument of antiquity is the citadel, or Acro-Corinthos. It stands above the town on an isolated hill, 1,890 feet high, in a situation of immense strength. The town, destroyed by an earthquake in 1858, has been rebuilt nearer the Gulf of Corinth.

Pop. with Argolis, 136,081.

History.—Corinth was, according to legend, first founded by Sisyphus, son of Æolus, A.M. 2616, and received its name from Corinthus, the son of Pelops. It was totally destroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, and burnt to the ground, 146 B.C. The government of Corinth was monarchical till 779 years B.C., when officers, called Prytanes, were instituted. Its inhabitants formed numerous colonies, and Paul preached the gospel in it for upwards of a year. After the taking of Constantinople, it fell into the hands of the Turks, in 1458, from whom it was retaken in 1687, by its former possessors, the Venetians. In 1715 it again was possessed by the Turks, who held it till 1823.

CORINTH, or LEPANTO, GULF OF, an arm of the Mediterranean, extending from W. to E., and nearly separating Hellas on the N. from the Morea on the S., and communicating with the Gulf of Patras by the Strait of Lepanto. Ext. 75 miles long, with an average breadth of 15 miles. (See LEPANTO.)

CORINTH, ISTHMUS OF, a narrow neck of sterile land, separating the Gulf of Corinth, or Lepanto, from that of Ægina, and connecting the peninsula of the Morea with the rest of Greece. It is 20 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 4 to 8 miles. The famous Isthmian games were celebrated here.

CORIO, a town of Italy, 7 miles N.W. of Turin. Pop. 5,300.

CORIOLANUS, kor'-i-o-lai'-nus, the surname of Caius Martius, from his victory at Corioli 493 B.C., where, from a private soldier, he gained the amplest honours. His story, as given by the Roman historians, is regarded as a fiction by Niebuhr, who thinks it ought to be excluded from history. It is stated, however, that the consulship, which he had solicited, was refused him, he having rendered himself distasteful to the people, on account of his haughty character. He afterwards proposed measures hostile to the interests of the people, and opposed the gratuitous distribution of the corn which had been sent, in a time of scarcity, by Gelo, king of Sicily. The tribunes, thereon, condemned him to exile. Eager for vengeance, Coriolanus offered his services to the Volsci, and soon appeared at their head, ravaging the Roman territory, and laying siege to the "Eternal City" itself. The inhabitants, terrified, sent several embassies to him; but he was deaf to all their entreaties. He was about to deliver the assault, when his mother, followed by his wife and a train of Roman women, arrived at his camp, to supplicate him to pause. Conquered by their tears, Coriolanus consented to raise the siege. He was assassinated some little time after by the Volsci; although, according to others, he lived to an advanced age.—Shakspeare and other poets have dramatized his life.

Lived in the 5th and 4th centuries B.C.

CORK, kork, the largest county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, and bounded N. and N.E. by Limerick and Tipperary, E. by Waterford, and on the other sides by the Atlantic Ocean. It is 110 miles long, by 70 broad. The surface of the country is varied with beauty and fertility, producing crops principally of oats, wheat and potatoes. In the western part it is wild and boggy. The coast, 250 miles long, is bold and rocky, with numerous indentations, and abounds with excellent harbours. The principal bays are Bantry, Cork Harbour, Kinsale, Clonakilty, Dunmanus, and Youghal. Off the coast are numerous islands, including the rocky island of Cape Clear, the southernmost point of Ireland. Rivers. The Lee, Bandon, Blackwater, Islen, Funcheon, Bridge, and the Awbeg. Lakes. Numerous. Minerals. Copper, iron, coal, limestone, and marble. Area, 2,890 square miles. Pop. 492,810. This county is supposed to have been originally peopled by the inhabitants of Spain, and up to the end of the 12th century it formed a kingdom under the Macarthys.

CORK, a city and parliamentary borough, capital of the above county, is situate on both banks of, and on an island in the river Lee, over which are several elegant stone bridges, 138 miles S. of Dublin. The public buildings are generally of a plain exterior. They consist of a cathedral, an exchange, commercial buildings, a spacious market-house, custom-house, several handsome parish churches, a town-hall, hospitals, and two theatres. Its barracks are on a very large scale, and are fine buildings. It has also several scientific institutions, the principal of which are the Queen's College, opened in 1849, school of medicine and surgery, the philosophical library, mechanics' institute, and a fine arts', Cuvierian, agricultural, and other societies. There is a spacious public park, a promenade a mile long, lined with elm trees, on the west of the city, and a fine public cemetery. The harbour is one of the largest and best in the United Kingdom. The entrance is defended by batteries on islands, on which are artillery barracks, ordnance depôts, and a convict establishment. QUEENSTOWN, formerly known as the Cove of Cork, is on the estuary of the Lee. Manf. Sail-cloth, sheeting, paper, leather, glue, glass, iron, and friezes, and iron shipbuilding is largely carried on. The city exports large quantities of salt provisions, with hides, butter, flour, pork, and other Irish produce. Pop. 80,124.

CORLEONE, kor'-lai-o'-nai, a well-built town of Sicily, 20 miles from Palermo. It stands on a hill near the source of the Belici, and has several churches and convents, with a trade in corn and oil. Pop. 15,300, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

CORNARO, LODOVICO, kor'-na'-ro, a Venetian nobleman, best known by his advocacy of a temperate life, in an essay which has been translated into nearly all the European languages. He produced this essay in his 83rd year, and his own life was prolonged until he had nearly completed a century.

Born 1467; died 1566.

CORNEILLE, PETER, kor'-nai, an eminent French dramatist, who was brought up to the bar, for which his genius was entirely unsuited. Accordingly, he quitted it, and commenced writing for the stage. His first comedy, "Mélite," was produced in 1629, and was followed by "Clitandre," "La Veuve," "La Galerie du Palais," and "La Place Royale," when, in 1637, appeared his "Cid," founded on the "Cid" of Guilhem de Castro, of Spain. This performance filled the Parisians with enthusiasm. It carried their conceptions of the drama into new regions, and its author became "Le Grand Corneille." Whatever gratification this might bring to the vanity of the author, it was not quite universal. He had been so unfortunate as to offend the Cardinal Richelieu, who had, himself, some poetical pretensions, and who, as the founder of the French Academy, was, in some degree, the means of endeavouring to abate the public admiration. Chapelain, one of the members of that learned body, therefore, wrote an elaborate critique on the "Cid," hinting at a deficiency of inventive genius in Corneille, seeing that he had borrowed the plot of his drama from a Spaniard. Such an insinuation was too damaging to be taken with indifference by Corneille, who set to work and in 1639 produced his "Horace" and his "Cinna," which are, in themselves, sufficient to establish a claim to ingenious originality. In 1640 appeared his "Polyeucte," which was succeeded by "La Mort de Pompée," "Le Menteur," and several others. His later productions betokened an evident declension of genius, and being disgusted with the stage, he turned his attention to other kinds of poetical composition. His success in these, however, was not great, and he returned to the drama. In 1659 he produced his "Œdipe," and continued to write, but with no steady success. In 1672 his "Pulchérie" appeared, and, in 1674, his "Suréna;" but he had already ceased to be popular. For 37 years he was a member of the Academy, and was dean at the time of his death.

Born at Rouen, 1606; died at Paris, 1684.

CORNEILLE, THOMAS, brother of the above, was also a poet, a member of the French Academy, and of that of Inscriptions. He wrote no fewer than forty-two pieces, which, with the exception of "Ariane" and "Le Comte d'Essex," have all passed into oblivion. Of this number, however, many met with the greatest success in their day. He succeeded his brother as a member of the Academy. Besides his plays he wrote a "Dictionary of Arts," and a "Geographical and Historical Dictionary."

Born at Rouen, 1625; died at Andelys, 1709.

CORNELIA, kor-né'-le-a, wife of Pompey, and daughter of Metellus Scipio, accompanied her husband in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him massacred before her eyes in the harbour of Alexandria. (See POMPEY.)

CORNELIA, the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus. She is best known in history as "the mother of the Gracchi." She was the mother of twelve children, only three of whom survived the period of childhood, two sons, Tiberius and Caius, the tribunes, and a daughter, the wife of Scipio Africanus the younger. She directed the education of her sons, and was greatly admired for her virtues. When a Campanian lady made once a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and entreated her to favour her with a sight of her own, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, "These are the only jewels of which I can boast." In her lifetime a statue was raised to her, with this inscription, "To Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi." (See GRACCHUS.)

Born 189 B.C.; died 110 B.C.

CORNELIS, CORNELIUS, kor-naï'-les, Dutch painter, who, in 1595, instituted an academy of painting at Haarlem. He painted historical and mythological subjects, portraits, and flower-pieces. His pictures are esteemed to be of great value.

Born at Haarlem, 1562; died 1638.

CORNELIUS, PETER VON, kor-naï'-le-oos, an eminent German artist, who became a painter by choice, and who, in his nineteenth year, was engaged to paint, with figures in chiaroscuro, the cupola of the old church of Neuss, near Dusseldorf. After this he proceeded to Frankfort, where he executed a series of designs illustrative of the "Faust" of Goethe, to whom the engravings were dedicated. His reputation was now fast rising, and he proceeded to Rome, where he united himself with several kindred spirits and commenced studying with a view to found a new school of German art. To accomplish this, fresco was the style adopted, and Cornelius was commissioned to paint the walls of the villa of Bartholdy, the Prussian consul-general. The subjects he chose were, "Joseph Recognizing his Brethren," and "Joseph Interpreting the Dream of Pharaoh's Chief Butler," which were a decided success, and excited general admiration. He now rose higher and higher in his profession, and left Rome, 1819. At Dusseldorf he remodelled the academy, and then had two spacious halls assigned him to paint, in the Glyptothek at Munich. In one of these,—the Hall of Heroes, he represented in colossal proportions, the leading events of the "Iliad;" in the other,—the Hall of the Gods, he symbolized the Grecian mythology. These works were not completed till 1830, and are conceived and executed with such a grandeur of effect as to command universal homage. He also painted for the Ludwigs-Kirche, a painting of great size, the "Last Judgment," which has been compared to the grandest works of Michael Angelo. In 1841 he went to Berlin, where he executed twelve large paintings for the royal mausoleum. In 1825 he became director of the Munich Academy, which, under him, rose to be a great school of art. He was admitted a foreign member of the Institute of France, in 1838, and a member of the Academy of Berlin, in 1841.

Born at Dusseldorf, 1787; died 1867.

CORNELIUS, kor-né'-le-us, "horney," or "beam of the sun," a captain of the Roman garrison at Cæsarea.

CORNELIUS NEPOS, a Roman author, who wrote, besides other works, of which no traces remain, a number of biographies, which form a very popular school book.

Lived in the 1st century.

CORNETO, kor-naï'-to, a maritime town of Central Italy, 10 miles N. of Civita Vecchia. The cathedral, a noble Gothic edifice, built in the 9th century, was so much damaged by lightning, that it has never since been used as a place of worship. The Vitelleschi Palace (now an inn) and the old town-house, decorated with frescoes, are interesting buildings. The town is surrounded with walls, and, occupying a lofty ridge near the Mediterranean, has a picturesque appearance. Pop. 4,000. —It occupies the site of the Etruscan Tarquinii, and extensive remains of the most interesting character have been discovered.

CORNIGLIO, kor'-né-le-o, a town of Italy, at the junction of the Beatica and Parma rivers, 25 miles S.W. of Parma. Three cattle fairs are held in the year. Pop. 5,500.

CORNOUAILLES, kor'-noo-aïl, an old district of France, now divided into the departments Côtes-du-Nord, Finisterre, and Morbihan.

CORNWALL, korn'-wal, a maritime county of England, forming its S.W. extremity, and surrounded by the sea, except on the E. side, where it is separated from Devonshire partly by the Tamar. It is 78 miles long, with an average breadth of 43. A ridge of bleak and rugged hills extending from W. to E. through its whole length, renders its appearance dreary in the extreme. These ranges are mostly of granite formation, and the greatest elevations are Brown Willy, 1,368 feet; Caradon-hill, 1,208; Kit-hill, 1,067; and Hensbarrow Beacon, 1,034. The eye is, however, occasionally relieved by valleys of great fertility and beauty, watered by numberless small streams, which are frequently interesting, from the romantic scenery with which they are associated. Along the coasts, too, the huge masses of granite, bidding defiance on one side to the violence of the waves, and forming, on the other, a stupendous rampart to the fertile plains beneath, exhibit a rare union of the sublime and beautiful. On the north-west coast are several shallow bays, that of St. Ives being the largest. The south coast is more broken, has many promontories, and several deep bays, the most extensive being Mounts, Falmouth, St. Austell, Looe, and Whitsand Bays. On the eastern side of Mounts Bay is the Lizard, the most southerly point of England, as Land's End, a rocky promontory, about 60 feet high, is the most westerly. The climate is uncertain, and subject to heavy rains, but, on the whole, mild. Myrtles and other tender plants thrive, whilst fruit-trees everywhere abound, and attain high perfection.

Pro.—Comparatively little attention was paid to agriculture till lately, when it began to be improved. The principal crops are corn, potatoes, and garden vegetables, large quantities are grown for the London and other markets.

Minerals.—Silver, zinc, lead, copper, tin, antimony, manganese, cobalt, bismuth, and granite. The copper and tin mines are very valuable and have been worked from remote antiquity. They are mostly of great depth, and in some cases the miners have driven galleries beneath the sea. In no other part of the world is the art of mining carried to such perfection. More than 90,000 tons of ore of all kinds are annually raised. One of the most interesting of the Cornish minerals is the soap-rock, particularly used in the manufacture of porcelain. There is also the china-stone, which is raised in great quantities near St. Austell, and forms a principal ingredient in the manufactures of the Staffordshire potteries.

Rivers.—The streams are generally short, flowing directly to the coast. The principal are the Tamar, Lynher, Fowey, Fal, Looe, and Alan.

Fisheries.—The pilchard and mackerel fisheries are especially valuable, and absorb a large amount of capital.

Area.—1,365 square miles.

Pop.—329,484, of whom about 30,000 are employed in mining operations.

Chief Towns.—TRURO, the county town; FALMOUTH, PENZANCE, LAUNCESTON, BODMIN, ST. IVES, PADSTOW, REDRUTH, and LISKEARD.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into East and West Cornwall, each of which returns two representatives.

History.—Long before the Christian era this part of Britain was visited by Phœnician mariners for the purpose of obtaining tin. At the time of the Roman conquest, it was occupied by tribes of Cimbri and Damnonii; and in the Saxon times was the retreat of native Britons, who maintained their independence until subdued by Athelstane. Druidical remains abound, and the Cornish language, a Celtic dialect, was spoken until the beginning of the present century. Cornwall was, in 1337, constituted a royal duchy, the revenues of which belong to the sovereign's eldest son, who is duke of Cornwall by inheritance, but prince of Wales by creation.

CORNWALL, NEW, a district of British Columbia, North America, on the Pacific Ocean. Pop. Unascertained, being mostly Indians.

CORNWALL, a township of Orange county, New York, U.S., beautifully situate on the Hudson, 48 miles from New York. Pop. about 5,000. The United States Military Academy of West Point is here.

CORNWALLIS, korn-wal'-lis, a county of Lower Canada, lying on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, between Devonshire and the district of Gaspé. Pop. Unascertained.—Also a town of Nova Scotia, 50 miles from Halifax.—An island in British N. America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 65° N. Lon. 95° W.—Another in the S. Atlantic. Lat. 61° S. Lon. 54° W.

CORNWALLIS, CHARLES, marquis of, educated at Eton and Cambridge, entered the army, and in 1758 was made a captain in the light infantry. Three years afterwards he was aide-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, whom he accompanied to Germany till the end of the Seven Years' War. In 1762, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and succeeded, on the death of his father, to the title of Earl Cornwallis. Before then he had represented the borough of Eye in the House of Commons. In 1770 he was appointed governor of the Tower. On the breaking out of the American war, in 1776, he was ordered to embark for that country, where he displayed great military talents, highly distinguishing himself at the battle of Brandywine and the reduction of Charlestown. He won the battles of Camden and Guildford, but in 1781 was forced to surrender at York Town to the united American and French army, in consequence, he declared, of the inefficient support he received from Sir Henry Clinton. Soon after this he returned to England. In 1786, the affairs of British India wearing a critical aspect, he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief, where, in December, 1791, he took Bangalore. This success he followed up by defeating Tippoo Saib, who delivered to his lordship his two sons as hostages. Having successfully brought this war to a close, he returned to England, was created a marquis, and appointed master-general of the ordnance. In 1798 he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, where he quelled as insurrection, defeated an invading French force, and succeeded in effecting the important measure of a union between the two kingdoms. In 1801 his lord-lieutenancy expired, and he was employed as minister plenipotentiary in France; in which capacity he signed the preliminary treaty of the peace of Amiens. In 1804 he again accepted the governor-generalship of India, but, soon after his arrival, he fell ill of a fever, on his march to join the army at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares.

Born 1738; died 1805.

CORO, kor'-o, a seaport-town of Venezuela, South America. It is built in a sandy plain, near the Gulf of Maracaybo, about 2 miles from the Caribbean Sea. The inhabitants carry on a small trade in mules, goats, hides, sheep-skins, cheese, &c. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 11° 24′ N. Lon. 69° 46′ W.

COROMANDEL COAST, kor'-o-man'-del, a long line of seacoast on the W. side of the Bay of Bengal. It does not possess a good harbour in its whole extent. The cities of Madras, Pondicherry, and Tranquebar are on its coast. Lat. between 10° 17′ and 16° N. Lon. between 79° 56′ and 80° 10′ E.

CORONATA, ko-ro-na'-ta, an island in the Adriatic, 20 miles from Zara. Ext. 15 miles long, and 1 broad. It belongs to Dalmatia. Pop. Unascertained, and chiefly employed in agriculture, fishing, and trading in oil and wine.

CORONATION GULF, kor'-o-na'-shun, lies to the W. of Victoria Land, in the Arctic Ocean, British North America. Lat. between 66° and 68° 30′ N. Lon. between 109° and 110° W.

CORONIL, a town of Spain, 28 miles S. of Seville. Manf. Linen, woollen, cotton, and silk fabrics, hardware, wine, oil, and vinegar. There are two annual fairs. Pop. 3,800.

COROT, JEAN BAPTISTE, ko-ro', a modern French landscape painter, remarkable for the exquisite beauty of his atmospheric effects. He was the son of poor parents, and apprenticed to a woollen draper, but his love of art was so great that he quitted that employment and devoted himself to study, rising to eminence. His pictures are among the most highly admired of the modern French school.

Born in Paris, 1796; died 1875.

CORPUS CHRISTI BAY, kor'-pus kris'-ti, a lagoon in Texas, N. America, separated from the Gulf of Mexico by the island of Mustang. Lat. 27° 30′ N. Lon. 98° W. It receives, at its W. end, the river Nueces.

CORREGGIO, kor-redj'-e-o, a town of Northern Italy, 10 miles N.W. of Modena. It has a citadel and several churches. Pop. 12,367.

CORREGGIO, a celebrated Italian painter, whose real name was Antonio Allegri, but called Correggio from having been born in the above town. His life is shrouded in obscurity. The little that is known of him seems to be rather the offspring of conjecture, eked out with imaginary probabilities, than facts obtained as the result of ascertained data. It is not known by whom he was instructed in his art; but Bianchi, Bartolotto, Lombardi, his uncle Lorenzo, and Mantegna, have all been named as his teachers. It is generally thought that he was mostly self-taught, seeing that he seems never to have lived at Rome. His manner combines grandeur of design with sweetness and gracefulness of execution. It is said he married, in 1520, a lady of a Mantuan family, whose name was Girolama Merlini. She is the original in the picture of his Holy Family, "La Zingarella." None have excelled him in the delicacy of his flesh-colouring; and his "Penitent Magdalen" is affirmed to be the most exquisite female figure ever painted. Some of his best pictures are in the National Gallery of Great Britain. One of them, the "Ecce Homo," was purchased for £11,500. He was buried in the church of St. Francis, at Correggio.

Born at Correggio, 1494; died 1534.

CORREZE, kor-raiz', a department of France, which comprises the S. or lower division of the former province of Limousin. The northern part is traversed by an offshoot of the Auvergne mountains, which attains, in Mount Odouze, an altitude of 3,200 feet. The other portions of the department are undulating. The soil is far from productive, but large crops of beetroot are grown. Rivers. The Dordogne, Vezère, and Corrèze. Minerals. Iron, coal, copper, lead, slate, granite, lime, and potters' clay. Large quantities of timber are grown. Pop. 317,066. —The department is divided into 3 arrondissements and 287 communes.

CORRIB, LOUGH, kor'-rib, lok, a lake in Connaught, Ireland, 3 miles from Galway. It is 23 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 6 miles. It has numerous islets.

CORRIENTES, kor'-re-ain'-tais, a province of the Argentine Confederation, South America. It has a varied surface, well wooded and fertile in the south, but marshy in the north; fertile in maize, sugar, cotton, indigo, tobacco, rice, and a kind of silk. Area, 54,000 square miles. Pop. 204,000.

CORRIENTES, capital of the above province, situated on elevated ground, on the left bank of the Parana, near its confluence with the Paraguay. A good transit trade is carried on. Pop. 15,500. Lat. 27° 28′ S. Lon. 58° 44′ W.

CORSHAM, kor'-sham, a town of Wilts, 4 miles from Chippenham. Pop. 3,200.—It is a station on the Great Western Railway.

CORSICA, kor'-se-ka, in French corse, an island in the Mediterranean, between the coast of Genoa and the island of Sardinia, 120 miles long, with a varying breadth up to 45, forming a department of France. It is separated from the island of Sardinia, on the S. by the strait of Bonifacio, about 10 miles wide, and is 100 miles to the S.W. of the nearest point of France, and 50 miles from the Italian coast. It is covered with mountains, especially in the centre, and culminating in Monte Rotondo, which attains an elevation of upwards of 9,000 feet above the level of the sea, and several other summits are about 7,000 feet high. It is watered by a number of streams and rivulets, which filter through a stony soil but little cultivated. The east coast has few indentations, but there are many deep bays on the west coast, the chief being the Gulfs of St. Fiorenzo, Calvi, Porto, Liscia, Ajaccio, and Valmio.

Pro.—Corn, excellent wine, oranges, lemons, figs, and other fruits; but the wealth of the island lies in its oil, chestnuts, olives, timber, and live stock, especially mules and goats.

Minerals.—Silver, copper, lead, iron, saltpetre, and alum, but the mines are little wrought; granite, marble, and porphyry.

Manf.—Coarse woollens, leather, and hardware. The silk raised is used by the Genoese for the manufacture of their damasks and velvets, as also by the French at Lyons. The fisheries on the coast are productive.

Chief Towns.—AJACCIO, the capital, BASTIA, CORTE, and SARTINE.

Area.—3,377 square miles.

Pop.—272,639, mostly of Italian descent.

Lat. Between 41° 20′ and 42° N. Lon. Between 8° 30′ and 9° 30′ E.

History.—This island has been successively occupied by the Phœnicians, Romans, Goths, Saracens, Franks, the Popes, Pisans, and Genoese; and lastly, by the French, in whose possession it now remains, and to whom it was ceded by the Genoese in 1768. In 1794, Paoli, with the assistance of the British, achieved a temporary release from the French dominion. Corsica was constituted a kingdom under British protection, governed by an English viceroy, and by a parliament of its own. But in 1796, the British were compelled to evacuate the island, and the French recovered possession. In 1811 it was made a department of France, and is divided into five arrondissements and 364 communes. In Ajaccio, its principal town, Napoleon I. was born.

CORSOER, or KORSOR, kor'-sor, a seaport of Denmark, 62 miles S.W. of Copenhagen, with a strong castle and good harbour. Pop. 1,800. It has communication by railway with Copenhagen.

CORT, CORNELIUS, Dutch engraver, who went to Venice, where he engraved some of Titian's pictures, and afterwards established a famous school of engraving at Rome.

Born at Hoorn, 1536; died, 1578.

CORT, HENRY, of Gosport, inventor of the process by which pig-iron was converted into malleable iron by the flame of pit-coal in the puddling furnace. Before his time, English ironmasters were compelled to employ charcoal for fuel. He began business as an iron merchant at Gosport, near which town he erected large works. Having got pig-iron into a malleable condition, he further invented a process for drawing it into bars by means of grooved rollers. In other words, he reduced the labour and cost of producing iron to one-twentieth of what they were before his day, and the iron was of a better quality. In perfecting these inventions, Cort expended a fortune of upwards of £20,000, and an unfortunate choice of a partner and a series of complicated law suits reduced him to poverty. In 1794 he received a Government pension of £200 a year. In 1859 a public appeal for the benefit of his family was made; and, looking at the services he rendered to the iron trade and our iron constructions, there can be no hesitation in assigning to the name of Cort a place beside the illustrious Watt, Arkwright, and Wedgwood. It is estimated that his inventions have added £600,000,000 to the national wealth since the beginning of the century, and given employment to 6,000,000 persons.

Born at Lancaster, 1740; died, 1800.

CORTE, a town of Corsica, 30 miles from Bastia. Pop. 5,000. It is defended by a castle, and near it are quarries of marble and jasper.

CORTES, or CORTEZ, HERNANDO, or HERNAN, kor'-tais, the conqueror of Mexico, a celebrated Spanish adventurer, whose family was respectable but not opulent. He was bred at Salamanca to the law, which he renounced to follow a soldier's life. The governor of Hispaniola was his relation; and Cortes, in 1504, went to St. Domingo, where he was appointed to several valuable posts. In 1511, he accompanied Velasquez in his expedition to Cuba, and displayed so much skill and bravery in the conquest of that island, that he was chosen to conduct a similar enterprise for the conquest of Mexico. Accordingly, in 1519, he set out on his expedition, and first landed at Tabasco, where, after several bloody battles, he compelled the natives to submit to the Spanish yoke. Thence he sailed to St. Juan de Ulva, in the Bay of Mexico, where Cortes was met by several messengers from the governors of the province. Assuming now the title of ambassador of the king of Castille, he insisted on having an audience with Montezuma, the emperor. In the meantime, he founded a settlement on the coast, to which was given the name of Vera Cruz, at the same time declaring himself independent of the governor of Cuba. For some time he had tried in vain to negotiate a friendly intercourse with Montezuma, and now, at the head of 500 Spaniards, indifferently armed, he marched up the country. After various events, he defeated the Mexicans in the great battle of Otumba, and finally succeeded in establishing himself in their capital, where he ordered some of the Mexican officers to be burned alive, and put the emperor himself into chains, exacting also immense tributes of gold and precious stones. After the death of Montezuma, his nephew, Guatimozin, was chosen emperor, but Cortes again took possession of the city, and killed the young emperor with the most horrible tortures. Meanwhile, a commission was sent from Spain to deprive him of his post; but this he contrived to elude, and afterwards obtained from Charles V. the appointment of governor of New Spain. His conduct to the natives was merciless in the extreme, and a new commission of inquiry arriving, he returned to his native country to vindicate his honour, in 1528. Having made his defence to the satisfaction of Charles, he was created marquis of the Valle de Oajaca, and obtained a large grant of land in New Spain, where he proceeded in 1530. Three years afterwards he discovered the peninsula of California. After an absence of ten years, he returned, to be treated with cold civility by Charles, and with neglect by his ministers. Disgusted alike with king, court, and courtiers, he, after an unfortunate expedition to Algiers, in which he served as a volunteer in 1541, but after which he was insulted by Charles, retired to a residence in the vicinity of Seville, and there passed the remainder of his days.

Born at Medellin, a village of Estremadura, 1485; died near Seville, 1547.

CORTLANDT, kort'-land, a county of New York, United States. It is fertile in the usual cerealia, and contains iron and sulphur-springs. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 25,500. The capital is Cortland.

CORTONA, kor-to'-na, a fortified town of Italy, on a hill fronting the lake of Thrasymene, 52 miles S.E. of Florence. It is a place of great antiquity, one of the twelve cities forming the Etruscan League, and is, to a considerable extent, still encompassed by its walls, erected 3,000 years ago. It has a cathedral of the 10th century, and it has a castle built by the Medici. Its churches contain many valuable works of art, and it has a famous academy of sciences, which was founded in 1726. Pop. 5,000.

CORTONA, PIETRO DI, a native of the above town, painter and architect. He studied at Rome, and at first showed little ability, but soon established a reputation by a fine altar piece and the painting of a ceiling in the Barberini Palace. He was afterwards employed in similar works at Florence and other places. Pope Alexander VII. made him a knight of the order of the golden spur; and he is buried in the church of St. Luke, at Rome, where is one of his finest altar pieces.

Born at Cortona, 1596; died at Rome, 1669.

CORUNNA, ko-run'-na, a fortified seaport of Spain, on a peninsula at the entrance of the Bay of Betanzos, in the province of Corunna. Its chief objects of interest are the royal arsenal, and an ancient tower called after Hercules, and occupying a Roman foundation. The harbour is spacious and secure, being defended by Fort St. Diego on the E., and Fort San Antonio on the W. About 3 miles from the harbour is a lighthouse. Manf. Cordage, linen goods; canvas, glass, and cigars. Besides these are some shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 33,730 Lat. 43° 22′ N. Lon. 8° 22′ W.—The Spanish Armada took its departure on its fatal enterprise; and on the heights of Elvina, in 1809, the British, under Sir John Moore, defeated the French, although the glory was dearly purchased by the loss of their general, to whose memory a monument has been raised. The town was the Magnus Portus of the Romans. Pop. of the province, 610,297.

CORVEY, kor'-vai, a town of Prussia, in the province of Westphalia. There is a magnificent cathedral, and a famous Benedictine convent built in the 6th century. Pop. 5,800.

CORWEN, kor'-wen, a town of Merionethshire, North Wales, on the right bank of the Dee. Pop. 2,464.

CORYAT, THOMAS, kor'-i-at, an English traveller, who called himself the "Odcombian legstretcher." He was the son of the rector of Odcombe, and in 1611 published an account of his travels on the continent, with the singular title of "Coryat's Crudities," now a rare book, and fetching, whenever it is sold, a very high price. In the following year, he set out again with a design of spending ten years in the East. He rambled through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, and died at Surat.

Born 1577; died 1617.

CORYBANTES, kor-i-ban'-tees, the priests of Cybele, who, in the celebration of their festivals.

beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. First inhabiting Mount Ida, they passed into Creta, and were, according to Greek legend, charged with the care of the infant Jupiter.

CORYVREKAN, or CORRYBRECHTAN, kor'-i-vrek'-an, a dangerous vortex, or whirlpool, on the W. coast of Scotland, between the isle of Scarba and the N. point of Jura.

COS, or STANCHIO, kos, an island of Asiatic Turkey, in ancient times celebrated for a temple dedicated to Æsculapius, and for the beautiful silk produced there. It is 20 miles long, by 5 broad. Fertile, and with a delightful climate. Pro. Silk, cottons, wines, fruit, and corn. Pop. Unascertained; perhaps 4,000.—The modern town of Cos is a poor place, and the harbour, once frequented, is filled up with mud.

COSEL, or COSSELL, Countess of, wife of the minister of Augustus II., elector of Saxony and King of Poland. The king being attracted by her, caused her to be divorced from her husband, and made her his mistress. For nine years she exercised an enormous influence, her arms appearing on the coinage. The king built for her the splendid Cosel Palace, at the expense of his subjects. Falling into disgrace she was imprisoned for 45 years.

Born 1679; died 1759.

COSENZA, ko-sen'-za, a city of Italy, the capital of Calabria Citeriore, situate at the foot of the Apennines. The streets are generally narrow, slanting, and ill built. It is surrounded by walls, and has a castle now converted into a barracks, and standing at the confluence of the rivers Busento and Crati. Manf. Cutlery and earthenware. It has a trade in rice, oil, corn, silk, and fruit. It has frequently suffered from earthquakes. Pop. 15,918.—The town was anciently the capital of the Brutii. Pop. of comp. 466,298.

COSHOCTON, ko-shok'-ton, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 646 square miles. Pop. 26,642. The capital is Coshocton.

COSLIN, or KOSLIN, ko'-slin, a well-built town of Prussia, in Pomerania, on the Nesebach, 6 miles from the Baltic. Manf. Silks, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 8,300.—Here is a monument to the Pomeranians who fell in the war of 1813, '14, and '15. The town was burned in 1718, but was rebuilt by Frederick William I., to whom there is a statue in the market-place.

COSMAS, ALEXANDER, traveller and author, known as "Indico pleustes" (Indian navigator). As a merchant he traded in Arabia and India, and wrote a curious account of India and Ceylon. He believed that the earth was a parallelogram surrounded by walls, and had other strange notions of cosmogony.

Lived in the 6th century.

COSMO I. II. and III. (See MEDICIS.)

COSNE, kone, a town of France, department Nièvre, on the Loire, 28 miles from Nièvre. Manf. Iron goods, hardware, and cutlery. Pop. 6,500.

COSSACKS, kos'-saks, the name of a warlike people who inhabit the Ukraine, or the countries bordering on Russia, Tartary, the north of Turkey, Mongolia, and China. They are subjected to Russia, but are governed by their own laws, and have usages peculiar to themselves. They form the irregular troops of Russia, and, in times of war, it is estimated they can supply that power with a force of nearly 100,000 men. Their settlements in European Russia are calculated to occupy an area of 100,000 square miles, and their population is about 900,000. This is exclusive of the Ukraine Cossacks, who are mostly settled. The others comprised in this estimate are the Don Cossacks, the Black-Sea Cossacks, the Asovien and the Ural Cossacks. These form a military cordon of the empire of the Czar, extending from the Black Sea nearly to the Sea of Okhotsch.

COSSE BRISSAC, CHARLES DE, kos brees'-sak, a celebrated French marshal, who successfully commanded the French army in Flanders and Piedmont, under Francis I., Henry II., and Charles IX. He was successively grand-master of artillery, governor of Picardy, and marshal of France. He was of small stature, but known as the "handsome Brissac," and for that reason excited the jealousy of Henry II. He acquired so high a reputation, that nobles and princes came to him to learn the art of war.

Born 1505; died at Paris, 1563.

COSSEIR, or KOSSEIR. (See KOSSEIR.)

COSSIMBAZAR, kos'-sim-ba-zar', a town of British India, in the province of Bengal, situate on the Bhagirathi river, a mile south of Moorshedabad. Manf. It has been long celebrated for its silk, carpets, and cotton stockings, which are knit by the women and children of the vicinity. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 24° 10′ N. Lon. 88° 15′ E.

COSSYAH HILLS, kos-si'-ya, in Hindostan, between Assam and Sylhet, on the N. and S., and the Garrow country on the W. and E. Area, 730 square miles. Pop. 12,000. Lat. between 25° and 26° 7′ N. Lon. between 90° 52′ and 92° 11′ E.

COSTA, ISAAC DE, kos'-ta, Dutch poet and theologian, who studied at Leyden, and at the age of eighteen produced a metrical translation of the "Persians" of Æschylus. Shortly afterwards he renounced the Jewish religion and became a Protestant. He wrote several poetical and theological works, among the latter, a refutation of Strauss's "Life of Jesus," and a history of the people of Israel.

Born at Amsterdam, 1798; died 1860.

COSTA, LORENZO, Italian painter, founder of the Ferrarese school, famous for portraits and altar-pieces.

Born at Ferrara, 1413; died at Florence, 1499.

COSTA, SIR MICHAEL, musical composer and conductor, was born at Naples, and his precocious talent for music gained for him admission, when very young, into the Conservatoire de Musique of his native city, where he studied under the famous Tritto. He made his entrée into the musical world as the composer of a cantata entitled "L'Immagine," which was quickly followed by "Il Delitto Punito," both of which were favourably received. In 1828 he produced his first opera, "Malvina." The same year he came to England, and took part in the musical festival at Birmingham, and in 1831, when he was only twenty-one years of age, he was appointed conductor of the orchestra at Her Majesty's Theatre. In 1847 he contributed to the formation of a second Italian opera at Covent Garden, and with that house he identified himself for many years. He has produced several operas, among them, "Don Carlos," but his great work is the oratorio, "Eli," produced at the musical festival at Birmingham in 1855. "Naaman," which was produced in 1864, was, however, scarcely less successful. He conducted the colossal Handel Festivals at the Crystal Palace, and the principal musical festivals in the cathedral towns. He is a naturalized British subject, and received the honour of knighthood in 1869, and in the same year received the royal order of Frederick from the king of Wurtemburg.

Born 1810. Died 1884.

COSTAMOUNI, or KASTAMOUNI, kos'-ta-moo'-nee, a town of Asia Minor, on the Kara-su, 114 miles from Angora. It has numerous mosques and public baths. Manf. Printed cottons, copper goods, and a trade in wool. Pop. 13,000, nearly all Turks.—This place has an elevation of nearly 2,400 feet above the level of the sea.

COSTA RICA, kos'-ta ree'-ka, a republic of Central America, bounded on the N.E. by the Gulf of Mexico, S.W. by the Pacific Ocean, N.W. by Nicaragua, and S.E. by Veragua. It is mountainous and volcanic, with extensive forests, although many parts present large barren tracts. Along the Pacific coast the country is fertile and beautiful, the climate is mild and temperate, except near the sea.

Pro.—Coffee, which is the staple; tobacco, sugar, cocoa, sarsaparilla, wild indigo, dye and other valuable woods.

Minerals.—Gold and silver.

Area.—26,040 square miles.

Pop.—About 200,000, of whom one-third are of the aboriginal or Indian race; and another that of mixed races.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are six provinces—San José, Cartago, Alajuelo, Heredia, Monrovia, and Punta Arenas. The chief towns are SAN JOSÉ, the capital, CARTAGO, HERREDIA, ESTRALLA, ESPARZA, and UJANAS.

Constitution.—Costa Rica has been an independent state since 1821; and from 1824 to 1839 formed part of the Confederation of Central America. The present constitution dates from December, 1871. The president is elected for four years, and there is a congress of one chamber, which annually elects two vice-presidents.

COSTER, LAURENS, kos'-ter, one of those to whom the invention of printing is ascribed. His countrymen, the Dutch, were so convinced that he was the real inventor, that statues were erected to his memory in 1622 and in 1856; and in 1740 a grand festival in honour of the jubilee of the master of the art was held. Modern research, however, has shown that the merit of the invention is due to John Gutenberg of Mentz. (See GUTENBERG.) Coster was a wealthy artizan of Haarlem, a member of the chief council, a judge, and sacristan of the church.

Born 1370; died 1439.

COSTIGLIONI, kos'-teel-ye-o'-ne, two towns of the Sardinian states, Piedmont.—1. In the division of Alessandria, 8 miles from Asti. Pop. 5,300. —2. In the division of Coni, 6 miles from Saluzzo. Pop. 3,000.

COSWAY, RICHARD, R.A., kos'-wai, a distinguished painter, who, by his skill in miniatures, rose to the highest rank in his profession. He took immense sums, and was patronized by the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., and all the leading members of the aristocracy. He married Maria Hadfield, a lady also of considerable artistic talent. Cosway lived in great splendour throughout his career, and was, in 1771, elected a member of the Royal Academy.

Born at Tiverton, in 1740; died 1821.

CÔTE D'OR, kote dor, a department of France, which comprehends the N. part of the old province of Burgundy, and is inclosed by the departments of Aube, Yonne, Saône-et-Loire, Jura, Haute Saône, and Haute Marne. The name is derived from a chain of hills, named the Hills of Gold, from the excellence and value of the wine produced in the district. The department is fertile, especially in the south, and largely covered with wood. It is divided into four arrondissements, and 717 communes. The capital is DIJON.

Rivers.—The Seine, Seraine, Armançon, the Aube, and the Saône. The Burgundy canal traverses the department.

Pro.—The usual cerealia and fruit, especially the grape, the extensive cultivation of which makes this one of the most important departments of France. On the eastern slopes of the Côte d'Or are the vineyards which produce the famous wines of Upper Burgundy.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, gypsum, marble, and lithographic stones.

Manf.—Jewellery, cloth, paper, pottery, iron goods, cottons, and chemicals.

Area.—8,354 square miles.

Pop. 382,819.

Lat. Between 46° 55′ and 48° N. Lon. Between 4° 2′ and 5° 35′ E.

CÔTE ST. ANDRÉ, kote andrai, a town of France, in the department of the Isère, 20 miles from Vienne. Pop. 4,500.—In its neighbourhood is produced the celebrated liqueur called Eaux de la Côte.

COTES, FRANCIS, R.A., kotes, one of the originators of the Royal Academy of London, and distinguished as a drawer of portraits in crayons. In oil-painting he was regarded by many as superior to Reynolds. His most celebrated works are a full-length portrait of the queen of George III., with the princess royal in her lap, and the beautiful daughter of Wilton the sculptor.

Born in London, in 1725; died 1770.

CÔTES DU NORD, kote doo nor', a maritime department of France, so called from its geographical position, as it comprehends the northern part of the ancient province of Brittany. The coast extends about 150 miles, and is much indented, presenting a range of granite cliffs. The department is mountainous in general, but productive in corn, hemp, and flax; the department, which comprehends several small islands in the Channel, is divided into five arrondissements and 387 communes, and cattle-rearing and horse-breeding are carried. The chief town is St. Brieuc.

Rivers.—The Rance, Blavet, Arguenon, Gouet, Trieux, and Oust.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, and copper.

Manf.—Woollen and linen goods, and sailcloth, paper, beetroot sugar, and earthenware.

Area. 1,967 square miles.

Pop. 627,585.

Lat. Between 48° 3′ and 48° 57′ N. Lon. Between 1° 53′ and 3° 35′ W.

COTIGNAC, ko-teen'-yak, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 16 miles from Draguignan, with a trade in leather, silk, and wines. Pop. 3,500.

COTIN, CHARLES, ko-tan(g), French scholar and author, counsellor of Louis XIV., member of the French Academy, and author of some poems of more than average ability. He was very learned, but pedantic, and is best known as the butt of Boileau and Molière, the latter of whom makes great fun of him in Les Femmes Savantes, under the name of Trissotin.

Born at Paris, 1604; died 1682.

COTOPAXI, ko'-to-pax'-e, a volcanic mountain of the Andes of Quito, 36 miles to the S.E. of the city of Quito. It is 18,875 feet above the level of the sea. With the exception of a section round its summit, of 4,400 feet, the upper part of the mountain is covered with snow. (See AMERICA, South.)

COTRONE, ko-tro'-na, a seaport of Italy, in the province of Catanzaro, at the mouth of the Esaro, in the Ionian Sea. The harbour is small. It is surrounded by walls, and defended by a strong citadel. Pop. 5,807. The ancient Crotona, one of the richest and most populous colonies of Greece, stood here.

COTSWOLD, or COTESWOLD HILLS, kots'-wolde, are in the county of Gloucester, extending 30 miles in length, and about 20 in breadth, and separating the basins of the Thames and the Severn. Highest part near Cheltenham, 1,134 feet.

COTTBUS, or KOTTBUS, kot'-boos, a town of Prussia, on the Spree. It is ancient and surrounded by walls, and has a royal palace and a college. Manf. Woollen cloths, leather, hosiery, and tobacco. Pop. 19,000.

COTTIN, SOPHIE RISTAND, kot-tan(g)', French author, the daughter of a banker of Bordeaux, and the wife of a French banker, who left her a widow at the age of 20. She is best known by her famous story, "Elizabeth; or the Exiles of Siberia."

Born at Bordeaux, 1773; died 1807.

COTTON, SIR ROBERT BRUCE, antiquary and collector of literary relics. He was educated at Westminster and Cambridge, and was one of the earliest members of the Antiquarian Society. James I. conferred on him the rank of knight, and afterwards of baronet. Being accused of writing an offensive political tract, he was imprisoned in the Tower, and his library confiscated. His death was accelerated by the loss of his books. The Cottonian Library, containing many manuscripts of great rarity and value, is now in the British Museum.

Born at Denton, Huntingdonshire, 1570; died 1631.

COTYTTO, ko-tit'-to, the goddess of all debauchery, whose festivals were celebrated by the Greeks at Athens, Corinth, Chios, and other places during the night.

COUCY, RENAUD, Castellan of, koo'-se, a French poet, author of some very passionate love songs. He is supposed to have been a crusader. His love adventures are made the subject of a romantic French legend.

Lived in the 12th century.

COULOMB, CHARLES AUGUSTIN DE, koo'-lomb, a French mathematician, who in early life served in the corps of engineers, and, in 1779, produced a treatise on the "Theory of Simple Machines," which gained the prize of the Academy. He was a member of the Institute, and inspector-general of the University; and in 1784 appointed intendant-general of waters and fountains of France. He is regarded as the founder of experimental physics in France, and is the inventor of the torsion balance. There are few to whom the theory of electricity is so much indebted as to this philosopher.

Born at Angoulême, 1736; died 1806.

COUPAR ANGUS, a burgh or barony of Scotland, 14 miles N.E. of Perth. The remains of a large Roman camp are in the vicinity. Manf. Coarse linen fabrics and leather. Pop. 2,036.—A station on the Caledonian railway.

COURBEVOIE, koorb-vwaw', a town of France, in the department of the Seine, on the left bank of the river of that name, and 5 miles N.W. of Paris. There are large barracks, and a shipping trade is carried on. Manf. Cotton prints and white lead. Pop. 9,800.—A station on the Paris and Versailles Railway.

COURIER DE MERE, PAUL LOUIS, koo-re-air' de mai-rai, French scholar and author. At the age of 19 he entered the artillery school at Chalons, and two years afterwards attained the rank of lieutenant. Throughout his military career he was remarkable rather for attention to classical studies than to soldierly duties, and he resigned in 1809. He published translations from Xenophon and other classic writers, and after the restoration of the Bourbons made himself notable as the author of pamphlets attacking their arbitrary government, which led to his being imprisoned and fined. He was shot by his gamekeeper, who died before his guilt was discovered.

Born at Paris, 1772; died 1825.

COURLAND, or KURLAND, koor'-land, a government of European Russia, separated on the N.E. from Livonia by the Dwina, and bounded on other sides by the Baltic and the governments of Wilna and Witepsk. It is undulating, with a fertile soil, but in many portions interspersed with swamps, and there are more than 300 lakes. Forests are abundant, consisting of oak and fir, and covering two fifths of the country. The principal rivers are the Aa and the Windau, the latter being connected by a canal with the Niemen. Pro. Corn, flax, hemp, tobacco, and fruits. The live stock are generally of inferior breeds, and the pasturage being scarce, not many are raised. Manf. Paper, copper wares; and there are some distilleries and tile-factories. Pop. 642,570, mostly Lutherans. Lat. between 56° and 58° N. Lon. between 21° and 27° E. In 1795, this country was incorporated with Russia.

COURTALLUM, koort-al'-lum, a town of British India, in the territory of Travancore, 350 miles from Madras. Pop. Unascertained.—It stands in a fertile district, yielding sago, date-palms, arrowroot, nutmeg, cinnamon, and having an indigenous flora of upwards of 2,000 species.

COURTRAI, or COURTRAY, koor-trai', a fortified town of Belgium, on the Lys, which divides it into two parts, 30 miles S. of Bruges. Its public edifices are the church of St. Martin, founded in the 7th century, with one of the loftiest and most beautiful towers in Belgium, and containing a superb picture of the Crucifixion, by Vandyke; St. Michael's church, in which is a famous image of the Virgin, much resorted to by pilgrims; the two colossal towers, erected in the 15th century for the defence of the city; a Gothic town-hall, and a public library. Manf. Table linen, woollen, cottons, flannel, and lace. Pop. 8,000.—Here, in 1302, the battle of the "Spurs," in which the Flemings defeated the French, was fought. On the field, after the fight, 30 gilt spurs were gathered, and hung up as a trophy in the church of the convent of Groenangen, now destroyed. In 1793, this town was taken by the French, and made capital of the department of Lys. It reverted to the Netherlands in 1814.

COUSIN, JEAN, koo-sa', an eminent French painter, sculptor, and geometrician. At the courts of Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry IV., he was the principal favourite, and is the first French artist who excelled as an historical painter. His most celebrated picture is "The Last Judgment," now in the Louvre. His greatest work in sculpture is the monument of Admiral Chabot in the church of the Celestines. His book on geometry was published in 1560.

Born at Soucy, near Sens, about 1500; died about 1590.

COUSIN, VICTOR, a distinguished French inquirer into the systems of mental philosophy, and lecturer on philosophy at the Faculté des Lettres, in Paris. In 1815 he was appointed deputy professor of philosophy at the Sorbonne. In 1817 he visited Germany, and studied the writings of Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and others. The original idea upon which his own system is based is, that every system is true, but incomplete in itself; but when all systems are united, and suitably, as it were, dovetailed together, a complete system would be obtained. After various vicissitudes, incident to the political changes in France, and to the liberal opinions he expressed, he became, under Louis Philippe, a councillor of state, an officer of the Legion of Honour, and a peer of France. Cousin wrote largely on educational as well as philosophical subjects, and translated the works of Plato, in thirteen volumes.

Born at Paris, 1792; died at Cannes, 1867.

COUSTOU, NICHOLAS, koos-too', French sculptor, and director of the Academy of Fine Arts in the reign of Louis XV. His brother, Guillaume, and nephew, of the same name, were also sculptors of great ability.

Born at Lyons, 1658; died at Paris, 1733.

COUTANCES, koo-tance', a town of France, in the department of Manche, about 4 miles from the sea. It contains several fine churches, particularly a Gothic cathedral, the two lofty spires of which form a conspicuous landmark, a college, public library, and a theatre. Manf. Linens, woollens, lace, and parchment. Pop. 8,100.

COUTHON, GEORGES, koot-hon(g), French revolutionist, bred to the law, and elected to the National Assembly. He had previously been considered a kindhearted man, but he fully shared in the atrocities of the violent party, and on the downfall of Robespierre, was arrested with him and guillotined.

Born at Orcet, 1756; died 1794.

COUTTS, ANGELA GEORGINA BURDETT, koots, (Baroness Burdett Coutts), a lady possessed of great riches, and the daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, who, for many years, represented Westminster, as a Reformer, in parliament. Her grandfather Mr. Coutts the banker, having, at a late period of his life, married Miss Mellon, an actress, bequeathed to the latter his very large fortune, and she afterwards married the duke of St. Albans. The duchess dying in 1834, without issue, left to Miss Burdett her immense wealth, estimated at £2,500,000, on the condition that she would assume the name and arms of the Coutts family. This she accordingly did, and devoted her life to promoting works of charity and public usefulness. In 1871 she was created a baroness in her own right, as a recognition of the great benefits conferred upon the community by her splendid liberality.

Born 1814.

COUVINS, koo'-va, a town of Belgium, 14 miles from Charlemont, celebrated for its steam-machinery and the manufacture of cables. Pop. 2,000.

COVADUNGA, ko'-va-doon'-ga, a small town of the Asturias, Spain, 30 miles from Oviedo. This place is famous in Spanish history, as being the locality where, in 718, Pelayo, king of the Goths, defeated, with immense slaughter, the army of the Moors. This victory delivered this portion of Spain from the dominion of the Saracens, and from it may date the birth of the kingdoms of Asturias, Castile, and Navarre.

COVE OF CORK. (See QUEENSTOWN.)

COVENTRY, kov'-en-tre, a city and parliamentary borough of England, the county town of Warwickshire, 18 miles S.E. of Birmingham. It was formerly inclosed by walls, and many of its houses have still an antique appearance. Its public buildings are St. Michael's Church, a beautiful specimen of the English or Pointed style of architecture; Trinity Church, having, as the other has, a lofty spire, but of inferior beauty; and Christ Church, a modern building attached to the beautiful spire of the old Greyfriar monastery; various charitable institutions, hospitals and almshouses; a free school, founded in the reign of Henry VIII.; St. Mary's Hall, one of the finest existing specimens of the ornamental architecture of the 15th century; a gaol, barracks, and theatre. Manf. Watches, ribbons, and silken fabrics. Pop. 42,111. —A station on the London and North-Western and Midland Railways. Coventry is a place of great antiquity. Frequent parliaments were convened within its walls by the ancient monarchs of England, some of whom occasionally resided in it. It was the favourite residence of Edward, the Black Prince; and Queen Elizabeth took great delight in seeing "the game of Hock Tuesday" performed in it. This pageant represented the destruction of the Danes by the English, in 1002. For pageants, however, the people of Coventry were always distinguished; and, until very recently, the procession of Lady Godiva was to be seen at the annual great fair in the Friday of Trinity week. The story of its origin is this. Leofric, earl of Mercia, and lord of this place, had laid heavy taxes on the citizens, and would not remit them, even at the entreaty of his wife, the Lady Godiva, who was as beautiful as she was modest, but on condition of her riding naked through the city, which he thought she would never submit to. She, however, determined to do so; and, on the occasion, all the doors and windows were shut, and Camden says that nobody looked after her. The tradition, however, is, that a tailor would needs be peeping, and that he was thereupon struck blind. He is commemorated in an effigy protruding from a window in the High-street, and is called "Peeping Tom of Coventry." One of the most exquisite minor poems of Tennyson is founded on this legend.

COVENTRY, SIR JOHN, a member of Parliament, who gave great offence to Charles II. by asking a question in Parliament in reference to the king's licentiousness. To punish him for his presumption, some ruffians were employed to attack him in the street and cut his nose to the bone. In consequence of this, Parliament passed the "Coventry Act," making cutting and maiming a capital offence; but, of course, the perpetrators of the cowardly outrage were unpunished.

COVERDALE, MILES, kuv'-er-dail, a distinguished English divine, educated at Cambridge, and ordained a priest in 1514; but, having adopted the reformed doctrines, in 1532 he united with William Tyndale in translating the Scriptures. The Prayer-book version of the Psalms are from this translation. In 1551 he became bishop of Exeter; but on the accession of Mary he was ejected and imprisoned. He went to Geneva, and when Elizabeth succeeded to the throne returned to England and became rector of St. Magnus, London Bridge.

Born in Yorkshire, 1487; died in London, 1568.

COVILHA, ko-vil-ha', a town of Portugal, in the province of Beira-Baixa. It is built on a hillside, is defended by a fort, and there are several churches, two convents, and a hospital. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 7,000.

COVINGTON, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 1,152 square yards. Pop. 5,000. The capital is Montezuma.

COVINGTON, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 486 square miles. Pop. 5,000. Williamsburg is the capital.

COVINGTON, a town of Kentucky, United States, on the Ohio river, opposite Cincinnati. It is regularly laid out, contains about twelve churches, a large city hall, a college, and other public buildings. Manf. Cotton, hemp, silk, and tobacco, and pork curing is carried on. Pop. 29,720.

COWES, West, kous, a seaport and watering-place on the north side of the Isle of Wight, on the Medina, with a safe and commodious harbour. Its streets, towards the sea, are narrow; but the buildings, rising above one another on the brow of a hill, command delightful views, and have a picturesque effect. Besides the new St. Mary's Church and Trinity Church, there is in the vicinity the ancient parish church of Northwood, with a modern tower and spire. The tower, the custom-house, and the castle are noticeable buildings. There are many elegant villas in the vicinity. At an angle called Egypt Point is a battery built by Henry VIII. It is much frequented in summer as a bathing-place, and is the head-quarters of the Royal Squadron Yacht Club. A considerable trade is carried on, and about 1,200 vessels enter the port annually. Pop. 13,052.

COWES, East, a hamlet of the Isle of Wight, on the east side of the Medina. There is a church, the first stone of which was laid by the Queen, when Princess Victoria, in 1831, directly opposite to West Cowes. Pop. 2,058.—Osborne House, the marine residence of Queen Victoria, is near this place.

COWLEY, Abraham, kow'-le, an English poet, the son of a London grocer, and educated at Westminster school and Trinity College, Cambridge. Early in life he produced a small volume of poems, called "Poetical Blossoms," most of them written in his boyhood, which gained him a considerable reputation, added to by elegant translations when at Cambridge. He took the M.A. degree, but was ejected from college in 1643 in consequence of his attachment to the court party. Three years afterwards he followed Queen Henrietta Maria to France, and remained there ten years. On his return to this country he was arrested and compelled to find security for his future behaviour. After the Restoration he obtained a lease of the Queen's lands at Chertsey, where he passed the remainder of his days. He took great interest in the advancement of scientific knowledge, and was one of the founders of the Royal Society. Dr. Johnson places him at the head of those whom he calls metaphysical poets; but though he is sometimes sublime, always moral, and frequently witty, he is occasionally tedious and affected. His Anacreontics are reckoned the best. He also wrote a comedy called "Cutter of Colman Street," and some pieces in prose, particularly a "Discourse on the Government of Cromwell," and a "Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy." He was an admirable prose writer. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory, erected in 1675 by the Duke of Buckingham.

Born in London, 1618; died at Chertsey, 1667.

COWLEY, Hannah, a poetess, whose effusions are perhaps more remarkable for their affectation than their merit. She wrote three narrative poems, called "The Scottish Village," "The Siege of Acre," and "The Maid of Aragon." For these, however, her name is not here preserved, but on account of her "Belle's Stratagem," and "A Bold Stroke for a Husband," which are her two best comedies of the nine which she wrote. Her maiden name was Parkhouse, and her husband a captain in the service of the East-India Company.

Born at Tiverton, 1743; died at Tiverton, 1809.

COWLEY, Henry Richard Wellesley, Earl, many years British ambassador at Paris and other courts, was the son of Lord Cowley, better known as Sir Henry Wellesley. At an early age he entered the diplomatic service, and in 1852 succeeded the marquis of Normanby at the Tuileries. In conjunction with Lord Clarendon, he represented England at the congress of Paris, held in 1856. He was created Earl Cowley in 1857, and made a Knight of the Garter in 1865.

Born 1804.

COWPER, William, kow'-per, and sometimes pronounced koo'-per, a celebrated English poet, was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II., and rector of Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, and was nephew to Lord-Chancellor Cowper. Being designed for the law, he, after finishing his education at Westminster, was placed under an eminent attorney, in 1754 was called to the bar, but never practised, and five years afterwards received the appointment of commissioner of bankruptcy, but did not enter on the duties of the office. At the age of 31 he was nominated clerk of the journals of the House of Lords, but when he found that it would be requisite for the clerk to appear at the bar of the house, it had such an effect on his nerves, that he was obliged to resign the office. A morbid melancholy now seized him, and it was found necessary to place him under the care of Dr. Cotton, at St. Albans, where he gradually recovered the use of his faculties. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, where he formed an acquaintance with a clergyman of the name of Unwin, in whose family he became an inmate. That gentleman being killed by a fall from his horse, in 1767, Cowper and Mrs. Unwin took up their abode at Olney, Buckinghamshire, where they contracted an intimacy with Mr. Newton, then curate of that parish, and where Cowper devoted himself to poetry. To a collection of hymns published by Mr. Newton, and widely known as the "Olney Hymns," Cowper contributed sixty-eight. In 1782 he published a volume of his poems, which did not excite much attention; but another volume, in 1785, stamped his reputation as a true poet. His "Task," "The Sofa," "John Gilpin," and other productions, will immediately occur to the reader's mind as works of enduring excellence. He afterwards engaged in translating Homer into Miltonic verse; and though his version is not so pleasing as that of Pope, it renders the original with greater fidelity. In 1786 he removed, with Mrs. Unwin, to Weston, Northamptonshire, where he continued to cultivate his literary tastes. In 1794 George III. granted him a pension of £300 per annum; but the royal bounty yielded pleasure only to his friends; for he was now sunk into a state of complete dejection, from which he never wholly recovered. He was buried in the parish church of Dereham, Norfolk, where a monument is erected to his memory. As a poet, Cowper occupies a very high place, and as a letter writer he is almost unrivalled.

Born at Berkhamstead, 1731; died at Dereham, 1800.

COX, David, kox, a distinguished water-colour artist, who unweariedly devoted himself to the study of Nature under her ever-varying aspects, and reaped his reward in the general admiration which was awarded to his pictures. He was the son of a blacksmith, and for some time a scene painter in Birmingham, and at Astley's, in London. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of Painters in Water-colours, and in the gallery of that society, in London, his pictures were almost exclusively shown.

Born at Birmingham, 1793; died at Harborne, near Birmingham; 1859.

COYPEL, NOEL, koy'-pal, French painter, who decorated the old Louvre and the palace of Versailles with historical pictures, and painted several altar pieces.

Born 1628; died at Paris, 1707.

COYSEVOX, ANTOINE, koys'-vox, French sculptor, member of the Academy of Arts. He executed statues of Louis XIV., Cardinal Mazarin, and other eminent persons, and many beautiful works of art. He was named the "Vandyke of sculpture."

Born at Lyons, 1640; died at Paris, 1720.

COZBI, koz'-bi, "a liar," a princess of Moab and seducer of the Israelites, through the wicked counsel of Balaam. She was killed by Phineas.

COZUMEL, koz'-u-mel, an island of Central America, near the E. coast of Yucatan. It is 30 miles long, and 8 broad. Remains of ancient buildings have been discovered on it. Lat. 20° 34′ N. Lon. 86° 44′ W.

CRABBE, GEORGE, reverend, krab, an English poet, who rose, from very humble circumstances, to hold the rectory of Trowbridge, in Wiltshire. His father was keeper of a warehouse and collector of salt dues at Aldborough, Suffolk. He was educated for the medical profession; but being unsuccessful, came to London in 1780, with very limited means, and in his distress applied to Burke, the great statesman, for literary introduction. The politician took him under his protection, introduced him to Dodsley, the publisher, who issued the poem "The Library," and advanced his fortunes by opening a path for his preferment in the church. He was ordained in 1782. At Burke's residence, Beaconsfield, he met Fox, Reynolds, and other celebrities. His principal poems are "The Library," "The Village," which was revised by Dr. Johnson; "The Newspaper," "The Parish Register," and the "Tales of the Hall," for which Mr. Murray, the publisher, gave him £3,000, with the remaining copyright of his previous poems. He was for some time domestic chaplain to the duke of Rutland, at Belvoir Castle, but in 1785 he took up his residence in his parsonage at Strathern, Dorsetshire. In 1813 he accepted the living of Trowbridge, in Wiltshire, where he resided till his death. The poetry of Crabbe is remarkable for its individuality, and the minuteness with which every picture is painted. Of the higher quality of invention he had none; but he could paint what he beheld with pathos, vigour, and originality. Byron speaks of him as "Nature's sternest painter, but her best."

Born at Aldborough, 1754; died 1832.

CRACOW, kra'-ko, a city of Poland, now comprised in the Austrian empire, and situate at the confluence of the Vistula and Rudowa, 155 miles from Warsaw. In the cathedral are the tombs of the most distinguished Polish kings and great men of the country, and the crown jewels were formerly deposited in it. Besides the cathedral, there are nearly 40 churches, 25 monasteries and nunneries, and several synagogues, an ancient castle, university (founded in 1564, and reorganized in 1817), a botanical garden, and observatory, and a library. It is connected by railway with Vienna, Berlin, Lemberg, and Warsaw. A tumulus to the memory of Kosciusko, with a height of 120 feet, formed of earth taken from the most famous battle fields of Poland, stands at about three miles from the city. The Austrians have constructed extensive fortifications round the city. Pop. 66,095, of whom more than a third are Jews. The city was founded by Krak, prince of Poland, in the early part of the 8th century, and was the capital of Poland from 1320 to 1609. It was annexed to the Austrian dominions in 1846.

CRADOCK, krad'-ok, a division of the Eastern province of Cape Colony, South Africa, to the north of the Great Winterberg range. It is an elevated plain, 3,000 feet above the sea level, and surrounded by lofty mountain ranges. It is one of the great wool producing districts of the colony, and the climate is delightful. Area, 5,070 square miles. Pop. 12,300.—The chief town is Cradock, on the Great Fish river, Pop. 2,000.

CRAIG, JOHN, kraig, reforming Scotch divine, who entered the Dominican order, but was soon afterwards imprisoned on suspicion of heresy. On his release he went abroad, and at Bologna openly avowed his adherence to the doctrines of the Reformation. He was brought before the Inquisition and sentenced to be burned; but was set at liberty on the occasion of the mob breaking open the prisons at Rome. He went to Vienna, and the emperor Maximilian II. refused to surrender him to the pope, and gave him safe escort out of the country. He then became the colleague of Knox at Edinburgh, where he refused to proclaim the banns of marriage between Queen Mary and Bothwell. He afterwards filled several offices in the church. He was of a bold and candid spirit, and exercised considerable influence.

Born 1512; died 1600.

CRAIG, SIR THOMAS, Scotch jurist and poet. He was the author of treatises on the feudal laws, on the succession to the throne of England, and other legal works, besides occasional poems on the marriage of Queen Mary and Darnley, and the birth of their son.

Born 1538; died 1608.

CRAIL, krail, a royal and parliamentary burgh and seaport of Fifeshire, Scotland, at the N. entrance of the Frith of Forth, 10 miles S.E. of St. Andrews. On the E. of the harbour are the remains of a castle, at which King David I. frequently resided. The church is of great antiquity. Catching and drying herrings employ many of the inhabitants. Pop. 1,126.

CRAILSHEIM, krails-hime, a town of Wurtemberg, on the right bank of the Jaxt. There is an old Gothic palace, now used as a court-house. Manf. Cotton, leather, earthenware, tobacco, and gunpowder. A mineral spring, much resorted to, is in the vicinity. Pop. 3,100.

CRAMER, JOHANN BAPTIST, krá-mer, German musical composer and pianist. His father and grandfather were musicians of note, and at the early age of 13 he began to play in public. Having made the tour of Europe, he settled in London at the age of 20, and remained there for more than 40 years, attaining great distinction as a composer, performer, and teacher. He was remarkable for the grace and delicacy of his playing, and composed a very large number of pieces, chiefly for the pianoforte. In 1832 he went to Paris, where he lived till 1845, when he returned to London.

Born at Mannheim, 1771; died in London, 1858.

CRANACH, LUCAS, kra'-nak, one of the most eminent of the old German painters, called after the place of his birth, but whose family name was Sunder. He produced a great many works, which are to be seen chiefly in Upper Saxony. He excelled in portraits and altar-pieces, the principal of these last being the "Crucifixion," in the church of Weimar. He was court painter to three electors of Saxony, Frederick the Wise, John the Constant, and John Frederick the Magnanimous; acted, besides, as director of court festivities, was an apothecary, paper-maker, and bookseller, and was twice burgomaster of Wittemburg. He was also the friend of Luther, and is said to have been the means of bringing about the marriage of the great reformer with Catherine Bora.

Born at Cranach, near Bamberg, 1472; died at Weimar, 1553.

CRANBORNE, kran'-born, an ancient town of Dorsetshire, 27 miles N.E. of Dorchester. There is a fine old church. Pop. nearly 2,000.—Cranborne Chase is in the neighbourhood, and still abounds with deer.

CRANBROOK, krăn'-brook, a town of Kent, 13 miles S. of Maidstone. A large hop business is carried on. Pop. 4,331.

CRANGANORE, kran-ga-nor', a town of British India, on the west or Malabar coast, 19 miles N. of Cochin, at the mouth of a river, the Cranganore, or Aycatta. It was surrendered by Tippoo to the British in 1790. It is said that congregations of Jews and Christians have existed here since the 5th century. Lat. 10° 14′ N. Lon. 76° 16′ E.

CRANMER, THOMAS, kran'-mer, archbishop of Canterbury. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow, received the D.D. degree, and was appointed lecturer on theology, in 1523. His opinion on the question of the divorce of Henry VIII. recommended him to that monarch, and his first service, after his appointment as archbishop, was to pronounce the divorce between the king and Catherine. He zealously furthered the Reformation, and by his means the Bible was translated and read in churches. On the death of Henry, he was named in the will of that monarch one of the regency of the kingdom, and as Edward VI. was brought up chiefly under his care, the Reformation, under this youthful sovereign, assumed a consistent form. The liturgy, homilies, and articles of religion were now framed, and in all of these, Cranmer had a principal hand. On the accession of Mary, he was condemned, first for treason, and pardoned; but a charge of heresy being afterwards brought against him, he was sent to the Tower, whence, with Ridley and Latimer, he was, in 1554, removed to Oxford, to hold a public disputation. The fate of these men seems, without doubt, to have been already determined. The archbishop was tried by the pope's commissioners, and convicted, but, after enduring great hardships for upwards of three years, he was, at length, induced to sign his abjuration of the Protestant faith, on the promise of life. For having committed this act, however, he was struck with deep remorse, and when brought into St. Mary's Church, Oxford, to read his recantation in public, he, instead of complying, besought God's forgiveness for the apostasy of which he had been guilty, and exhorted the people against the errors of Rome. This greatly enraged his adversaries, who, denouncing him as a hypocrite and heretic, dragged him to the stake, opposite Balliol College. Here he endured the terrible fiery trial with patience and fortitude, holding his hand in the flame, and often exclaiming, "This unworthy hand!"

Born at Aslacton, in Nottinghamshire, 1489; died at Oxford, 1556.

CRAON, kra'-on(g), a town of France, department Mayenne, on the left bank of the Ondon. There is a handsome modern chateau. Manf. Coarse woollen goods. There is a large trade in linen, yarn, flax, and grain. Pop. 3,100.

CRAPONNE, kra-pon', a town of France, department of Haute-Loire, 20 miles N. of Le Puy. There are an ancient church, and a tower, the sole relic of the old fortifications. Manf. Lace and blonde. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,200.

CRASHAW, RICHARD, kra'-shaw, devotional poet. He was the son of an English clergyman, and was educated at the Charterhouse and Cambridge. He entered the Church in 1641, but being ejected from his college fellowship by Parliament, he went to France, where he adopted the Roman Catholic faith, and became a cardinal's secretary at Rome, and a canon of the Church of Loretto. He wrote Latin poems, "Steps to the Temple," "Delights of the Muses," and other poems, marked by fervid piety and vigorous imagination, but occasionally disfigured by quaint conceits.

Born 1605; died at Loretto, 1650.

CRASSUS, LUCIUS LICINIUS, kras-sus, Roman orator, elected consul 95 B.C. With his colleague, Scævola, he procured the enactment of the law which banished all but Alæus from Rome, and closed the schools of the rhetoricians. He was a powerful orator, and his death was caused by excitement attending a debate.

Born 140 B.C.; died 92 B.C.

CRASSUS, LICINIUS MARCUS, surnamed the "rich," a distinguished Roman, conqueror of Spartacus, who, at the head of the gladiators, had for some time defied the power of Rome. Afterwards, he formed one of the triumvirate with Cæsar and Pompey, and had the province of Syria allotted to him. Attempting to possess himself of Parthia, he was defeated by Surena, the Parthian general, who, subsequently, treacherously got possession of his person, and put him to death. He possessed immense wealth, which he systematically strove to increase, although indulging occasionally in displays of extraordinary magnificence.

Died 53 B.C.

CRATERUS, krat'-e-rus, one of Alexander the Great's generals, conspicuous for his literary abilities as well as for his valour. He received as his share of Alexander's kingdom, Greece and Epirus, and wrote the history of his great commander. He was killed in a battle against Eumenes.

Died 321 B.C.

CRATES, krat'-tes, a philosopher of Bœotia, remarkable for his eccentricities. In the summer he would clothe himself as warm as possible, but in the winter his garments were uncommonly thin.

Born 324 B.C.

CRATHIS, krat'-this, a river in Magna Græcia, distinguished for giving a yellow colour to the hair and beard of those who drank its waters.

CRATINUS, kra-ti'-nus, a satirical poet of Athens, who wrote twenty-one plays, and enlarged the scope of the comic drama, satirising the public and private life of eminent Athenians.

Born 519 B.C.; died 431 B.C.

CRATIPPUS, kra-tip'-pus, a Greek philosopher of the Peripatetic School. The friend and adviser of Cicero, Pompey, and Brutus, and highly esteemed by most of the leading men of the age.

Lived in the 18th century B.C.

CRATO, kra'to, a town of Brazil, province of Ceará. It is irregularly built, and as the inhabitants, mostly of Indian and mixed races, have a terribly bad character for systematic immorality, shared in by the priests, it is perhaps not astonishing that of the two churches, one has not been completed. Pop. 3,000.

CRAVEN, krai-ven, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 980 square miles. Pop. 19,729. Newburn is the capital.

CRAWFORD, kraw-ford, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 960 square miles. Pop. 14,740. Van Buren is the capital.

CRAWFORD, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 1,008 square miles. Pop. 10,756. The capital is Steelville.

CRAWFORD, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 596 square miles. Pop. 30,583. The capital is Bucyrus.

CRAWFORD, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 1,016 square miles. Pop. 68,607. Meadsville is the capital.

CRAWFORD, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 612 square miles. Pop. 15,644. The capital is Prairie du Chien.

CRAYER, CASPAR DE, kra'-yer, Flemish painter, who executed many altar pieces for churches at Ghent, and painted historical subjects and portraits.
Born at Antwerp, 1582; died at Ghent, 1669.

CREBILLON, PROSPER JOLYOT DE, krai-beel'-yon, a French dramatic poet, who studied for the law, but, being attached to theatrical representations, became a dramatic writer. His first popular performance was "Atrée," which was followed by his "Electra" and "Rhadamiste." He next produced some tragedies, which procured for him the name of the French Æschylus. He wrote one tragedy and began another after he was eighty years of age. Some French critics consider him a little inferior to Corneille.
Born at Dijon, 1674; died 1762.

CREBILLON, CLAUDE PROSPER JULYOT DE, French romance writer, son of the above, author of a series of romances of a very licentious character.
Born at Paris, 1707; died 1777.

CRECY, or CRESSY, kres'-se, a small French town in the department of Somme, 12 miles N. of Abbeville, famous for the great victory obtained over the French, under Philip of Valois, by Edward III. of England, August 26th, 1346. Pop. 1,400.

CREDITON, kred'-i-ton, a town in Devonshire, near the confluence of the Crede with the Exe, 8 miles N.W. of Exeter. There are a church in the later pointed style, several chapels, and a free grammar school. The town was the seat of a bishopric before the erection of the bishopric of Exeter in 1050. Manf. Shoes, linen, and lace. Pop. 4,541.

CREFELD, or KREFELD, kref'-elt, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 12 miles from Dusseldorf. This is the principal place in Prussia for the manufacture of silk goods. Pop. 73,872.

CREIL, a town of France, department of Oise, on the left bank of the Oise, crossed here by a remarkable bridge. There are a parish church with a fine spire, and the remains of an old castle. Manf. Porcelain and stoneware. A good trade is carried on in flour, coal, and cattle, and there is an annual fair. Pop. 2,100.

CREMA, krai'-ma, a town of Northern Italy, province of Cremona, on the Serio, 20 miles N.W. of Cremona. It has a splendid cathedral, besides other churches and religious houses, and an old castle, and is strongly fortified. Manf. Silk and lace. Pop. 10,800.

CREMNITZ, or KREMNITZ, krem'-nitz, the oldest mining town in Hungary, in the county of Barsch, amidst lofty mountains, 18 miles from Schemnitz. The castle, built on an eminence, is encompassed with a double wall and several bastions. This town is famous for its mines of gold and silver, which are of great value, and have attached to them large smelting and washing works. Pop. 5,000.

CREMONA, krai-mo'-na, a province of Italy, bounded on the N. by the Oglio, and on the S. by the Po. It is very fertile. There are numerous plantations of mulberry-trees; flax is largely cultivated, and dairy produce is abundant. Area, 690 square miles. Pop. 309,842.

CREMONA, a fortified city of Northern Italy, on the left bank of the Po, 48 miles S.E. of Milan. It is the capital of the province of the same name. It has a vast number of churches, chapels, convents, and a university. The cathedral is a massive structure, built at various times, and exhibiting a variety of architectural styles, and the tower or belfry of Cremona is very curious, consisting of two octagonal obelisks, surmounted by a cross, and 396 feet in height. The Corso is very fine, and much resorted to. Manf. Silk, cotton, porcelain, and chemicals. It was formerly noted for its superior violins. Pop. 31,000. —This city is of great antiquity, having been created a Roman colony in B.C. 291.

CREON, kre'-on, king of Corinth, promised his daughter Glauce to Jason, who thereupon repudiated Medea. Medea, in revenge, presented Glauce with a gown covered with poison. Upon wearing it, she expired in the greatest torments. Creon and his family shared the fate of Glauce, whose sufferings will be found vividly depicted in the "Medea" of Euripides.

CREPY, kra'-pe, a town of France, department Oise, 4 miles S.E. of Beauvais. It was formerly the capital of the old province of Valois. The town is surrounded by pleasant promenades. Manf. Cotton and agricultural implements. There is a trade in grain, timber, linen, and thread. Pop. 2,600.

CRESCENTINO, kres'-en-te'-no, a town of Northern Italy, in the province of Novara, in a marshy district, on the Po, 20 miles N.E. of Turin. Manf. Silk and woollens. Pop. 3,000.

CRESCIMBENI, GIOVANNI MANO, krais-chim-bai'-ne, Italian historian and poet, educated by the Jesuits, and a canon in the church, author of a history of Italian poetry, a translator of the homilies of Pope Clement XI., and of numerous historical and literary works.

Born near Ancona, 1663; died 1728.

CRESPANO, kres-pa'-no, a town of Northern Italy, in the province of Treviso. Manf. Linen, flannel, and woollen cloth. Pop. 2,000.

CRESPINO, kres-pe'-no, a town of Northern Italy, on the left bank of the Po, 40 miles S.W. of Venice. Pop. 4,000.

CREST, LE, krest, a town of France, department of Drôme, on the left bank of the river of that name, 15 miles S.E. of Valence. A portion of the old castle, once of immense strength, remains. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, blankets, handkerchiefs, turnery ware, sugar, and earthenware. A good trade is carried on, and the truffles found in the neighbourhood are in great demand. Pop. 3,800.

CRESWICK, THOMAS, R.A., kres'-wik, an eminent English landscape painter, who produced a great many "Scenes," "Spots," "Shades," and "Streams" redolent of poetic beauty. When only seventeen years of age he exhibited two pictures in the Royal Academy. In 1843 he became an associate in the Royal Academy, and, in 1847, exhibited his two greatest works, entitled "England," and "The London Road a Hundred Years ago." He is one of the greatest of England's favourites in landscape representation..

Born at Sheffield, 1811; died 1869.

CRESWICK, a town of Victoria, Australia, 11 miles from Ballarat, in the centre of a gold mining district. There are good public buildings, banks, hotels, schools, and six places of worship. The diggings in the neighbourhood are very rich, and machinery is extensively employed. Pop. 4,000.

CRETE (See CANDIA).

CREUSA or GLAUCE, kre-u'-sa. (See CREON.)

CREUSE, kroose, a central department of France, comprising portions of the old provinces of the Limosin, Auvergne, and Berry. It is mountainous, and in many parts barren, the rearing of live stock being the chief branch of rural industry; but large quantities of fruit and chestnuts are grown. The department is divided into four arrondissements and 263 communes. The capital is GUERET. Area, 2,200 square miles. Pop. 278,782.

CREUZOT, LE, kroo'-zo, a manufacturing town of France, department Saône-et-Loire, 14 miles S. of Autun, famous for the great iron-works established in 1837 by M. Schneider, where locomotives, iron bridges, engines, and machinery are constructed, and about 10,000 workmen employed. There are extensive coal-mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 15,740.

CREVILLENTE, krai-vel-len'-te, a town of Spain, in the province of Alicant, near the boundary of Murcia. Weaving and agriculture are the chief industrial occupations. Pop. 7,000.

CREWE, kroo, a town and great railway centre of Cheshire, 34 miles S.E. of Liverpool. There are very large works for the construction of locomotives and railway carriages, a handsome church, mechanics' institute, and assembly-room. Pop. 24,372.—A junction station on the London and North-Western, Great Western, North Staffordshire, and Cambridgeshire Railways.

CREWKERNE, kroo'-kern, a town of Somersetshire, in the valley of the Parret, 10 miles S.W. of Ilchester. Manf. Sailcloth, sacking, webbing, and hair-seating. There is a large annual cattle fair. Pop. 3,557.—A station on the London and South-western Railway.

CRICHTON, JAMES, kri'-ton, a celebrated Scotchman, of whom so many wonderful things are related as to have procured him the name of the "Admirable Crichton." He was the son of the Lord Advocate of Scotland, and through his mother descended from the old Scottish kings. He was educated at St. Andrews, and, at the age of 20, visited Paris. Here he acquired great reputation not only as a disputant in several languages, but for his skill and activity in games of all sorts, as well as martial exercises. He next went to Rome, and displayed his talents in the presence of the pope and cardinals. Thence he travelled to Venice, where he became intimate with the learned Aldus Minutius, who dedicated to him the Paradoxes of Cicero, in a strain of panegyric which borders on the ridiculous. At Padua he held disputations with the most learned professors on a number of subjects, but particularly on the Aristotelian philosophy. At Mantua he slew a famous fencing-master in a duel. The duke of Mantua admired him so much, as to appoint him tutor to his son, a licentious young man, by whom, it is said, he was assassinated in the public streets, during the carnival. The stories of the various achievements of Crichton do not rest on very trustworthy authority, and it may be as well to take them with the proverbial "grain of salt."

Born in Perthshire, 1551 or 1560; died 1583.

CRICKLADE, krik'-laid, a town and parliamentary borough of Wiltshire, on the right bank of the Isis, 85 miles from London. Pop. 5,563.

CRIEFF, kreef, a town of Perthshire, on the Earn, 17 miles W. of Perth. Manf. Linen, paper, and leather. There are colleges and schools, and a large hydropathic establishment. Pop. of town 4,153.—A station on the Caledonian and North British railway.

CRILLON, LOUIS DES BALBES DE BERTON DE, kreeel'-yon, French warrior, "the man without fear," "the bravest of the brave," who exhibited the most splendid heroism in the wars of the reigns of Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., Henry III., and Henry IV. He was a man of noble character, and indignantly protested against the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Born in Provence, 1541; died at Avignon, 1615.

CRIMEA, kri-me'-a, a peninsula of European Russia, in the S. of the government of Taurida, formed by the Black Sea on the W. and S., the Straits of Caffa and the Sea of Azov on the E., and on the N. connected with Russia by the narrow isthmus of Perekop. It is 190 miles long, with a breadth of about 110. The coast is very much indented, especially on the eastern side. The centre and west portion consists of a vast steppe, covered mostly with swamps and salt marshes, unfertile in the extreme, but, upon the plains, affording pasturage to large flocks of broad-tailed sheep. In the S. there are numerous valleys of great fertility, exhibiting a constant succession of beautiful fields, forests, and meadows. Here the mountains slope towards the steppes on the N. Their highest point is Tchatir-dagh, which is 5,000 feet above the level of the sea.

Rivers.—The Alma, Salghir, and Karasu.

Climate.—Unequal and variable; sometimes severe in the winter, and at others not so. The temperature of summer is occasionally as high as 100° Fahrenheit in the shade. The spring is the most genial and healthy season, and the autumn the most unhealthy.

Forests.—Considerable, and furnishing pine, ash, oak, elm, and poplar.

Zoology.—The wild animals are the wolf, fox, fallow-deer, roebuck, and hare. Among birds may be noticed the Alpine vulture, numerous kites and hawks, which are trained to falconry by the Tartars. The domestic animals are the camel, dromedary, horse, ox, and sheep. Fish are abundant, both in the rivers and along the coasts.

Area, 8,600 square miles.

Pop. 650,000, more than two-thirds of whom are Tartars, and the remainder Russians, Germans, and Greeks.

Lat. between 44° 44′ and 46° 10′ N. Lon. between 32° 30′ and 36° 35′ E.

Chief Towns.—SIMFEROPOL, the capital; BAKTSHISERAI, the old Tartar capital; SEBASTOPOL, KAFFA, KERTCH, and PEREKOP.

History.—This country was, at one time, considered the granary of Greece, especially of Athens; and Demosthenes speaks of it in his oration against Leptines. Towards the end of the 11th century, the Genoese settled in it, but were expelled by the Tartars in 1474. In 1783 the Russians took possession of the country, and the following year it was ceded to them by the Turks; but its peaceable possession was not secured to them till 1791. The Crimea now forms the greater part of the Russian government Taurida, and was, in 1854, invaded by the Anglo-French army. This was followed by the battles of the Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann, Tchernaya, and the siege of Sebastopol. (See ALMA, BALACLAVA, INKERMANN, &c.; also RAGLAN, CANROBERT, &c.)

CRIMMITSCHAU, krim'-mit-sho, a manufacturing town of Saxony, on the left bank of the Pleisse, 37 miles S. of Leipsic. It is a thriving place, with a rapidly increasing population. Manf. Woollen yarn, woollen and cotton fabrics, needles, buttons, and turnery ware. There are three annual woollen markets. Pop. 15,000.

CRISPIN, Roman martyr, who fled from Rome into Gaul to avoid the Diocletian persecution, and worked as a shoemaker to support himself while he exerted himself to spread the doctrines of Christianity. With his brother he suffered martyrdom. Readers of Shakspeare will recollect King Harry's reference to "Crispin and Crispin's day," on the eve of the battle of Agincourt, which was fought on the day appointed for the commemoration of the saint, the 25th October, and the same day is memorable in modern history as the anniversary of the battle of Balaclava in 1854.

Died 287.

CRISPUS, kris'-pus, "curled," the ruler of the Jews' synagogue at Corinth, who embraced Christianity.

CRITTENDEN, krit'-ten-den, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 994 square miles. Pop. 9,415. Capital, Marion.

CRITTENDEN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 11,688. The capital is Marion.

CROATIA, kro-ai'-she-a, a province of the kingdom of Hungary, in the Austrian empire, consisting of two divisions, Croatia proper and Slavonia. It lies to the N.E. of the Adriatic, and is bounded E. by Bosnia, S. by Dalmatia, and W. by the Adriatic. It is traversed by a range of mountains, ranging between 3,500 and 5,000 feet high, and especially barren in the south. In the north there are tracts of greatest fertility, where the vine is cultivated, and where silk, and the fruits common in the south of Europe, are raised with success; but cattle-rearing is the principal rural occupation of the inhabitants.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, coal, and marble.
Rivers.—The Save and the Drave.
Area, 8,757 square miles.
Chief Town.—AGRAM, the capital.
Pop. with Slavonia, 1,892,499.
Lat. between 44° 5′ and 46° 25′ N.
Lon. between 14° 20′ and 17° 25′ E.

History.—At the peace of Vienna, in 1809, the whole of this country lying to the south of the Save was ceded by Austria to France, and incorporated by Napoleon I. with the Illyrian provinces. At the congress of Vienna, however, in 1815, it was restored to its former possessor.

CROCE, SANTA, kro'-sai, a town of Italy, on the right bank of the Arno, 21 miles S.W. of Florence. Manf. Woollens and silks. Pop. 3,000.

CROCE, SANTA, (DI MAGLIANO), a town of Italy, province of Napoli. It is beautifully situated, is walled, and contains a fine church. There are two annual fairs. Pop. 3,800.

CROCE, SANTA (DI MORCONE), a town of Italy, province of Napoli. There is a sulphurous spring in the neighbourhood. Pop. 6,000.

CROCE, SANTA, a town of Sicily, near the south coast. There is a small port. Pop. 2,000.

CRŒSUS, kre'-sus, the last king of Lydia, of the race of the Mermnadæ, celebrated for his great riches. He succeeded to the throne 560 B.C. His court was the asylum of learning; and here were to be found Æsop and Solon. Showing, with pride, his treasures to the latter, that philosopher said, "Call no man happy before his death;" and, in truth, misfortune soon came upon the rich king. He was conquered by Cyrus, king of Persia, and placed on a burning pile, when, exclaiming "Solon, Solon," with great energy, his captor asked him the reason of such an exclamation. Crœsus then repeated the conversation he had had with Solon on human happiness. Cyrus, moved at the recollection of the instability of human affairs, ordered Crœsus to be taken from the burning pile, and became one of his most intimate friends.

CROIA, or CROJA, kro-ya, a town of European Turkey, in Uscub (Albania), 45 miles S.E. of Scutari. There is a castle, and it is the stronghold of the Mirdites, a body of Roman Catholics. Pop. 6,000.

CROISIC, krwoi'-seek, a small seaport of France, department Loire Inférieure, on the extremity of a peninsula stretching into the Bay of Biscay. The spire of the church is an important landmark. There are shipbuilding yards and fisheries. Pop. 2,000.

CROIX, ST., or SANTA CRUZ, krwaw, the most southerly and largest of the Virgin Islands, and the most important of the Danish possessions in the West Indies. It is remarkably well cultivated. Area, 100 square miles. Pop. 18,430. The French sold this island to Denmark in 1733.

CROKER, JOHN WILSON, kro'-ker, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, studied for the bar, and, in 1800, was entered a student at Lincoln's Inn. He devoted much of his time, however, to literature and politics, displaying considerable satirical power, and in the latter field strong Tory tendencies. In 1807 he became member of parliament for Downpatrick, in Ireland, and in 1809 secretary to the Admiralty. This post he held for twenty years, during which he sat as member in the house for various boroughs. Meanwhile he was almost continually engaged with his pen, and was a ready and versatile writer. He was one of the founders of the "Quarterly Review," and contributed many of the personal and spiteful articles for which at one time that Review was famous. He figures as "Rigby" in Mr. Disraeli's political novel, "Coningsby." His most extensive production is an edition of "Boswell's Life of Johnson," which Macaulay criticised with great severity in the "Edinburgh Review." He wrote besides, "Stories from the History of England," and edited "The Suffolk Papers," "Walpole's Letters to Lord Hertford," Lord Hervey's "Memoirs of the Court of George II.," and several other works.

Born in Galway, Ireland, 1780; died at Hampton, 1857.

CROKER, THOMAS CROFTON, Irish author, known for his collection of legendary tales, and many novels and slighter works marked by considerable imagination and racy humour. He entered the Admiralty office at an early age, and retired in 1850 with a handsome pension. He devoted much attention to the archæology of his native country.

Born at Cork, 1798; died 1854.

CROLY, REVEREND GEORGE, krō'-lȳ, a modern poet and novelist. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and having entered the Church, became rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and St. Benet's, London. His principal effusions are "The Angel of the World;" a tragedy, entitled "Catiline;" a comedy, entitled "Pride shall have a Fall;" "Salathiel," a romance; and "Marston," with "Tales of the Great St. Bernard," both works of fiction. He has likewise written a "Life of Burke;" but it was as a popular preacher that his fame was most extended. He died suddenly.

Born at Dublin, 1780; died in London, 1860.

CROMARTY, krom'-ar-te, a county of Scotland, formed of several detached portions of Rossshire. The boundaries of these districts are not well defined, and it is, therefore, difficult to determine the extent of each. It is fertile and cultivated in the E., but the interior and W. parts are almost uniformly wild and mountainous. Area, 344 square miles. (See ROSS and CROMARTY.)

CROMARTY, a seaport-town and parliamentary burgh in the above county, is situate on the peninsula between the firths of Cromarty and Murray, 18 miles N.E. of Inverness. It has a safe and commodious harbour, though but little commerce. The herring and other fisheries afford the chief industrial occupation. Pop. 1,481.

CROMARTY FIRTH, a bay lying between the county of Ross on the N. and W., and Cromarty and Ross on the S. and E. It is 18 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 3 to 5 miles, and forms a fine harbour.

CROMER, krō'-mer, a pretty seaport-town and watering-place of England, on the N.E. coast of Norfolk, 20 miles N. of Norwich. From the encroachments of the sea on this coast, a considerable portion of it has been swept away by the waves. Pop. 1,400, mostly engaged in fishing.

CROMPTON, SAMUEL, krom'-ton, inventor of the mule for cotton spinning. He was the son of a small farmer, and brought up as a farm labourer, but worked hard to obtain a good education. At an early age he endeavoured to devise an improved spinning-machine, and after five years succeeded in producing a yarn of hitherto unknown fineness. Being too poor to obtain a patent, he was compelled to hide his machine, as all kinds of devices were employed to gain a knowledge of his process. After many years of struggling, during which his machine was generally adopted, with the most astonishing results, and vast fortunes were made by those who had appropriated his ideas, he received £5,000 as a national reward; but it came too late, and he died a broken-hearted man.

Born at Bolton, 1753; died 1827.

CROMWELL, OLIVER, krom'-well, the great Protector, was the younger son of Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrook, Hertfordshire, and came of a good family on both sides. After passing about a year at Cambridge, he was removed to Lincoln's Inn, with the view of prosecuting his studies for the bar. It has been said that he was much addicted to low pleasures and gaming in his youth; but when we find him, in his 21st year, marrying the daughter of Sir John Bourchier, and spoken of by religious men as a professor of religion, we are inclined to believe that he has been vilified by malice, rather than spoken of with justice. In 1628 he was elected member of parliament for Huntingdon, and, in the following year, distinguished himself by his zeal against the bishops. When the parliament was dissolved, he retired into the country, and took a grazing farm at St. Ives, where he became overseer of the parish, and a zealous member of the religious community with which he had connected himself. In 1636 Sir Thomas Stuart, his maternal uncle, died, leaving him property in the Isle of Ely worth £500 a year. To this place he now removed his family; but being disgusted with the measures of the government, he in 1637 actually took a passage for himself and family in a ship lying in the Thames, and bound for New England, in America. This vessel was detained by proclamation; but if she had been suffered to proceed on her voyage, the head of Charles I. would have, perhaps, never been forfeited to his country; England would never have been a commonwealth, nor Oliver Cromwell a protector. In 1640 he was returned to parliament for Cambridge, and, by this time, had become a popular leader, being called "Lord of the Fens," for having defended a portion of the fen country of Cambridgeshire from being wrested from the people by the grasping hands of certain proprietors who had been draining them for themselves. In 1642, when parliament determined upon hostilities, he went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, and which he himself so ably commanded, that he soon acquired the rank of colonel, and a great reputation for military skill and valour. His men were well disciplined, and, under his leadership, at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, acquired the name of "Ironsides." At Stamford, and in the second battle of Newbury, Cromwell greatly distinguished himself, and received from his party the title of "Saviour of the nation." This party consisted of the Independents, who had gained so great an influence in parliament as to pass the famous self-denying ordinance, by which all members of either house were excluded from commands in the army. From this, however, Cromwell, on account of his value to the cause, was excepted; a stroke of policy which preserved his ascendancy in the army, and paved the way for his future advancement. He was now made lieutenant-general, and by his conduct in 1645, the battle of Naseby, which decided the fate of the royalists, was won. This victory was followed by a series of successes, for which he was voted a pension of £2,500 per annum, and the thanks of the House. When the king was handed over by the Scotch to the parliament, Cromwell determined to get him into his own power. This he effected in 1647, by means of Cornet Joyce, a young and spirited soldier. He now obtained the chief command of the army, and at a conference at Windsor, which he himself opened with prayer, propounded the bold measure of punishing the king by a judicial sentence. Charles was now in the Isle of Wight, when Cromwell was called into the north against the Scots and into the west against the Welsh. Wherever he fought, success attended him, and returning to London, he purged the parliament house of its members, by means of his troopers, under the direction of Colonel Pride. In the January of 1649 the king's trial commenced.

Cromwell was the third to sign the warrant for his execution, and the monarch suffered accordingly. Cromwell was now called into Ireland, where he took a terrible vengeance upon the inhabitants of Drogheda, Wexford, and several other places. In 1650 he returned to England, and was sent against the Scots, who had armed to restore Charles II. On September 3, 1650, he gained the battle of Dunbar; and that day twelvemonth he defeated Charles at Worcester. The sovereign power was now within his reach, and he did not hesitate to grasp it. Accordingly, on December 16, 1654, he was invested with the dignity of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the Court of Chancery. In this capacity, he vigorously directed the affairs of the kingdom, making the English flag, borne by men like Blake, respected wherever it was seen. In 1658, however, he became moody and suspicious. In the August of that year, his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, died at Hampton Court. This event, with the publication of a pamphlet by Colonel Titus, entitled "Killing no Murder," tending to prove the assassination of a tyrant a public duty, produced a slow fever, from which he never rallied. He was, by order of his physician, removed to Whitehall for change of air; but nothing would avail him now. He died on the 3rd of September, 1658, the anniversary of his victories at Dunbar and Worcester, and a day which he was accustomed to consider especially fortunate to himself. His corpse was interred on the 25th of April, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, whence, at the Restoration, it was taken and exposed on, and afterwards buried under, the gallows at Tyburn. It is needless here to enter into the character of Cromwell. That he was one of the greatest statesmen and most valiant warriors England has produced, none will deny.

Born at Huntingdon, 1599; died 1658.

CROMWELL, RICHARD, son of the above, succeeded him in the protectorate, but when affairs turned, and he found his post no longer tenable, he resigned, after an occupancy of seven months, and went abroad; where he resided for several years. On his return to this country he lived in great privacy, assuming the name of Clarke.

Born at Huntingdon, 1626; died at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in 1712.

CROMWELL, THOMAS. (See ESSEX, EARL OF.)

CRONSTADT, or KRONSTADT, kron'-stat, a seaport and fortress of Russia, situate at the S.E. extremity of an island in the Gulf of Finland, 20 miles W. of St. Petersburg. Some of the streets are tolerably regular, and the principal public buildings are the imperial hospital for sailors, the civil hospital, the barracks, and several churches. The harbour is very spacious, and consists of three divisions,—the Merchants' Harbour, the War Harbour, and the Man of War's Mole. The War Harbour is the principal station of the Russian fleet. Adjoining it are the docks for building and careening ships of war, faced with stone, and paved with granite. The Man of War's Mole is inclosed by a strong rampart of granite, built in the sea. There are a large naval school, formerly a palace, built by Prince Menschikoff, a marine hospital, exchange, custom-house, arsenal, cannon-foundry, barracks, and other public buildings, and Peter the Great's Palace, with well laid-out gardens. Cronstadt is defended towards the sea by fortifications projecting into the water, and, towards the land, by ramparts and bastions. There are also batteries erected on several neighbouring islets in the channel between the island and the mainland. A very large trade with the interior of Russia is carried on through this port. Pop. 48,276; but considerably augmented in the summer. Lat. 59° 59′ N. Lon. 29° 49′ E.—Cronstadt was founded in 1703 by Peter the Great. In 1855, the English fleet, commanded by Sir Charles Napier, proceeded to the Baltic, with the view of taking this place, or destroying its fortifications; but, either from the inadequacy of the means placed at his disposal, or from the great strength of the forts, no attempt was made upon them.

CRONSTADT or BRASSE, a trading town of Transylvania, on the river Farcas, 70 miles from Hermanstadt, in an elevated situation on the slope of the East Carpathian Mountains. There are an old town surrounded by walls, and three large suburbs. The chief Protestant church, a large Gothic edifice, was built in the 14th century, and there are several Lutheran and Catholic churches, academies, and a good public library. Manf. Linen, cotton, and coarse woollen goods, hosiery, and paper. Pop. 28,000.

CROOKED ISLANDS, krook'-ed, two islands of the Bahama group. Lat. of the middle of Crooked Island, 22° 30′ N. Lon. 74° W.

CROSSE, ANDREW, electrician, educated at Oxford, and when he came of age, settled on his paternal estate in Somersetshire, and devoted himself to scientific investigations, experimenting for many years on the formation of crystals by electricity; and in 1836 detailed the results he had achieved to the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Shortly afterwards he found that electricity developed small animals of the acarus kind. The announcement of this discovery caused an immense sensation, and the experiments were repeated by others with varying success, but Crosse had to endure a great amount of odium.

Born in Somersetshire, 1784; died 1855.

CROSSEN, kros'-sen, a town of the Prussian states, 68 miles from Berlin. Manf. Hosiery, woollen cloths; and there are some tan-yards. Pop. 6,500.—In 1758, this place was taken by the Russians.

CROTCH, WILLIAM, krotch, doctor of music, whose almost infant performances are said to have rivalled those of Mozart. In 1797, when only twenty-two, he was appointed musical professor at Oxford, and in 1822, principal of the Royal Academy of Music. He composed a large number of pieces, both for the pianoforte and the organ, besides an opera called "Palestine," and wrote several practical works on music.

Born at Norwich, 1775; died at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1847.

CROWLAND, or CROYLAND, kro'-land, a town of Lincolnshire, 8 miles N. of Peterborough, consisting of four principal streets, connected by a bridge, built by the Saxons, and one of the most remarkable specimens of their architecture. The church is a part of the old abbey, one of the most famous in England. Pop. 2,500.

CROYDON, kroi'-don, a town and parish of Surrey, 11 miles S. of London. It possesses many handsome villas. The old church was destroyed, except the tower, by fire, in 1867, and the new edifice is remarkably handsome. In its neighbourhood is a large barracks. The summer assizes are held alternately here and at Guildford. Pop. 78,947.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast, and South Eastern railways, and branches. There are seven railway stations.

CROZET ISLANDS, kro'-set, a volcanic group in the South Indian Ocean. Lat. 46° 27′ S. Lon. 52° 14′ E.

CROZON, kró'-zawng, a trading town of France, in the department of Finisterre, 9 miles S. of Brest. Pop. 9,000, mostly supported by fishing and navigation.

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER, kru'-den, a laborious compiler, who, in 1728, went from Aberdeen, where he had been educated in Marischal College, to London, and settled there as a bookseller. In 1737 he published his "Concordance to the Bible," a book of great merit. He was a very pious man, but at times deranged in his mind, and believed himself to be especially inspired to set the world right, assuming the name of Alexander the Corrector.

Born at Aberdeen, 1700; died in London, 1770.

CRUIKSHANK, GEORGE, krook'-shank' caricaturist, painter, and engraver. The son of an artist, he began to draw and etch while almost a child, and soon found employment in illustrating books for children, and songs. William Hone found in him a most valuable assistant in the numerous political satires which attracted so much attention; and the young artist also produced an immense number of caricatures ridiculing social follies in dress and other matters. He also illustrated, in the richest style of humour, and with a grotesque power which has seldom been equalled, German fairy tales, Fielding's, Smollett's, and Scott's works, produced the "Comic Almanack" regularly for many years, infusing into his illustrations the wildest comicality. The illustrations to Dickens's "Oliver Twist" gave him scope for the exhibition of great power of a more serious kind; and having adopted extreme temperance views, his fine series of plates, "The Bottle," and its sequel, showing the fate of the drunkard's children, exhibited a still more earnest side of his artistic character. In the cause of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, he has been an indefatigable worker; and in other directions has endeavoured, not unsuccessfully, to make his art the auxiliary of moral reformation. He has produced some oil pictures, especially "The Worship of Bacchus," of great merit. His fertility of invention is prodigious. In the space of three or four square inches he will depict hundreds of figures, each characteristic and comical; and his etchings are of admirable delicacy and force. He stands at the very head of English caricaturists.

Born in London, 1792; died 1878.

CRUYS, CORNELIS, kroos, admiral in the Russian service, and organizer of the navy. Peter the Great induced him to leave the Dutch service, in which he held the rank of rear-admiral. Under his superintendence, dockyards and canals were constructed, and indeed the Russian navy formed. He was in disgrace for a short period, but was richly rewarded at last; and the white flag with the blue cross, shown by Russian men-of-war, is in memory of him.

Born 1657; died 1727.

CRUZ, SANTA. (See SANTA CRUZ.)

CSABA, chob'-o, a town of Hungary. There is an archducal palace, with gardens. Manf. Sacks and mattresses. There is a trade in wine, grain, and cattle. Pop. 30,000.

CSANAD, cho-nod', the name of two Hungarian towns, both on the Marös. Pop. 4,000 and 5,400.

CSAT, chot, a town of Hungary, near the Theiss, 15 miles S.E. of Miskolcz. Pop. 5,000.

CSOMA, ALEXANDER, cho'-ma, a Hungarian, who studied the Oriental languages, and in 1820 set out on a journey to discover the original home of the Magyars. He travelled through Persia and Bokhara, and mastered the language of Tibet, which he at first thought gave the clue he desired. He reached Calcutta, where he found employment in cataloguing a splendid collection of Tibetan manuscripts in the library of the Asiatic Society. He also prepared, at the expense of the government, a valuable grammar and dictionary of the language. In 1842, still haunted by his old ideas, he started on a journey to the western provinces of China, but died on the way.

Born at Koros, in Transylvania, 1790; died at Darjeeling, 1842.

CSONGRAD, chon'-grad, a market-town of Hungary, at the junction of the Theiss and the Koros, 70 miles S.E. of Pesth. Pop. 17,500, chiefly engaged in the culture of the vine and cattle-rearing.

CTESIAS, te'-si-as, a Greek historian and physician, who lived for many years at the court of Persia, and wrote a history of that country.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CTESIBIUS, te-sib'-e-us, a mathematician of Alexandria, the inventor of the pump, the syphon, and other hydraulic instruments; also of a clepsydra, or water-clock.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

CTESIPHON, tes'-i-fon, an Athenian, who counselled his fellow-citizens to present Demosthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CUBA, the largest of the Antilles, or West Indian islands, "the pearl of the Antilles," and the most important colonial possession of Spain, at the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico. It is about 130 miles S. of Florida, from which it is separated by the Bahama Channel, 48 miles from Hayti, on the E., 95 miles from Jamaica on the S., and by the Yucatan Channel, 130 miles wide, from the north-eastern point of the peninsula of Yucatan, in Central America. It is 750 miles in length from E. to W., with an average breadth of a little more than 50 miles. The coast-line of about 1,600 miles is encumbered with reefs, making the approach difficult and dangerous, except at the bays and harbours, of which there are a considerable number. The most important ports and harbours are at HAVANA, at Guantanamo, Santiago, Manzanillo, and Jagua, on the south coast; Bahia Honda and Puerto de Cabanos on the north-west coast; and Baracoa, Naranjo, Puerto del Padre, and Matanzas on the north and north-east coast; and Buena Esperanza. Nearly all round the island the coast is low, and subject to inundations. A range of mountains traverses the island, attaining its greatest elevation at the eastern end, where the Sierra Maestra attains an elevation of 8,000 feet, and diminishing in height and lateral extension farther west. At the base of the mountain are extensive and beautiful plains and some swampy tracts, and in other parts the surface is undulating.

Rivers.—The largest is the Cauto, rising in the Cobre or Copper Mountains, at the east end of the island, and enters the sea on the south side. The other rivers are short and unnavigable, except by small boats.

Pro.—There are forests of mahogany, ebony, cedar, and other valuable woods, and beautiful flowers and odoriferous plants grow abundantly. Two crops of maize are obtained in the year, and tobacco, indigo, rice, bananas, coffee, and some cotton are successively cultivated. In the eastern part of the island the staple its sugar, vast tracts being covered with the cane, and a great number of factories for crushing, boiling, and refining being in full work.

Zoology.—The only indigenous quadruped is the hutia, an animal resembling the rat, but about 18 in. long in body. Some of the snakes have a length of 12 or 14 feet. Insects, including jiggers, ants, and spiders, are unpleasantly abundant; crocodiles and caymans frequent the gulfs and bays, and lizards of various kinds are met with on the banks of the streams and lagoons. Birds are numerous, but the bald-headed vulture is the only bird of prey. The ordinary domestic animals of European breed thrive well.

Climate.—During the greater part of the year the atmosphere is dry, and the heat rather less than in some of the adjacent islands. Between July and September heavy rainfalls are frequent, but there is no regular wet season. Hurricanes occasionally occur, and in October, 1870, 2,000 lives were lost in a storm of that nature. Frost is not uncommon in December and January.

Area.—40,000 square miles.

Pop. 1,525,684, of whom 489,249 are negroes. About 760,000 are white, and 34,000 Chinese and Hindoo coolies, or hired labourers. Of the blacks, about 230,000 are free negroes.

Lat. Between 19° 50′ and 23° 9′ N. Lon. 74° 8′ to 84° 58′ W.

Territorial Divisions and Government.—The island is separated into three military divisions, or intendencias, known as the eastern, central, and western. There is a civil division into two provinces, and an ecclesiastical division into the province of Santiago on the east and Havana on the west, each forming the diocese of an archbishop. The captain-general is also civil governor, and there are a sub-governor and a colonial junta of seven members.

Chief Towns.—Havana, Puerto Principe, Santiago, Trinidad, Nuevitas, Matanzas, Guanabacoa, Cardenas, Santa Espiritu, Santa Clara, Cienfuegos, and San Juan. There are railways in connection with some of the principal towns.

History.—Columbus discovered the island in 1492, and revisited it in 1494 and 1502. The first Spanish settlement was formed in 1511. In 1850 and 1851, bands of American adventurers endeavoured to take possession of the island, "the Lone Star," as they named it, but were repulsed and the leader taken and executed. For several years past, efforts have been made, sometimes with sanguinary results, by the Cubens to release themselves from the dominion of Spain.

CUBCABEA, koob-ka′-be-a, a trading town of Darfur, North Africa. There is a market for leather and cotton cloths. The natives are a mixture of Arabs and various African tribes. Lat. 14° N. Lon. 26° 30′ E.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, kud′-worth, a learned divine, who studied and became a tutor at Cambridge, and in 1641 was appointed to the rectory of North Cadbury, Somersetshire. In 1644 he became master of Clare College, and in the following year Regius Professor of Hebrew. He obtained several preferments, and at the time of his death was master of Christ's College. He wrote upon "The True Intellectual System of the Universe," and his attainments were of the highest order. His writings gave rise to much controversy.

Born at Aller, Somersetshire, 1617; died at Cambridge, 1688.

CUELLAR, koo-al′-lar, a town of Spain, in the province of Segovia, 30 miles N. of the town of that name. It is partly surrounded with walls, and defended by a strong castle. The splendid sepulchres of the dukes of Albuquerque are in the church attached to one of the convents. Agricultural pursuits are the chief occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. 3,100.

CUENCA, koo-aín′-ka, a province of Spain, a portion of the old province of New Castille. It is mountainous, being traversed by the Sierra Morena, but well watered and fertile. Pro. Timber, grain, wine, and honey. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, and coal. Area, 11,304 square miles. Pop. 239,000.

CUENCA, the capital of the above province, at the junction of the Juca and Huecar, 80 miles S.E. of Madrid. It is situated on a rocky eminence, more than 3,000 feet above the sea-level. The streets are narrow and crooked. The cathedral, in the Gothic style, was founded by Alphonso IX. in the 12th century. There are about 12 other churches, a bishop's palace, and a fine bridge over the Jucar, built in the 16th century. The town is of Moorish origin, but the name is derived from the Latin concha, a shell, which, from a distance, the town is supposed to resemble. It was once a place of considerable renown for the cultivation of arts and literature. Pop. 9,200.

CUENCA, a town of Ecuador, South America, 85 miles S.W. of Quito. It stands in a wide plain, at an elevation of about 8,700 feet above the sea. There are a cathedral and university. Pop. 30,000.

CUEVA DE VERA, koo-aí′-va, a town of Spain, in the province of Grenada, at the mouth of the river Almanzor, 42 miles N.W. of Almeria. There is an old Moorish castle. Manf. Hardware, earthenware, wine, and oil. Pop. 10,500.—In its neighbourhood there are mines of silver.

CUEVA DE SAN MARCOS, a town of Spain, 38 miles N. of Malaga. There is a trade in grain, brandy, and wine. Pop. 3,700.

father at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded in the leg. In 1745 he commanded the British at the battle of Fontenoy, where they were defeated by the French, in consequence of not being properly supported by the Dutch. In 1746, at Culloden, he defeated Prince Charles Stuart, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. He was a man of considerable ability, but his military severities, especially after the battle of Culloden, gained for him the name of "the butcher."

Born 1721; died 1765.

CUMBERLAND, ERNEST, Duke of. (See ERNEST, King of Hanover.)

CUMBERLAND, RICHARD, an English dramatic and miscellaneous writer, who was educated at Cambridge for the church, but became secretary to the Board of Trade, and, in 1780, was dispatched to Madrid, on a secret and confidential mission. He held his secretaryship until 1782, when the Board was suppressed; and subsequently, on a compensation allowance, retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he entirely devoted himself to literature. From this retreat he poured forth essays, operas, comedies, tragedies, poetry, novels, and pamphlets, on various subjects. It is as an essayist and translator from the Greek, however, that he is most favourably known; for, out of upwards of thirty dramas, there are almost none of them now remembered. He was satirized by Sheridan as "Sir Fretful Plagiary," in the burlesque of "The Critic."

Born at Cambridge, 1732; died at Tunbridge, 1811.

CUMBRIAN MOUNTAINS, kum'-bre-an, occupy portions of the counties of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire. (See ENGLAND.)

CUMNOCK, OLD, kum'-nok, a town of Ayrshire, Scotland, 16 miles E. of Ayr. Manf. Agricultural implements. Iron ore and coal are abundant in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000. NEW CUMNOCK, in the centre of a rich mineral district, is 5 miles to the south.

CUMYN, COMYN, or CUMMING, koo'-min, a family prominent in the history of England and Scotland. One branch of the original stock remained at Comines in Flanders (see COMINES), whence the name is derived; a number of the others came to England with William the Conqueror, and Robert de Comines, or Comyn, was sent to subdue the provinces of the North. His nephew became Chancellor of Scotland in 1133, and other members of the family united in marriage with some of the best Scottish houses, and obtained great estates. The earls of Buchan, Monteith, Angus, and Athol were Cumyns, and in the 13th century were among the most powerful nobles of Scotland. One of them, Red John, the Lord of Badenoch, was stabbed by Robert Bruce in the church at Dumfries, and in the struggle to avenge him the other leading members of the family were defeated and scattered. The cruelties practised by Bruce in the earldom of Buchan are memorable in history. The remnants of the once powerful Cumyns escaped to England, and in course of time became connected with several of the aristocratic houses.

CUNAXA, ku-nax'-a, a town of Babylonia, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, famous for a battle fought there between Artaxerxes and his brother Cyrus the Younger, 401 B.C., in which the latter was defeated and killed. (See CYRUS.)

CUNDINAMARCA, koon-de'-na-mar'-ka, the central state of the United States of Columbia, S. America, comprising several provinces of the region in the Andes, with portions of the valleys of the Cauca and Magdalena. Area, estimated at 350,000 square miles. Pop. 569,000, besides Indians unenumerated. BOGOTA is the capital.—The name is derived from one of the goddesses in the American mythology.

CUNNINGHAM, ALLAN, kun'-ning-ham, poet, novelist and biographer. He was the son of a Scottish peasant, and at an early age put to the trade of a stonemason; but, in his leisure, applied himself to the cultivation of the homely Doric muse of his country, and rose to a considerable eminence as a lyric poet, attracting the especial notice of Sir Walter Scott. In 1810 he went to London, where he eked out a subsistence by reporting for the newspapers and contributing to periodicals. He subsequently obtained the situation of manager of the extensive studio of Chantrey, which enabled him to pursue his literary tastes in accordance with his own sentiments, and without the usual hazards attending the precariousness of the profession of literature. Considering his education and occupation, his works may be viewed as both numerous and excellent. The principal of them are the novels of "Paul Jones," and "Sir Michael Scott;" "Songs of Scotland, with Critical and Historical Notes;" "Sir Marmaduke Maxwell," a drama; "The Lives of the most Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects;" "The Life of Burns," and "The Life of Wilkie." He was much admired by Hogg, and affectionately esteemed by Chantrey, who bequeathed him £2,000, and an annuity of £100.

Born at Blackwood, in Dumfriesshire, 1785; died in London, 1842.

CUNNINGHAM, PETER, the eldest son of Allan Cunningham, was educated at a private school, and entered the public service as a clerk in the Audit Office. In 1854 he was promoted to one of the chief clerkships, and gave to the world some of the fruits of his leisure hours. In 1833 he published a "Life of Drummond of Hawthornden;" and, in 1835, "Songs of England and Scotland." In 1841 a new edition of Campbell's "Specimens of the British Poets," and in 1849 a "Handbook of London." Besides these, he edited Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," Walpole's Letters, Goldsmith's works, and contributed to "Fraser's Magazine," and several other periodicals, articles of light literature.

Born in London, 1816; died 1869.

CUPAR-ANGUS. (See COUPAR-ANGUS.)

CUPAR-FIFE, the capital of Fifeshire, Scotland, a royal and parliamentary borough, on the peninsula of Fife, 9 miles from the mouth of the Eden. It is situated in a beautiful and fertile valley, and has a church, county-hall, and other public buildings, with reading-rooms. Manf. Linens, bricks, and earthenware: and there are spinning and fulling mills, tanneries, and breweries. Pop. 7,404.

CUPID, kū'-pid, a celebrated deity among the ancients, the god of love, and love itself. There are different traditions concerning his parents, but the most celebrated represents him as a lively ingenious youth, the son of Jupiter and Venus. He is generally exhibited as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and a quiver full of arrows.

CURA, SAN LUIS DE, kū'-ra, a town of Venezuela, South America. Pop. 4,000.

CURAÇOA, ku-ra-sō', an island in the Caribbean Sea, about 75 miles from the coast of the Caraccas. It is one of a group known as the Curaçoa Islands, belonging to the Dutch. The other islands are Bonaire, Aruba, and Little Curaçoa. The island is 40 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 6 to 10 miles. It has rocky coasts, with an undulating surface, producing indigo, tobacco, sugar, and maize. The chief town is WILLEMSTAD. Pop. of group, 28,000. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 69° W.

CURETON, REV. WILLIAM, Oriental scholar, educated at Oxford, and ordained priest in 1832. In 1837 he was appointed assistant-keeper of the MSS. in the British Museum, and in 1849 was appointed to the rectory of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and a canonry in the abbey. He died from the effects of a railway accident. He was a profound Arabic and Syriac scholar.

Born at Westbury, Shropshire, 1808; died 1864.

CURIATII, ku-re-aï'-she-i. (See HORATII.)

CURIUS DENTATUS, MARCUS ANNIUS, kū'-ri-us den-tā'-tus, a Roman, celebrated for his bravery, fortitude, and frugality. He was victorious over various nations, and when the Samnites attempted to bribe him, he said, "I prefer my earthen pots to all your vessels of gold and silver, and my desire is to command those who are in possession of money, while I have none, but live in poverty."

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

CURL, EDMUND, kurl, a London bookseller, chiefly known by his quarrels with Pope, who scarified him in the "Dunciad," and for the publication of immoral books, for which he stood in the pillory.

Died 1748.

CURRAN, JOHN PHILPOT, kur'-ran, Irish orator and politician. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1773 entered the Inner Temple, London, and rapidly attained to a leading position at the Irish bar. In 1782 he entered the Irish Parliament. He eloquently denounced the policy of the English government, and was strongly opposed to the union. In 1806 he was appointed Master of the Rolls for Ireland, an office he resigned in 1813. He was as remarkable for his gaiety, wit, and conviviality, as for his patriotic fervour and brilliant eloquence. He was involved in several duels, but fortunately without receiving any injury.

Born in the county of Cork, 1750; died in London, 1817.

CURRITUCK, kur'-re-tuk, a county on the coast of Edenton district, North Carolina, United States. The Dismal Swamp is in this county. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 5,300.

CURTIUS, METTUS, kur'-she-us, a Roman youth, who devoted himself to the infernal gods for the safety of his country. A wide chasm having suddenly appeared in the Forum, the soothsayers announced that it would never close until Rome threw into it its most precious possession. Thereupon Curtius, arming himself, mounted his horse, and said "Rome has no greater riches than courage and arms," and solemnly threw himself into the abyss, which instantly closed over his head.

Died 360 B.C.

CURTIUS, RUFUS QUINTUS, Roman historian, known for his history of Alexander the Great. The date at which he lived is uncertain.

CURZOLA, koor-zo'-la, an island in the Adriatic, belonging to the Austrian province of Dalmatia. It is 25 miles long, with an average breadth of 4 miles. Pine forests cover a large portion of the island, and furnish ship-timber. The capital, of the same name, is at the north-east extremity. Pop. 6,500. Lat. 42° 57′ N. Lon. 17° E.

CUSH, kush, "black," a son of Ham, and father of Nimrod.—A country, supposed to be Æthiopia, in Africa, or the modern Abyssinia.

CUSHMAN, CHARLOTTE SAUNDERS, koosh-man, American actress, famous for her impersonation of characters requiring great dramatic force, and for the assumption of male characters, such as "Romeo." In 1845 she visited England, and made a great impression.

Born at Boston, 1816; died 1876.

CUSSET, koos-saï', a town of France, department Allier, 32 miles S.E. of Moulins. Manf. Blankets, cotton, coverlets, silk edging, lace, leather, and chemicals. Pop. 3,800.

CUSTRIN, or KUSTRIN, koos-treen', a fortified town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, at the union of the Wartha with the Oder, 48 miles from Berlin. It is small, but has three spacious suburbs, and is situate in a marsh crossed by 36 bridges. Pop. 8,500.—In 1758 it was bombarded by the Russians, and in 1806 taken by the French. It has large grain and powder magazines.

CUTCH, kutch, an extensive native state of India, inclosed by Scinde on the N., the Guicowar dominions on the S., and by the Gulf of Cutch and the Indian Ocean on the S. and S.E. It is divided into two portions, Cutch proper, and the Runn of Cutch, a waste district, about 8,600 square miles in extent, a salt desert in the dry season, and a shallow lake when the heavy rains fall. Cutch proper is mountainous, but contains numerous fertile level tracts, which, with the usual cerealia of India, produce cotton, rice, sugar, grapes, and musk lemons. The country suffers greatly from the scarcity of water. Minerals. Iron, coal, and alum. Area. 6,500 square miles. Pop. 512,084. Lat. between 22° 47′ and 24° 40′ N. Lon. between 68° 26′ and 71° 45′ E.

CUTCH-GUNDAVA, gun-dā'-va, a province of Beloochistan. Area, 10,000 square miles. Desc. Flat, bare, and arid, from the heat of the climate. Pro. Cotton, sugar, pulse, madder, and fruits. Pop. 100,000. Lat. between 27° 40′ and 29° 50′ N. Lon. between 67° 21′ and 69° 15′ E.

CUTHBERT, ST., kuth'-bert, old English bishop. His authentic history is greatly mixed up with ecclesiastical legend, but it seems that he was a shepherd boy of Northumbria; at an early age he entered the monastery of Melrose, of which he became prior, leaving it for the solitary monastery on the island of Lindisfarne, which he was induced to leave in 684 and become bishop of Hexham. After two years he returned to his island, and there died. He was canonized, and many churches in the north of England were dedicated to him. When, in 875, the Danes ravaged the island, the monks fled, bearing with them the saint in his coffin, which, after long wanderings, was finally deposited at Durham, where it was enclosed in a costly shrine, and was credited with the power of working miracles. Cuthbert was looked upon by the early Church as one of the greatest of English saints. His life was written by the Venerable Bede and others.

Born 635; died at Lindisfarne, 687.

CUTTACK, kut-tak, a district of the province of Orissa, British India. It is mountainous in the interior, but generally having a surface diversified by hill and dale. Pro. Cotton, rice, indigo, tobacco, poppy, and oil-seeds. Minerals. Iron ore. Manf. Cottons and fine muslins. Area, 3,178 square miles. Pop. 1,738,165. Chief Towns. CUTTACK, BALASORE, KANARAH, and POORNEE.

CUTTACK, the capital of the above district, at the head of the delta of the Mahanuddee. There is very little trade. Pop. 42,656. Lat. 20° 28′ N. Lon. 85° 55′ E.—The name, "Cuttack," means "a royal residence."

CUVIER, GEORGES CHRÉTIEN LEOPOLD DAGOBERT, Baron, koo'-ve-ai, a distinguished French naturalist, who, at the age of 21, became tutor to the only son of Count d'Héricy in Normandy, where, having a residence by the seacoast, he commenced the study of marine animals. In a short time he sent some papers to the Society of Natural History, and in 1795 received the appointment of assistant to Mertrud at Paris, in the Jardin des Plantes. Here he commenced his collection of comparative anatomy, and in 1796, when the National Institute was formed, became one of its first members. He now began a series of works illustrative of fossil remains, and in 1800 was appointed professor of natural philosophy at the College of France, but still continued to lecture on comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes. In 1802 he was chosen by the first consul, Bonaparte, one of the inspectors-general to establish public schools in France, and became perpetual secretary to the Institute for the department of Natural Sciences. He rose to the highest honours, and in 1814, just before the abdication of Napoleon I., was named a councillor of state, which appointment was confirmed by Louis XVIII. His next advancement was to the chancellorship of the university, which he held till his death. In 1819 he was created a baron; in 1826 Charles X. conferred on him the decoration of grand officer of the Legion of Honour; and in 1832 Louis Philippe created him a peer. Cuvier greatly advanced the natural sciences, the true object of which is, he declares, "to lead the human mind towards its destination,—a knowledge of truth." His works are very numerous, and as a comparative anatomist he has exercised an immense influence on the present condition of the science.

Born at Montbéliard, 1769; died at Paris, 1832.

CUXHAVEN, koox-ha'-fen, a seaport of Germany, 58 miles from Hamburg, to which it belongs, situate at the mouth of the Elbe. The harbour is large and commodious. There are baths, and regular steam communication with England. Pop. 1,700.

CUYABA, ke-a'-ba, a Brazilian town, capital of the province of Matto Grosso. It stands on the left bank of a river of the same name, has three churches, and other good public buildings. A large trade is carried on in the export of gold, diamonds, hides, and ipecacuanha. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 15° 36′ S. Lon. 56° W.

CUYAHOGA, ke'-a-ho'-ga, a county in Ohio, U.S., on Lake Erie, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga river, which enters Lake Erie at Cleveland, after a course of 60 miles. Area, 486 square miles. Pop. 196,943.

CUYP, JACOB GERRITSE, or KUYP, koip, a Dutch portrait and animal painter, known to collectors as "old Cuyp."

Born at Dordrecht, 1575 died; 1650.

CUYP, AELBERT, son of the above, a painter famous for landscapes, which are highly valued for their beauty and truthfulness to nature. They fetch very high prices.

Born at Dordrecht, 1605; died 1691.

CUZCO, koos-ko, a province of Peru, South America, in the region of the Andes. Area, 95,547 square miles. Pop. 238,445.

CUZCO, capital of the province, and the ancient capital of the Peruvian empire, in S. America, 200 miles N.E. of Arequipa. The houses are almost all of stone, and there are a cathedral, several parish churches, convents, and hospitals. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, leather, jewellery, and embroidery. Pop. 18,370.—According to tradition, this town was founded in 1043, by Manca Capac, the first inca of Peru. The grandeur and magnificence of the edifices, of the fortress, and of the Temple of the Sun, struck the Spaniards with astonishment in 1534, when the city was taken by Francis Pizarro. On a hill towards the north are yet seen the ruins of a fortress built by the incas, and which had a communication, by means of subterranean passages, with three forts built in the walls of Cuzco. All the descendants of the incas resided in a particular quarter.

CYBELE, sib'-e-le, a goddess, the daughter of Cœlus and Terra (heaven and earth), and wife of Saturn. She is generally represented as a robust woman, far advanced in pregnancy, to personify the fecundity of the earth; and is also seen with many breasts, to show that the earth gives aliment to all living creatures.

CYCLADES, si'-kla-dees, a name given to certain islands of the Ægean Sea, the principal of which were Ceos, Naxos, Andros, Paros, Melos, Seriphos, Gyarus, and Tenedos. Pop. 132,020.

CYCLOPES, si-klo'-pees, in Greek mythology giants, the sons of heaven and earth, having but one eye in the middle of the forehead; whence their name, which means "round-eyed." Mythologists differ as to their number; Hesiod mentions three, Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Virgil adds a fourth, —Pyracmon. They inhabited the western parts of Sicily, and, from their vicinity to Mount Ætna, were supposed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Zeus, or Jupiter. They were reckoned among the gods, and sacrifices were solemnly offered to them at Corinth. Apollo destroyed them all, because they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter, with which his son Asclepius had been killed. Homer makes Polyphemus one of the Cyclopes.

CYNÆGIRUS, sin-e-ji'-rus, an Athenian, brother of the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was immediately cut off by the enemy. Upon this, he seized the vessel with his left hand; and when he had lost that also, retained his hold with his teeth.

CYPRIAN, THASCIUS CÆCILIUS, sip'-ri-an, a learned father and martyr of the Latin church, who, in 246, embraced Christianity, on which he wrote his book "De Gratiâ Dei," addressed to Donatus. He was made bishop of his native town, Carthage. He was persecuted in the reign of Valerian, and beheaded. He was a learned and eloquent divine, dignified and moderate in his bearings. His works include several treatises of importance.

Died 258.

CYPRUS, si'-prus, an island near the coast of Asia Minor, the third in size in the Mediterranean. It is nearly traversed from east to west by two lofty chains of mountains, having between them the valley of the Pedia and Mount Santa Croce, the ancient Olympus, 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. There are extensive forests of oak and walnut, and large districts of open country with a fertile soil.

Pro.—Corn, wine, fruits, cheese, cotton, wool, salt, madder, hemp, timber, and colocynth. The corn is of excellent quality; but wine is the staple product of the island. All the valuable kinds are white, the red being merely used as vin du pays. The apricots of Cyprus are delicious; many varieties of the gourd and pumpkin are also produced.

Manf.—Carpets, printed cottons, and leather are the principal.

Pop. 186,173, of whom about three-fourths are Greek Christians.

Lat. 35° N. Lon. Between 32° 20′ and 34° 40′ E.

Chief Towns.—NICOSIA, the capital; FAMAGOSTA, LARNACA, and LIMASSAL.

History.—Cyprus is thought to have obtained its name from Cyprus, one of its early kings, though others say it was derived from a certain fragrant tree or flower. It has been celebrated as the residence of Venus, surnamed Cyprus, who was the chief deity of the island, and to whose service many places and temples were consecrated. The Greeks made themselves masters of it, and it was taken from them by the Romans. It was a portion of the kingdom of the Ptolemies, and of the Byzantine empire; was conquered by the Arabs in 648 A.D., and taken from them and given to the Knights-Templars in 1191. After 1571 it was subject to the Turks till 1878, when Great Britain assumed a protectorate.

CYRENE, si-ré'-ne, a celebrated city of Africa, capital of Cyrenaica (which was nearly identical with the modern Barca), situate in a beautiful and fertile plain, about eleven miles from the Mediterranean Sea. It was the birthplace of many great men; among whom were Callimachus, Eratosthenes, Carneades, Aristippus, &c.

CYRIL, ST., si'-ril, bishop of Alexandria, one of the Fathers of the early church, noted for the fierceness with which he attacked those who differed from him. He excited a fanatical rabble to attack the Jews of Alexandria, and was the cause of the murder of the maiden HYPATIA. He was a learned theologian and effective writer.

Died 444.

CYRIL, ST., bishop of Jerusalem, a Father of the Greek church. He was involved in controversies with the Arians, and was deposed from his office in 358 for the very singular offence, as it may seem to us, of selling church treasures to obtain food for the poor in a time of famine. He was restored on appealing to a synod; but again deposed in 360. He once more regained the episcopate in 362, but five years afterwards was banished by the Emperor Valens, and did not return till the emperor's death in the following year.

Born 315; died 386.

CYRUS, si'-rus, king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. There are different accounts of his youth. He restored the independence of Persia, which had long been under the domination of the Medes, and caused himself to be proclaimed king about 560 B.C. In a short time he extended the limits of his empire, which soon became the greatest in Asia. He decisively defeated Cœsus, king of Lydia, invaded Assyria, and took Babylon, by turning the channel of the Euphrates, 538 B.C. He afterwards, however, was beaten by the Scythians, taken prisoner, and, according to Herodotus, put to death by their queen. Historians do not agree, however, as to the manner of his death. (See CRŒSUS.)

Died 529 B.C.

CYRUS, called the "Younger," was the youngest son of Darius Nothus, and brother of Artaxerxes Mnemon, king of Persia. When the latter mounted the throne, he was made governor of Asia Minor. Desirous, however, of the supreme authority, he levied forces against his sovereign. A great battle was fought between the brothers at Cunaxa (see CUNAXA), where Cyrus was defeated and slain by Artaxerxes. Cyrus had in his service Clearchus and Xenophon, the latter of whom wrote the famous account of the retreat of the remnant of the Greeks. (See XENOPHON.)

Died 401 B.C.

CYZICUS, siz'-i-kus, the chief town of Cyzicus, in the Propontis, built where that island or peninsula is joined by bridges to the continent. It derives its name from Cyzicus, who was killed there by Jason. The Athenians, under Alcibiades, defeated, near this place, the Lacedæmonians, 410 B.C.

CZARTORYSKI, ADAM GEORGE, tsar'-to-ris'-ke, Polish patriot and statesman, a descendant of the founder of the Jagellonian dynasty of Poland. He was educated at Edinburgh and London, and took part in the war against Russia consequent on the second partition of Poland. His countrymen being defeated, he was sent as a hostage to St. Petersburg, where he rose into favour, and received diplomatic and other important appointments. When the revolution of 1830 broke out, he adopted the cause of his country, and was elected head of the national government. But Russia was successful, and Czartoryski escaped to Paris, where he continued to reside. He had given half of his estates to the public service, and in 1848 he liberated his serfs.

Born at Warsaw, 1770; died at Paris, 1861.

CZASLAU, tsas'-lou, a town of Bohemia, 45 miles S.E. of Prague. The church has the highest steeple in Bohemia. Manf. Beet-root sugar and chicory; and there are copper-works and a distillery. Pop. 6,000. In May, 1742, the Austrians were here defeated by the Prussians under Frederick the Great. Capital of circle of same name.

CZEGLED, chaí'-glad, a town of Hungary, between the Danube and the Theiss, 40 miles S.E. of Pesth. There are large breweries, and red wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 22,300.

CZERNOVITZ, or TSCHERNOWITZ, chair'-no-veetz, a town of the Austrian empire, on the Pruth, 140 miles from Jassy. Its public buildings are a Greek cathedral, gymnasium, and schools. Manf. Jewellery, clocks, hardwares, and carriages. Pop. 45,600.

CZERNY, GEORG, chair'-ne, known as "Black George," Servian leader, whose dwelling having been plundered by Turkish soldiers, collected followers and began a guerilla warfare, achieving considerable successes. In 1806 he captured Belgrade, and two years afterwards was elected prince of Servia, and recognized as such by the sultan. Hostilities recommenced in 1812, and, being deprived of Russian support, Czerny was defeated and fled to Russia, and afterwards to Austria. In 1817 he returned to oppose Prince Milosch Obrenowicz, who had in the meanwhile been chosen leader of the Servians, and at whose instigation Czerny was murdered.

Born near Belgrade, 1770; died 1817.

CZORTKOW, chort'-koof, a town of Austrian Galicia, the capital of a circle, 103 miles from Lemberg. It contains a castle, and has a large tobacco-manufactory. Pop. 2,500.

D

DAC, or DACH, JOHN, dak, a German painter, who was employed by the emperor Rodolphus, and whose pieces are excellent.

Born at Cologne, in 1556; died at Vienna, 1646.

DACCA, dak'-ka, an extensive and rich division of Lower Bengal, British India. It is intersected by the Ganges and Brahmapootra, which, with their various branches, form a complete inland navigation, extending to every part of the country; so that, every town having its river or canal, the general mode of travelling or conveying goods is by water. Floods are frequent in the rainy season. Pro. Sugar, hemp, indigo, rice, the betel-nut, and vegetables. Manf. Jewellery, soap, paper, woollens, hardware, and glass. Area, 2,987 square miles. Pop. 8,700,039. Lat. between 23° 12′ and 24° 17′ N. Lon. between 90° 11′ and 90° 58′ E.

DACCA, the capital of the above division, is situate on the N. bank of a deep and broad river called the Burha Gunga, an affluent of the Brahmapootra, 100 miles from the sea. The houses of the wealthy are built of brick, every vacant spot being filled with trees. Its public buildings are the churches of various denominations, about 180 mosques, more than 100 temples, cemeteries, a gaol, a college, and a number of schools. Many of the old buildings are in a ruinous state, and overgrown with vegetation. The famous Dacca muslins were at one time a staple manufacture of the town, but are no longer made. Pop. 80,000.

DACI and DACÆ, da'-si, a warlike nation of Germany, beyond the Danube, whose country, called Dacia, now Moldavia, was conquered by the Romans under Trajan, after a war of fifteen years, A.D. 103.

DACIER, ANDRÉ, da'-se-ai, a learned French scholar, who, in 1681, published, at Paris, an edition of Pompeius Festus, for the use of the dauphin. His translation of Horace appeared the same year; and, in 1691, his translation of the "Reflections of Marcus Antoninus," and the next year Aristotle's "Poetics." For his services to literature, he was appointed perpetual secretary to the Academy, rewarded with a pension of 2,000 livres, and made keeper of the cabinet of the Louvre. Besides the works above mentioned, he translated Plato into French; the "Lives" of Plutarch, the "Manual" of Epictetus, and several others.

Born at Castres, 1651; died 1722.

DACIER, ANNE, wife of the above, and daughter of Le Fèvre, professor of Greek at Saumur, received a liberal education. In 1674 she published an edition of Callimachus, and, in 1681, a translation of Anacreon and Sappho, which was followed by versions of some of Plautus's comedies, and of the "Plutus" and "Clouds" of Aristophanes. In 1683 she married M. Dacier, and, in 1711, produced the translation of the "Iliad." Three years after appeared her version of the "Odyssey;" and this closed her literary labours.

Born at Saumur, in 1651; died 1720.

DADE, an almost unpopulated county of Florida, United States; the southern extremity of the peninsula. Area, 1,000 square miles.

DADE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 4,702. Trenton is the capital.

DADE, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 498 square miles. Pop. 12,557.

DADUR, da'-dur, a town of Beloochistan, 5 miles E. of the Bolan pass. This is accounted one of the hottest places in the world, and is celebrated as the locality where, in 1840, the British defeated a Kelat force. Pop. 3,000.

DÆDALUS, de'-da-lus, in Greek legendary history, an Athenian, son of Eupalamus, was the most ingenious artist of his age. To him we are supposed to be indebted for the invention of the wedge and many other mechanical instruments, as also the sails of ships. Having killed, from jealousy, his nephew Dalus, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos gave him a cordial reception. Here he constructed a famous labyrinth for Minos, in which he himself and his son were subsequently confined; when they made for themselves wings of feathers and wax, and took their flight from Crete. The heat of the sun, however, melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, who flew too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean which, from him, has been called the Icarian Sea. The father alighted at Cumæ, in Italy, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He was ultimately put to death by Cocalus, who had been threatened with war by Minos. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass, at a distance, for wings; but the whole legend is too mythical for criticism.

DAGHESTAN, da'-ges-tan', a province of Asiatic Russia, on the W. coast of the Caspian Sea, between the efflux of the rivers Koisin and Rubas. It has the mountains of Caucasus and Georgia on the S.W., and the province of Kumiki on the N. It is mountainous, and intersected with numerous valleys. Pro. Grain, madder, hemp, and tobacco. Cattle-breeding is carried on to a large extent. Area, about 8,600 square miles. Pop. 529,271, chiefly Lesghians, a brave people, ardent Mahometans. Lat. between 41° and 43° N. Lon. between 46° and 50° E.—The chief town is DERBEND.

DAGO, da'-go, an island of Russia, near the Gulf of Finland, in the Baltic Sea. Ext. 34 miles long and 15 broad. Desc. Rocky, and in general possessed of a poor soil. Pop. 10,000.

DAGO, or DAGEN, an island, situate in the Baltic, at the entrance of the Gulf of Finland. It is about 35 miles long and 15 broad. Des. Infertile and rocky. Pop. 10,000.—The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in fishing and cattle-rearing.

DAGOBERT I., dag'-o-bair, king of France, was recognised as king of Austrasia in 622, and on the death of his father, Clotaire II., in 628, became possessed of Neustria, and in 631 of Aquitania, on the death of his brother Caribert. He subdued the Saxons, Gascons, and Bretons; but tarnished the splendour of his exploits by his cruel and dissolute habits. He founded St. Denis, near Paris, in 632, and was there buried.
Born 602; died 638.

DAGOBERT II., succeeded to the kingdom of Austrasia in 656. His death was caused by assassination.
Born 652; died 679.

DAGOBERT III. succeeded his father, Childebert III., 711.
Born 699; died 715.

DAGON, dai'-gon, "fish," the idol deity of the Philistines, the body being human, with the tail of a fish.

DAGUERRE, LOUIS JAQUES MANDE, dagair', the inventor of the diorama, and daguerreotypes or sun-pictures, which take from him their name. He was originally an artist, became a scene-painter to the opera at Paris, and assisted M. Prévost in producing his panoramas of the great cities of the world. His ingenuity, however, was continually prompting him to make new efforts in his art; and in 1822, in conjunction with Bouton, he perfected and exhibited the first diorama, which had a great success. For seventeen years he continued in this line, when he discovered the means of delineating objects by the chemical action of light. Something similar had been attempted before, by various chemists; but it remained for Daguerre to work out the discovery. To him belongs the merit of producing sun-pictures perfect upon metallic plates. In 1839 he made an exhibition of these pictures, and was named an officer of the Legion of Honour. At the same time, on condition of publishing his method, an annuity of 6,000 francs for life was voted to him by the government, and the process of daguerreotyping became generally known.
Born at Cormeille, France, 1789; died at Petit-Brie-sur-Marne, 1851.

DAHL, MICHAEL, dal, a Swedish portrait-painter, who came to England and met with great success. He had the honour to paint the portrait of Queen Anne, and was, during her reign and that of George I., the rival of Sir Godfrey Kneller.
Born at Stockholm, 1656; died in London, 1743.

DAHL, JOHANN CHRISTIAN CLAUSEN, a distinguished Norwegian landscape-painter, at first intended for the church, whose views of Italian and Tyrolean scenery were universally admired. In rendering the wild grandeur of his native scenery he was equally successful. In 1821 he was appointed professor of painting at Dresden.
Born at Bergen, 1788; died at Dresden, 1857.

DAHLBERG, ERIC, dal'-bairg, a Swedish general, who, after studying the science of fortification, was, in 1648, appointed an engineer. Gustavus Adolphus sent him to superintend the works for the defence of Thorn, and he attended that monarch in the Polish war. By his advice the king undertook the enterprise of marching his army across the Great Belt, when frozen over in 1657, whereby he extended his conquests to Copenhagen. In 1660 Dahlberg was ennobled, and in 1669 appointed commandant of Malmo, and superintendent of fortifications. He so greatly improved these, as to be called the Vauban of Sweden. In 1690 he was made governor of Livonia, and died at Stockholm.
Born 1625; died 1703.

DAHLMANN, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH, dal'-man, German historian and politician, appointed professor of political science at Gottingen in 1829. He was banished from Hanover on account of his advocacy of liberal principles, and in 1842 became professor of history and political science at Bonn. He took an active part on the liberal side in the political struggle of 1848. He wrote a history of Denmark, researches into the sources of German history, and other valuable historical works.
Born at Wiemar, 1785; died at Bonn, 1860.

DAHME, dam, a town of Prussia, on the river of the same name, 43 miles from Berlin. It is defended by a strong citadel, and inclosed by walls. Manf. Linens, woollens, and tobacco. Pop. 4,000.—Here, in 1713, the French were defeated by the Prussians.

DAHOMEY, dá'-ho-me, a country of Upper Guinea, West Africa, with a coast-line extending from the river Volta on the west, to Fort Badagry on the east. It is bounded on the E. by Yarriba, and on the W. by Ashantee. It extends 180 miles from E. to W., with a breadth of about 200 inland, rising gradually to the Kay mountains. The parts which have been visited are very beautiful and fertile, and rise, for about 150 miles, with a gradual slope, but without any great elevation. The soil is a deep rich clay, yielding maize, millet, and Guinea corn in abundance. The inhabitants are a warlike and ferocious race, but sunk in the lowest state of barbarism. Their institutions and political system are of a very extraordinary character. All the females of the nation are considered as belonging to the king, and a distribution of wives takes place once a year, at a grand festival. Their king is absolute, human sacrifices are made on all state occasions, and there is an army of female soldiers, whose courage is as undoubted as their ferocity. The chief town is ABOMEY. Pop. 180,000. Lat. between 6° and 8° 50′ N. Lon. between 30′ and 3° E.

DAHRA, dah'-ra, a district of Algeria, memorable for the massacre of 800 Arabs, of the Kabyle tribe, in a cave by the French colonel Pelissier, who suffocated them by lighting immense fires at the entrance of a cave in which they had taken refuge, in June, 1845.

DAIMIEL, dá'-e-me-ail, a town of Spain, in the province of Ciudad Real, 20 miles N.E. of the city of that name. There are two fine churches and a town-hall. Public walks and gardens surround the town. Manf. Linens, woollens, and blonde lace. Pop. 9,636.

DAIR EL KAMAR, dair el ka'-mar, a town of Syria, and capital of a community of Druses, 12 miles S.E. of Beyrout, on the slope of Mount Lebanon, amid plantations of mulberries, olives, and vines.

DAKHEL, or DAKHLEH, EL, da'-kel, the W. oasis of Upper Egypt, 50 miles W. of the oasis El-Kharzeh. It contains two small towns and numerous villages, the inhabitants of which are chiefly supported by dates, olives, and other fruits. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 25° 30′ N. Lon. 29° E.

DAKOTA, da-ko'-ta, a territory of the United States, bounded by the British possessions on the N., Nebrasca on the S., Montana and Wyoming on the W., and Minnesota on the E. It is 360 miles long, and about 360 in average breadth. The land is fertile and well timbered in some parts, with open plains, and watered by the Missouri and its affluents. Fur-bearing animals are abundant. Area, 148,166 square miles. Pop. 135,177. The chief towns are Fargo and Crookston. There are very extensive wheat-growing farms.

DALAMOW, da'-la-mou, a city of British India, in the province of Oude, on the left bank of the Ganges, 68 miles above Allahabad. It is a holy place, to which the Hindoos resort to perform their ritual ablutions in the Ganges, and there are two old temples of Siva. Pop. 5,700, nearly all Hindoos.

DALBY, ISAAC, a self-taught mathematician, a native of Gloucestershire, who, in 1772, went to London, and received the appointment of usher in Archbishop Tenison's grammar-school, then near Charing Cross. Here he got acquainted with many celebrated men of science, and subsequently became mathematical master of the naval school at Chelsea. He was afterwards engaged in the trigonometrical survey of England, and in 1799 was appointed professor of mathematics in the senior department of the Royal Military College at High Wycombe. On the removal of that institution to Farnham, Surrey, he accompanied it; but infirmities were now fast increasing upon him, and he was forced to resign his situation. Besides other writings of less collective importance, he wrote for the Military College a "Course of Mathematics," in 2 vols., which extended to a sixth edition.

Born in Gloucestershire, 1744; died at Farnham, 1824.

DALE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 12,677. The capital is Newton.

DALECARLIA, an old province of Sweden. (See FAHLUN.)

D'ALEMBERT. (See ALEMBERT, D').

DALHOUSIE, JAMES ANDREW BROUN-RAMSAY, tenth earl and first marquis of, a modern English statesman, was educated at Harrow, and afterwards entered Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1838. In 1832 he became Lord Ramsay, by the death of his elder brothers, and in 1835 contested the representation of Edinburgh for the House of Commons, but was unsuccessful. In the following year he married the eldest daughter of the Marquis of Tweeddale. In 1837 he was returned for Haddingtonshire, and in the succeeding year he was called, by the death of his father, to the House of Lords. In 1843 he entered upon official life under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel. His first office was that of vice-president of the Board of Trade, of which he became president in 1845. In this capacity his business habits were so conspicuous and his ability so great, especially in connexion with railway administration, that, on the accession of Lord John Russell to power, in 1846, he was requested to keep his appointment, which he, accordingly, did. In 1847, on the recall of Lord Hardinge from India, Lord Dalhousie was appointed governor-general. He had now an opportunity of developing those administrative talents with which he was endowed. On reaching Calcutta, he proclaimed that his policy was to acquire equally direct dominion over the territories of the native princes as the British already had over those other parts of India in their possession. Accordingly, on a revolt taking place in Moolraj, he marched a force into the North-Western provinces, and, after defeating the Sikhs and Affghans, annexed the Punjab. In two years afterwards, the king of Ava provoked an expedition to be sent against him, when the coast of Burmah was taken by the British, and in 1852 Pegu incorporated with their dominions. After this, a series of annexations were made, which greatly enlarged the British empire in India. Nagpore, Sattara, Jhansi, Berar, and Oude were successively appropriated either on account of the tyranny and misrule with which they had been governed, or from the failure of their lawful heirs among the native dynasties. Whilst these events were taking place, the internal resources of the country were being energetically developed and improved. A uniform system of cheap postage was introduced, and a large portion of India intersected by railways; the Ganges Canal was cut, and grand trunk roads constructed through various parts. The energy of his administration was apparent in every direction, but, with a broken constitution, he returned to England in 1856. In 1848 he was made a knight of the Order of the Thistle, and in 1849 he was created a marquis for his successes in the Punjab. Previous to his return, he had been, on the death of the duke of Wellington, appointed to the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, and the East India Company also settled on him a pension of £5,000 a year.

Born at Dalhousie Castle, Midlothian, 1812; died, 1860.

DALHOUSIE, a town of New Brunswick, British America, on the S.W. side of an island of the same name in Chaleur Bay. There is a good harbour, visited by timber ships. The place is rapidly increasing.

DALIAS, dai-le-as, a Spanish town, in the province of Almeira, about 4 miles from the Mediterranean. It is irregularly built, and is subject to earthquakes. Mining, smelting, and fishing are the chief occupations of the inhabitants. There are mineral baths, much frequented in the season. Pop. 9,000.

DALILAH, or DELILAH, da-li'-la, a woman of the Philistines, beloved by Samson. She was induced, by the gold which her friends offered her, to betray him, helpless, into their hands, and, one night, cutting off his long hair, in which lay his strength, she delivered him, bound hand and foot, to his enemies.

DALIN, OLOF, or OLAUS, da'-lin, a Swedish historian and poet, who was appointed royal librarian in 1737, preceptor to the Prince Royal (afterwards Gustavus III.), in 1751; historiographer royal in 1759, and chancellor of the Court of Sweden in 1763. He wrote an effusion entitled "The Liberty of Sweden," and a tragedy entitled "Brunhilda." He also produced in prose a General History of Sweden; a periodical paper, "The Swedish Argus;" many songs, epigrams, and fables; and was so distinguished for his poetical ability, as to be called the father of modern Swedish poetry.

Born at Winsberg, in 1708; died in 1763.

DALKEITH, dal-keeth', a town and burgh and barony of Scotland, beautifully situated between the North and South Esks, 6 miles S.E. of Edinburgh. The town is well built, and has an old parish church, and a fine new church, in the Early English style, built in 1840, several chapels, a scientific institute, various banks, and a large market-hall, erected in 1854. The largest market for grain in Scotland is held in the town. Manf. Woollens, brushes, hats, iron, and leather. There are coal mines in the neighbourhood. The duke of Buccleuch has a fine seat in the vicinity, built in 1700, on the site of the old castle. Pop. 7,707.—A station on the North British Railway.

DALKISSORE, dal-kis-sore, a river of Bengal, British India, which rises in lat. 23° 30′ N., lon. 86° 34′ E., and joins the Hooghly 30 miles below Calcutta, after a course of 170 miles.

DALLAS, GEORGE MIFFLIN, dal'-las, American statesman. He graduated at Princeton College, in 1810, was called to the bar, and soon afterwards went to St. Petersburg as private secretary to the American minister. On his return he filled several public offices in Philadelphia, and in 1831 represented Pennsylvania in the senate. From 1837 to 1839 he was minister at St. Petersburg, and between 1844 and 1849 Vice-President of the United States. In 1856 he was appointed American minister in England, and remained in this country until 1861.

Born at Philadelphia, 1792; died 1864.

DALLAS, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 890 square miles. Pop. 48,433. Cahawba is the capital.

DALLAS, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 860 square miles. Pop 6,505. The capital is Princeton.

DALLAS, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 18,746. Adell is the capital.

DALLAS, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 9,000. Buffalo is the capital.

DALLAS, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 33,488. The capital is Dallas.

DALLAS, a county of Wisconsin, United States, almost uninhabited.

DALLERY, THOMAS CHARLES AUGUSTE, dal'-la-re, organ builder, one of a famous family of organ builders, who constructed some of the finest instruments in France. He was a clever mechanic in other departments, and in 1803 took out a patent for a screw propeller for steam navigation, but receiving no encouragement from the government, and his own means being exhausted, abandoned the project.

Born at Amiens, 1754; died 1835.

DALLYA or DALGA, dal'-ya, a town of the Austrian empire, on the Danube, in the midst of a fertile, corn-rearing, and grazing district. The sturgeon and other fisheries are profitable. Pop. 3,500.

DALMASIO, LIPPO, dal-mai'-se-o, an early Bolognese painter, remarkable for the sweetness and grace of his pictures, especially Madonnas. He was continually employed by the wealthy inhabitants of Bologna.

Born 1376; died 1410.

DALMATIA, KINGDOM OF, dal-mai-she-a, a district in the S. of Europe, extending along the E. side of the Adriatic, and forming the southernmost province of the Austrian empire. It is partly continental and partly insular. The continental portion makes a narrow strip of country, bounded on the S. and W. by the Adriatic, E. by Bosnia and Herzegovina, and N. by Istria and Croatia. The islands are very numerous, the largest being Arbe, Pago, Isola, Grossa, Brazza, Lesina, Curzola, Lissa, and Meleda. The continental portion is in general hilly and unproductive; but there are many beautiful and fertile valleys. The pasturages are considerable, and are, in many parts, overlooked by the lofty peaks of the Dinaric Alps, the highest of which are the Dinara, 5,669; the Svilaya, 4,750; Mosor, 4,210; the Biokovo, near Macarsca, 5,520 feet, and Orien, 6,322 feet above the level of the sea. The first of these peaks gives its name to the range. The coast line is indented by numerous bays, forming excellent harbours, the chief of which are CATTARO, RAGUSA and SEBENICO.

Rivers.—The Kerka, Cettina, Narenta, and Zermagna.
Pro.—Chiefly maize, wheat, grapes, olives, and a small quantity of silk.
Minerals.—Marble, gypsum, iron, and coal.
Area.—4,831 square miles.
Pop.—476,101, of whom about one-eighth are Italians; the remainder Slavonians (or Dalmatians), Albanians, Morlaks, and Germans. The native Dalmatians are a fine race of men, active, warlike, and independent.
Lat. Between 42° 15′ and 44° 54′ N. Lon. Between 14° 30′ and 12° E.
History.—This country formed a part of the ancient Illyricum, and is now divided into the four departments of Cattaro, Ragusa, Spalatro, and Zara. It was incorporated with the kingdom of Italy in 1805 by Napoleon I., who created Marshal Soult duke of Dalmatia; afterwards formed part of Illyria, and in 1814, with the exception of a small portion belonging to Turkey (added in 1876) annexed to the Austrian empire.

DALRY, dal'-re, a town of Scotland, in the county of Ayr, beautifully situated on the Garnock, 19 miles S.W. of Glasgow. There are extensive ironworks, and in the vicinity coal-pits. Pop. 10,215.

DALRYMPLE, PORT, dal-rim'-pel, a harbour, with lighthouse, in an estuary at the mouth of the Tamar, in Tasmania. Lat. 41° 3′ 5″ S. Lon. 146° 7′ 5″ E.

DALRYMPLE. (See STAIR, Viscount and Earl of.)

DALRYMPLE, ALEXANDER, an eminent hydrographer, who, by the force of his talents, raised himself to considerable eminence in the service of the East-India Company, which he entered at the age of 15. He endeavoured to establish friendly commercial relations between the sultan of Sooloo and the Company, but was unsuccessful. He returned to England to urge the importance of the treaty upon the home government, but was there also unsuccessful. In 1775 he again went to Madras, where he had been appointed a member of council, and one of the committee of circuit; but in 1777 was recalled. In 1779 he was appointed hydrographer to the Company, and in 1795, when a similar office was established by the Admiralty, it was given to Dalrymple. This appointment he held till 1808, when he was called upon to resign it on the ground of superannuation. This, however, he refused to do, and was dismissed, and died, partly from vexation, a month afterwards. He was the author of numerous pamphlets, accounts of geographical expeditions, suggestions for promoting commercial intercourse, and similar subjects.

Born near Edinburgh, 1737; died in Marylebone, 1808.

DALRYMPLE, DAVID, Lord Hailes, a Scotch judge, grandson of Viscount Stair, and elder brother of the preceding, after finishing his education at Eton, Edinburgh, and Utrecht, was called, in 1748, to the Scotch bar, and in 1766 appointed one of the judges of the Court of Session, on which occasion he took the title of Lord Hailes. In this capacity he was eminently distinguished for the diligence with which he fulfilled his duties; but it is on account of his labours in the field of literature that he is chiefly celebrated. In 1766 he was raised to the rank of justiciary lord. He published a number of books in the form of memoirs and letters, relating to the history of Britain in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; "Remarks on the History of Scotland," 12mo; "Annals of Scotland," 4to, 2 vols.; "Remains of Christian Antiquity," 3 vols.; several Memoirs intended for a Biographia Scotica; papers in the "World" and "Mirror," and a great many other works, every one of them bearing the stamp of considerable merit.

Born at Edinburgh, 1726; died 1792.

DALTON, dal'-ton, a market town of Lancashire, 16 miles N.W. of Lancaster, communicating with the sea by a canal nearly 4 miles long. In the vicinity are the ruins of the great abbey of Furness, founded in 1127. Extensive ironworks give employment to many of the inhabitants. Pop. 13,350.—A station on the North-Eastern and Furness Railway.

DALTON, JOHN, a distinguished mathematician, chemist and natural philosopher, who, from humble circumstances, gradually worked his way into public notice and honourable fame. In 1793 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the New College at Manchester, which he held until the removal of that institution to York in 1799. He continued to reside in Manchester, and gave lessons in private seminaries, and also occupied himself with lecturing upon his favourite subjects. He also filled the appointments of secretary and vice-president to the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and in 1817 became its president, to which distinction he was elected every succeeding year until his death. At an early age he was known as a contributor to the "Lady's Diary," "The Transactions of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society," and other serials; but it was not till 1803 that he commenced seriously to work out his grand discovery of the atomic theory. In the following year he explained it to Dr. Thomas Thomson, and subsequently in some of his own lectures, delivered in London and several other of the principal towns of England. In 1808 appeared the first volume of his "New System of Chemical Philosophy," which, in 1810, was followed by his second volume. In both of these volumes he treated of the atomic theory, which proved one of the most important contributions that had yet been made to the science of chemistry. By it, the constituents of any article could be regulated with perfect accuracy, and the knowledge of chemical combinations reduced to an amazing degree of simplicity and certainty. It is upon this discovery that his fame rests, as it, at once, places him amongst the most original inquirers and thinkers of his day. For it the first gold medal of the Royal Society was awarded to him. He also made valuable researches into the nature of mixed gases, and the elasticity of vapours. In 1832 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the title of D.C.L.; in the following year William IV. gave him a pension of £150 a year, which, in 1836, was raised to £300. In 1834 the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and in 1833, £2,000 was subscribed by his friends in Manchester for a statue to him, to be sculptured by Chantrey, and placed in the entrance-hall of the Royal Institution of that city. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and was also a member of various other learned societies. He was throughout life a member of the Society of Friends.

Born at Eaglesfield, near Cockermouth, Cumberland, 1766; died at Manchester, 1844.

DALYELL, THOMAS, dal-yel, Scottish military commander. In the Parliamentary war he served on the Royalist side, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and confined in the Tower, from which he escaped to Russia, where the Czar made him a general. At the Restoration he returned to England, and Charles II. gave him the command of the forces in Scotland, where his cruel persecution of the Covenanters made his name execrated. He wore a long white beard, having refused to shave after the execution of Charles I., and his remarkable appearance is described by Scott in the novel, "Old Mortality."

Born in West Lothian, 1599; died 1685.

DAMAN, or DAMAUN, da'-man, a seaport of India, belonging to the Portuguese, and situate on the coast of the Northern Concan, at the mouth of the Daman river. There is a good harbour, and shipbuilding is carried on. The town is fortified, and is capital of a district 10 miles long by 5 broad. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 20° 11′ N. Lon. 73° 42′ E.

DAMAN, or the BORDER, a tract extending 300 miles on the west bank of the Indus river and extending westward to the Suliman mountains, in India. It was formerly a part of the kingdom of Runjeet Singh, but, being annexed to the Punjab, now belongs to the British. It is fertile where watered, but otherwise consisting mostly of sand. Lat. between 28° 40′ and 33° 20′ N. Lon. between 69° 30′ and 71° 20′ E.

DAMANHOUR, da-man-hoor', a town of Lower Egypt, 38 miles from Alexandria. It has both cotton and woollen manufactories.

DAMAR, da-mar', a town of Arabia, 120 miles N.W. of Aden. There is a large college, and the town is the residence of a governor. Pop. about 20,000.

DAMARAN, or DUMARAN, da-ma-ran', one of the Philippine Islands.

DAMARAS, da-mar'-as, a country comprising wide plains and grassy slopes, situate at the foot of mountains with an elevation of 1,000 feet, in S.W. Africa. It abounds with lions, rhinoceroses, and zebras, and is peopled by two distinct nations—the Damaras of the hills and the Damaras of the plains. It abounds with copper, of which the natives make rings. Lat. between 21° and 24° S.

DAMASCENUS, JOANNES, da-mas-sē'-nus, a learned monk of Jerusalem, famous for eloquence, and author of the standard text-book of dogmatic theology used by the Greek church. He was canonized both by the Greek and Latin churches.

Born at Damascus, 700; died 756.

DAMASCIUS, da-mas'-se-us, a philosopher who taught the Neo-Platonic philosophy, at Alexandria and Athens, until the schools at the latter place were closed by the Emperor Justinian. He then went to Persia, where he remained several years, but afterwards returned to the West.

Lived in the 6th century.

DAMASCUS, da-mas'-kus, the capital of a pashalic of the same name in Syria, the largest and most beautiful town in Asiatic Turkey, and probably the oldest city in the world, is situate in a fertile plain amidst extensive gardens, watered by the Barada and Avraj, the Abana and Pharphar of Scripture, at the eastern base of the range of Anti-Libanus, 54 miles S.E. of its port of Beyrout. The streets are in general narrow, of regular width, though not in straight lines; they are well paved, and have elevated footpaths on each side. The town is partly surrounded by old walls, which are in a very ruinous condition. Damascus contains many large and magnificent houses, with very mean exteriors, but having beautiful courts, gardens, and fountains, and luxuriously furnished. In the poorer parts of the town, the houses are mean and wretchedly dirty. The number of mosques and chapels is very great. The great mosque, originally a heathen temple, was afterwards a Christian church, and the cathedral of Damascus. It is built in various styles of architecture, with beautiful columns and tesselated marble pavements, and occupying a quadrangle 490 feet by 324 feet. There are three monasteries of the Latin church. The mosques are mostly fronted by a court. There are Greek, Maronite, Syrian, and Armenian churches, and several synagogues. The castle, situated towards the S.W. part of the city, and about three quarters of a mile in circuit, is a fine edifice, with three square towers in front, and five on each side, The great khan is a fine building of black and white marble. "Straight street," mentioned in the "Acts of the Apostles," still exists, and is the principal street of the city, and is now known as "the street of bazaars." Damascus is the seat of a tribunal of commerce, and has a considerable trade.

Manf.—Formerly it was celebrated for the manufacture of sabres, of such peculiar quality as to be perfectly elastic, but these are no longer made, as silk, cottons, jewellery, and saddlery, for the making of which this city had once a great reputation, are now only produced in small quantities. Commerce is carried on chiefly by caravans, of which the principal is that which takes place annually with the pilgrims to Mecca; but the number of pilgrims has greatly diminished of late years, more convenient routes being available.

Pop. —200,000 (including the adjacent village of Salahiyeh), of whom about 15,000 are Christians, and 5,000 Jews, the great majority being of the Mahometan faith.

History.—Damascus is a place of great antiquity, and is alluded to in the days of Abraham. In 632 it fell before the Saracens, in 1516 was captured by the Turks, and in 1832 by Ibrahim Pacha, but was restored to Turkey in 1840. At the time of the great outbreak of the Druses, in 1860, the city was attacked by them, about 6,000 houses in the Christian quarter destroyed, and nearly 5,000 persons killed, besides other atrocities being committed.

DAMASCUS, PASHALIC of, comprises that portion of country which lies between the Euphrates and Lebanon. It is divided into twenty districts. Pop. About 520,000. Lat. between 31° and 36° N. Lon. between 35° and 41° E. (See SYRIA.)

DAMASUS I., POPE, dam′-a-sus, was a native of Portugal, and rose to the pontifical chair in 366. He laboured to reform the morals of his time, and extend the discipline of the church. The Arians were opposed by him in several councils. He was a friend of Jerome, whom he employed as secretary, and induced to undertake the translation of the Scriptures. He was the author of several epistles addressed to the bishops of the church, and of some short poems.

Born 304; died 384.

DAMBOOL, or DAMBOLO, dam′-bool, a village of Ceylon, 45 miles N.W. of Kandy, remarkable for the Buddhist cave-temples, with colossal statues.

DAMER, HON. ANN SEYMOUR, dai′-mer, sculptor, daughter of Marshal Conway. She married when young, the Hon. John Damer, brother of the Earl of Dorchester, a dissipated young man, who committed suicide in a tavern. She studied sculpture, and among other works produced a bust of Nelson, now in the Guildhall, London. Horace Walpole greatly admired her, and at his death left her his house at Strawberry Hill.

Born 1748; died 1828.

DAMIEN, ROBERT FRANÇOIS, da′-me-ong, a man of disreputable character, who on the 15th of January, 1757, attempted to assassinate Louis XV. of France, by stabbing him as he was entering his carriage. Damien was executed with the most horrible tortures that can be imagined. His hand was burned in a slow fire, his flesh was torn with pincers, he was dragged by strong horses, and molten lead, resin, oil, and wax poured into his wounds. His remains were burned, his immediate relations banished from France, and others compelled to change their names.

Born near Arras, 1714; died at Paris, 1757.

DAMIETTA. da′-me-et′-ta, a city of Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the E. branch of the Nile, about eight miles above where it falls into the Mediterranean Sea. It is situate on a narrow neck of land, from two to six miles in breadth, interposed between the Nile and the lake Menzaleh. The houses are white, built in the form of a crescent along the right bank of the river, and most of them with pleasant saloons on their terraced roofs, commanding a delightful view of the river, the lake, and rich country intervening. The chief disadvantage of Damietta lies in the want of a harbour, a bar at the mouth of the river preventing any but small vessels reaching the town. At one time there was a considerable commerce, but rice and fish are now the chief articles of trade. The well-known fabric "dimity" takes its name from this town where it was first manufactured. Pop. 34,046. Lat. 31° 25′ N. Lon. 31° 49′ E. The country round Damietta is perhaps the most fertile in Egypt, being carefully improved by irrigation, and producing rice of an extremely fine quality.

DAMIETTA, OLD, lies about 4 miles to the N. of the above city, and was repeatedly taken by the Christians during the Crusades. Its remains now, however, are nearly extinguished. The present town was founded in the middle of the 13th century.

DAMM, ALT, or OLD, dam, a fortified town of Prussia, at the mouth of the Plöne, on Lake Damm. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. There are three annual fairs. Pop. 2,400.

DAMME, an island in the Indian Archipelago. It is about 12 miles square, mountainous, with a lofty active volcano, and most luxuriant vegetation. Kulewatte Bay, a deep and spacious inlet, is on the east side. Lat. 7° 10′ S. Lon. 128° 40′ E.

DAMMER ISLAND, a small group in the Indian Archipelago. Lat. 1° S. Lon. 128° 15′ E.

DAMMUDAH, or DUMMODAH, dam-moo-da′, a river of India, rising in the British district of Ramguhr, in the Bengal presidency, and, after a course of 350 miles, falling into the Hooghly in Lat. 22° 13′ N. Lon. 88° 7′ E.—The valley of this river abounds with iron and coal, and is to be traversed by the Calcutta Railway.

DAMOCLES, dam′-o-klees, a flatterer of Dionysius the tyrant, whom he pronounced the happiest man on earth. This prince, in order to convince him of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed, invited him to a banquet, and caused him to be arrayed and treated as a monarch. During the entertainment, a sword was suspended from the ceiling, over the head of Damocles, by a single horsehair; and thus was typified the happiness of a tyrant, of which Damocles afterwards entertained a clearer conception.

DAMOO, da-moo′, a town in Thibet, in the neighbourhood of which it is said there are rich gold mines worked by the natives. Lat. 31° 26′ N. Lon. 79° 53′ E.

DAMON and PYTHIAS, or PHINTIAS, dai'-mon, py'the-as, two Pythagorean philosophers of Syracuse, rendered memorable by their friendship. Dionysius the tyrant having condemned Pythias (or Phintias) to death, permission was granted him to return to his native place, in order to settle his affairs, Damon remaining in his stead. The hour fixed for the execution arrived, and Damon was about to suffer the punishment; but Pythias returned in time, and a generous contest ensued between them as to who should be the victim. Dionysius was so touched by this faithful friendship, that he pardoned Pythias, and asked to be admitted as a third friend. Some versions of the story reverse the names, making it Damon who was condemned to death, and Pythias who was about to suffer in his stead.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

DAMPIER, WILLIAM, dam'-peer, an English navigator, who was early sent to sea, and first sailed in a Bristol privateer. After cruising a considerable time on the American coast, and taking several prizes, principally from the Spaniards, Dampier went aboard another buccaneering ship. Not meeting with success, he sailed for the East Indies, where he left the vessel, and proceeded to the English factory at Achem. Afterwards he became gunner to the factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he embarked for England, and arrived there the same year, when he published his "Voyage round the World," which was well received by the public. He had now made himself known, and was sent out on a voyage of discovery to the South Seas. In this expedition he explored the north and north-west coasts of Australia, New Guinea, New Britain, and New Ireland; but, on his return home, was wrecked on Ascension Island. In 1701, however, he arrived in England, and published an account of his voyage. He continued to follow the sea till 1711, when his life is lost in obscurity.

Born in Somersetshire, 1652.

DAMPIER ARCHIPELAGO, a group of islands lying off the N.W. coast of Australia. It comprises Enderby, Legendre, Lewis, Depuch, Rosemary, and several smaller islands. Lat. 21° S. Lon. between 116° and 117° E.

DAMPIER STRAIT, between the north-western extremity of New Guinea and the island of Waygiou, almost immediately under the equator, and Lon. 131° E. The strait is 35 miles wide.

DAMPIER'S BAY, or SHARK'S BAY, a spacious inlet on the W. coast of Australia, about 25 miles wide and 150 long. It was named after Dampier the navigator.

DAMUGGO, da-mug-go', a large town of Guinea, Africa, on the left bank of the Niger. It consists chiefly of circular mud huts. The population is large. Lat. 7° N. Lon. 7° 50' E.

DAN, dan, "judgment," the son of Jacob, by Bilhah, the servant of Rachel, and the father of the warlike tribe of Dan, one of the twelve tribes of Israel, whose portion was on the coast of the Mediterranean, bounded on the N. by Joppa, and on the S. by Ascalon.

DAN, an ancient city of Palestine, situate at the N. extremity of the "Promised Land," 140 miles from Beersheba, which was the south limit.

DANA, RICHARD HENRY, dai'-na, an American writer, who was educated at Harvard College, Massachusetts, with a view to his following the legal profession. Delicacy of health, however, forced him to quit his legal studies, when he applied himself to the more congenial pursuits of literature and politics. In 1817 he became a contributor to the "North American Review," and from the attractive character of his articles, was introduced to a share in its management. This continued till 1820, when his connection with that periodical ceased. He now started the "Idle Man," which lived only through one volume, and in which his "Tom Thornton" appeared. In 1825 he wrote his poem of "The Dying Raven," which appeared in the "New York Review;" and in 1827 he published his "Buccaneer," and other poems. In 1833 he published a collection of his poems and prose writings, and another edition in 1850. Mr. Dana, however, has principally confined himself to miscellaneous writing, and to occasional lecturing on poetry. His popularity with his countrymen is widely extended.

Born at Cambridge, near Boston, 1787; died 1879.

DANA, RICHARD HENRY, son of the above, having injured his health by study at college, entered himself as a common sailor on board a vessel trading to the west coast of South America. He recovered his strength, and on his return published, in 1840, "Two Years before the Mast," which became a very popular work. He afterwards achieved a considerable reputation in politics and literature, and in 1876 was nominated minister to England, but a violent party opposition was got up, and the President rescinded the appointment.

Born 1815.

DANAE, dan'-ai-e, in Greek legend, the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, was confined in a brazen tower by her father, to whom it had been predicted by an oracle that he would be slain by his daughter's son. Jupiter, however, introduced himself into the tower in the guise of a golden shower. Perseus was the offspring of their union, and he, together with his mother, was exposed to the fury of the waves by Acrisius. He was saved, however, became a famous hero, and ultimately killed his grandfather.

DANAIDES, da-nai'-a-dees, in Greek legend, the fifty daughters of Danaus, king of Argos. Ægyptus, king of Egypt, their uncle, who had fifty sons, wished them to be married to their cousins; but Danaus was averse to this, as he had been informed by an oracle that he would be killed by one of his sons-in-law. Ægyptus, however, sent his sons to Argos at the head of a powerful army; and Danaus, unable to resist, consented to the marriage; but his daughters promised that they would destroy their husbands on the night of their nuptials. They executed their horrible purpose, Hypermnestra alone sparing her husband, Lynceus. In order to punish these cruel wives, Jupiter cast them into Tartarus, and condemned them to be eternally filling with water a vessel full of holes.

DANAUS, dan'-a-us, according to Greek legend, son of Belus, reigned, conjointly with his brother Ægyptus, on the throne of Libya. Having, however, attempted the life of his brother, he was forced to fly, and arrived at Argos about the 16th century B.C. There the king, Gelanor, received him hospitably; but Danaus recompensed his kindness by usurping his throne, although others say Gelanor abdicated in his favour. However this may be, the dynasty of the Belides commenced with Danaus. Fable gave to this monarch fifty daughters. (See DANAIDES.) He was succeeded by Lynceus.

DANBURY, dăn'-ber-re, a town of Fairfield county, Connecticut, United States, 33 miles from New Haven. Pop. 11,666.

DANBY, FRANCIS, A.R.A., dan'-be, a modern painter, who received his earliest lessons in design at the Society of Arts in Dublin. After acquiring some distinction in that city, he, in 1820, removed to England, and took up his residence at Bristol, whence he sent his pictures annually to the exhibition of the Royal Academy, but with little success till 1824, when his "Sunset at Sea after a Storm" attracted considerable notice. This picture was purchased by Sir Thomas Lawrence. The following year he sent his "Delivery of Israel out of Egypt," which was highly thought of, and he became an associate of the Academy. He now worked hard, and exhibited several pictures, which increased his reputation. In 1829, on account of some domestic affairs, he left England, and was absent for twelve years, when he returned, and began to exhibit again. He had now attained the summit of his art, and continued to produce a great many first-class paintings. Among these may be named his "Morning at Rhodes," "The Enchanted Island," "The Deluge," "A Holy Family," "Caius Marius amid the Ruins of Carthage," "The Departure of Ulysses from Ithaca," and "A Wild Seashore at Sunset."

Born near Wexford, in Ireland, 1793; died at Exmouth, 1861.

DANCE, GEORGE, JUN., dance, an eminent architect, whose first work was the prison of Newgate, begun by him in 1770. He also designed St. Luke's Hospital and the front of Guildhall. He was also the architect of the British Institution, formerly the Shakspeare Gallery, Pall Mall, and the theatre at Bath. He held the appointment of city surveyor till 1816, when he resigned in favour of Mr. W. Montague, a pupil of his own. He was buried near Wren and Rennie in St. Paul's.

Born in London, 1740; died 1825.

DANCER, DANIEL, dan'-ser, an extraordinary English miser, who, in 1736, succeeded to a considerable estate. Notwithstanding this, he led the life of a hermit for more than half a century. His only dealing with mankind arose from the sale of his hay; and he was seldom seen, except when gathering logs of wood from the common, or old iron or sheep's dung under the hedges. He was frequently robbed, and therefore fastened the door of his house, and got in at the upper window, making use of a ladder, which he drew up after him. His sister, who lived with him many years, left him, at her death, a considerable increase to his wealth; and, on this occasion, he bought a second-hand pair of black stockings to put himself in decent mourning. This was an article of luxury, for, at other times, Daniel wore haybands on his legs. He left his estates to Lady Tempest, who had been very charitable to both him and his sister, and from whom he habitually accepted cold meat and broken victuals, which he warmed up by putting them between two plates, and lying on them in bed until they were warm, to save the expense of firing.

Born near Harrow, in Middlesex, 1716; died 1794.

DANDOLO, ENRICO, dan'-do-lo, doge of Venice, to which office he was elected in 1192, being then 84 years old. He raised the Venetian republic to a considerable height by the vigour and wisdom of his government. In 1201 he engaged in the crusade, and conquered Zara, which had revolted against the Venetians. In 1203, though nearly 90 years of age, he greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Constantinople, which he took by storm. He was afterwards formally invested with the title of Despot of Romania, and obtained for Venice some of the islands in the Ionian Sea, a portion of Constantinople, the island of Candia, and other valuable possessions. He was buried in the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, but his monument was destroyed by the Turks in 1453.

Born 1115; died at Constantinople, 1205.

DANDOLO, ANDREA, doge of Venice, extended the commerce of the republic by a union with Egypt, which produced a war between the Venetians and the Genoese, which lasted several years. He was a man of letters, wrote a "History of Venice," and corresponded with Petrarch.

Born about 1310; died 1354.

DANE, dain, a county of Wisconsin, United States. It is fertile, and producing Indian corn, wheat, and oats. Area, 1,235 square miles. Pop. 54,000. The capital is Madison.

DANGEAU, PHILIPPE DE COURCILLON, Marquis de, dan'jo, French soldier, diplomatist, and diarist. He distinguished himself in the first capacity in Flanders, was elected a member of the Académie Française in 1668, was afterwards employed in diplomacy, held various offices in the court of Louis XIV., and was appointed grand-master of the royal and military orders of Notre Dame du Mont Carmel and Saint Lazare of Jerusalem. He was an able linguist, and a pleasing writer of verses; but is best known in literature by his "Journal," published many years after his death, which contains a daily record of events connected with the French court, for nearly 25 years.

Born 1638; died 1720.

DANGEROUS ARCHIPELAGO, a group in the Pacific. They are about 80 in number, of coral formation, generally circular, with very deep central lagoons. Lat. 21° S. Lon. 140° W.

DANIEL, dan'-yel, "judge of God," the fourth of the greater prophets, was of the blood royal of Judah, and was, in his infancy, carried captive to Babylon 606 B.C. He was brought up at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, subsequently becoming governor of Babylon, and in the reign of Belshazzar explained the famous writing upon the wall, when the event confirmed the truth of his prediction. Darius made him his prime minister; but the courtiers, out of envy, contrived to have him thrown into a den of lions for refusing to pay divine honours to Darius. He escaped the beasts by a miracle, and regained the favour of his master. His prophecies are written partly in Hebrew and partly in Chaldee. They announce the coming of the Messiah, and the revolution of the four empires. It is supposed that he died at an advanced age at Susa, in Persia, and a tomb among the ruins of that city is supposed to be that of the prophet.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

DANIEL, SAMUEL, an English poet and historian, the son of a music-master, and educated at Oxford. He became master of the revels and groom of the privy chamber to the queen of James I. At the close of his life he retired to a farm in his native county, where he died. His poems are now esteemed of little merit. The principal consists of an heroic poem in six books, on the wars of York and Lancaster, "Musophilus;" a tragedy of "Cleopatra," and the "Complaint of Rosamond." Besides these, are several masques, sonnets, odes, and epistles. He also wrote the "History of England to the End of the Reign of Edward III.," which, according to some authors, is the best of all his works.

Born near Taunton, Somersetshire, 1562; died at Beckington, in the same county, 1619.

DANIEL, GABRIEL, da'-ne-el, a French historian, who entered among the Jesuits at the age of eighteen, and became historiographer of France under Louis XIV., who gave him a pension of 2,000 francs. One of his first productions was a satirical "Voyage to the World of Descartes," which has been translated into several languages. His greatest performance, however, is "The History of France," published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713, but afterwards enlarged to 7 vols. 4to, 1722. This work is rather a history of the kings than of the people, is feeble in style, and full of inaccuracies. He also wrote several miscellaneous and theological treatises.

Born at Rouen, 1649; died at Paris, 1728.

DANIELE, SAN, dan-e-a'-le, a town of Italy, province of Udine, 12 miles N.W. of the town of that name. It is surrounded by walls, and has a castle. A trade in grain is carried on. Pop. 3,600. The Austrians were defeated here by the French in 1809.

DANIELL, JOHN FREDERICK, a distinguished chemist and meteorologist, who commenced life as a sugar-refiner, but, becoming acquainted with Professor Brande, they, together, started the "Quarterly Journal of Science and Art," and superintended the first twenty volumes of that serial. In 1820 he published an account of his new hydrometer, an instrument which has been of immense service to meteorology. In 1823 his "Meteorological Essays" appeared, and raised him still higher in the rank of men of science. His "Essay on Artificial Climates" appeared in 1824, and in 1831, on the establishment of King's College, he was made professor of chemistry. About this time a description of his new pyrometer was given to the world, and for the invention of this instrument the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal. In 1837 he received the Copley medal for discovering a mode by which a continuous current of voltaic electricity may be maintained, and in 1842 he received one of the Royal medals for a paper on the theory of salts. He was the only person who ever obtained all the three medals in the gift of the Royal Society. In 1843 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L., and in the same year a second edition of an "Introduction to Chemical Philosophy" appeared. With his professorship, he held other important appointments, and was, for thirty years, a member of the Royal Society. Besides the above, he wrote a great many treatises upon the subjects of his favourite studies.

Born in London, 1790; died 1845.

DANILOW, dan'-i-lof, a town of Russia, on the Pelenda, 41 miles N. of Garoslav. Manf. Wax and tallow candles; and there are dyeworks. An annual fair is held. Pop. 3,200.

DANKALI, KINGDOM OF, dan-ka-le', an independent state in Africa, bounded by the Red Sea on the N.E., and on the S.W. by a range of mountains. It is 250 miles long, by 56 broad, unfertile and ill-watered, and inhabited by a treacherous race of a barbarous disposition. Its climate is very hot. Pop. about 70,000. Lat. 13° to 15° 30′ N.

DANNECKER, JOHANN HEINRICH VON, dan'-na-ker, German sculptor. His parents were very poor, but he received a good education. At the age of 22 he obtained a prize for sculpture, and afterwards studied at Paris and Rome. In 1790 he was appointed professor of sculpture in the Academy at Stuttgart. His works are remarkable for beauty and delicacy, and in portrait busts he was almost unrivalled.

Born at Waldenbuch, 1758; died at Stuttgart, 1841.

DANNEMORA, a village of Sweden, on a lake of the same name, 24 miles N.E. of Upsala. The place is celebrated for its iron-mines, the second richest in Sweden, and which produce the finest iron in the world. They have been worked for more than three hundred years, and the annual yield of ore is now about 25,000 tons yearly.

DANNENBERG, a town of Prussia, in Hanover, on the Jetze, 32 miles S.E. of Luneberg. There is an old Gothic church. Manf. Linen, tobacco, beer, and spirits. There are eight annual fairs. Pop. 1,700.

DANNOWITZ, UNTER, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, 23 miles S. of Brünn. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,600.

DANTAN, JEAN PIERRE, dan'-ta, a French sculptor, whose father followed the same profession, and in whose studio he first imbibed the principles of his art. He subsequently studied under Bosio, and, when he first essayed on his own account, produced several bust and portrait studies, which excited considerable admiration, and, at once, brought him prominently into notice. His genius, however, led him into the study of caricature, when, about 1832, he captivated the humorous inclinations of the Parisians by a series of grotesque statuettes, which he called "Charges," of the principal celebrities of the capital.

Born 1800; died 1869.

DANTE, or DURANTE, ALIGHIERI, dan'-tai, the most d s'inguished of Italian poets, who, in early life, served his country both as a soldier and a politician. He fought in the battle of Campaldino in 1289, and was present at the taking of Capraona, in the following year. He became one of the priori, or chief magistrates, of his native city of Florence about 1300, when the two factions of the Bianchi and the Neri were at their height. The Neri (or "black") were the adherents of the pope, the Bianchi (or "white") leaned to the Ghibelline, or emperor's faction. The heads of the Neri, or Guelphs were for a time expelled from Florence, and went to Rome to ask the assistance of Pope Boniface VIII., and Dante, who had joined the Bianchi party, was sent after them to watch their movements. The pope sent Charles of Valois to Florence to settle matters, which he did by recalling the Neri and punishing their opponents. Dante, falling with his party, was banished, and his property confiscated. For many years he was doomed to bear the sorrows of an exile. At length he was taken under the protection of Guido da Polentia, lord of Ravenna, under whose roof he passed the remainder of his days. It was during his exile that Dante wrote his great poem, of world-wide fame, "La Divina Commedia." It comprises three poems, or distinct acts—Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. The poet, describing the fate of souls after "shuffling off their mortal coil," places in Hell and Purgatory all those who were remarkable, either for their crimes or vices (especially those who were the authors of his misfortune), and in Paradise, those who have done good deeds on earth. He is supposed, in company with Virgil, to descend to the infernal regions, and there describe the various punishments of sinners, whilst Beatrice leads him through the delights of Paradise. Beatrice was the daughter of a rich citizen of Florence named Portinace, and when she and Dante were children he conceived an extraordinary attachment for her which animated him throughout a long life, and found an exquisitely pure and tender expression in his first poetical work, the "Vita Nuova," or "new life," published when he was thirty-five years of age, and ten years after the death of Beatrice, who had married a nobleman. Dante himself afterwards married Gemam, one of the Donati family. The "Divina Commedia" is one of the most sublime productions which have ever emanated from the genius of man, although many passages are full of extravagances, and others, from their peculiar allusions, are very obscure. "La Commedia" (the name given by Dante himself, the adjective "Divina" being added by his admirers) was the first long poem written in the Italian language; before it, the Latin tongue was always employed. This poem has found in all countries a host of editors, commentators, and translators. Dante also wrote some works in Latin, particularly one on monarchy, and another, "De Vulgari Eloquentiâ." A monument was erected to his memory in the church of Santa Croce, in Florence, and opened to public view on the 24th of March, 1830. This tardy justice to the memory of a great poet, by his countrymen, may have been stimulated by the reproving lines of Byron, in the 4th canto of "Childe Harold," beginning—"Ungrateful Florence! Dante sleeps afar!"

Born at Florence, 1265; died at Venice, 1321.

DANTON, GEORGE JACQUES, dan'-tawng, a leading demagogue in the French revolution. He was a lawyer, but his fierce temper and dissolute habits did not conduce to great professional success. Mirabeau introduced him to public life, and with Marat and Camille Desmoulins, he instituted the Cordeliers Club. After the flight of the king, Danton became one of the most prominent and violent of the revolutionary leaders. He displayed extraordinary talents in the National Convention, and was a powerful speaker. For a time his influence was paramount, and he instigated and approved the most terrible events of the Revolution. He was the most powerful rival of Robespierre, who supplanted him, and he died under the guillotine.

Born at Arcis-sur-Aube, 1759; died 1794.

DANTZIC, or DANZIG, dant'-zik (Pruss. dant'-zeesh), a district in the province of Prussia, bounded on the N. by the Baltic, S. by Marienwerder, E. by Konigsberg, and W. by Kustrin. In general level and fertile, and corn, flax, and tobacco, are grown, and horses, cattle, and swine bred. Its principal river is the Vistula, and it has several lakes. Pop. 525,500. (See PRUSSIA.)

DANTZIC, or DANZIG, a city and seaport of Prussia, the capital of the above district, on the left bank of the western branch of the Vistula, about 4 miles from its mouth. The town is strongly fortified, and traversed by two small rivers, the Motlau and Radaune, which unite and fall into the Vistula. It is surrounded by ramparts, lined with cannon, and may be considered as well defended. The principal public buildings are the cathedral (a noble building, erected in the 14th and 15th centuries), two other churches, the ancient town-hall, recently restored, the old Gothic exchange, the arsenal, a school of navigation, a house of industry, a gymnasium, a museum, an observatory, &c. Besides these, there are chapels, charitable institutions, and several monasteries and nunneries. Vessels of moderate draught can reach the town, by the Motlau, but the chief port is at Neufahrwasser, at the mouth of the Vistula. Dantzic is one of the chief commercial cities in Europe, the exports of grain and timber are immense, and there are enormous granaries on an island in the river.

Manf.—Jewellery, silks, firearms, tobacco, and vitriol. It has large distilleries and breweries, sugar-refineries, lye-works, and flour-mills.

Exp.—Besides grain and timber, amber, biscuit, flour, ashes, bones, flax, hemp, spirits, black beer, and wool.

Pop.—108,551.

Lat. 54° 21′ N. Lon. 18° 40′ E.

History.—Known in the 10th century as the capital of Pomerania, it passed with that province, in 1202, under the authority of Poland; but, in 1308, Ladislaus IV. ceded the whole to the Teutonic knights, who held it till 1454. In that year it was again seized by the Poles; and, in 1575, having refused to acknowledge Stephen Bathory, it had to sustain a siege by that monarch, and was taken in 1577. From 1360 to 1641 it was one of the principal towns in the Hanseatic league. When this league was dissolved, Dantzic joined Lubeck, Hamburg, and Bremen; and these four cities, down to a very late period, retained their name of Hanse towns. In 1734 it was forced to surrender to the Russians and Saxons, who were then besieging Stanislaus of Poland. In 1793 it was occupied by the Prussians. It was taken by the French in May, 1807, after a long siege, by Marshal Lefebre, who thence acquired his title of duke of Dantzic. After Bonaparte's disastrous campaign in Russia, it was blockaded and obliged to surrender, after a long and able defence by General Rapp. At the peace of Paris, in 1814, it reverted to Prussia. In April, 1829, 4,000 houses were destroyed, many lives lost, and 10,000 head of cattle perished, in consequence of the Vistula bursting its dykes.

DANTZIC, GULF OF, an inlet of the Baltic, 60 miles wide at its entrance. On it are the towns of Hela, Pillau, and Putzig.

DANUBE, dan'-ube (German, DONAU, don'-ou), the second largest river of Europe, being next to the Volga, is formed by the union of the mountain streams, the Brege and Brigach, rising in the eastern part of the Black Forest, in Baden, at nearly 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. After receiving in Suabia a number of small streams, it takes a N.E. direction, becomes navigable at Ulm, and throughout the remainder of its course, its waters are increased by the junction of the Iller, Lech, Iser, Inn, Ens, Raab, Save, Drave, Isker, Morava, Vid, and Jantra. Altogether it receives 60 navigable rivers. The scenery on the banks is generally very picturesque, and near the mouth there are many beautiful islands. The river is estimated to drain an area of 269,000 square miles, and after a course of 2,400 miles, including windings, it enters the Black Sea by several mouths. The principal of these are the Sulina, Kilia, and St. George. The latter, which are to the S., were, by the treaty of Adrianople, the boundary between Russia and Turkey. After, however, the war of 1854-6, the Russians had to retire altogether from the banks of this river, the navigation of which, together with the care of its mouths, was to be under the authority of Austria, England, France, and Turkey.

DANUBE, the UPPER and LOWER CIRCLES of the, two former circles of Bavaria, now called Lower Bavaria and Suabia.

DANUBE, CIRCLE of the, one of the four circles of Wurtemberg, watered by the Danube and some of its affluents. Area, 1,760 geographical square miles. Pop. 467,835.

DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES, da-mu'-be-an, the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia, in Europe. United area, 44,500 square miles. United pop. 3,677,000. These provinces were, in July, 1853, invaded by the Russians, when the hospodars, or appointed governors of each, transferred their governmental powers into the hands of an extraordinary council of administration. In the following November, the emperor of Russia, who hitherto, in conjunction with the sultan of Turkey, had the power of nominating the hospodars, appointed Baron de Budberg to the government of both principalities. The occupation of these, with this assumption of the sovereign power by the Czar, led to the war between Turkey, England, and France, united against Russia. This war was terminated in

1856, and the final organization of the Danubian principalities was settled by a conference held at Paris in that year. (See ROUMANIA, MOLDAVIA, and WALLACHIA.)

DAOUDNUGUR, da-oud-nu-gar', a town of Bahar, presidency of Bengal, British India, 90 miles E. of Benares. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics. Pop. 10,000.—The town was founded by Daoud Khan in the middle of the 16th century.

DAOURIA, da-oor'-e-a, a country of Asia, comprising a part of Mantchooria, and of the Russian government of Irkutsk. Its mountains of the same name are rich in metals. The limits of the country are not defined.

DAPHNE, daf'-ne, a daughter of the river Peneus, or of the Lador, and beloved by Apollo during his exile upon earth. The god, pursuing the nymph, overtook her on the banks of the Peneus, and here Daphne, imploring the succour of the gods, was changed into a laurel. Apollo, in despair, crowned himself with its leaves, and ordered that this tree should be sacred to his divinity, and be the reward of poets.

DAPHNE, a grove and sanctuary near Antioch, where was a temple of Apollo and Diana, in the midst of beautiful gardens, resorted to for purposes of the grossest debauchery. The grove and temple were founded by Seleucus Nicator, in the 4th century B.C. They were destroyed by fire about 362 A.D.

DAPHNIS, daf'-nis, a shepherd of Sicily, who was, according to Greek legend, the son of Mercury and a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the Nymphs, and is supposed to be the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled.

DARABJERD, or DARAB, da-rab-jird', a town of Persia, in the province of Faristan. A considerable portion of it is in ruins. The vicinity is famous for the growth of tobacco, of a mild quality and much esteemed. Near the town are some remarkable excavations and sculptured rocks of great antiquity. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 29° N. Lon. 54° 30′ E.

DARAPORAM, dai-ra-po-ram', a large town of British India, 132 miles S.E. of Seringapatam. The houses are chiefly built of earth and roofed with thatch. Rice and tobacco are grown in the neighbourhood. Lat. 10° 37′ N. Lon. 77° 35′ E.

D'ARBLAY, MADAME, dar'-blai, better known by her maiden name, Fanny Burney, was the daughter of Charles Burney, the author of the "History of Music." (See BURNEY.) When very young she published anonymously her novel "Evelina," which at once achieved an immense success. She acknowledged the authorship, and became a literary celebrity, Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale being her intimate friends. Queen Charlotte noticed her, and appointed her to the very uncongenial post of personal attendant, in which she passed several wretched years, until her failing health rendered it necessary to relinquish the ceremonious drudgery in which she was employed. In 1793 she married a French emigrant artillery officer, with whom she afterwards went to France, and who, on the restoration of the Bourbons, attained the rank of general. After the termination of the war, they returned to England, and settled at Bath, where her husband died in 1818. She continued to reside at Bath up to the time of her death. She produced four novels, "Evelina," "Cecilia," "Camilla," and the "Wanderer." For this last she received £1,500, although it is but an indifferent performance. She wrote several other works, among which were Memoirs of her father, which in 1832 she published in 3 vols. For more ample particulars of her life Macaulay's clever essay should be read.

Born at Lynn Regis, 1752; died at Bath, 1840.

DARCET, JOHN, dar'-sai, a French chemist and physician, who became professor of chemistry in the National Institute of Paris. He published several papers on the management of potteries, and the nature of earths fit to be used in those manufactories. He also gave analyses of several minerals; and published the "State of the Pyrenees, and the Causes of their Wasting."

Born at Donazit, Guienne, 1725; died at Paris, 1801.

DARCI, PATRICK, dar'-se, an eminent Irish engineer, who was educated at Paris, and, entering the French service, progressively rose through various ranks to a major-generalship. In 1760 he published an "Essay on Artillery." In 1765 appeared his "Memoir on the Duration of the Sensation of Sight," which is considered an ingenious performance. He also produced several meritorious mathematical works.

Born in Galway, Ireland, 1725; died 1779.

DARDANELLES, or HELLESPONT, dar'-da-nells, a narrow channel extending from S.E. to S.W., separating Europe from Asia, and connecting the Sea of Marmora and the Grecian archipelago. It is 40 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 4 miles. On the European side the coast is steep and rugged, but on the Asiatic the scenery is extremely beautiful. On both sides are numerous forts, batteries, and several castles, as it is the key to Constantinople. Its ancient name, Hellespont, is derived from Helle, daughter of Alhamas, king of Thebes, who was drowned in it. Two castles built by Mahomet IV. in 1658, on its banks, at its S.W. entrance, mark the site of Lestos, on the European side and Abydos on the Asiatic. It is celebrated in ancient history and legend as the water which Xerxes and Alexander crossed, and in which Leander was drowned when swimming to visit Hero. It has been crossed in modern times by several swimmers, among whom was Lord Byron. In 1807, the English fleet, under admiral Duckworth, forced the passage of the Dardanelles.

DARDANUS, dar'-da-nus, in Greek legend a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. After the death of his father-in-law he ascended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy. From him the Trojans are called by the poets Dardanidæ, and he it was who caused to be erected the Palladium, the great statue of Pallas, the idol of the Trojans.

DARES, dair'-es, a Phrygian, who lived during the Trojan war, in which he was engaged, and of which, it is said, he wrote the history in Greek. This work was extant in the age of Ælian.

DARFUR, or DAR-EL-FUR, dar'-foor, a country of Central Africa, occupying a large extent of territory, which is little known. On the E. it has Kordofan and the country of the Shilluks, which separate it from Sennaar and Abyssinia; on the W., Bergoo, which divides it from Begharmi and Bornou; while the regions to the S. are inhabited by barbarous nations. Its commerce is extensive with Egypt and Nubia, being carried on entirely by the African system of caravans. The most important exports are slaves, male and female, taken in the negro countries to the S.; camels, ivory, the horns, teeth, and hides of the rhinoceros and hippopotamus; ostrich feathers, gum, pimento, parroquets in abundance, and a small quantity of white copper. The capital, and point of departure for the caravans is Kobbe. Pop. estimated at 200,000, nominally Mahometans. Lat. between 11° and 15° N. Lon. between 26° and 29° E.—Darfur was annexed to Egypt in 1864.

DARGAN, WILLIAM, dar'-gan, Irish industrial improver. He was the son of a farmer in Carlow, and having adopted the profession of surveyor, was employed in England under Telford. He afterwards took contracts in Ireland, constructed the Dublin and Kingstown and other railways, canals, and other great works. He achieved great wealth, and planned the Dublin Industrial Exhibition of 1853, by which he lost £20,000, which he had advanced. He was offered, but declined, the honour of knighthood.

Born in Carlow, 1799; died 1867.

DARIEN, dair'-e-en, a seaport town of Georgia, U.S., on the N. and principal channel of the Altamaha, 60 miles from Savannah. It has a trade in cotton.

DARIEN, GULF OF, the most southerly portion of the Caribbean Sea, having on its W. side the Isthmus of Darien or Panama. Its extent is 26 leagues from S. to N., and it is 9 wide from E. to W.

DARIEN, or PANAMA, ISTHMUS OF. (See PANAMA.)

DARIUS, or DAREIUS, da-ri'-us, the name, or title, borne by several monarchs of Persia.

DARIUS THE MEDE, the prince mentioned in the Scriptures, is, according to some, the same as Cyaxares, son of Astyages, and maternal uncle to Cyrus.

Died at Babylon, about 548 B.C.

DARIUS I., king of Persia, was the son of Hystaspes. He entered into a conspiracy with six others against the usurper Smerdis, whom they slew, and then entered into an agreement that he should have the crown whose horse should neigh first in the morning. By a plan concerted with the groom of Darius, a certain spot was fixed upon, and when the candidates came to the place, the horse of Darius suddenly neighed, in consequence of which he was saluted king, 521 B.C. He subsequently took Babylon, after a siege of ten months, rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem and restored the captive Jews to their own country. In 513, he crossed the Bosphorus with an army of 700,000, by means of a bridge of boats, and advanced against the Scythians as far as the mouths of the Danube. He afterwards sent three great expeditions into Greece; but, in 490 B.C., his forces were defeated at Marathon by the Greeks, on which he resolved to carry on the war in person, but died in the midst of his preparations.

Born 521 B.C.; died 485 B.C.

DARIUS II., surnamed Ochus, or Nothus (bastard), because he was an illegitimate son of Artaxerxes. After the murder of Xerxes, he ascended the Persian throne, and espoused Parisatis, his stepsister, a cruel princess, by whom he had Artaxerxes Mnemon, Amistris, and Cyrus the Younger.

Died 405 B.C.

DARIUS III., surnamed Codomanus, great-grandson of the above, ascended the throne 336 B.C. The peace of his kingdom was early disturbed by Alexander, who invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. The king of Persia met his adversary in person, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable however, more for the splendour of its equipment than its military courage. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. Another was soon after fought near Issus, where Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead on the field, and took, among the prisoners of war, the mother, wife, and children of Darius. The darkness of the night favoured the retreat of Darius, who saved himself by flying in disguise. These losses weakened, but did not discourage, the Persian monarch, who assembled another more powerful army, with which he encountered his enemy at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander and the superior valour of the Macedonians ultimately prevailed over the effeminate Persians, and Darius fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now almost at an end. Bessus, the governor of Bactriana, in hopes of succeeding him on the throne, attempted his life; and Darius was found by the Macedonians, in his chariot, expiring, covered with wounds. In him the empire of Persia was extinguished, 228 years after it had been first founded by Cyrus the Great. (See ALEXANDER THE GREAT.)

Died 331 B.C.

DARJEELING, or DARJILING, dar-je'-ling, a sanitary station in the Sikkim territory, British India, 318 miles N. of Calcutta, and at a height of 7,400 feet above the sea level. The atmosphere is moist and the rainfall heavy; but nevertheless the climate is very restorative to those suffering from the effects of the heat on the plains of Bengal. Lat. 27° 3′ N. Lon. 88° 28′ E.

DARKE, dark, a county of Ohio, bordering on Indiana, United States. Area, 714 square miles. Pop. 40,496.

DARKEHMEN, dar'-ke-men, a town of Prussia, on the Angerap, 14 miles S.W. of Gumbinnen. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, and leather. There are five annual fairs. Pop. 2,300.

DARKHAN MOUNT, dark-han', a lofty granite mountain in Mongolia, 145 miles from Gurga, on the way to Pekin. A monument to the memory of Genghis Khan is erected on it, and is annually visited by large numbers of Mongolians.

DARLASTON, dar'-las-ton, a town of Staffordshire, 17 miles S.E. of Stafford. Manf. Small articles of ironmongery, and castings. There are coal and iron mines in the vicinity, and there are blast furnaces employing a large number of hands. Pop. 14,000.

DARLING, GRACE, dar'-ling, daughter of the lighthouse keeper of one of the Farne islands, on the coast of Northumberland. She exerted herself heroically on the occasion of the wreck of the Forfarshire, on the 7th of September, 1838, when she urged her father to endeavour to save the lives of the passengers. Accompanying him in a boat, Grace exhibited wonderful nerve and courage, rowing through the raging sea, and succeeded in saving the lives of nine persons. Presents and testimonials were forwarded to her, and public admiration was aroused to an extraordinary degree; but her natural modesty induced her to avoid publicity. She died four years afterwards of consumption.

Born at Bamborough, 1815; died 1842.

DARLING, a principal river of central Australia, formed by the conflux of many mountain streams, and which, after traversing a sterile country and receiving the Bogan, unites with the Murray near lat. 34° S. and lon. 142° E.—For the greater part of its course its waters are salt.

DARLING DOWNS, a district of New South Wales, chiefly watered by the Condamine, one of the head waters of the Murray. It lies between lat. 27° and 28° 15′ S. Area, 50,000 square miles. Not officially recognized.

DARLING MOUNTAINS, a range in W. Australia, 250 miles long. Its culminating peak is 3,500 feet above the level of the sea.

DARLINGTON, a town and parliamentary borough in the county of Durham, on the Skerne, 18 miles S. of Durham. The town has an ancient edifice called St. Cuthbert's Church, and which has a tower, 180 feet high, erected in 1160, by Hugh Pudsey, bishop of Durham, and restored in 1865. There are a handsome town-hall, central hall, and mechanics' institute. Manf. Woollen yarns, flax, optical glasses, brass and iron wares, machinery and locomotives. There are iron and brass foundries, breweries, tanneries, and wool mills. Pop. 35,102. A station on the London and North-Western and North-Eastern railways.

DARLINGTON, a county of S. Carolina, United States. Area, 1,050 square miles. Pop. 34,485.—The capital is Darlington.

DARMABAH, dar'-ma-ba, an island off the African coast, in the Red Sea, 20 miles in circumference. It is low, and mostly covered with jungle. Lat. 12° 15′ N. Lon. 42° 55′ E.

DARMSTADT, darm'-stat, a neat town of Germany, the capital of the grand-duchy of Hesse Darmstadt, on the Darm, 15 miles S. of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. It consists of an old and new town, both enclosed by walls. The old town has narrow and dirty streets. In the new town are the best public buildings. Two principal streets, the Rheinstrasse and the Neckarstrasse, lined with handsome houses, traverse the new town, the first from E. to W., and the latter from N. to S. Near the Rheinstrasse is a fine square, the Louisenplatz, in the centre of which is a Doric column, 134 feet high, surmounted by a statue of Duke Louis I. Around the square are the new palace of the grand duke and other handsome residences. The old ducal palace, surrounded by gardens and promenades, open to the public, is a large edifice, containing a picture gallery, a museum, containing some remarkable fossils, and a large public library. The circular Roman Catholic church, the Protestant church, the large drilling house, a very fine theatre, and a town-hall, built in 1580, are among the most noticeable public buildings. Manf. Carpets, paper, playing-cards, philosophical instruments, silver articles, starch, tobacco, and wax candles. Pop. 52,000.

DARNETAL, darn'-tal, a town of France, department of Seine Inférieure, 2 miles E. of Rouen. There are two Gothic churches. Manf. Woollens and paper. Pop. 5,600.

DARNLEY, HENRY STUART, earl of, darn'-le, eldest son of the earl of Lennox and Lady Margaret Douglas, and the ill-fated husband of Mary, queen of Scots. He was married to her in 1565, and two years afterwards was blown up by gunpowder in a house where he was lying unwell, in the neighbourhood of Holyrood palace, at Edinburgh. (See MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.)
Born 1546; died 1567.

DARNLEY, or ERROOB, an island off the Australian coast, near the entrance to Torres Strait. It is about 5 miles in circuit, of volcanic formation, and rises in the centre to a peak 610 feet high. On the N. shore is Treacherous Bay, where there is good anchorage. Pop. 1,000, chiefly aborigines. Lat. 90° 35′ S. Lon. 143° 45′ E.

DAROCA, da-ro'-ca, a town of Spain, province of Saragossa, picturesquely situated in a valley, on the right bank of the Jiloca, 56 miles S.W. of Saragossa. It is surrounded by walls, and contains a fine old Gothic church, a town-house, and large prison. Pop. 2,200, chiefly employed in agriculture.

DAROCZ, da-roch', a market-town of Hungary, on the Kraszna, 50 miles E. of Debreczin. There are a Protestant, a Catholic, and a Greek church. Pop. 2,200.

DARQUIER, AUGUSTIN, dar'-ke-ai, a French astronomer, and member of the National Institute, who early discovered a strong inclination for the study of astronomy, which he cultivated with ardour; purchasing instruments, and establishing an observatory in his own house. He also educated pupils, and paid the expense of calculations, and sought for no pecuniary aid from government. His last observations were printed in Lalande's "Histoire Céleste," and are brought down to March, 1798.
Born at Toulouse, 1718; died 1802.

DART, dart, a river of England, rising in Dartmoor, Devonshire, and falling into the English Channel by an estuary which forms Dartmouth harbour.

DARTFORD, dart'-ford, (anciently and more correctly Darentford), a town of Kent, on the left bank of the Darent, 15 miles S.E. of London. It consists of a principal street, with some smaller avenues. The church is an ancient and large edifice, and there are to be seen the remains of a nunnery erected by Edward III. Manf. Gunpowder, paper, oil, and machinery. There are large corn-mills, cotton and silk printing works. The first paper-mill in England was established here in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Pop. 10,567. A station on the North-Kent Railway.—Wat Tyler's rebellion broke out at Dartford in 1381.

DARTMOOR, dart'-moor, an extensive tract of land, belonging to the duchy of Cornwall, and occupying about one-fifth of Devonshire. It is 20 miles long, with an average breadth of 10, mostly consists of moorland, as its name implies, with several granite peaks rising to about 2,000 feet, and termed tors. It pastures, in the summer months, large numbers of sheep and cattle, Dartmoor mutton having a high reputation, and has tin and copper mines. There are numerous British remains. There is on Dartmoor, near Princes Town, a convict prison, built in 1806, at first chiefly occupied by prisoners taken during the war against Napoleon. (See DEVONSHIRE.)

DARTMOUTH, dart'-mouth, a seaport and parliamentary borough of Devonshire, situate 32 miles S.W. of Exeter, near the confluence of the Dart with the English Channel. There is a good harbour, with deep water, defended by a battery that has lately been rebuilt. The town occupies the declivity of a craggy hill, and extends about a mile along the water's edge. There are several churches; the principal, St. Saviour's, is a very fine edifice, built in the 14th century, and beautifully decorated and carved. There are, besides, a guildhall, a custom-house, and a market-place. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the Newfoundland trade, and ship-building and rope-making are carried on to some extent. There is a considerable trade with the Mediterranean, and the exports are chiefly cider, malt, and barley. Pop. 5,338. A station on the South Devon Railway.—In 1190 Richard Cœur-de-

Leon embarked at Dartmouth for the Holy Land. In 1646 it was stormed by the Parliamentary general Fairfax.

DARTMOUTH, a seaport town in Bristol county, Massachusetts, U.S., 62 miles S. of Boston. Pop. 4,200, mostly engaged in a coasting trade and the whale fishery..

DARU, PIERRE ANTOINE NOEL BRUNO, Count, dar'-oo, a distinguished poet, historian, and statesman of France, who, in his sixteenth year, entered the military service of his country. Robespierre imprisoned him, but on the fall of that leader he was released. While in prison he translated the odes and epistles of Horace, and shortly afterwards the satires, and wrote a work entitled "Cleopedie." He attracted the notice of the first consul, and, in 1802, became a member of the Tribunal. In 1805 he was made a counsellor of state, and general intendant of the Imperial household. This last office he hesitated to accept. "I have spent my life among books," said he, "and have not had time to study the arts of the courtier." "Of courtiers I have plenty," said Napoleon I.,—"they will never fail; but I want a minister, at once enlightened, vigilant and firm." He subsequently became the confidential friend of the emperor, and his prime minister. In 1812 he opposed the expedition to Russia, as he did several other of the emperor's schemes. On the abdication of Napoleon, he retired from public life, and, although exiled by the first parliament of the restored Bourbons, was recalled in 1819, and made a peer of France. He afterwards wrote a "Life of Tully," and a "History of Venice."

Born at Montpellier, 1767; died 1829.

DARUVAR, or PODBORJE, da-ru-var', a town of the Austrian empire, in Slavonia, 33 miles N.W. of Posega, in a valley surrounded by lofty hills. There are a handsome château, a Protestant and a Greek church, and a much-frequented bathing establishment. Pop. 3,200.

DARWAR, dar-war', a district of British India, in the presidency of Bombay. The soil and climate are well adapted for the growth of cotton, of which a considerable quantity is cultivated. The capital is a strongly fortified town of the same name, in Lat. 15° 28' N., Lon. 75° 8' E. Area, 9,122 square miles. Pop. 882,907.

DARWEN, OVER, dar'-ween, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, 3 miles S. of Blackburn. Trinity Church is a handsome building in the Gothic style; there is also a fine Gothic Independent chapel, and there are several other places of worship, a market-house, and mechanics' institution. Manf. Cotton goods, paper, machinery, and rope. There are cotton-printing and bleaching works, and iron foundries. Three fairs are held annually. Pop. 33,557.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

DARWIN, ERASMUS, dar'-win, an English physician and poet, who, in 1755, took his bachelor's degree in medicine at Cambridge. From Cambridge he removed to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree, after which he practised at Lichfield. In 1757 he married Miss Howard, of that city, who died in 1770; and he then married the widow of Colonel Pole, who brought him a good fortune. He removed to Derby, where he passed the remainder of his life. Dr. Darwin's literary fame rests upon his "Botanic Garden," with philosophical notes, in two parts;—1. "The Economy of Vegetation." 2. "The Loves of the Plants;" the latter was burlesqued by Canning, in "The Loves of the Triangles." He also wrote "Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life," and "Phytologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening." Besides these, he was the author of papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and a Tract on Female Education, 4to. He had also a share in the formation of the System of Vegetables of Linnæus, published in the name of the Botanical Society at Lichfield.

Born near Newark, 1731; died at Derby, 1802.

DARWIN, CHARLES, F.R.S., grandson of the above, and, by his mother's side, of Joseph Wedgwood, the famous potter, an eminent modern naturalist, who has distinguished himself by his discoveries in the paths of zoology and geology, and by his laborious investigation into the production of species by the process of evolution. He was educated at Edinburgh and Cambridge, and, in 1831, engaged as naturalist on board the Beagle, a ship of the royal navy about to undertake a survey of the coast of South America and the circumnavigation of the globe. He returned to England in 1836, and published "The Voyage of a Naturalist;" and other works descriptive of the voyage, and its scientific results. Subsequent publications established his reputation as a scientific observer; and in 1859, appeared his great work on the "Origin of Species," which excited great attention for the extent of observation displayed and the boldness of the speculations. He has since produced other works strengthening his argument and further developing his theories.

Born at Shrewsbury, 1809. Died 1882.

DASHKOV, EKATERINA ROMANOVA, Princess, dash'-kof, a learned Russian lady, no less distinguished for her acquirements than for her political audacity. She was one of the chief promoters of the conspiracy against Peter III., and, dressed in uniform, headed the troops she had induced to support the Empress Catherine II. She afterwards travelled in Germany, England, France, and Italy, making the acquaintance of some of the leading literary persons of the day. On her return to Russia in 1782, she was appointed director of the St. Petersburg Academy of Arts and Sciences, and president of the Russian Academy, founded at her suggestion. On the death of the Empress she was deprived of her offices. She superintended the production of a dictionary of the Russian language, which occupied twelve years, and to which she contributed. She also wrote several comedies.

Born 1744; died at Moscow, 1810.

DATAMES, dat'-a-mees, a Persian general under Artaxerxes Ochus, gained many victories over the enemies of that prince. Being disgraced, however, by the king, to whom envious courtiers had misrepresented him, he raised Cappadocia in revolt, and defeated Artabazes, whom the king sent against him. He was assassinated by Mithridates. Cornelius Nepos has written his life.

Died 361 B.C.

DATIS, dai'-tis, a general of Darius I., had the command, in conjunction with Artaphernes, of the Persian army which was defeated by Miltiades at Marathon. He was subsequently put to death by the Spartans.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

DATSCHITZ, or DACZISZE, dats'-chitz, a town of Moravia, in the Austrian empire, on the right bank of the Taya, 53 miles S.W. of Brünn. There are two castles, a large church, with a lofty Gothic tower, a Franciscan monastery, court-house, and town-house. Manf. Woollen cloth, liqueurs, and sugar. Five annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,100.

DATTOH ISLANDS, dat'-toh, a small group off the north coast of Sicily. The largest is Basiluzza, on which there are some remains of ancient buildings. It is partially cultivated by the few inhabitants, and abounds with rabbits.

DAUBENTON, LOUIS JEAN MARIE, do-ben'-tawng, a French anatomist and naturalist, who became assistant to Buffon in the royal garden, and keeper of the king's museum. In 1744 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and contributed several valuable papers to their Memoirs. He had also a considerable share in the production of Buffon's "Natural History," generally furnishing the anatomical descriptions. His "Instructions to Shepherds," 1784, is an excellent work. He was likewise the author of "A Methodical View of Minerals," and contributed several articles to the Encyclopédie. In 1778 he was appointed professor of natural history in the College of Medicine, and, under the Convention, professor of mineralogy in the Museum of Natural History. Daubenton was the principal means of introducing and successfully propagating the breed of Spanish sheep in France. He was married to the authoress of "Zélie dans le Désert," with whom he lived in great happiness.

Born at Montbar, 1716; died 1800.

D'AUBENY, CHARLES GILES BRIDLE, daw'-be-ne, chemist, botanist, and geologist, educated at Winchester and Oxford, and practised for several years as a physician at Oxford. In 1822 he was appointed professor of chemistry in the university, and in 1834 professor of botany. He was President of the British Association in 1856. He published several treatises of great value on his favourite sciences.

Born at Stratton, Gloucestershire, 1795; died at Oxford, 1867.

D'AUBIGNÉ, JEAN HENRI MERLE, do-been'-yai, a Swiss theologian, who, for some time, was the pastor of a French church in Hamburg, whence he removed to Brussels, where he acquired great popularity as a preacher. It is, however, on account of his great work, entitled "A History of the Reformation of the 16th Century," that he is here noticed, a performance which has acquired an immense popularity. He is the author of several other works; among which we may name "The Protector (Cromwell); a Vindication;" and "Germany, England, and Scotland." His sympathies lean greatly towards the evangelical Protestantism of the last-named country, to which he has paid frequent visits, and, in 1856, received the freedom of the city of Edinburgh.

Born at Geneva, 1794; died 1872.

DAULE, dawl, a town of Ecuador, South America, on the left bank of a river of the same name, 30 miles N.W. of Guayaquil. It was nearly destroyed by fire in 1839 and again in 1854. There is an annual festival, which attracts a large number of visitors.

DAUN, LEOPOLD JOSEPH MARIA, Count, doun, a celebrated Austrian general, who served the empress Maria Theresa with the greatest zeal and glory. He was the son of a distinguished Austrian officer, and commenced his military career against the Turks, achieved a great reputation in the Austrian "wars of succession," was appointed master-general of the ordnance in 1745, and in 1754 was raised to the rank of field-marshal. He introduced a new military system into the army, and re-organized the military academy; but it was as a commander in the armies which were engaged in the "seven years' war" against the king of Prussia, whom he several times defeated, that he attained the acme of his glory. After a series of good fortune, however, he met with a defeat at Torgau, in 1760.

Born at Vienna, 1705; died 1766.

DAUNG, THE, dawng, an Indian tract of country, in the presidency of Bombay, comprising several native states, who pay tribute to a prince called the rajah of Daung. There are immense forests of teak, which are rented by the English government. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 60,270. Lat. between 20° 22′ and 21° 5′ N. Lon. between 73° 28′ and 73° 52′ E.

DAUPHIN, daw'-fin, a county of Pennsylvania, United States, situate on the E. side of the Susquehannah. It is fertile, though mountainous. Area, 608 square miles. Pop. 76,148.—Harrisburg is the capital.

DAUPHIN, LAKE, in British America, discharging, by the Moss River, into Lake Winnipigoos, farther north. It is 21 miles long, and 12 miles wide, and very shallow.

DAUPHIN, an island in the Gulf of Mexico, near the coast of W. Florida. Ext. 14 miles long. Lat. 30° 18′ N Lon. 88° 12′ W.

DAUPHINÉ, do'-fe-nai, an old and extensive province in the S.E. of France, now comprised in the three departments of Isère, Drôme, and Haute-Alpes. Its counts were called dauphins; and when, in 1349, it was ceded to Charles of Valois, the title of dauphin was given to the eldest son of the king of France, to whom it continued to be applied till the revolution of 1830.

D'AVENANT, SIR WILLIAM, dav'-nant, an English poet, son of the host of the Crown Inn, Oxford. When only 10 years old he wrote an "Ode in remembrance of Master William Shakspeare," who had just died. Shakspeare frequently stopped at the inn on his journeys between London and Stratford, and was known to the family. After being some time at Lincoln College, young D'Avenant became page to the duchess of Richmond, and then to Lord Brook. He began to write for the stage when quite a young man, and in 1638 succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate; and became manager of Drury-lane Theatre. Having fought for the king during the civil war, he received, in 1643, the honour of knighthood. On the decline of the royal cause, he went to France, and formed a plan for carrying out to Virginia, in America, some artificers; but his ship was taken by the English cruisers, and he, himself, would have suffered death, had not Milton interceded on his behalf. This, generous act he was enabled, at a future day, similarly to repay to Milton. At the Restoration he obtained a patent for erecting a theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, and devoted himself to dramatic composition and poetry, producing an epic, "Gondibert." He was interred in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Oxford, 1606; died 1688.

D'AVENANT, CHARLES, son of the preceding, was well versed in politics, and acquired some reputation by his works connected with political and social economy.

Born 1656; died 1714.

DAVENPORT, a town of Iowa, United States, near the upper rapids of the Mississippi, which is crossed by a magnificent bridge. There are nearly 20 churches and three colleges. The water power is very advantageous. The town was founded in 1836. Manf. Soap, candles, agricultural implements, carriages, and musical instruments. There are foundries and iron-works, and numerous saw and flour mills. Pop. 22,000.

DAVENTRY, or DAINTREE, dav'-en-tre, a town and parish of Northamptonshire, 13 miles W. of Northampton, at the sources of the Avon and the Nene. Remains of large Roman camps are in the vicinity. Manf. Whips and shoes. Pop. 4,051.

DAVEY, PORT, dai'-ve, a harbour on the S.W. coast of Tasmania. It is divided into two branches and extends several miles inland. The eastern branch is known as Bathurst harbour. Lat. 43° 18′ S. Lon. 146° E.

DAVID CLARK ISLAND, in the Lower Archipelago, South Pacific. It is about 20 miles in circumference. The coast is low and dangerous. Lat. 17° 19′ S. Lon. 138° 30′ W.

DAVID, dai'-vid, "beloved," king and prophet of Israel, the son of Jesse, was keeping his father's flocks when he was selected and anointed by the prophet Samuel, at the age of 15, to succeed Saul. His valour in killing Goliath, a gigantic Philistine, procured him a place at the court of Saul, who, afterwards, endeavoured to take away his life; on which David fled. When Saul fell, David was acknowledged king by the tribe of Judah; but the other tribes, at the instigation of Abner, placed Ishbosheth, the younger son of Saul, on the throne; thus occasioning a civil war. On the death of Ishbosheth, however, the contending parties united in submission to David, who reigned with great glory for thirty years. He took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, and gained considerable victories over the Philistines and other neighbouring nations; but tarnished his glory by taking Bathsheba from Uriah, her husband, and putting him to death. He also suffered by causing his people to be numbered. A rebellion was excited against him by his son Absalom, which was quelled, and Absalom slain. When the news of this was brought to David, he lamented the untimely fall of his son in affecting terms. At the close of his life, he abdicated in favour of his son Solomon. A considerable portion of the book of Psalms was composed by him. He was, as has been well said, "a great sinner, but a magnificent saint." As a warrior and king, he was signally able and energetic.

Born 1074 B.C.; died 1001 B.C.

DAVID, ST., a British saint, who, in the 6th century, was bishop of Caerleon, and the metropolitan of the Welsh church. He subsequently removed his see to Mynyw, which came to be called Ty Dewi, or the house of St. David. There are many churches dedicated to him in Wales; and it is traditionally asserted that he was son of the prince of Ceretica (Cardiganshire), and he is generally considered the patron saint of Wales. He was a learned man of holy life, and a powerful preacher.

Born 480; died 554.

DAVID I., king of Scotland, youngest of the six sons of Malcolm Ceanmohr, and the Saxon princess St. Margaret. He was reared in England, and married Matilda, grand-niece of William the Conqueror. When called to the Scottish throne, in 1124, he held the earldom of Northumberland and Huntingdon, and on the death of Henry I., king of England, maintained the claim of his niece Matilda, daughter of Henry and of David's sister, against Stephen, and seized Carlisle. He was, however, defeated at the battle of Northallerton, in 1138. The following year a negotiation was entered into, by which Carlisle was suffered to remain in the possession of David. The remainder of his life was devoted to promoting the peace and prosperity of his country.

Born 1080; died at Carlisle, 1153.

DAVID II., king of Scotland, was the son of Robert Bruce, at whose death he was but five years old. On the invasion of his country by Baliol, he was sent to France; but his party prevailing, after a bloody contest, he returned in 1342. He made several inroads on England, but was taken prisoner and conveyed to the Tower, where he was confined till 1357, when, on paying a heavy ransom, he was set free.

Born 1324; died 1371.

DAVID OF HIRAZUG, surnamed the Black, a Welsh divine, bard, and grammarian. The literary compositions of the Welsh being affected by their conquest by Edward I., this divine was chosen to modify the grammar and system of prosody of Edeyrn, agreeably to the regulations which took place on that occasion. He also translated several copies of a Missal, or the Office of the Virgin, into Welsh.

Flourished in the 14th century.

DAVID AB GWILYM, a celebrated Welsh bard, who composed a variety of beautiful poems, under the patronage of Ivor the Generous. The subject of the greater part of these is love. One hundred and forty-seven of them he dedicated to the fair Morvid, his mistress; but she rejected his suit, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer in the English army at the battle of Cressy.

Flourished in the 14th century.

DAVID COMNENUS, the last emperor of Trebizond, who had usurped the throne on the death of his brother John. In 1458 he relinquished his kingdom to Mahomet II., on condition that the latter should espouse his daughter Annie, and that his own life should be saved. The sultan observed the first of these conditions, but caused David to be put to death, with seven of his sons.

Died 1461.

DAVID, JACQUES LOUIS, a celebrated French artist, who, after studying in Paris, went to Rome, where his talents for historical painting rapidly developed themselves, and a picture on the subject of the Horatii excited considerable admiration. In 1789 he produced his picture representing Lucius Junius Brutus passing sentence of death upon his son Titus, which, to some extent, may be considered to have indicated the political tendency of his mind to the worship of democratic principles. He became a devoted admirer of Robespierre and Marat, was artistic superintendent of the grand national fêtes, and eagerly accepted office in the bloodiest periods of the great Revolution. He became a member of the National Convention, and also of the Jacobin Mountain, when he imagined he discovered in Robespierre a resemblance to Phocion, and in Collot d'Herbois a reproduction of Marius. He painted pictures of republican heroism, voted for the death of Louis XVI., and escaped guillotining himself only on account of his artistic celebrity. In 1800 Napoleon appointed him painter to the government; and throughout the imperial rule, his influence controlled, to a large extent, the fine arts in France. On the fall of the emperor, he was driven into exile. The best paintings of David, however excellent in other respects, are deficient in vitality. His figures have the form but not the breath of life in them; consequently, they can be considered as little more than beautiful sculptures represented on canvas. His best works are the "Oath of the Horatii," the "Rape of the Sabines," the "Death of Socrates," and "Napoleon presenting the Imperial Eagles to his Troops." His portrait of Napoleon I. is generally well known. He refused to paint a portrait of the Duke of Wellington. He had many pupils who highly distinguished themselves.

Born at Paris, 1748; died at Brussels, 1825.

DAVID, PIERRE JEAN, sculptor, who at an early age obtained the first prize given by the Academy of Arts. He was chosen a member of the Institute in 1826, and appointed professor in the School of Fine Arts. Between 1835 and 1837 he was engaged on the sculpture in front of the Pantheon, which some consider his finest work. In 1848 he was a member of the Constituent Assembly, but after the coup d'état went to Greece, soon, however, returning to France. His busts and portrait statues are very fine.

Born at Angers, 1789; died 1836.

DAVID, FÉLICIEN, da'-veed, a modern French composer, who, after attaining to considerable excellence on the violin, became musical director at the church of Saint-Sauveur, Aix. Here he continued to devote himself to his professional duties; but, becoming imbued with the doctrines of Saint-Simon, he, with some others, paid a visit to Egypt, the Holy Land, and the Desert. He was gone three years, and when he returned, published some "Oriental Melodies," which were not well received. Still devoting himself to study, he adopted loftier themes for the exercise of his genius, and in 1844 produced his ode entitled "The Desert," which met with a brilliant success. After this, came his "Moses on the Mount," "Christopher Columbus," for which Louis Philippe conferred on him the cross of the Legion of Honour; and several other works of great merit.

Born at Cadenet, in Vaucluse, 1810; died 1879.

DAVID, a town of Columbia, Central America, situated near an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, where there is sufficient depth for large ships. The climate is healthy, and the town is rapidly increasing. Rice, coffee, hides, turtle, shells, and gold dust are exported. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 8° 23′ N. Lon. 82° 27′ W.

DAVID'S, ST., a decayed episcopal city of Pembrokeshire, S. Wales, about a mile from the sea, near St. David's Head, on the north side of St. Bride's Bay. The cathedral is cruciform, 290 feet in length, with a central tower 127 feet high. There are some interesting tombs. There are the ruins of an episcopal palace, and St. Mary's College, founded by John of Gaunt. Pop. 2,131, chiefly engaged in agriculture.—In the middle ages St. David's was a large city much resorted to by pilgrims.

DAVID'S HEAD, ST., a lofty rugged promontory, the extreme W. point of Wales, in Pembrokeshire. Lat. 51° 54′ N. Lon. 5° 20′ W.

DAVIDSON, da'-vid-son, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 20,333. The capital is Lexington.

DAVIDSON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 79,026, Nashville is the capital.

DAVIDSON, SAMUEL, D.D., theologian and Biblical critic, was educated at Belfast college, and ordained a minister of the Presbyterian Church. In 1835 he was appointed professor of Biblical literature in the Belfast Royal Academical Institution, and afterwards in the Lancashire Independent College, at Manchester. In 1838 he received the degree of LL.D. at Aberdeen, and in 1848 of D.D. from the University of Halle. His reputation for scholarship was maintained by the publication of many learned and valuable critical works; but some contributions by him to a new edition of Horne's "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures" led him to a vigorous and acrimonious controversy, Dr. Davidson being accused of promulgating the doctrines of the German rationalists, the result being that he resigned the professorship. Since then he has published several works of great learning, defending his position that "the Scriptures contain the highest truth; but this fact is undisturbed by the possibility that they contain some things which are not truth." He published also a revised text of the Hebrew Scriptures, and is unquestionably one of the most learned and careful of Biblical critics.

Born at Ballymena, Ireland, 1808.

DAVIE, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 175 square miles. Pop. 11,096. The capital is Mocksville.

DAVIES, SIR JOHN, da'-vis, an English poet, lawyer, and political writer, who studied at Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1595. On the accession of James I., he had the honour of knighthood conferred on him, and was made attorney-general for Ireland. In 1613 he was chosen speaker of the Irish House of Commons, and in 1620 entered the English parliament as member for Newcastle-unde-Lyne. In 1626 he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, but died suddenly from apoplexy, before entering on the duties of the office. Sir John wrote a valuable book on the state of Ireland. His poetical works, of which that entitled "Nosce Teipsum," a poem on the immortality of the soul, is the best known, displaying considerable elegance and command of metre.

Born at Chisgrove, Wiltshire, 1570; died 1626.

DAVIES, THOMAS, an intelligent and enterprising publisher, who was educated at Edinburgh, and becoming an actor, received an engagement at the Haymarket theatre, London. He subsequently became a bookseller in Russell-street, Covent Garden, where he was patronized by Dr. Johnson, and, through him, by other celebrities of his time. In 1780 he published the "Life of Garrick," which had a good sale. He also wrote "Dramatic Miscellanies," the "Life of Henderson the Player," and several fugitive pieces. Dr. Johnson declared that Davies was "learned enough for a clergyman." The Doctor was first introduced to Boswell in his back shop; and both he and his wife, distinguished by her beauty, were highly esteemed by the great lexicographer, who lived on as easy an intimacy with them, as with any family he visited. It was the unmerciful ridicule of Churchill in his "Rosciad" which drove Davies from the stage.

> "With him came mighty Davies;—on my life,
> That Davies has a very pretty wife!—
> Statesman all over—in plots famous grown,
> He mouths a sentence as curs mouth a bone."

Born 1712; died 1783.

DAVIESS, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 21,552. The capital is Washington.

DAVIESS, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 27,730. The capital is Owenborough.

DAVIESS, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 19,145. Gallatin is the capital.

DAVILA, ENRICO CATERINO, da'-ve-la, an Italian historian. At an early age he was brought from Padua to France, where his father enjoyed the favour of Henry III. and Catherine de Medicis. In compliment to these royal friends, he received his baptismal names; and, at first a page, he afterwards took service under Henry IV., and was present, during the civil war, in 1597, at Honfleur and Amiens. He afterwards returned to Padua, and then fixed his residence at Venice, where he, again, took up arms and rendered great services to the republic. He now set about writing, in Italian, a "History of the Civil Wars in France, from the Death of Henry II. to the Peace of Vervins," which was published at Venice, 1630. His history is universally esteemed for the exactness of its facts and the excellence of its style, although the author has been reproached with showing some partiality for Catherine de Medicis. It has been translated into French several times, and also into English. He was shot while on his way to take command of the garrison of Crema.

Born near Padua, 1576; died 1631.

DAVIS, JEFFERSON, dai'-vis, American statesman, a prominent member of the House of Representatives and Senate, who, having served in the Mexican war, became secretary of war under President Pearce. At the outbreak of the civil war in 1861, he was chosen president of the Confederate States. After the fall of Richmond, he was a prisoner for two years, but was set at liberty by the amnesty of December, 1868.

Born in Kentucky, 1808.

DAVIS, JOHN, an English navigator, who, in 1585, had the command of an expedition to discover a N.W. passage to America. In this voyage he discovered the strait called by his name. (See DAVIS STRAIT.) The year following he sailed with the same design, and having explored the coasts of Greenland and Iceland, proceeded as far as lat. 73° N. In 1591 he went as second in command with Cavendish, in his voyage to the South Seas. After this, he made five voyages to the East Indies, but was killed in the last of these, in a fight with some Japanese pirates, on the coast of Malacca. He wrote an account of some of his voyages, and invented a quadrant, which was used for taking the sun's altitude at sea, till superseded by Hadley's sextant.

Born near Dartmouth, Devonshire; died 1605.

DAVIS STRAIT, a narrow sea, which divides Greenland on the [illegible] from British N. America, and connects Baffin's Bay with the Atlantic Ocean. Its narrowest part is about 150 miles across.

DAVIS ISLAND, in the Mergui Archipelago, Bay of Bengal. It is 10 miles in circumference, and rises to a considerable elevation. Lat. 9° 40′ N. Lon. 97° 50′ E.

DAVIS, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 504 square miles. Pop. 16,000. Bloomfield is the capital.

DAVIS, a county of Kansas, United States. Pop. 7,000.

DAVIS, a county of the territory of Utah, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 5,000. Farmington is the capital.

DAVOLI, da-vo'-le, a town of Italy, 18 miles S.W. of Calanzaro. An annual fair is held, and cotton and silk are grown in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,000.

DAVISON, WILLIAM, da'-ve-son, English statesman, employed on several diplomatic missions in the time of Queen Elizabeth. In 1586 he was one of the principal secretaries of state, and was the principal agent in the proceedings against Mary, Queen of Scots. When it became convenient to disown his acts, he was dismissed from office, imprisoned, and fined £10,000.

Died 1608.

DAVOUT, or DAVOUST, LOUIS NICOLAS, da'-vou, a celebrated French marshal, began life with Bonaparte, as a student at Brienne. In 1785, he entered the army, and, taking the side of the revolutionists, fought under Dumouriez at Jemappes, on November 8, 1792. In 1793 he was made a general; but being of a noble family, he was forced to resign his command, on account of the decree which forbade such to enter upon active service. The downfall of Robespierre, however, enabled him to recover his rank in the army, with which he fought on the Rhine, under Pichegru. In the Italian campaigns he procured the friendship of Napoleon I., and afterwards accompanied him to Egypt. On his return he was made a general of division, and commanded the cavalry of the army of Italy. He contributed to the victory of Marengo, and became a marshal under the imperial dynasty. He commanded the right wing at Austerlitz, and, on October 14, 1806, defeated the duke of Brunswick at Auerstadt. For this he was created duke of Auerstadt. For his services at Eckmuhl he was created prince of Eckmuhl, and at Wagram once more commanded the right wing. He was with the Russian expedition, and was wounded at the battle of Borodino. After the retreat from Moscow he held Hamburg, where he had his headquarters, against all the forces of the allies, and only, after the peace of 1814, surrendered to General Gérard, who was the bearer of the commands of Louis XVIII. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he became minister of war. After Waterloo, he lived in retirement till 1819, when he re-entered the Chamber of Peers.

Born at Annoux, in the Yonne, 1770; died 1823.

DAVY, SIR HUMPHREY, dai'-ve, a distinguished modern chemist, who was intended for the medical profession, but who relinquished that design, and became superintendent of the Pneumatic Institution at Bristol. While fulfilling his duties in this capacity, he discovered the properties of nitrous oxide, commonly known as "laughing gas," and published his "Chemical and Philosophical Researches," which obtained for him the professorship of chemistry in the Royal Institution of London. In the April of 1801 he gave his first lecture, and, from that time, his popularity extended to all parts of the country. In the following year he was made professor to the Board of Agriculture, in 1806 delivered the Bakerian lecture on the "Chemical Agencies of Electricity," which greatly increased his reputation, and obtained the prize of the French Institute; and in 1815 entered on the investigation of the nature of fire-damp, which led to the discovery of the famous Davy safety lamp. In 1818, he had a baronetcy conferred on him, and in 1820 was elected president of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he continued to contribute papers, on subjects of the greatest interest, for several years. The exertions of Davy in the fields of science have given his name an imperishable fame. Besides his philosophical works, he wrote "Salmonia; or, Days of Fly-fishing;" and "Consolations in Travel."

Born at Penzance, 1778; died at Geneva, 1829.

DAWES, RICHARD, dawz, a learned critic, who, in 1736, published proposals for a Greek translation of "Paradise Lost," which was never completed. In 1738 he was appointed master of the grammar-school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and, in 1745, published his "Miscellanea Critica; or, a Collection of Remarks on various Ancient Authors," a work of high value. In 1749, Dawes resigned the mastership of his school.

Born at Market Bosworth, 1708; died 1766.

DAWLISH, daw'-lish, a town and fashionable watering place on the south coast of Devonshire. 3 miles W. of Teignmouth. Pop. 3,600.—A station on the South Devon Railway.

DAX, dax, a town of France, in the department Landes, on the Adour, 25 miles N.E. of Bayonne. There are an old church, formerly a cathedral, and a bishop's palace. This place has long been celebrated for its mineral waters and baths, and is, in consequence, much frequented. Manf. Leather, thread, earthenware, linseed-oil, and brandy. Pop. 7,800.—Dax was taken by the English in the 12th century, and remained in their possession till the middle of the 15th.

DAY, THOMAS, an English writer, the author of "Sandford and Merton," whose father was a collector of the customs, and died while he was an infant, leaving Thomas £1,200 a year. His manners were eccentric, and his opinions romantic. He and a friend of his, called Bicknel, took two orphan children from the workhouse at Shrewsbury, to educate them in the ancient Roman manner, and afterwards to marry them. The project, however, failed, and Mr. Day married, in 1778, a Miss Mills, of Derbyshire. He wrote several works; but the one by which his name will be perpetuated is "The History of Sandford and Merton." He was killed by being thrown from his horse.

Born in London, 1748; died 1789.

DAYTON, da'ton, a town of Ohio, United States, on the Miami, 52 miles from Cincinnati, with which it is connected by the Miami. It ranks as the fourth city in the State, the manufactures are very extensive, and the population rapidly increasing. Pop. 38,678. Lat. 39° 44′ N. Lon. 84° 11′ W.

D'AZARA, DON FELIX, da-za'-ra, Spanish naturalist, who served in the army, and was wounded in the attack on Algiers. In 1781 he went to South America, as one of the commissioners for fixing the boundaries of the Spanish possessions. He remained there 20 years, and gave great attention to the quadrupeds and birds of Paraguay and La Plata, of which he published an account.

Born 1746.

DEAD SEA, or LAKE ASPHALTITES, that is, the "Lake of Bitumen," a lake of Palestine. It is 20 miles E. of Jerusalem at its N. point, about 40 miles long, with an average breadth of about 10. The depth increases towards the N. extremity which is about 220 fathoms. The surface is more than 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Five cities, including Sodom and Gomorrah, situate on this spot, were, according to Scripture, all swallowed up, to satisfy divine vengeance for their iniquity. The neighbourhood of the lake abounds in volcanic products, and large masses of asphaltum are frequently cast to the surface. It receives the river Jordan on its N. side. The Asclepias gigantea (the apple of Sodom) grows on its W. coast; and, though inviting to the eye, the fruit crumbles to dust in the hand. The centre of the lake is in lat. 31° 30′ N.; lon. 35° 30′ E.

DEAK, FERENCZ, or FRANCIS, dai'-auk, Hungarian statesman. Being deprived of his parents almost immediately after his birth, he was reared by his brother Anthony, who was twenty years his senior. He studied the law at Raab, and afterwards exercised the profession of an advocate in his own country. He early distinguished himself as an orator and a patriot. In 1832 he was appointed deputy to the Diet of Presburg, and took a prominent part in the agitation for the removal of the restrictive rights which fettered the constitution of his country. The arrest of Kossuth, and other popular leaders in 1837 only had the effect of inducing him to redouble his efforts in the direction of parliamentary reform; and to his energy and skill was to be attributed the reconciliation that was ultimately brought about between the king and the people in 1840. After the revolution of 1848, he became minister of justice in the cabinet of count Bathyani, a post which he resigned on the accession of Kossuth to power in September of that year. The following year he directed his energies to bringing about a reconciliation between Austria and Hungary, but failed in the attempt, and was himself arrested, and for some time held a prisoner at Pesth. On his release he retired to his estates. Declining the advances made to him by the Austrians, he remained in retirement till 1860, when he was returned a member for Pesth in the Hungarian Diet. Although the efforts he made for obtaining a separate ministry for his country were not at first successful, his unceasing efforts greatly influenced the conciliatory policy adopted by count Beust, under whose administration a separate ministry was ultimately granted. Since that period, M. Deak has figured prominently in the affairs of his country. Besides being regarded as the man of greatest distinction in Hungary, the integrity of his conduct has gained for him from the citizens of Pesth the surname of "the Just."

Born 1803; died 1876.

DEAKOVER, dai-awk'-o-vair, a town of the Austrian empire, in Slavonia, 30 miles S.E. of Posega. There are a fine cathedral and an episcopal palace, a Franciscan monastery, and barracks. Pop. 3,000.

DEAL, deel, a town and (with Sandwich) parliamentary borough on the coast of Kent, situate between the N. and S. Forelands, 8 miles N.E. of Dover, opposite the Goodwin Sands. The seashore forms a bold beach, and is defended from the violence of the waves, by a long rampart of pebbles, thrown up by the sea. The anchorage, about 8 miles in extent, is known as "the Downs." The coast is protected by Deal Castle, Sandown Castle, and three batteries on the N., and by Walmer Castle on the S. In the upper part, the streets are broad and capacious; but, in Lower Deal, they are narrow and dirty. To the S. of the town is Walmer Castle, where the first duke of Wellington died, in 1852. Besides the parish church, there are a chapel of ease, and a public library and reading-room, a custom-house, naval store-house, and barracks. At a little distance is an extensive naval hospital, and, at the back of the town, a commodious house of industry. The Deal pilots and boatmen are intrepid and excellent seamen, and particularly active in affording assistance to vessels in distress. Pop. 8,000.

DEAL ISLAND, a small rocky island in Bass's Straits, between Australia and Tasmania. There is a lighthouse 880 feet above the sea level.

DEAN, FOREST OF, a royal forest in the west of Gloucestershire, between the Severn and the Wye, 22,000 acres in extent, of which about one half is inclosed for growing timber for the navy. The forest is governed by a lord warden and six deputy wardens.

DEARBORN, deer'-born, a county of Indiana, United States, on Ohio river. Area, 308 square miles. Pop. 26,671.

DEASE STRAIT, deese, a channel in the Arctic Ocean between Victoria Land and Kent peninsula. It is about 120 miles long and 23 wide.

DEBA, or DHAPA, dē'-ba, a town of Thibet, nearly 15,000 feet above the sea level. It is the residence of the lama, and there is a large temple of Vishnu. Lat. 31° 10′ N. Lon. 79° 57′ E.

DEBAI, de-bai', a town of Arabia, on the S.E. side of the Persian Gulf. The inhabitants are mostly engaged in the pearl fishery. Lat. 25° 16′ N. Lon. 55° 25′ E.

DEBIR, dē'-bir, "oracle," or "discourse," a king of Eglon slain by Joshua.

DEBO, LAKE, dē'-bo, in Central Africa, about 160 miles S.W. of Timbuctoo, about 60 miles long and 20 wide. It is traversed by the Joliba, or Niger, and has a town of the same name on its shores.

DEBORAH, deb'-o-ra, "a bee," a Hebrew prophetess, who, by her exhortations, prevailed on Barak to march against Sisera, general of the troops of Jabin.

Lived in the 13th century B.C.

DEBRECZIN, de-brech'-zin, a large town of Hungary, 120 miles E. of Pesth. It has several Catholic and Calvinist churches, monasteries, a large Protestant college, a town-hall, hospitals, and an orphan-house. Manf. Furs, shoes, coarse woollens, soap, pipe-bowls, tobacco, combs, and turnery wares. Pop. about 52,000, of whom 30,000 are Magyars.—This town was, in 1684, taken by the Turks, but abandoned by them in the same year. In the revolution of 1849, this town was the seat of the national Diet removed from Pesth.

DE CANDOLLE, AUGUSTIN PYRAMES, kan'-dol, a French botanist, son of a syndic of Geneva, where he was educated. In 1807 he was made professor of botany in the University of Montpellier. A chair was subsequently specially established for him at Geneva, when he designed to produce a work which should comprehend a description of all known plants. Such an undertaking was of too great magnitude for one man; consequently, he was obliged to abandon his design. He, however, wrote largely on his favourite science, besides contributing papers to the Transactions of almost every scientific society in Europe.

Born in Geneva, 1778; died 1841.

DECAPOLIS, de-kap'-o-lis, "ten cities," a province having ten cities, east of the Jordan.

DECATUR, de-kai'-tur, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 870 square miles. Pop. 19,072. The capital is Bainbridge.

DECATUR, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 19,779. Greensburg is the capital.

DECATUR, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 528 square miles. Pop. 15,000.

DECATUR, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 8,000. The capital is Decaturville.

DECAZEVILLE, de-kais'-veel, a town of France, department Aveyron. It is famous for blast furnaces and iron works, esteemed the best in France. There are iron and coal mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5,000.

DECCAN, dek'-kan, or the Country of the South, a name formerly applied to an extensive region of India, bounded N. by the Nerbudda, S. by the Krishna or Kistna river, E. by the Bay of Bengal, and W. by the Arabian Sea.

DECCAN ISLAND is in the Bay of Bengal, at the mouth of the Brahmapootra. It is 30 miles long, by 12 broad. It lies very low, and at spring tides is nearly submerged. Salt is manufactured.

DECEBALUS, de-seb'-a-lus, a warlike king of the Daci, who was successful in the war against the emperor Domitian, but was conquered by Trajan. In despair at his reverses, he destroyed himself, and Dacia became a Roman province. This was in 105.

DECEPTION ISLAND, de-sep'-shun, a volcanic island in the Antarctic Ocean, consisting of layers of ashes and ice. There are hot springs and a deep lake five miles in circuit.

DECIUS MUS, dē'-she-us mus, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods' manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, throwing himself into the midst of the ranks of the enemy, and dying, covered with wounds. His son and grandson also imitated his devotedness in the same manner; the first in a battle with the Gauls and Samnites, 295 B.C.; the second, in the war against Pyrrhus, 279 B.C.

Died 338 B.C.

DECIUS, CAIUS, a Roman emperor, who assumed the imperial dignity in 249, distinguished himself by an expedition against the Persians, and by persecuting the Christians in the most relentless manner. In his march against the Goths, he entered a morass, where he and his army were attacked by the enemy, and he perished.

Died 251.

DECIZE, de-seez', a town of France, in the department of Nièvre, 18 miles S.E. of Nevers. It stands on a rock in the middle of an island formed by the Loire, crossed by two bridges, and has extensive coal and iron works in the vicinity. Near the town are the extensive glass-bottle works of Charbonnière. Pop. 2,800.

DECKER, or DEKKER, THOMAS, dek'-ker, an English dramatist, contemporary with Ben Jonson, who satirized him in his "Poetaster," under the name of Chrispanus, Decker retorting in his "Satyromastix; or, Untrussing of a Humorous Poet." He wrote several plays, some of which possess merit, and contributed scenes, generally of broad humour, to plays by other dramatists. The best-known drama of Decker is "Fortunatus, or the Wishing-cap;" and his best-known tract is "The Gull's Horn-book." From this, Sir Walter Scott, in his "Fortunes of Nigel," draws largely for his description of London life. It was first printed in 1609, and gives a very minute and curious picture of the manners and customs of the middle classes of society in the seventeenth century.

Died 1630.

DEDDINGTON, ded'-ding-ton, a town of Oxfordshire, 15 miles from Oxford. It consists of one principal street, and has a large market-square. There is a handsome Gothic parish church, erected in the 13th century. Mineral springs are in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,000. A station on the Great Western Railway.

DEDHAM, ded'-ham, the capital of Norfolk county, Massachusetts, United States, 14 miles S.W. of Boston. Manf. Iron ware, leather, sugar, machinery, cards, soap, candles, cotton, and woollen goods. Pop. 6,500.

DEE, a river of Wales, rising in Lake Bala, Merionethshire, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into the Irish Sea, about 15 miles below Chester.

DEE, a river of Scotland, rising in the Cairngorm mountains, on the N. side of Cairntoul, Aberdeenshire, and, after a course of 96 miles, falling into the German Ocean, at the town of Aberdeen. Its source has an elevation of 4,000 feet, and it drains 1,000 square miles of country.—Another, in Kirkcudbrightshire, which, after, a course of 50 miles, joins the Solway Firth, below the town of Kirkcudbright.

DEE, a river of Ireland, which traverses the county of Louth, and, after a course of 20 miles, falls into Dundalk Bay.

DEE, JOHN, an English mathematician and astrologer, son of the gentleman server to Henry VIII. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and on the founding of Trinity College, was chosen one of its fellows. Becoming, however, suspected of practising magic, he went to Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in civil law. He there read lectures in the mathematics, and also at Paris, where he was offered a mathematical professorship in the university. In 1551 he returned to England, and obtained the rectory of Upton-upon-Severn; but his devotion to mathematical studies again brought him into trouble, by causing him to be accused of practising magical incantations. He was also accused of preaching against the life of Queen Mary, for which he suffered imprisonment. On the death of Mary, he rose into favour with Queen Elizabeth, who, it is alleged, occasionally employed him as spy, and visited him at Mortlake, where he resided, but from which he was driven by a mob, which attacked his house and destroyed his library and instruments. As the people would have him a magician, he seems, at length, to have believed that he was one, and in 1581, with Edward Kelly, began magical operations, which lasted two years. In these they were joined by a polish nobleman, called Laski, who persuaded Dee to go to Poland, where they remained some time, holding, it was alleged, communication with spirits. He subsequently returned, by order of the queen, and, in 1595, was made warden of Manchester College. He published several mathematical works in Latin and English, and wrote many more, which were never printed; but in 1659 Dr. Casaubon published "A true and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits," &c. The genius of Dee was comprehensive, and seems to have been misunderstood in the age in which he lived.

Born in London, 1527; died at Mortlake, 1608.

DEEG, a town and fortress of British India, in the Bengal presidency, 57 miles N.W. of Agra. There are the ruins of seven fine palaces. Lord Lake took the fortress by storm in 1805.

DEEPING, MARKET, a town of Lincolnshire, 38 miles S.E. of Lincoln. There is a fine old church. EAST DEEPING is a suburb, on the bank of the Welland. There is a large ancient parish church. Pop. of town and suburb, 3,000.

DEER ISLAND, an island in the state of Maine, United States, off the S.E. shore of Penobscot Bay. It is about 18 miles in circumference, has a feeble soil, and several good harbours. Pop. 2,800.

DEERFIELD, a town of the state of New York, United States, 4 miles N. of Utica. Pop. 3,500.

DEERFIELD, a town of New Jersey, United States. There are four churches and several factories. Pop. 2,800.

DEESCH, or DEES, deesh, a town of the Austrian empire, in Transylvania, at the confluence of the Great and Little Szamos, 30 miles N.E. of Klausenberg. There are a Protestant, a Roman Catholic, and two Greek churches, and two convents. The ruins of the old castle of Deesvar are in the neighbourhood. A considerable trade in salt is carried on. Pop. 5,300.

DEFFANT, MARQUISE DU, daf'-faun, a French lady, distinguished for her wit and talents, the centre of a famous coterie of fashionable and literary notabilities. Her correspondence has been published.

Born 1697; died 1780.

DEFIANCE, de-fi'-ance, a county of Ohio, United States, bordering on Indiana. Area, 414 square miles. Pop. 22,515.—The capital is Defiance.

DE FOE, DANIEL, de-fo', the author of "Robinson Crusoe," was the son of James Foe, a butcher, of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He himself prefixed the De to his name, but for what reason we have no intimation. He began to write political pamphlets at the age of 21, and in 1685 took part in the rebellion of the duke of Monmouth, but fortunately for him escaped the punishment so ruthlessly awarded to the duke's adherents. In 1688 our author kept a hosier's shop in Cornhill; but becoming a bankrupt had recourse to his pen for a subsistence. He subsequently received the appointment of accountant to the Commissioners of the glass duty, which office he held till that impost was taken off. In 1701 he produced his "True-born Englishman," a poem in defence of William III., which achieved a tremendous success, and in the following year appeared his "Shortest Way with the Dissenters," a pamphlet which drew upon him the vengeance of the government. Beholding the danger with which he was threatened, he absconded, when, on the 10th January, 1703, the following interesting descriptive advertisement appeared in the London Gazette:—"Whereas Daniel De Foe, alias De Fooe, is charged with writing a scandalous and seditious pamphlet, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' He is a middle-sized spare man, about 40 years old, of a brown complexion, and dark brown-coloured hair, but wears a wig; a hooked nose, a sharp chin, grey eyes, and a large mole near his mouth; was born in London, and for many years was a hose-factor in Freeman's Yard, in Cornhill, and now is owner of the brick and pantile works near Tilbury Fort, in Essex. Whoever will discover the said Daniel De Foe to one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, or any of her majesty's justices of the peace, so that he may be apprehended, shall have the reward of £50, which her majesty has ordered immediately to be paid upon such discovery." The luckless author was discovered, brought to trial, and sentenced to be pilloried, fined, and imprisoned. In the Gazette of the 31st July of the same year, it is recorded, that "on the 29th instant Daniel Foe, alias De Foe, stood in the pillory before the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, as he did yesterday near the Conduit in Cheapside, and this day at Temple Bar, in pursuance of his sentence, given against him at the last sessions at the Old Bailey, for writing and publishing a seditious libel, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' By which sentence he is also fined 200 marks, to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years, and to remain in prison till all be performed." However cruel had been the design of the government, in passing sentence on De Foe, the punishment itself was a complete failure. Such a pillory exhibition had seldom been seen in England; for exulting thousands accompanied him each day from Newgate to the pillory, to protect him from hurt or insult, and greeted him, also, with shouts of triumph on his return to Newgate. The very pillory itself was said to have been decorated with garlands; for it was the height of summer, when there was an abundance of flowers; and not only this; but refreshments were provided for him. On regaining his liberty, he retired to Bury St. Edmunds, where he continued to exercise his pen, and was instrumental in promoting the union of England and Scotland. In 1713 he was again committed to prison for some political pamphlets, but Lord Oxford procured his pardon. In 1715 he published the "Family Instructor," a religious performance of merit; and in 1719 appeared his greatest work, the romance of "Robinson Crusoe," supposed to have been founded on the story of Alexander Selkirk's being left on the island of Juan Fernandez. De Foe wrote a number of other fictions, among them "Moll Flanders," "Colonel Jack," the "Memoirs of a Cavalier," and a "Journal of the Plague," an imaginary account, which, for intense realism, has never been surpassed. It is almost impossible to believe that the book is not the production of an eye-witness of the scenes described, but De Foe was only four years old when the great plague broke out. Another production which had an immense sale was the "Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs. Veal," which he wrote to push the sale of a dull work, "Drelincourt on Death," which hung terribly on the hands of the booksellers. The "Political History of the Devil" was another extraordinary work. De Foe may be considered as the father of the English novel, and of periodical publications.

Born in London, 1661; died 1731.

DEGERANDO, JOSEPH MARIE, dai'-ge-ran'-do, French author and philanthropist. He was descended from an Italian family, and studied at Lyons, intending to become a priest, but the Revolution altered his plans. He entered the army of Massena, in Germany, as a common soldier, and while in that humble capacity wrote a philosophical treatise which was "crowned" by the Academy. A work on the history of philosophy soon followed, and procured him admission to the Academy of Belles Lettres. He was appointed secretary to the Ministry of the Interior, and subsequently held several offices of importance under the empire. He was elevated to the peerage in 1837, and at the time of his death was vice-president of the Council of State. He wrote several works on moral, economical, and educational subjects.

Born at Lyons, 1772; died 1842.

DEGGENDORF, deg'-gen-dorf, a town of Bavaria, on the Danube. There are several churches and charitable institutions. Many thousand pilgrims annually visit one of the churches, supposed to possess a miraculous wafer. Manf. Pottery and linens. Pop. 5,500.

DEGNEZLI, de-neez'-le, a city of Asia Minor, 52 miles from Allah Shehr. In 1715, 12,000 of its inhabitants were destroyed by an earthquake. From that time it has never regained its former importance.

DEHRA DOON, dai'-ra-doon, a valley of India, at the base of the Himalayas, 45 miles long and 20 miles wide. There are 234 towns, and extensive forests, and the soil is very fertile, and the scenery magnificent.

DEHRA, the chief town in the above valley, 72 miles S.E. of Simla, at an elevation of 2,360 feet. Many Europeans reside there, and a good trade is carried on.

DEIOPEIA, de'-i-o-pe'-ya, a nymph, the fairest of all the fourteen nymphs that attended upon Juno, who promised her in marriage to Æolus, the god of the winds, if he would destroy the fleet of Æneas, which was sailing for Italy.

DEIR, dair, the name of many places in the East, the principal being 10 miles from Beyrout, in Syria. It is the chief town of the Druses, whose emir lives in its citadel.

DEJANIRA, dej'-a-ni'-ra, a daughter of Œneus, king of Ætolia. Her father promised to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the strongest of all his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children. When Nessus, a centaur, who had offered violence to Dejanira, was dying by a poisoned arrow shot from the bow of Hercules, she accepted from him the present of his tunic, which Nessus said had the power of reclaiming a husband from unlawful loves. Accordingly, when Hercules became enamoured of Iola, daughter of the king of Œchalia, she sent him the centaur's tunic, which instantly caused his death. Dejanira was so disconsolate at this event, that she destroyed herself. (See HERCULES.)

DEJOTARUS, de-jot'-a-rus, a tetrarch of Galatia, who was created, by the Romans, king of that country, with the addition of Lesser Armenia. He joined the party of Pompey, but, on the defeat of that general, submitted himself to Cæsar, who dethroned him, but soon afterwards restored his estates.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DEKKER. (See DECKER.)

DE KALB, JOHN, de-kaulb', general in the American army, during the War of Independence. He was the son of German peasants, entered the French army, and served with distinction in the Seven Years' War. In 1768 he visited America on a secret mission from the French government, and in 1776, with Lafayette, offered his services to Congress. He was one of the ablest officers in the American army, and took part in most of the leading events of the war. He was killed, while commanding the American troops against Cornwallis at Camden.

Born at Huttendorf, Germany, 1721; died 1780.

DE KALB, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 12,675. Capital, Lebanon.

DE KALB, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 14,497. Decatur is the capital.

DE KALB, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 26,768. The capital is Sycamore.

DE KALB, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 365 square miles. Pop. 20,225. Auburn is the capital.

DE KALB, a county of Missouri, United States. Pop. 13,334. Marysville is the capital.

DE KALB, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 275 square miles. Pop. 14,813. Capital, Smithville.

DE LA BECHE, SIR HENRY THOMAS, baish, an eminent geologist, who first imbibed a taste for that science whilst residing at Charmouth and Lyme Regis, previous to his being sent to the military school at Great Marlow. In 1814 he entered the army, and in 1817 became a fellow of the Geological Society. Of this society he subsequently became secretary, foreign secretary, and finally president in 1847. Throughout the whole of his life, he ardently devoted himself to his favourite science, reporting on the geology of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Wales, and other parts; and was, by his map of Cornwall, the cause of suggesting to the government the geological survey. He founded the Museum of Practical Geology, and succeeded in establishing the School of Mines. His mind was of an eminently practical character. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1848 was knighted. In 1853 he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Sir Henry wrote largely on geology, and published several excellent manuals for the young student. His "How to Observe," first published in 1835, has been pronounced a truly Baconian volume,—a sort of Novum Organum of geology.

Born near London, 1796; died 1855.

DELACROIX, FERDINAND VICTOR EUGÈNE, del-a-krwaw, a distinguished French painter. His father passed through the sternest scenes of the great revolution, and, in 1805, died prefect of the Mouths of the Rhone and the Gironde. Young Delacroix was well educated, and commenced the study of arts in his 18th year. His first exhibited picture represented "Dante and Virgil sailing round the Infernal City," and excited a great deal of controversy; which may be taken as a sign of its being differently executed from the style of French art then in vogue, as well as of its indicating proofs of genius. It was succeeded by the "Massacre of Scio," which placed him at the head of a school designated the "Romantic." Both of these pictures now belong to the national collection, and hang on the walls of the Luxembourg. His position was now in a measure fixed, and he continued to work with unremitting assiduity. Among his earlier performances, we may notice his "Christ in the Garden," "Milton dictating 'Paradise Lost' to his Daughters," and "Mephistopheles appearing to Faust." The revolution of 1830 supplied him with other themes; but having become an attaché of the government mission to Morocco, the scenes of the East suggested new subjects. On his return, he exhibited, in 1834, "Women of Algiers;" a work which Parisian judges declared placed him on a parity with Rubens as a colorist. M. Thiers, who had from the first been his admirer, being now minister of the interior, gave him the walls of the Salon du Roi, at the Palais Bourbon, to paint; which he accomplished by symbolically illustrating the arts, winning for himself still greater fame. He was now called upon to adorn other public buildings, at which he laboured, whilst, at intervals, he produced other important gallery and cabinet paintings. Among these may be named "Hamlet with the Skull of Yorick," "Medea," "Cleopatra," "Christ at the Tomb," and the "Resurrection of Lazarus." In 1857 he became a member of the Institute. His works, as a whole, are numerous, and marked by great energy of style and originality of invention. His admirers place him on the same pedestal with Paul Veronese.

Born at Charenton-Saint-Maurice, near Paris, 1799; died 1863.

DELAGOA BAY, del-a-go'-a, is situate on the S.E. coast of Africa, about midway between Mozambique and the Cape. It is 55 miles long, by 20 broad. The Delagoa, Manice, Machavenna, and many smaller rivers flow into the bay, which is a good deal frequented by the South-Sea whalers, who find it safe and commodious. The Portuguese have a small settlement. The most N. point of its entrance is in lat. 25° 58' S.; lon. 33° 15' E.

DELAMBRE, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH, del-ambr', a distinguished French astronomer, who was first taught by the poet Delisle, at Amiens, and who afterwards entered the astronomical class under Lalande, in the College of France, at Paris. This teacher, as did Delisle, became the friend of Delambre; who made for him many difficult calculations. Up to this period, Delambre had supported himself by translating foreign works for publishers, and by giving instructions as a professor of languages; when he became tutor to the two sons of a person of the name of d'Assy. This gentleman fitted up a small observatory for his use, and Delambre soon became an adept in the use of the instruments, when he resolved to devote himself to the study of astronomy and its history. Persevering by nature, and devoted to whatever he engaged in, he surmounted every obstacle that came in his way, and, in 1781, formed the tables of the motion of Herschel's newly-discovered planet, Uranus, which procured him the prize awarded by the Academy of Sciences. He then entered upon the construction of his solar tables and those of other planets; and, in 1792, completed his calculations, and received another prize, which the Academy had offered in the preceding year. He was then deputed, with Méchain, to measure the arc from Dunkirk to Barcelona, which, from the death of his assistant, he had to complete himself. The result of the measurements taken in the performance of this duty, furnished the data for his work entitled "Base du Système Métrique Décimal," for which the Institute of France decreed him a prize. He had now attained what may reasonably be supposed to be the summit of a philosopher's ambition, and was chosen an associate of almost every learned body in Europe. In his own country, honours were showered upon him. In 1814 he was appointed a member of the Council of Public Instruction, and in 1817 he was made a chevalier of the order of St. Michael. His scientific works are very numerous.

Born at Amiens, 1749; died at Paris, 1822.

DELAROCHE, PAUL, de-la-rosh', an eminent modern French painter, who early became devoted to his art. At first he applied himself to landscape, but by degrees entered upon historical subjects, and became the head of the "Eclectic" school. His style and pictures are so generally familiar, that it is hardly necessary to do more than enumerate the names of some of them, to recall them to mind, and prove his claim to the eminence he attained. "Joan of Arc in Prison with Cardinal Beaufort," the "Death of Queen Elizabeth," "The Children of Edward IV. in the Tower," "Cromwell contemplating the Dead Body of Charles I.," "Execution of Lady Jane Grey," "Charles I. insulted by the Parliamentary Soldiers in the Guard-room," "Strafford receiving the Blessing of Laud, on his way to the Scaffold," "The Death of the Duke of Guise," "Napoleon crossing the Alps," "Napoleon at Fontainebleau," and many more. Most of these, if not all, have been engraved; and may be said to be almost universally known. In 1832 Delaroche was elected a member of the Institute, and the next year appointed professor of painting in the Parisian School of Fine Arts, and in 1834 was created an officer of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Paris, 1797; died 1856.

DELAYTIN, de-la'-tin, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, at the confluence of the Budsina with the Pruth. There are salt-springs and refineries. Pop. 3,300.

DELAVIGNE, JEAN-FRANÇOIS CASIMIR, del-a-veen', a modern French poet and dramatist, whose best effusions are his "Messéniennes," which deplore the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. He also wrote several dramas which enjoyed an ephemeral success.

Born at Havre, 1793; died at Lyons, 1843.

DELAWARE, del'-a-war, one of the United States, bounded N. by Pennsylvania, S. and W. by Maryland, and E. by Delaware Bay and the Atlantic Ocean. In general low and level; and, at particular seasons, overspread by large quantities of stagnant water. It is chiefly an agricultural state, and includes a very fertile tract of country. In it is Cypress Swamp, which yields large quantities of pine timber. A canal in the N. part of the state connects the Chesapeake river with the Delaware.

Area.—2,120 square miles.
Pop.—146,608.
Chief Towns.—DOVER, the political capital, WILMINGTON, Milford, Newcastle, Loire, Smyrna, and Georgetown.
Lat. Between 38° 29′ to 39° 47′ N. Lon. 75° to 75° 45′ W.
History.—The first settlement was made in 1627 by Swedes and Finlanders. In 1655 the Dutch obtained possession, and retained it until 1664, when the country came into the hands of the English, and formed at first part of Pennsylvania. The name is taken from Lord Delaware, governor of Virginia in the time of James I.

DELAWARE, a river of the United States, rising in the Catskill mountains, and, after a course of about 300 miles, expanding into Delaware Bay, lying between the state of that name and New Jersey. It is connected by canals with the river Hudson and the Bay of Chesapeake, and is navigable from its mouth, as far as Philadelphia, for large vessels.

DELAWARE BAY, an inlet of the Atlantic, formed by the mouth of the Delaware river and several other small ones. Ext. About 60 miles long, and 25 wide between Capes Henlopen and May, where are two stone piers, inclosing an artificial harbour.

DELAWARE, or DELAWARE COURT HOUSE, capital of Delaware county, Ohio, on the left bank of the Obentangy, 30 miles N. of Columbus. There are six churches and a Wesleyan university. In the vicinity is a sulphur spring much resorted to. Pop. 4,000.

DELAWARE, a county of Indiana, United States. Area. 394 square miles. Pop. 22,926. Muncie is the capital.

DELAWARE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area. 576 square miles. Pop. 17,950. Delhi is the capital.

DELAWARE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area. 610 square miles. Pop. 27,381. Capital, Delaware.

DELAWARE, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area. 220 square miles. Pop. 56,101. Media is the capital.

DELAWARE, a county of New York, United States. Area. 1,362 square miles. Pop. 43,000. The capital is Delhi.

DELEMONT, dale'-mawn(g), a town of Switzerland, 18 miles S.W. of Basel. The streets are wide, and there are several fountains. There is a college. Pop. 1,500, all Catholics.

DELESSERT, BENJAMIN, da-las-sair', French manufacturer, distinguished for his efforts in promoting the making of beet-root sugar, for which the Emperor Napoleon rewarded him with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Lyons, 1773; died 1847.

DELFT, delft, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of S. Holland, on the Schie, 8 miles N.W. of Rotterdam. It is tolerably well built; most of the streets are divided by narrow canals, crossed by 69 bridges. In the centre of the town there are two spacious streets, with broad canals bordered with trees. The principal buildings are the palace, in which, in 1584, William, prince of Orange, was assassinated, now converted into a barracks; the new church, containing a monument to the memory of the prince; the old church, where are monuments of Admiral Van Tromp and Leeuwenhoek, the naturalist; the council-house, arsenal, the military engineering academy, and several churches. Manf. The earthenware or counterfeit porcelain, called Delft ware, for which the place was once famous, is now made in very small quantities; woollen cloth, and tobacco-pipes, butter, and next to it, beer, are the principal objects of the wholesale trade. Pop. 27,241.

DELFTSHAVEN, delfts-ha'-fen, a town of Holland, on the bank of the Maas, 2 miles below Rotterdam. Pop. 4,800, mostly engaged in fishing and shipbuilding.

DELHI or DEHLI, del'-he, a division of the province of the Punjaub, British India, bounded E. by the Ganges, N. by a range of mountains, W. by the deserts of Moultan, S. by Ajmeer. The soil is generally sandy, and rendered fertile principally by artificial watering. The Jumna and its branches spread over portions of the district. It also contains the Delhi Canal and the Hansouti Nullah, a lake formed during the rainy season. Area, 1,273 square miles; of which about one-third are uncultivated. Pop. 1,907,984 of whom about 500,000 are Hindoos and 140,000 Mahometans. Lat. between 28° 24′ and 28° 54′ N. Lon. between 76° 50′ and 77° 30′ E.

DELHI, or DEHLI, a celebrated city of British India, and for many years the capital of the Mogul empire, situate near the right bank of the river Jumna. The ancient name was Indraprestha, or Inderput, and the Mahometan name Shahjehanabad. During the era of its splendour, the city is said to have covered a space of 30 miles in length; but it is now reduced to a circumference of about 7 or 8 miles. The remains of the ancient city consist of ruined palaces, tombs, and gardens. The modern city is surrounded by strong walls, 30 feet high and with a wide moat, and entered by 11 gates. Most of the streets are narrow, but there are two fine avenues, one of which, the Chandni Chauk, is nearly a mile long and 90 feet wide, and the other is longer and 120 feet wide. Among the finest public buildings are the Mogul's palace, surrounded by walls and with two principal entrances, the Delhi and Lahore gates, both superb structures; the Jumna Musjid, the principal mosque, a splendid edifice in the Byzantine-Arabic style, built by Shah Jehan, and restored by the British government, and the Delhi college, founded in 1792, and attended by several hundred students of the English and Oriental languages. There are about 40 mosques, including the Souna Musjid, with domes and minarets overlaid with golden, plates, and, about 5 miles to the south of the town the tomb of the Emperor Hoomaioon, a large and very beautiful building with a large vaulted hall, containing the sarcophagi of the emperor and his wife. Near this is the highly ornamented tomb, in white marble, with exquisite arabesque and fillagree work, of the Mahometan saint, Nizam-ad-Deen. The city has railway communication with Calcutta and Bombay, and intermediate places.

Manf.—Embroidered shawls, ornamental needlework, and beautiful goldsmith's work.

Pop. — 173,393, Hindoos and Mahometans, in nearly equal numbers.

Lat. 28° 39 N. Lon. 77° 18′ E.

History.—Delhi was taken by Timour in 1398; the modern town was founded in 1631; Nadir Shah sacked the city, and killed 100,000 of the inhabitants in 1739; the Mahrattas, aided by the French, took it in 1803, but were soon afterwards driven out by Lord Lake. In the terrible mutiny of 1857, the rebels established themselves there, and held the place for four months, when they were dislodged in the most heroic manner by the British troops.

DELILLE, JACQUES, de-leel', a French poet of considerable eminence. He was professor at the College de Lisieux, Paris, and translated the "Georgics," of Virgil, which obtained for him admission to the French Academy. He afterwards became professor of the belles-lettres in the Paris University. Having twice withdrawn from the unsettled social condition of his country, he went to Switzerland, and then to London, where he translated Milton's "Paradise Lost." On his return he produced his poem entitled "Conversation;" but shortly afterwards became blind, and died. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced the "Three Reigns of Nature," "Misfortune and Pity," and "Imagination." The chief characteristics of his effusions are sweetness of versification, true pathos, and purity of moral sentiment.

Born in Auvergne, 1738; died 1813.

DELISLE, JOSEPH NICHOLAS, de-leel', an eminent French mathematician and astronomer, who had for his pupil the celebrated Lalande. Being invited to Russia, he there held the appointment of astronomer-royal for upwards of twenty years. On returning to Paris, he was appointed professor in the Royal College. In 1724 he paid a visit to England, and was there acquainted with both Newton and Halley.

Born 1688; died 1768.

DELITZCH, de-litch, a town of Prussia, in the province of Saxony, on the right bank of the Lober, 14 miles N. W. of Leipsic. Manf. Woollen cloth, hosiery, and tobacco. Several annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,500.

DELLYS, del-lis', a seaport of Algeria, 49 miles E. of Algiers. A good trade in agricultural produce is carried on. Pop. 2,800. Lat. 36° 55′ N. Lon. 3° 55′ E.

DELOLME, JEAN LOUIS, de-lolm', a political writer, who first practised as a lawyer in his native Geneva, and afterwards travelled to gain a knowledge of the constitutions of various countries. He fixed his abode in England, where he remained until near the close of his life, composing political essays, and writing in the journals. In spite of considerable talents, he led a miserable existence, having an unfortunate passion for gaming. He is best known by his "History of the Constitution of England," written in French, but translated into English, and often reprinted. "It is the best work to consult on the government of England," says a foreign writer, "and proves its superiority over all other existing governments."

Born at Geneva, 1740; died at Switzerland, 1806.

DELORME, de-lorm', a notorious Frenchwoman, whose house was the resort of many prominent political characters, for which she incurred the displeasure of Cardinal Mazarin, who ordered her to be imprisoned, but she died suddenly. There is a strange popular belief that she did not actually die, but escaped to England, became the heroine of many marvellous adventures, and lived for upwards of a century. She is the heroine of one of Victor Hugo's historical dramas.

Born near Chalons-sur-Marne, 1612.

DELORME, PHILIBERT, de-lorm', a celebrated French architect, who first studied in Italy, and was attracted to Paris by the Cardinal du Bellay, who introduced him to the court of Henry II. Delorme executed for this prince the plans of the châteaux of Anet and Meudon, and subsequently, for Catharine de Medicis, those of the Valois court at St. Denis, and of the palace of the Tuileries, of which he was created governor. He left some writings on architectural art; amongst which is a treatise entitled "New Inventions in order to build better and at small cost."

Born at Lyons, 1518; died 1577.

DELOS, or ORTYGIA, now SAILLES, de'-los, one of the Cyclades, at the N. of Naxos, sacred to Apollo and Diana. According to fable, Neptune caused it to rise out of the waters, to save Latona and her two children, who were pursued by the jealousy of Juno. The dead were not interred, but were transported to the neighbouring island of Rheneia. One of the altars of Apollo, in the island, was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world. Lat. 37° 23′ N. Lon. 25° 17′ E.

DELPHI, now CASHI, del'-fi, a town of Phocis, also called Pytho, situate in a valley to the W. of Mount Parnassus. The ancients regarded Delphi as a sacred city, and considered it to be the centre of the world. Its temple and its oracle of Apollo rendered it celebrated throughout all the countries inhabited by the Greeks. The oracles were generally given in verse, by a priestess, named Pythia; but when it had been sarcastically observed that the god and patron of poetry was the most imperfect poet in the world, the priestess delivered her answers in prose. The temple was built and destroyed several times, and the immense riches which were sent to the altar of Apollo from all parts were often the object of plunder.

DELTA, del'-ta, a part of Egypt, which received its name from its resemblance to the form of the fourth letter (Δ delta) of the Greek alphabet. It lies between the Canopian and Pelusian mouths of the Nile, and is said to have been formed by the accumulated mud and sand, washed down by the Nile from the upper parts of Egypt. As a geographical expression, DELTA is applied to alluvial tracts, sometimes formed by, and inclosed between, the branches of a river and the sea into which it debouches. There are several deltas, the principal of which are those of the Nile and the Niger in Africa, and the Ganges in Asia.

DELUC, JOHN ANDREW, de'-look', a modern philosopher, who principally devoted himself to the study of physics and geology, extending his observations to all parts of Europe, and endeavouring to make his discoveries tally with the text of the book of Genesis. He passed a portion of his life in England, and was there appointed queen's reader. His principal works are, "Theory of Barometers and Thermometers," "New Notions on Meteorology," "Letters to the Queen of England on the Mountains and History of the Earth," and "Geological Journeys." In 1811 he published "An Account of the Philosophy of Bacon," with the view of opposing Lasalle, a French infidel translator of the English philosopher; but the work was not much esteemed. To Deluc we owe many important improvements in the barometer, thermometer, and hydrometer.

Born at Geneva, 1727: died at Windsor, 1817.

DELVINO, del-vé-no, one of the principal towns of Lower Albania, in European Turkey. It is fortified, is the residence of a Greek bishop, and is built on the side of a hill covered with orange plantations. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 40° N. Lon. 20° 15′ E.

DEMADES, dem'-a-dees, an Athenian, who, from being a mariner, became a distinguished orator, and rose to high service in the republic. He was made prisoner by Philip of Macedon at the battle of Cheronea, 338 B.C., and succeeded, by his frankness, in gaining the esteem of his captor, and was set at liberty. He remained some time attached to Macedon, and used his influence in favour of the Macedonian party at Athens. Betraying, however, Antipater, he was put to death by Cassander, the son of the latter. An oration of his is said to be in "Rhetorum Collectio," Venice, 1513.

Died about 322 B.C.

DEMAS, dé'-mas, "popular," a Christian professor, corrupted by the love of riches.

DEMAVEND, MOUNT, dem'-a-vend, the highest peak in the Elburz chain, in Persia, 40 miles N. E. of Teheran. It is volcanic, and of the form of a cone 20,000 feet high.

DEMBEA, or TZANA, dem'-be-a, a province of Abyssinia, including all the territory surrounding the great lake which bears its name. The LAKE is 60 miles long, with an average breadth of 25. It is at an elevation of 6,000 feet above the sea level, and contains several islands. The Bahr-el-Azrek, or Abyssinia Nile, flows through it. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 37° 15′ E.

DEMBIA, a river of Western Africa, falling into the W. Atlantic in Lat. 9° 45′ N.

DEMBINSKI, HEINRICH, dem-bin'-ske, a Polish general, who took an active part in the Hungarian revolution of 1848-9. He entered the Polish army in 1809, accompanied the French in the invasion of Russia; was prominent in the Polish insurrection of 1830, and became commander-in-chief of the national army. In 1833 he entered the service of Mehemet Ali in Egypt. In 1848 Kossuth appointed him commander-in-chief of the Hungarian forces, but he resigned the command after the defeat of Kapolna. When the Hungarians capitulated he fled into Turkey. In 1850 he went to Paris, where he resided till his death.

Born 1791; died 1864.

DEMERARA, demé-a-rair'-a, a river of British Guiana, S. America, which, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the Atlantic in lat. 6° 50′ N.; lon. 58° W. It is navigable by large ships for 100 miles. A district of British Guiana is named from the river. (See GUIANA, BRITISH.)

DEMERARA, a province of British Guiana, South America, taking its name from the river. It extends for about 100 miles along the coast. The soil is very fertile, producing cotton, rice, sugar, and coffee. The chief town is Georgetown. Pop. 85,000.

DEMETER, de-mé'-ter, in Grecian mythology, the great mother goddess, the nourishing and fertilizing principle of nature. The Romans worshipped her as Ceres. (See CERES.)

DEMETRIUS, de-mé'-tre-us, king of Macedon, surnamed Poliorcetes, ("the conqueror of cities"), on account of the many places which he destroyed, one of Alexander the Great's generals and successors. He was the son of Antigonus, and at the age of twenty-two, was sent with an army against Ptolemy, by whom he was defeated near Gaza; he soon, however, repaired his losses, and, with a fleet of 250 ships, sailed to Athens, which he conquered from Demetrius Phalereus. He afterwards defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ, but was subsequently, himself, overthrown at the battle of Ipsus, fought 301 B.C., when he fled to Ephesus, the Athenians refusing to receive him. Notwithstanding this ingratitude, he raised another army, and when they groaned under the power of a foreign enemy, came to their help. He then slew Alexander, the son of Cassander, and seated himself on the throne of Macedon. At the end of seven years, he was obliged to quit his kingdom and retire into Asia, where, being reduced to great distress, he went to the court of Seleucus, his son-in-law; but a difference breaking out between them, war ensued, in which he was defeated. Seleucus then confined him in a castle, but allowed him to take the diversion of hunting. He died of excessive drinking.

Died 286 B.C.

DEMETRIUS I., king of Syria, surnamed Soter, was the son of Seleucus Philopator. He was, for some time, deprived by usurpers of his rightful inheritance; but the Syrians, recognizing him as their lawful sovereign, placed him on the throne. He then declared war against the Jews, in which conflict Judas Maccabæus lost his life, bravely fighting for the liberties of his country. A confederacy of the neighbouring kings was subsequently formed against Demetrius, and he was slain.

Died 150 B.C.

DEMETRIUS II., surnamed Nicator, the son of the preceding, was placed on the throne by Ptolemy Philomator, king of Egypt, after expelling the usurper Alexander Balas, 146 B.C. He married Cleopatra, the wife of the same Alexander, and daughter of Ptolemy, but gave himself up to dissipation; when, after various vicissitudes, his reign became so intolerable, that his subjects solicited the king of Egypt to grant them another sovereign. Demetrius fled, and was killed by the governor of Tyre.

Died 127 B.C.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a celebrated orator and statesman of Athens, attached to the Macedonian party, and elected by their influence, archon, 317 B.C. He governed wisely; and the Athenians, charmed by his eloquence, erected 360 bronze statues to his honour. He afterwards fell into disgrace, and Demetrius Poliorcetes took possession of the city, and proclaimed the liberty of the Athenians to throw off the yoke of the Macedonians. His life being threatened, he fled to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, whose son banished him from his dominions, and he fled to Busires, in Upper Egypt, where he died from the bite of an asp. He wrote several books, and, it is said, that the library of Alexandria was commenced by his advice, and that he contributed to it a very large number of volumes. There is a treatise on rhetoric ascribed to him; but it is of more modern date. (See DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES.)

Born at Phalerus, 345 B.C.; died 283 B.C.

DEMETRIUS, the son of Ivan IV., czar of Russia, was still in his cradle at the death of his father. He was the brother and sole heir of Fedor. His uncle, the ambitious Boris Godonov caused him to be assassinated, thus hoping to pave his own way to the throne. The disappearance of Demetrius furnished an opportunity for a crowd of impostors to assert their right to the crown. One of these, a monk, and whose real name was Gregory Otrepieff, caused himself to be recognized as czar in 1605, and, after a reign of a few months, was assassinated in Moscow, 1606. The false Demetriuses ceased not to make their appearances until the rise of the house of Romanoff in 1613.

Born 1582; died 1592.

DEMETZ, FREDERIC AUGUSTE, da-mets', originator of the reformatory system of treating young criminals in France. He was a member of the bar, and having held various judicial offices, visited America to study the penitentiary system. The result was the foundation of the famous agricultural and penitentiary college at Mettray, which has produced such interesting and valuable results.

Born 1796.

DEMIDOV, or DEMIDOFF NIKITA, dem'-i-dof, an armoury founder at Toula, who was intrusted by Peter the Great with the business of casting the canon for that prince's numerous warlike expeditions. He actively seconded all the exertions of the czar, and in 1725 discovered the mines of Kolyvan, the working of which speedily enriched him. He left a son, AKIMFI, and several grandsons, who distinguished themselves in the same career as their progenitor, and amassed colossal fortunes.

DEMIDOV, or DEMIDOFF, NICOLAS NIKITICH, a zealous philanthropist, who introduced into his country several branches of industry, founded establishments of public utility, and carried, to a great state of perfection, the working of mines. He had an annual income of a quarter of a million sterling. His last years he passed in France and Italy, enjoying the society of learned men, and heaping benefits on all around him. He left two sons, PAUL and ANATOL, who, as well as inheriting his fortune, had also the same high taste and benevolence. Of these, Count Anatol allied himself to the Bonaparte family, by marrying, in 1840, one of Napoleon's nieces, the Princess Mathilde, daughter of Jerome, and sister of Prince Napoleon. In 1845, however, a separation took place between them.

Born 1773; died at Florence, 1828.

DEMIR-HISSAR, de-mir his'-sar, ("iron castle,") a town of European Turkey, in Roumelia. It is fortified, and contains several mosques and a Greek church. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 41° 12' N. Lon. 23° 28' W.

DEMMIN, dem'-min, a town of Prussia, in the province of Pomerania, 27 miles from Stralsund. It stands at the mouth of the Trebel and Tolleuse. It is a place of considerable antiquity, and has a celebrity from the number of sieges it has sustained. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, and hats. There are distilleries and breweries. Pop. 9,100.

DEMOCEDES, dem'-o-se'-dees, a physician of Crotona, who went to Athens, and resided at the court of Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos. On the death of that prince, he and his family became captives to the Persians, and were carried to Susa, where he worked with other slaves. Happening to cure Darius from the effects of a wound received whilst hunting, he was liberally rewarded, admitted to the royal table, and requested by the monarch to remain at his court. He returned, however, to his own country, and married the daughter of Milo the wrestler.

Lived in the 6th century B.C.

DEMOCRITUS, de-mok'-ri-tus, a famous Greek philosopher, whose father was a man of wealth; but Democritus, preferring philosophy to riches, spent his patrimony in travelling to acquire knowledge. He was the most learned man of his age, and maintained the highest character for moral worth. Fragments of his writings have come down to us. He was the author of the atomic system of philosophy (a recent reference to which by Professor Tyndal, has recalled attention to the philosophical teaching of Democritus) and the precursor of Epicurus.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

DEMOIVRE, ABRAHAM, dai-mwavre', mathematician. French by birth, he passed the greater part of his life in England. At first he earned a poor living by teaching mathematics, lecturing, and answering questions as to probabilities and games of chance, annuities, and similar matters. He rose into fame, and became a member of the Royal Societies of London, Berlin, and Paris. Besides some purely mathematical treatises, he wrote a work on the doctrine of chances (dedicated to Sir Isaac Newton), and another on life annuities.

Born at Vitri, France, 1667; died in London, 1754.

DEMONA, VAL DI, dai-mo'-na, one of the old divisions of Sicily, which occupied the N.E. portion of the island. It is now divided into the provinces of Catania, Messina, and Palermo.

DEMONTE, dai-mon'-tai, a town of Northern Italy, near the Stura, with a citadel on a high rock, 15 miles S.W. of Coni. It contains several churches and an hospital. Pop. 6,100.

DE MORGAN, AUGUSTUS, de mor'-gan, mathematician. Educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was professor of mathematics in University College, London, from its foundation, in 1828, till 1831, when he resigned. In 1836, however, he returned to the same post. He was the author of a great many works on arithmetic, trigonometry, mathematics, and the kindred sciences, and a contributor to the "Penny Cyclopædia."

Born in the island of Madura, East Indies, 1806; died 1871.

DEMOSTHENES, de-mos'-the-nees, the greatest of Grecian orators, was the son of an Athenian, a wealthy armourer. Losing his father when a child, his guardians embezzled a considerable portion of his estate, and, at the age of seventeen, he pleaded his cause against them, in which he was successful. His first attempts at oratory, however, in the public assembly, were not so happy; for his lungs were weak, his pronunciation inarticulate, and his gestures awkward. He now retired for some years from public life, and by great perseverance overcame his defects. He would declaim as he walked up the side of steep hills, and by the seashore, when the waves were roaring, and accustom himself to speak with pebbles in his mouth. To acquire a good gesture, he would practise before a mirror; and to correct a habit he had of shrugging up one of his shoulders, he placed a sharp-pointed sword just over it, in the place where he stood. The principles of his art he had acquired under Isæus, and he had also attended the lectures of Plato. Not being ready in speaking extemporaneously, he studied orations with great care in a cave, on which account his detractors declared that they smelt of the lamp. He read and re-read, too, all the great writers of antiquity, especially the history of Thucydides, which he transcribed, it is said, some eight or ten times. Having thus gained confidence that he had overcome his faults of manner and style, he returned to public affairs at the age of twenty-seven, and after passing some years at the bar, entered the government, and filled the highest offices of state. The encroachments of Philip of Macedon at this period alarmed all the Grecian states, particularly Athens. Demosthenes was foremost in rousing his countrymen to a sense of their danger. He depicted the ambitious designs of Philip in glowing colours in his celebrated orations called Philippics. When Philip was about to invade Attica, Demosthenes was sent as ambassador to prevail on the Bœotians to assist them; in which mission he succeeded. Philip dying, Demosthenes thought this a favourable opportunity to crush the Macedonian power, and by his exertions a new confederacy was formed among the Grecian states, and the Persians were solicited to commence hostilities against his son Alexander. The vigorous activity of this prince, however, and the dreadful chastisement he inflicted on Thebes, soon had the effect of breaking up the confederacy. The Athenians found it expedient to divert the victor's wrath by sending to him an embassy, of which Demosthenes formed one; but his apprehensions induced him to turn back on the road. He was one of the orators whom Alexander required to be delivered up; but Demades pacified the king without this sacrifice. The influence of Demosthenes being now on the decline, Æschines took advantage of it, to bring an accusation against him on the subject of his conduct at Chæronea; but the orator so well defended himself that he was honourably acquitted, and his adversary sent into exile. Shortly after, however, Demosthenes was convicted of receiving a golden cup and twenty talents from Harpalus, one of Alexander's generals, who had revolted from Alexander, and instigated the Athenians to rise against his authority. To avoid punishment, Demosthenes fled to Ægina, where he remained till the death of Alexander, when he was recalled by his countrymen, and brought home in triumph. But this change of fortune was of short duration. Declaring war against Antipater, Alexander's successor, and that general defeating the Athenians, he required the citizens to deliver up Demosthenes, who, with his friends, fled to the temple of Poseiden, at Calauria, where he poisoned himself. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and maintained his eldest child at the public expense. Majesty and energy are the characteristics of the eloquence of Demosthenes. To convince the understanding, rather than to exert a power over the passions of his hearers, was the object of this speaker's oratory; and, as Cicero said, this is the ideal model of true eloquence. Of the orations of Demosthenes which are extant, the text of Bekker is now regarded as the standard, and many of his orations have been translated into the English and other languages.

Born 385 B.C.; died 322 B.C.

DEMOTICA, de-mo'-te-ka, a town of European Turkey, in the province of Roumelia, on the Mariza, 25 miles S. of Adrianople. It is tolerably well built, and has a citadel and an old palace, the residence of a Greek bishop. Manf. Silks, woollens, and pottery. Pop. 8,000.

DEMPSTER, THOMAS, demp'-ster, a Scotch writer, who studied at Cambridge, whence he removed to Paris, and afterwards became professor of philology at Pisa. He wrote several books, the most curious of which are a "Martyrology of Scotland," a "List of Scottish Writers," and a "History of the Etruscans;" but, either from carelessness, indolence, or ignorance, none of them are to be relied upon. He unscrupulously claimed as of Scottish origin, not only eminent natives of other countries, but even people who never existed, and books which were never written, but the names of which were invented by himself.

Born at Muiresk, Aberdeenshire, 1579; died near Bologna, 1625.

DENAIN, de-nain(g'), a town of France, department Nord, on the left bank of the Scheldt, 5 miles W. of Valenciennes. It is situated in the midst of coal-fields and iron mines. Manf. Iron and beet-root sugar. Pop. 15,493.

DENBIGH, den'-be, a parliamentary borough of North Wales, the county town of Denbighshire, 30 miles W. of Chester, on the side and at the base of steep hills in the valley of the Clwyd. The market-hall is a large building in the Elizabethan style, and there is a large institution for the maintenance of orphan and other female children under the care of the Drapers' Company; and near the town is a county lunatic asylum. The ruins of a castle built by Lacy, earl of Lincoln, are on the summit of the hill. Manf. Shoes, leather, and woollen goods. Pop. 6,323. A station on the Great Western and London and North-Western Railways.

DENBIGHSHIRE, a county of North Wales, between the Dee and the Conway, having 8 miles of coast on the Irish Sea. The surface is partly mountainous, the highest summit being Cader Fromwen, 2,563 feet, and there are several others over 1,500 feet in elevation. There are beautiful and fertile vales, especially the extensive Vale of Clwyd, which is 20 miles long, and the Vale of Llangollen, famous for beautiful scenery. The climate is mild in the valleys, but cold in the hilly districts. About two-thirds of the county are under cultivation, and it is well timbered. The dairy produce is highly esteemed, and cattle and sheep and hardy ponies are reared. The rivers are the Dee, Conway, Clwyd, and Elivy.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, lead, copper, millstone, and slate.
Area, 600 square miles.
Pop.—108,931.
Chief Towns.—DENBIGH, ABERGELE, HOLT LLANGOLLEN, LLANRWST, RUABON, RUTHIN, and WREXHAM.

DENDER, den'-der, a small river of Belgium, which, after a course of 40 miles, joins the Scheldt, at Dendermonde.

DENDERAH, den'-de-ra, a ruined town of Upper Egypt (the ancient Tentyra), opposite Keneh, on the left bank of the Nile, remarkable for the fine antiquities which it contains. The great temple of Athor, or Aphrodite, built in the time of the early Roman emperors, is the admiration of every traveller; and it still remains in an almost entire state. It is 220 feet long and 50 broad, with a portico supported by 24 columns. There are other temples, surrounded by a wall, 35 feet high. Lat. 26° 13' N. Lon. 32° 40' E.

DENDERMONDE, or TERMONDE, den'-der-mond, a fortified town of Belgium, in the province of E. Flanders, at the conflux of the Dender and the Scheldt, 19 miles S.E. of Antwerp. Its principal buildings are a town-hall, an asylum, hospital, and several churches and convents. The old church of Notre Dame contains some fine pictures by Vandyke. There is a strong citadel, erected in 1581. Manf. Woollens and lace. Pop. 8,500.

DENHAM, DIXON, the companion of Clapperton in the expedition into Central Africa in 1823-4. He served in the Peninsular War, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1824 he published the narrative of the African expedition. In 1828 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Sierra Leone, where he died of fever.

Born in London, 1786; died 1828.

DENHAM, SIR JOHN, poet, whose father was baron of the court of Exchequer in Ireland. In 1631 he was sent to Trinity College, Oxford, whence he went to Lincoln's Inn, with the view of following the law; but in this he made little or no progress. In 1641 his tragedy of "The Sophy" appeared; and soon after he was made governor of Fareham Castle for Charles I. In 1643 he published his "Cooper's Hill," the best of all his works. It is in this poem that the celebrated couplet, so much admired, appears:—

> "Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull > Strong, without rage; without o'erflowing, full."

It relates to the Thames. After the decapitation of Charles I., he attended Charles II. in his exile, and was appointed by him ambassador to Poland. At the Restoration he was appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings, and created knight of the Bath. The latter years of his life were clouded by occasional insanity. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. "Cooper's Hill" is a descriptive poem, and gave rise to a new species of composition, which, says Johnson, may be denominated local poetry. Pope has bestowed on him the compliment of the "majestic Denham."

Born at Dublin, 1615; died 1668.

DENIA, de'-ne-a, a city and port of Spain, province of Valencia, 58 miles N.E. of Alicante. It is enclosed by old walls, and overlooked by an ancient castle. The church and town-house are handsome buildings, and there are several convents and schools. About 400 vessels enter the port annually, and a good export trade is carried on. Pop. 2,700.

DENINA, CARLO GIOVANNI MARIA, dane'-na, Italian author. In 1754 he was appointed professor at Pigneroli, and afterwards at Turin, but in each case was deprived of his chair in consequence of the animosity of the ecclesiastics whom he had satirised. He went to Berlin, on the invitation of Frederick the Great, and remained there many years. In 1804 he was introduced to Napoleon, who appointed him imperial librarian at Paris. He wrote various historical works in the Italian and French languages.

Born at Revello, 1731; died at Paris, 1813.

DENIS, or DENYS, ST., de-ne', an ancient town of France, in the department of the Seine, 6 miles N. of Paris. It was formerly fortified, but the walls have given way to promenades; and the town is within the outer line of forts which defend Paris. (See PARIS.) The abbey church is built in the Gothic style, and is remarkable for the delicacy of its structure and the richness of its ornaments. It was founded in 676 by Dagobert I., on the site of a chapel raised above the tomb of St. Denis. It was the place of burial of the monarchs of France; but when the Revolution broke out, many of the tombs were broken open, and the remains of the dead thrown into ditches. The building was unroofed, and used as a cattle-market until Napoleon I. ordered its restoration, which was completed in a splendid style. In the crypt are statues of French kings and princes from Clovis to Louis XVI. The church is 415 feet long, and 106 wide. Manf. Cotton goods and chemicals. There are dye-works and bleaching-grounds, and the annual cattle-market lasts for a fortnight, and is well attended. Pop. 40,821.

DENIS, ST., bishop and martyr, who, according to ecclesiastical tradition, was sent from Rome about the middle of the 3rd century to preach the gospel to the Gauls. He reached Paris, where he became the first bishop. He was cruelly tortured, and afterwards beheaded by order of the Roman governor.

Died 272.

DENIZLI, den-ez-le', a town of Asiatic Turkey. There are numerous bazaars and market places. Manf. Leather. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 37° 48′ N. Lon. 29° 3′ E.

DENMAN, THOMAS, Lord, den'-man, received the rudiments of his education at Diss, under the celebrated Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld. He subsequently entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and, in 1806, was called to Lincoln's Inn. In 1818 he was returned member of parliament for Wareham, Dorset, and, in 1820, for Nottingham. In the House of Commons he leagued with Brougham and Burdett, and in 1820, became solicitor-general to Queen Caroline. His conduct in behalf of that unfortunate lady was so highly approved by the London citizens, that they presented him with the freedom of their city. In 1830 he was appointed attorney-general, and, in 1832, chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1834 he was raised to the peerage, and, in 1850, he retired from the Lord Chief Justiceship on account of failing health.

Born in London, 1779; died at Stoke Albany, Northamptonshire, 1854.

DENMARK, den'-mark, a kingdom in the N. of Europe, consisting of a peninsular portion, Jutland; several islands lying to the east, the chief of which are Seeland, or Zealand, Amager, Langöe, Taröe, Masnedöe, Agersöe, Laaland, Falster, and Möen—forming the SEELAND group; and the FUNEN group—Funen, Langeland, Aeröe, Faröe, and Taasinge. There are also the outlying islands of Lessoe and Anhalt, in the KATTEGAT, and BORNHOLM, in the Baltic. These islands are separately described. (See BORNHOLM, FUNEN, KATTEGAT and SEELAND.) There are a few small islands on the west side of the peninsula. The principal part is bounded on the N. and W. by the North Sea, S. by the states of the German empire, and E. by the Baltic, the Sound, and the Kattegat. Continental Denmark forms a long-continued plain, interrupted by few hills, or even gentle risings, a portion of it being perfectly flat, and below the level of the sea, protected by dykes as in Holland. The greatest elevation is not more than 500 feet. Along the coast are several winding creeks and bays, which are of essential benefit to navigation. The largest of these inlets is the Lymfiord, which enters from the Kattegat, and stretches nearly across the peninsula to the North Sea, from which it is separated only by a narrow strip of land, which has given way in several places. This inlet expands in several places into broad sheets of water, with many islands, and throws off several branches. It is estimated to cover an area of 250 square miles. The other most remarkable fiords are Ringkjöbing and Nissim on the W. coast of Jutland and Mariageo and Randers on the E. coast. The entire coast line, including the islands is over 800 miles, but in many parts sandbanks and bars render the coast unapproachable. The channels which separate the principal islands from the mainland, and from one another, are the two Belts and the Sound. The climate is temperate, but wet and foggy. The harbours of the country are rarely frozen; but it does sometimes happen that even the Sound is frozen over. The summers are not so fine as they are in countries having colder winters, and sometimes the heat is excessive. The soil being various, and interspersed with heaths and marshes, especially in the west, much of the country is unproductive. Schleswig, Holstein, and the S.W. part of Jutland, are generally fertile, and have excellent pasturages. The N.W. of Jutland, and the higher parts, extending N. and S. in the middle of the country, largely consists of heaths covered with brambles. The common products are oats, barley, beans, pease, hops, hemp, potatoes, and tobacco; wheat is but partially cultivated, and the forests, once extensive, have now almost disappeared. Cattle are largely reared in the duchies and N. Jutland; besides sheep, goats, and horses. These last are bred for military purposes, and are largely exported.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers are small. The most important is the Guden, which flows in a north-east direction, is navigable for a part of its course, and having received several smaller streams, falls into the Kattegat. Other rivers are the Holm, the Lunborg, and the Stor Aa. There are numerous small lakes, mostly in Seeland.

Area, 14,553 square miles.

Pop. 1,980,259.

Provinces.—Jutland, Seeland and Möen, Bornholm, Fünen and Langeland, and Lolland-Falster.

Dependencies and Colonies.—The Færoe, or Faro Islands, Iceland, and Greenland. (See separate headings.) The colonial possessions of Denmark consist of the three islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John, in the West Indies.

Constitution and Government.—The executive power is in the king and his responsible ministers, and the right of making and amending laws in the Rigsdag, or Diet, acting in conjunction with the sovereign. The Rigsdag comprises the Landsthing and the Folkething, the former being a Senate or Upper House, and the latter a House of Commons. The Landsthing consists of 66 members, 12 nominated for life by the crown, from among actual or former members of the Folkething, and the rest elected for the term of eight years. The Folkething, or Lower House of Parliament, consists of 101 members, returned in direct election, by universal suffrage, for the term of three years. The franchise belongs to every male citizen who has reached his twenty-fifth year, who is not in the actual receipt of public charity, or who, if he has at any former time been in receipt of it, has repaid the sums so received; who is not in private service without having his own household, and who has resided at least one year in the electoral circle on the lists of which his name is inscribed. Both the members of the Landsthing and the Folkething receive payment for their services, at the same rate.

Religion.—The established religion is the Lutheran. The affairs of the national church are under the superintendence of seven bishops. Complete religious toleration is extended to every sect; but those who belong to other churches or sects than the Lutheran do not amount to 1 per cent. of the entire population.

Education.—Elementary education is widely diffused in Denmark, attendance at school being obligatory from the age of seven to fourteen. Education is afforded gratuitously in the public schools to children whose parents cannot afford to pay for their teaching. Besides the university of Copenhagen, there are 13 public gymnasia, or colleges, in the principal towns of the kingdom, which afford a "classical" education, and under them are a large number of middle schools, for the children of the trading, and higher working classes. Instruction at the public expense is given in the parochial schools, spread all over the country.

Chief Towns.—COPENHAGEN. AALBORG, AARHUUS, and ODENSE.

Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines.—There are about 600 miles of railway open. Two canals, one in Seeland and one in Funen, afford facilities for inland traffic. There are 1,600 miles of telegraph lines.

Commerce.—Trade is carried on chiefly with Germany, Great Britain, Sweden, and Russia. The exports are principally agricultural produce.

History.—The first inhabitants of Scandinavia (comprehending Denmark, Norway, and Sweden) were descended from the Scythians, a people who had no fixed habitations: at what period they first settled in towns is uncertain. The Cimbri, a German nation, next possessed themselves of Jutland, which, from this circumstance, obtained the name of the Cimbrian Chersonese. The Teutones, another tribe of Germans, reduced Zealand, Funen, and the rest of the Danish islands. The Jutes and Angles succeeded the Cimbri in the Chersonese, and from the former, the peninsula obtained its name of Jutland. In the 4th century, the inhabitants of these countries and of the N.W. of Germany were called Saxons. They attempted, but could not gain a footing in Britain, till the decline of the Roman empire, when Vortigern, king of S. Britain, invited them over, about the year 450, to defend his country against the Scots. After they had repulsed those northern invaders, they quarrelled with the Britons who had called them in, and, at length, made themselves entirely masters of S. Britain. Saxony, of which Denmark was then deemed a part, was, at that time, divided among a number of petty sovereigns and states, which were all united under Gestrius, their first king, about the year 797. The Danes and Normans, or Norwegians, invaded and harassed the coasts of Gaul and Britain in the 8th century, and continued their incursions till the year 1012, when Sweyn, king of Denmark, made a complete conquest of England, and left it to his son Canute, who was, in 1020, king of England, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. The kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway were, after this period, governed by distinct sovereigns; but, in 1397, by the Union of Calmar, the three kingdoms were reunited into one. This union, however, was frequently broken, and at length finally put an end to, by the revolt of Gustavus Vasa, of Sweden, against Christian II., in 1523. Norway, however, was still subject to Denmark, and so continued until 1814, when it was ceded to Sweden, under Bernadotte. During the Napoleon wars, Denmark incurred a heavy loss at the hands of the British, by the bombardment of Copenhagen, 1807. The most remarkable event in the more modern history of Denmark is the revolt of the duchies of Holstein and Schleswig, in 1848. After a severe struggle, however, the army of the duchies was defeated at the battle of Instedt, in July, 1850, when they submitted to the authority of their sovereign, the king of Denmark; but in 1866 the duchies were taken possession of by Prussia.

DENNEWITZ, den'-ne-vitz, a Prussian village, in the province of Brandenburg, 42 miles S.W. of Berlin, famous for the great defeat of the French, commanded by Marshal Ney, with a loss of 15,000 men and 43 pieces of cannon, on the 6th of September, 1813.

DENNIS, JOHN, den'-nis, English author and critic. He was the son of a London saddler, and was educated at Harrow and Cambridge. In 1692 he wrote a Pindaric ode on King William, after which he published several other poems, two of which, on the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies, procured him the favour of the duke of Marlborough, who gave him £100 and placed him in the Custom-house. In 1704 appeared his tragedy of "Liberty Asserted," which, as an invective against the French nation, became popular. This was followed by his "Orpheus and Eurydice," "The Comical Gallant," an alteration of "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" "The Invader of his Country," which was also an alteration of "Coriolanus." When the treaty of Utrecht was negotiating, he imagined himself of so much consequence, that he went to the duke of Marlborough, and begged he would use his interest, that he might not be delivered up to the French king. The duke gravely told him, that "he had made no provision for himself, though he could not help thinking that he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis." In 1712 he made a merciless attack on the "Cato" of Addison, and his reflections on Pope's "Essay on Criticism" secured him a place in the "Dunciad." His attack on "Cato" drew forth a whimsical pamphlet, called "The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable Frenzy of Mr. John Dennis." The last years of his life were spent in blindness and poverty.

Born in London, 1657; died 1734.

DENNY, den'-ne, a town of Scotland in Stirlingshire, on the right bank of the Carron. Manf.

Woollens, fancy shawls, linseys and tartans, paper and dye-stuffs. There are bleachfields and printworks. Two fairs are held annually. Pop. 4,988. A station on the North British and Caledonian railways.

DENON, DOMINIQUE VIVANT, Baron de, den-awng', was appointed to the office of a gentleman about the person of Louis XV., and afterwards, as secretary to an embassy, resided several years in Italy. Here he studied the arts, and, subsequently, after passing through the horrors of the French revolution, attracted the notice of Bonaparte. With him he went to Egypt, and on returning to Paris, received the appointment of general director of the museums, with the superintendence of the medallic mint, and such works of art as were executed in honour of the victories of France. He accompanied the Emperor in several of his expeditions, and selected the pictures and other treasures of art which were taken from the conquered cities and places to the Louvre. On the abdication of the emperor, he was still allowed to retain his office, but in 1815, having rejoined Napoleon, on his escape from Elba, was deprived of it. He now retired from public life, and occupied his leisure with preparing a general history of art. In this performance he was assisted by eminent artists; but he did not live to complete it.—He wrote "Travels in Lower and Upper Egypt," a superbly illustrated work, a comedy, and several other productions of considerable merit.

Born at Châlons-sur-Saône, 1747; died 1825.

DENS, PETER, denz, Roman Catholic theologian. He held various ecclesiastical offices at Malines and Brussels, but is best known as the author of the work on moral and dogmatic theology, which is a text book in many Roman Catholic colleges, and has been so severely condemned by Protestant writers.

Born at Boom, Flanders, 1690; died 1775.

DENT, a county of Missouri, United States, formerly a portion of Shannon county. Pop. 10,646.

DENTA, or GYENTYA, dent'-ta, a town of Hungary, on the Bezava, 30 miles S. of Temesvar. Several annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,000.

DENTATUS, LUCIUS SICINIUS, den-tai'-tus, a Roman tribune, who had been engaged in 120 conflicts, and was 45 times wounded. He was murdered by the soldiers of Appius Claudius, but not until he had slain 15 of them and wounded 30 more.

Lived in the 5th century, B.C.

DENTATUS, MARCUS CURIUS, a Roman of noble character, who was tribune and three times consul, and distinguished himself as a general by the defeat of Pyrrhus. (See PYRRHUS.) In his latter years, after other splendid military successes, he retired to his Sabine farm.

Died 270 B.C.

DENT-DU-MIDI, dawng doo me'-de, an Alpine mountain on the frontiers of Savoy and the Valois. In 1784 it was first ascended. Height, about 10,780 feet.

DENTON, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 18,143.—The chief town is Alton.

DENTRECASTEAUX'S CHANNEL, dawn'-tre(r)-kas'-toes, a strait on the S.E. coast of Tasmania, separating Bruné Island from the main land. Ext. 35 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 3 to 9.

DENTRECASTEAUX ISLANDS, a group in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 10' S. Lon. 151° E.

DENTRECASTEAUX, CAPE, a prominent headland on the S.W. coast of Western Australia. Lat. 34° 52' S. Lon. 116° E.

DENVER, den'-ver, the principal town of the state of Colorado, United States, on the right bank of the South Platte. It has risen rapidly into importance, having been founded only in 1858. There are several Government and public offices. The situation is picturesque and the climate salubrious. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 39° 45' N. Lon. 104° 51' W.

DEODAR, de-o-dur', an independent state of India, in the presidency of Bombay. Area, 80 square miles. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 24° 9' N. Lon. 71° 49' E.

D'EON DE BEAUMONT, CHARLES GENEVIEVE, dai'-on(g), better known as the Chevalier D'Eon, a Frenchman, of remarkable abilities, who distinguished himself as author, soldier, and diplomatist. Being sent by Louis XI, as envoy to Russia, he gained the favour of the Empress Elizabeth. He was afterwards minister plenipotentiary to London; but, from political reasons, fell into disgrace, and he lived fourteen years in this country in banishment. On his return to France, in 1777, he was ordered to assume female attire. The rest of his life was passed principally in this country, where he endured poverty, endeavouring to support himself by teaching fencing. There was always a mystery as to his real sex, and even the medical testimony, after his death, that he was a male, failed to satisfy many persons who persisted in asserting that he was a woman.

Died in London, 1810.

DEORI, BURA DEORI, or GREAT DEORI, de-o-ri', a town of British India, in the S.W. part of the North-Western Provinces, 1,700 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 23° 22' N. Lon. 78° 4° E.

DEPEDELEN, de-ped'-e-len, a town of European Turkey.

DEPTFORD, det'-ford, a naval port of England, at the confluence of the Ravensbourne (a small river, here known as Deptford Creek) with the Thames in the county of Kent, 3 miles from London bridge. It is very irregularly built, and contains two parish churches, besides several places of worship for dissenters. It had a royal dockyard, with wet docks and numerous buildings for the manufacture and preservation of naval stores, established by Henry VIII., and occupying an area of upwards of 30 acres; but the dockyard was abandoned in 1865, and the naval establishment confined to the victualling yard. There are several private docks in the neighbourhood for building and repairing merchantmen. There are two hospitals belonging to the corporation or society of the Trinity House; one built in 1685, and devoted to the support of decayed masters of ships, and pilots, together with the widows of such persons. The society of the Trinity House was founded in the reign of Henry VIII., by Sir Thomas Spert, for the increase and encouragement of navigation, and for the good government of the seamen, and the better security of merchant-ships on our coasts. Pop. 84,641.—A station on the London and Greenwich Railway.

DEPUCH ISLAND, de-pook, a rocky island, one of the Dampier Archipelago, lying off the N.W. coast of Australia, and attaining a height of upwards of 500 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 20° 38' N. Lon. 117° 44' E.

DE QUINCY, THOMAS, de quin'-cy, English author, was a merchant's son, and educated at the grammar-school, Bath, and Oxford. He devoted himself to literature, and few employed their pens upon so many and such varied subjects. His "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater" reveal much of the history of his earlier years, and were first published in the "Old London Magazine," in 1821. From that time De Quincy constantly kept his name before the public, in metaphysics, political economy, philosophy, and biography. To enumerate the number of his essays would occupy a considerable space. It is impossible here to give the slightest criticism of the various writings of Mr. De Quincy. Every department of literature which he touched, he either illumined with new lights, or gave it additional graces by the magical fertility of his pen.

Born at Manchester, 1786; died at Edinburgh, 1859.

DERA FATI KHAN, dé-ra, a town of Afghanistan, near the right bank of the Indus. Cotton, indigo, sugar, and opium, are grown in the vicinity, and a good trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 31° 7′ N. Lon. 70° 52′ E.

DERA GHAZEE KHAN, a town of Afghanistan, 40 miles from Bhaulpoor, ceded to the British in 1849. It has an extensive commerce. Manf. Cotton, silk, and steel. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 30° 5′ N. Lon. 70° 52′ E.

DERA ISMAEL KHAN, a town of Afghanistan, 16 miles from Bukkur. It has a trade in salt and grain. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 31° 50′ N. Lon. 70° 58′ E.

DERAYEH, EL, de-ra'-ye(s), a town of Arabia, nearly in the centre of Nedjed. It consists of several fortified parts, and in 1819, after a siege of seven months, it was nearly ruined by the troops of Ibrahim Pasha. Pop. estimated at 15,000. Lat. 25° 15′ N. Lon. 46° 30′ E.—This was the former capital of the Wahabees.

DERBEND, or DERBENT, der'-bend, a town of Russia, the capital of the government of Daghestan, on the W. coast of the Caspian Sea. It stands at the entrance of a defile in the Caucasus, and is surrounded by strong walls rising out of the sea, strengthened by round and square towers. It consists of three parts, of which the citadel, about half a mile square, constitutes the upper part, and commands the whole place. Its harbour is the worst on the Caspian Sea, so that ships cannot approach the town. Manf. Coarse silk, and woollen stuffs. Pop. 16,000, mostly Mahometans. Lat. 42° N. Lon. 48° 15′ E.—It was taken from Persia by Russia in 1722, restored to the former power in 1735, and retaken by the Muscovites in 1795. This is a place of great antiquity, the walls being supposed to be 1,500 years old.

DERBY, der'-be, a town, parliamentary and municipal borough of England, the capital of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 35 miles N.E. of Birmingham. The town has several parish churches, the principal being dedicated to All Saints,—and the architecture of which is greatly and justly admired. There are, besides, many chapels, a Roman Catholic church, a very handsome town-hall, corn-exchange, and cattle-market. A noble public library, the gift of Mr. Bass, M.P., was opened in 1879; and there are literary and philosophic societies. There is a public park of six acres. Manf. Silk-throwing, cotton, hosiery, ribands, lace, porcelain, spar, iron, lead pipes, lead shot, white and red lead, tin plate, soap, leather, and railway carriages. Pop. 30,410.—A station on the London and North-Western, North Staffordshire, Midland, North-Eastern, Manchester, Sheffield and Lincoln, Stafford and Uttoxeter, and Cheshire lines of railway.

DERBY, a town of Newhaven county, Connecticut, United States, on the E. side of the Housatonic river, 37 miles S.W. of Hartford. Pop. 11,650.

DERBY, JAMES STANLEY, earl of, an English nobleman, and an active supporter of Charles I. in the civil war. In an action at Wigan, in Lancashire, he displayed considerable bravery against superior forces. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and, in violation of a promise of quarter which had been given him, was beheaded. This earl wrote a "History of the Antiquities of the Isle of Man," and none shed greater lustre on the cause for which he fought than he. His countess retired to the Isle of Man, where she regarded herself as queen, and which she defended with the utmost gallantry, being the last person in the British dominions who yielded to the parliament forces.

Born 1596; died 1651.

DERBY, EDWARD GEOFFREY SMITH STANLEY, 14th earl of, dar'-be, a modern English statesman. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and, as Lord Stanley, was first returned to parliament in 1820 for Stockbridge. He afterwards represented Preston, Windsor, and Lancashire. His first efforts in addressing the "House" were very successful; and, under various administrations, he held office with credit to himself. During the early part of his career, Lord Derby supported reforming changes, and was chief secretary for Ireland, and, subsequently, colonial minister under Lord Grey's administration. In the discussion on the Reform Bill of that period, Lord Stanley defended its provisions with great warmth and talent, and also carried the bill for national education in Ireland. He was also the principal instrument in the success of the measure for the emancipation, in 1833, of the West-India slaves. Now came, however, the crises in which he separated, for the remainder of his political life, from the Liberal party. Alarmed at the intended project to reduce still farther the Irish Church establishment, he, with other members of the cabinet, resigned his office in 1834. He was once more, in 1841, under Sir Robert Peel, colonial minister; and, in 1844, he took his seat in the House of Lords as Lord Stanley of Bickerstaffe. Towards 1845, however, when Sir Robert declared his adhesion to the principles of free trade, Lord Stanley headed the protectionist opposition, and was afterwards recognised as the leader of the Conservative party. In 1851, his father dying, he succeeded to the earldom of Derby. The year following, he was enabled to form an administration to succeed Lord John Russell's, but he had only a few months' tenure of power. In 1858, on the fall of the Palmerston administration, he again had the formation of a ministry entrusted to him; and although this lasted somewhat longer than the former, yet, in 1859, it succumbed before the attacks made on its Reform Bill by the Whigs and Radicals, headed by Lord John Russell. The eloquence of Lord Derby was remarkable for the purity and fire of his style, and the title of the "Rupert of debate" was given him by Mr. Disraeli. He was a scholar of considerable acquirements and cultivated taste. His translation of the "Iliad" of Homer, published shortly before his last illness, is considered one of the best.

Born at Knowsley, Lancashire, 1799; died 1869.

DERBYSHIRE, der'-be-sheer, a county of England, bounded N. by Yorkshire, E. by the counties of Nottingham and Leicester, S. by the counties of Leicester and Stafford, and W. by those of Stafford and Chester. It is mountainous and picturesque towards the N.W., which is occupied by a portion of the great Pennine Chain, known as the High Peak, forming the watershed between the Trent and the Mersey. The scenery is of the most romantic kind, the loftiest elevation, the Peak, being 2,000 feet high. There are many caverns, among which the one denominated the "Devil's," 2,700 feet long, is the most remarkable. The middle portion of the county is intersected by other ranges of less elevation; and in the south are generally undulating tracts, affording good pasturage, and dairy husbandry is extensively carried on, the production of cheese being very large. In the Peak district is good sheep pasturage.

Rivers.—The principal are the Trent, which for 10 miles divides the county from Staffordshire, then crosses it into Nottinghamshire; the Derwent, and the Dove, tributaries of the Trent, rise in the Peak district; the Nye, the Rother, and the Erwash.

Minerals.—Lead, iron, coal, gypsum, lime, and what is so well known by the name of Derbyshire spar, which, in a variety of singular forms, is found suspended round the sides and tops of the limestone caverns. There are also extensive quarries of grit, which afford excellent millstones and grindstones. Crystals, also called Derbyshire diamonds, jasper, chalcedony, and terra-vert are found. There are mineral springs of great celebrity at Buxton and Matlock, and intermittent springs at Barmoor and Tideswell.

Manf.—Woollen, linen, cotton, silk, spinning and weaving, porcelain and spar ornaments; calico printing is carried on, and there are needle-factories, tanyards, paper-mills, and hat manufactories.

Area.—1,030 square miles.

Pop.—461,141.

Chief Towns.—Derby, Ashbourne, Bakewell, Belper, Buxton, Chapel-le-Frith, Chesterfield, and Wirksworth.

Parliamentary Representation.—Six members are returned for the county, which is electorally divided into North, South, and East Derbyshire, and two for the town of Derby.

DERENBURG, a town of Prussia, in the province of Saxony, on the Holtemme, 32 miles S.W. of Magdeburg. It is surrounded by walls, and in the neighbourhood is the strong castle of Regenstein. Pop. 2,400.

DERCYLLIDAS, der-sil'-li-das, a Lacedæmonian general, who, about 404 B.C., entered Asia Minor, defeated the Persians, and took several of their cities; thus preserving the Greek colonies, which had been threatened by their neighbours. He, also, built a wall between Thracia and the Chersonesus, to prevent the incursions of the former people.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

DEREHAM, East, or MARKET DEREHAM, deer'-ham, a town and parish of Norfolk, 16 miles N.W. of Norwich. The church of this place is a very ancient cruciform structure, and contains the tomb of Cowper, the poet. There are many gardens and orchards around the town. Manf. Agricultural implements. Pop. 3,689.

DERG LOUGH, derg lok (the "red lake"), an expansion of the Shannon river, separating Connaught from Munster, in Ireland. It is 24 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 6. It receives several small rivers.—Also a small lake at the extremity of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It contains many islands, on one of which, Saints' Island, are the remains of a priory, founded about 600, and known as St. Patrick's Purgatory, a place of penance, to which thousands of pilgrims used to resort. A little rocky island, Station Isle, is now the place of penance, and the annual pilgrimages are very largely attended, 15,000 persons sometimes visiting the island in June, July, and August.

DERHAM, William, deer'-ham, an English divine and philosopher, who devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, became a member of the Royal Society, and contributed largely to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1713 he published his "Physico-Theology," being the substance of his Boyle Lectures, with curious notes; and in 1714 appeared his "Astro-Theology," which was, also, delivered at the same lecture. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and, in 1730, the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. The last thing he printed of his own was "Christo-Theology, or a Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion," 1730. In his younger days he published a treatise entitled "The Artificial Clockmaker," in 12mo, which has been several times reprinted. He was rector of Upminster.

Born near Worcester, 1657; died at Upminster, 1735.

DERING, Sir Edward, deer'-ing, an English gentleman, who distinguished himself, in the reign of Charles I., by his zeal for the reform of abuses. He brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters. Notwithstanding these revolutionary tendencies, he, afterwards, espoused the king's cause, which he supported with a regiment of horse equipped at his own expense. He was a great sufferer in the civil war, and died before the Restoration.

Born 1598; died 1644.

DERMODY, Thomas, der'-mo-de, Irish poet and author. He was the son of a schoolmaster, of county Clare, and exhibited as a child precocity of talent which attracted attention, being able to assist his father in teaching Latin and Greek when only eight years old, and producing before his tenth year translations from Horace and Virgil, besides original poems. At that age, he ran away from home and wandered to Dublin, where he made friends, and would have been sent to Trinity College, but for his misconduct. A few years afterwards he was sent there, the Attorney-General, Wolfe, paying all expenses. He soon afterwards broke away from all control, entered on a course of reckless dissipation, and enlisted as a soldier. He served in Flanders, obtained promotion, was wounded and put on half pay. In London, he again gave way to dissipation, and died in miserable poverty. He was possessed of considerable poetical genius.

Born at Ennis, 1775; died at Sydenham, 1802.

DERMOT MAC MURRAGH, der'-mot, the last king of Leinster, Ireland. He became king in 1140, but was driven out in 1167 by O'Ruare, prince of Leitrim, whose wife he had carried off. He did homage to Henry II., king of England, and with the help of the earl of Pembroke, known as Strongbow, who had married his daughter, recovered his kingdom. He died shortly afterwards, and Strongbow succeeded him.

Died 1170.

DERNA, der'-na, a town of Tripoli, in the north of Africa, about a mile from the Mediterranean. There is a poor harbour, and the place has greatly declined from its former importance. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 33° 30′ N. Lon. 46° 30′ E.

DERWENT, der'-went, the name of several rivers in England.—1. Of Cumberland, which falls into the Irish Sea at Workington.—2. Of York, which, after a course of 60 miles, falls into the Ouse at Barmby.—3. Another, which rises in the High Peak of Derbyshire, and, after a course of 50 miles, falls into the Trent on the borders of Leicestershire.

DERWENT, a river of Tasmania, rising in Lake Clair, near the centre of the island, flowing towards the south east, and entering Storm Bay by a wide estuary, in lat. 42° 53′ S. and lon. 147° 23′ E. It is navigable to Hobart Town.

DERWENT WATER, or KESWICK LAKE, in the south of Cumberland. It is 4 miles long, with an average breadth of 1. It is very picturesque, and contains several islands, one of which is called the floating island, which only occasionally appears; being nothing more than a mass of soft land which rises to the surface.—The river Derwent enters it at the S. and leaves it at its N. extremity.

DERWENTWATER, JAMES, earl of, one of the leaders of the Scottish rebellion of 1715. He was taken prisoner after the battle of Preston, and taken to the Tower of London. When tried for treason at Westminster Hall, he pleaded guilty, and, although he asked for mercy, was condemned and beheaded on Tower Hill.

Born at Dilston, Northumberland, 1688; died 1716.

DERZAWIN, GABRIEL ROMANOWICZ, der-za'-win, Russian poet, who entered the army at the age of 19 as a private soldier, and, his talents having attracted the attention of the Empress Catharine, soon rose to distinction. In 1791 he was appointed secretary of state, in 1800 imperial treasurer, and two years afterwards minister of justice. He soon retired on a pension, and devoted himself to literature. He wrote many poems of marked excellence, especially an "Address to the Deity," which has been translated into several European languages.

Born at Kasan, 1743; died 1816.

DESAGUADERO, dais'-a-ga-dair'-o, a river of Bolivia, having its source in Lake Titicaca, and, after a course of 190 miles, entering Lake Aullagos, near Oruro. No river in the world is of so great an elevation, for it rises 12,846 feet above the sea level, and the point of discharge is but little lower.

DESAGUADERO, LAKE, in Auricania, South America. It is 35 miles long, and about 5 broad.

DESAGULIERS, JOHN THEOPHILUS, dai'-sa-goo'-le-ai, a French philosopher, who came to London with his father, who was a minister, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Entering into holy orders, he, in 1710, succeeded Dr. Kiel as lecturer in experimental philosophy at Oxford. He was an active member of the Royal Society, and contributed several papers to its Transactions.

Born at Rochelle, 1683; died 1749.

DESAIGNES, des'-ain, a town of France, in the department of Ardèche, on the Doux, 16 miles from Tournon. Pop. 4,000.

DESAIX DE VEYGOUX, LOUIS CHARLES ANTOINE, des-ai', a French general, who early entered the military service of his country, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. In the early part of the Revolution he became aide-de-camp to General Custine, and was severely wounded at the battle of Lauterberg, but kept the field, and rallied the battalions after they had been thrown into disorder. Named successively general of brigade and of division, he contributed greatly, by his talents, to the success of the famous retreat of Moreau from Germany, the left wing of the army being commanded by him on that occasion. He afterwards defended the bridge and fort of Kehl for two months against the Austrian army with great bravery, and was wounded; but subsequently joined Bonaparte at Milan, when it was announced that "the brave General Desaix had come to visit the army of Italy." He served with Bonaparte in Egypt, where he distinguished himself greatly, and was appointed governor of the upper part of the country. It was here he achieved his greatest glory. He completely subdued Upper Egypt, and received, as a testimony of admiration, from Bonaparte, a sword, with this inscription on its blade, "Conquête de la Haute Égypte!" He was obliged, however, in 1800, to sign the unfavourable treaty of El Arish with the Turks and English, and, on his way to France, was captured and detained by Lord Keith as prisoner of war. He afterwards obtained his parole, and went to France. He once more fought under the banner of Bonaparte in Italy, but was killed at the battle of Marengo, to which victory he principally contributed. A statue was erected to this general, in the Place-Dauphiné, in Paris.

Born at St. Hilaire-d'Ayat, in Avignon, 1768; died 1800.

DESAULT, PETER JOSEPH, des'-olte, a French surgeon, who, in his twentieth year, went to Paris, and soon became popular as a lecturer on anatomy and surgery. In 1776 he was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons, and, in 1782, was appointed surgeon-major to the Hospital of Charity, after which he became head surgeon of the Hôtel-Dieu. In 1791 he commenced his "Journal de Chirurgie," a work of high reputation. During the violence of the Revolution he was confined some time in the Luxembourg prison; but his usefulness saved his life. He died while attending the dauphin, which induced a suspicion that he was despatched because he would not poison that unfortunate prince.

Born near Macon, 1744; died, 1795.

DESBARREAUX, JAMES VALLÉE, COUNT, dai-bar'-ro, a French nobleman, who became counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, but which position he resigned, in order to devote himself more fully to the enjoyment of good cheer and the pursuit of pleasure. He changed his abode and climate according to the seasons, and was intimately associated with all the fine wits of the day—Balzac, Chapelle, Descartes, and others. He composed several songs and fugitive pieces; but the only production of his which is preserved is the beautiful sonnet, "Grand Dieu, tes jugements sont remplis d'équité," &c. Voltaire, however, denies the authorship to Desbarreaux, and gives it to the Abbé Lavau.

Born at Paris, in 1602; died, 1647.

DESBILLONS, FRANCIS JOSEPH, dai-bee'-yawng, a French Jesuit, who wrote 2 vols. of fables resembling those of La Fontaine, and some Latin poems. He also published an edition of Phædrus, with notes.

Born at Châteauneuf, in 1711; died at Mannheim, 1788.

DESCARTES, RENÉ, dai-kart' (known in the learned world as Renatus Cartesius, and founder of the Cartesian philosophy), a celebrated French philosopher, who received his education at the Jesuits' college at La Flèche. Here he acquired a considerable knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages; and on leaving that seminary he removed to Paris, applying himself to the study of mathematics. In 1616 he entered the army of the prince of Orange, and, afterwards, served under the duke of Bavaria, fighting with great bravery at the battle of Prague, in 1620. While in the garrison at Breda, he solved a difficult mathematical problem, which had been posted in the public streets; and this introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned Beckman, principal of the college of Dort. He also wrote, at this time, in Latin, a treatise on music, and projected some other works. After this, he quitted the military life, and travelled into Holland, Switzerland, France, and Italy. In 1629 he settled at Amsterdam, and applied himself assiduously to the mathematical sciences, particularly dioptrics, in which he made some important discoveries. About this time he visited England, where he made observations on the declination of the magnetic needle. His philosophy now became the subject of much discussion, meeting with an extensive reception, though with considerable opposition. Gilbert Voet, rector of the University of Utrecht, wrote against it, and Descartes replied with a virulence unbecoming a philosopher. To escape religious persecution, he accepted an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to go to Stockholm, where he obtained a pension and an estate. By this queen he was treated with great distinction, although she pursued her studies, under his direction, at five o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding that his health was far from being vigorous. He died after only a few months' residence at her court. Sixteen years afterwards his remains were conveyed to Paris, and interred in the church of St. Geneviève. Descartes was a man of great parts, and of a vigorous imagination. He was the first to reduce the science of optics to the command of mathematics. His principal works are, 1. "Principia Philosophiæ;" 2. "Dissertatio de Methodo recte regendæ Rationis, &c.;" 3. "Dioptrices;" 4. "Meditationes;" 5. "Geometry;" 6. "Letters."

Born at La Haye, Touraine, 1596; died at Stockholm, 1650.

DESEADA, or DESIDERADA, dai-se-a'-da, one of the Leeward Islands in the Caribbean Sea, to the E. of Guadaloupe, about 10 miles long, and 5 broad. It belongs to the French. Pop. 1,800.

DESEMBOGUE, dai-saim-bo'-gai, a town of Brazil, 400 miles from Goyaz. Pop. 5,000.

DESENZANO, dai-zain-za'-no, a town and port of Italy, situate at the S.W. extremity of the Lake of Garda, 16 miles S.E. of Brescia. Its streets are wide; it has several churches, a convent, hospital, and philosophical society: it forms a fishing port on the lake; and on the hill which rises behind it, is an ancient castle. A good trade is carried on in grain, wine, oil, silk, and fish; and there are four fairs annually. Pop. 3,500.

DESERET. (See UTAH.)

DESERTAS, LAS, dai-sair'-tas, a group of three islands in the Atlantic, with extensive cattle-pastures. They lie to the S.E. of Madeira. The largest, Deserta Grande, is not more than 6 miles long. The others are named Chao and Bugia.

DESFONTAINES, PIERRE FRANÇOIS GUYOT, Abbé, dai-fon'-tain, a French critic, who studied under the Jesuits, and in 1724 went to Paris, where he contributed to several periodical papers, especially to the "Journal des Savants," which he greatly aided by the cleverness of his articles. Offending Voltaire by the freedom of his criticisms and censure, a bitter literary warfare was the consequence. Besides other works, he published a prose translation of Virgil.

Born 1683; died 1745.

DESFUL, or DIZFUL, des'-ful, a city of Persia, 30 miles N.W. of Shuster. It is rather a busy town, with good bazaars; and in the vicinity are numerous interesting relics of antiquity. Pop. 14,000.

DESHA, de'-sha, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 8,973.—The capital is Napoleon.

DESHOULIÈRES, ANTOINETTE, dai-shool'-e-air', a distinguished French poetess of the reign of Louis XIV., who was intimate with all the literary celebrities of that sparkling age, and appears to have borne herself, throughout many difficult circumstances, with a propriety much to be commended. Her contemporaries called her the tenth muse and the French Calliope. She attempted poesy in all its various forms, from the song to tragedy; but the idyl and eclogue were those in which she most excelled. She married, in 1651, the Seigneur Deshoulières, who died, leaving her without fortune.

Born 1638; died 1694.

DESIDERIUS, or DIDIER, des'-i-deer'-e-us, the last king of the Lombards, succeeded Astolphus in 756. His daughters were married to the two sons of Pepin, king of France, Carloman and Charlemagne. Desiderius invading the papal territories, the pope called in Charlemagne to his aid, who marched into Lombardy, took his father-in-law prisoner, and sent him with his family to France, where they died.

Died 775.

DESIMA, or DEZIMA, a very small island, assigned to Dutch commerce, off the Japanese seaport of Nagasaki, which is on the island of Kiu Siu. (See NAGASAKI.)

DESIRE, PORT. (See PATAGONIA.)

DES MOINES, a county of Iowa, United States, bordering on Illinois. Area, 384 square miles. Pop. 33,099.—Burlington is the capital.

DESMOULINS, BENOÎT CAMILLE, dai'-moo-la, French revolutionist. He studied law, but a defect in his speech hindered him from becoming an advocate. In 1789, he was the favourite orator with the people of France, and made his idea of liberty the idol of his worship. He excited the mob to the destruction of the Bastille, and when elected to the National Convention, voted for the death of Louis XVI. He joined Danton in denouncing the Girondists, but held back from participation in the sanguinary scenes which followed. He published a series of papers, "Le Vieux Cordelier," in which he attacked the proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety. He had the greatest contempt for everything that wore the appearance of religion; and although his talents were considerable, they seem only to have hastened his downfall. His colleagues conspired against him, and brought him to the scaffold. His wife, a beautiful woman, endeavoured to excite an insurrection in his favour, but failed, and was sent to the guillotine a fortnight after her husband.

Born at Guise, 1762; died 1794.

DESNA, des'-na, a large river of Russia, which rises 50 miles S.E. of Smolensk, and after a course of 500 miles, unites with the Dnieper nearly opposite Kiev.

DESOLATION, CAPE, des-o-lai'-shun, is the S.W. extremity of Nunarsoak Island, Greenland. Lat. 60° 50′ N. Lon. 48° 50′ W.—Also a HEADLAND of Terra-del-Fuego, S. America, on one of its W. islands. Lat. 55° 45′ S. Lon. 71° 37′ W.

DE SOTO, de-so'-to, a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 828 square miles. Pop. 16,000.—Mansfield is the capital.

DESPARD, EDWARD MARCUS, des'-pard, an Irishman who early entered upon a military life, and became an able engineer. At the close of the American war he served in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by an expedition on the Spanish main, in which he had for a coadjutor, Captain, afterwards Lord, Nelson. For his services there, he was made lieutenant-colonel. In 1784 he was appointed English superintendent at Honduras; but his conduct causing him to be suspended, he demanded an investigation. This, however, was refused him, when he became violent against the government, and was sent to Cold-bath Fields prison, whence he was removed to the House of Industry at Shrewsbury, and next to Tothill Fields bridewell. On his liberation, he endeavoured to seduce the soldiery, and having collected some followers, held secret meetings at alehouses, to which no persons were admitted without taking a treasonable oath. At these assemblies, it is said that various plans were devised for the murder of the king; and, at last, it was determined to make the attack when his majesty went to the Parliament House. The plot being discovered, he and several other persons were arrested, and, being found guilty, suffered on the scaffold, in 1803.

DESPOTO DAGH, des-po'-to-da, a mountain-chain of European Turkey, extending from 30 miles to the E. of the Balkan to the bank of the Maritza. Height, nearly 8,000 feet.

DESSALINES, JACQUES, dais-sa-line, one of the negroes who took part in the insurrection in the island of Hayti (St. Domingo), in 1794, and having been lieutenant to Toussaint l'Overture, was successful in a later insurrection, and was appointed governor in 1804. He caused himself to be crowned Emperor, but his cruelties alienated his adherents, and he was attacked and killed by insurgents. (See CHRISTOPHE.)

Born 1760; died 1806.

DESSAU, des'-sou, the capital of the duchy of Anhalt-Dessau, on the Mulde, 70 miles S.W. of Berlin. The chief buildings are the ducal palace, a town-hall, and Lutheran and Catholic churches. The town is well built, and surrounded on three sides by walls, the river protecting the fourth side. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, tobacco, leather, hats; and there are some distilleries. Pop. 27,584.

DESTERRO, dais-tair'-ro, a fortified city of Brazil, nearly in the middle of the W. coast of the island of Santa Catharina, 450 miles from Rio Janeiro. The harbour is one of the best on the Brazilian coast. Pop. 7,000.

DESTOUCHES, PHILIPPE NÉRICAULT, dai-toosh', a French dramatic writer, who was attached to a political mission to England, and resided in London for a number of years. On his return to his own country he refused the office of ambassador to Russia, and retired into the country, where he devoted himself to agriculture and the belles-lettres.

Born at Tours, 1680; died 1754.

DETMOLD, det'-mold, capital of the principality of Leppe-Detmold, Germany, on the Werre. There are an old and new town. The chief public building is the old palace, surrounded by gardens. On the summit of the Grotenberg, near the town, is the colossal statue of Hermann, the first hero of the German people, inaugurated in 1875 by the Emperor William. (See BAUDEL and HERMANN.) Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Pop. 6,500.

DETROIT RIVER, or STRAIT OF ST. CLAIR, det'-rwaw, a portion of the St. Lawrence river, flowing from Lake St. Clair into Lake Erie, separating the United States from Upper Canada. It is 28 miles long, and is navigable for the largest vessels, but is frost bound for about four months in the year.

DETROIT, a city and port of entry in Wayne county, and the capital of Michigan, U.S., on the Detroit, along the right bank of which it stretches for about three miles. It has a state-house, city-hall, a cathedral, about 30 churches, market-houses, government magazines, museum, theatre, merchants'-hall, and several charitable institutions, literary societies, and schools. Manf. Brass and iron works. It has shipbuilding-docks, and a considerable trade on the lakes. Pop. 116,340.—This place was founded by the French in 1670, and, in 1815, made a city.

DETTELBACH, det'-tel-bak, a town of Bavaria, in the district of Lower Franconia, on the right bank of the Main, 9 miles N.E. of Würzburg. Manf. Cloth. A good trade is done in wine and agricultural produce, and five annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

DETTINGEN, det'-tin-gen, a village of Bavaria, on the Maine, 8 miles from Aschaffenburg. It is noted for a victory gained over the French, commanded by Marshal Noailles, by the English, under George II., in 1743, to celebrate which Handel composed the famous "Dettingen Te Deum."

DETVA, det'-va, a town in the north-west of Hungary. Pop. 10,000.

DEUCALION, du-kai'-le-on, in Greek legend an ancient king of Thessaly, the son of Prometheus, and husband of Pyrrha, daughter of Epimetheus. In his reign the whole earth was covered with a deluge. Deucalion and Pyrrha, alone preserved out of mankind, on account of their piety, built a vessel, which, after tossing about nine days, landed on the top of Mount Parnassus. Here, consulting the oracle of Themis, they were directed, in order to repair the loss of mankind, to throw behind them the bones of their grandmother. Understanding, by the latter phrase, the earth, they threw behind them stones, and those that Deucalion cast became men, and those that Pyrrha cast, women. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in ancient history, is supposed to have happened 1503 years B.C.—Some writers, in their account of this, do not mention the building of a vessel, but only say that the king and queen took refuge on the top of Mount Parnassus, and others say Etna.

DEUTSCHKRONE, doitchd'-krone, a town of Prussia, province of West Prussia, 72 miles N.W. of Posen. Manf. Woollens and tiles. There are dye-works, and a trade in horses and cattle is carried on. There are eight annual fairs. Pop. 3,000.

DEUTZ, doitz, a fortified town of Prussia, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite Cologne, with which it is connected by a bridge of boats. There are two churches, the barracks, and the ruins of a Benedictine abbey. Manf. Silks, velvets, porcelain, soap, and playing cards. Pop. 2,900.

DEUX PONTS, LES, doo-pawng' (Germ. ZWEIBRUCKEN, tswi brook'-en), "Two Bridges," a town of Bavaria, capital of a duchy of the same name, on the Little Erbach, 34 miles N.W. of Landau. The principal public buildings are the Lutheran church, the Lutheran academy, and the Orphan-house. Manf. Woollens, cotton, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 8,400.

DEVA, dai'-va, a fishing town and seaport of Spain, on a river of the same name, 15 miles from St. Sebastian. Pop. 2,500.

DEVA, a town of Transylvania, Austrian empire, on the right bank of the Maros. Pop. 4,000, mostly employed in papermaking and coppermining.

DEVAPRAYAGA, de'-va-pra'-ya-ga', a town of Northern Hindostan, Serinagur, at the junction of the rivers Aluknunda and Bhageerettee, the union of which forms the Ganges. There are two Hindoo temples to which pilgrims resort in great numbers. Except about 1,000 Brahmins, there are scarcely any permanent inhabitants. Lat. 30° 9′ N. Lon. 78° 39′ E.

DEVENTER, dai-fen'-ter, a fortified town of Holland, on the Yssel, 55 miles S.E. of Amsterdam. Its principal buildings are a Gothic cathedral, several other churches, a town-hall, and an observatory. Manf. Linens, stockings, carpets, and iron; and the traffic in cattle, butter, and cheese is considerable. There are a very large hospital for old people, five other hospitals, and a burgher orphan house. Pop. 18,000, mostly Protestants.

DEVERON. (See DOVERON.)

DEVICOTTA, de-ve-kot'-ta, a fort and seaport of British India, on the Coromandel coast, at mouth of the Coleroon. Lat. 11° 27′ N. Lon. 79° 47′ E.

DEVIL'S-BIT MOUNTAINS, a range in the county of Tipperary and part of King's county, Ireland. It separates the basins of the Suir and the Shannon. Height, about 2,100 feet.

DEVILLE-LES-ROUENS, dai-veel'-lai-roo'-on(g), a town of France, in the department of Seine-Inférieure, 3 miles N.W. of Rouen. Manf. Cotton goods, paper, and chemicals. Pop. 3,600.

DEVIZES, de-vi'-zes, a town and parliamentary borough of Wiltshire, on the Kennet and Avon Canal, 23 miles N.W. of Salisbury. It has two parochial churches, one of which, St. John's, was enlarged and restored in 1833, some dissenting chapels, a town-hall, a large corn exchange, a gaol, and a free grammar-school. Manf. Silk, snuff, and malt. Pop. 6,839.—A station on the Great Western railway.

DEVON, dev'-on, a river of Scotland, rising in the Ochil Hills, and falling into the Forth near Alloa. There is another smaller river, which falls into the Forth at Clackmannan harbour.

DEVONPORT, dev'-on-port, a seaport, parliamentary, and municipal borough of Devonshire, situate on the E. of the estuary of the Tamar, and connected with Plymouth. Previously to 1824, it was known as Plymouth Dock, and a lofty tower has been raised to commemorate the naming of the town anew. It is partially inclosed with a lofty wall and a fosse, and on its sea side is defended by strong batteries. Its dockyard occupies more than 100 acres, the buildings being mostly of granite. It has a guildhall, Albert hospital, barracks, military hospital, assembly-rooms, theatre, 11 churches, and several other places of worship. A statue of Field-marshal Lord Seaton was erected near the Military Parade in 1866. Pop. 48,745.—A station on the South Devon railway.

DEVONSHIRE, dev'-on-sheer, a county in the S.W. of England, and the third in respect of size, bounded N. by the Bristol Channel, E. by the counties of Dorset and Somerset, S. by the English Channel, and W. by the county of Cornwall. There are about 160 miles of coast line, generally steep and rocky. The principal indentation on the N. coast is Bideford or Barnstaple Bay, 18 miles wide and 8 deep; and on the E. and S. coasts are Tor Bay, 3 miles wide and of about the same depth, and Plymouth Sound, of nearly equal dimensions. About one fourth of the county is open and uncultivated; and Dartmoor occupies a considerable part of its S.W. half. (See DARTMOOR.) Other elevated districts are Blackdown, in the eastern part, and Exmoor, in the north-east, extending into Somersetshire. A great extent of the surface, however, consists of fine and very fertile valleys; whilst the climate is particularly mild, and on that account making this county the resort of invalids from all the northern counties of Britain. The aspect of the cultivated portion of the county is peculiarly delightful. In no other part of England is vegetation more abundant or beautiful. The undulating surface, divided into small holdings by thick hedges, interspersed with fruit trees, and rich in wild flowers, is very picturesque. The valleys abound with orchards teeming with fruit, and Devonshire lanes are famous for the abundance of wild flowers. From the elevated districts extensive views are obtained, stretching almost from sea to sea, and the "coombs," or narrow valleys through which the rivers rising in the hills make a rapid way to the sea, are unequalled for beauty. The soil is very productive, the chief crop being wheat. Excellent cider is made, and the produce of the dairy is considerable. The Devonshire red breed of cattle is highly valued; and Dartmoor grazes large flocks of sheep. The coast abounds with herrings, pilchards, and mackerel.

Rivers.—The most important rivers are the EXE, TEIGN, DART, and PLYM, falling into the English Channel, and the Taw and Torridge, into the Bristol Channel. The TAMAR is the boundary between Devonshire and Cornwall.

Minerals.—Small quantities of gold and silver are sometimes found; antimony, bismuth, cobalt, copper, lead, tin, iron, gypsum, and manganese. A beautiful kind of veined marble, called Devonshire marble, susceptible of a high polish, is also found. Dartmoor is chiefly of granite formation.

Area.—2,590 square miles.

Pop.—604,397.

Chief Towns.—EXETER, PLYMOUTH, DEVONPORT, TAVISTOCK, TIVERTON, and BARNSTAPLE. There are many favourite watering places and summer resorts, the principal being SIDMOUTH, DAWLISH, TORQUAY, TEIGNMOUTH, and DARTMOUTH, on the south-east coast; and ILFRACOMBE and CLOVELLY, on the British Channel.

Parliamentary Representation.—17 members are returned, 2 for each division of the county, and 11 for the boroughs.

History.—The county was inhabited by a tribe called Damnonii, at the time of the Roman invasion. It was one of the last places where the Britons made a stand against the Saxon invaders. There are many British and Roman remains, stone circles, barrows, dolmens, and the traces of camps, and a grove of stunted oaks, of great antiquity, presumed to have been the resort of the Druids. The Saxons conquered the county in the 9th century, and in that and the two following centuries it was ravaged by the Danes and the Irish.

DEVONSHIRE, GEORGIANA, Duchess of, eldest daughter of the first earl Spencer, married, at the age of 17, the duke of Devonshire, and was for many years the most prominent leader of fashionable society, eminent for beauty, wit, talent, and good nature. She took a prominent part in the famous Westminster election of 1784, canvassing for Fox with a zeal that exposed her to vehement abuse from the opposite party. She possessed considerable poetical talent, and a descriptive poem, "The Passage of St. Gothard," was translated into French and Italian.

Born 1757; died 1806.

DEVRA-TABOUR, dev'-ra-ta-boor', a large town of Abyssinia, 35 miles E. of Lake Dembea. Lat. 11° 55′ N. Lon. 37° 45′ E.

D'EWES, SIR SYMONDS, duse, an English antiquary, who employed a considerable part of his time in collecting materials for a history of Great Britain, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by Charles I. In 1641 he was made a baronet, and, on the breaking out of the civil war, entered the Solemn League and Covenant. He compiled the "Journals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth," published in 1682, folio, and wrote his own life, which is in Peck's "Desiderata Curiosa." The "Journals of Parliament" are an authority for the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Born at Coxden, Dorsetshire, 1602; died 1650.

DE WETTE, WILHELM MARTEN LEBEBRECHT, de-wet', German theologian. He studied at Jena, in 1807 was appointed professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, in 1809 professor of theology, and professor at Berlin in 1810. He was deprived of his chair in 1819 in consequence of his sympathy with the mother of the assassin of Kotzebue, but was soon afterwards chosen for the chair of theology at Basel, and in 1849 he was elected rector of that university. He was the author of many able theological works, moderately rationalistic and decidedly independent in tone, and published a critical edition of the works of Luther.

Born near Weimar, 1780; died at Basel, 1849.

DE WITT, JAN, de wit, a distinguished Dutch statesman, who laboured to retrench the power of the house of Orange by endeavouring to prevent the union of the offices of stadtholder, captain-general, and high admiral in one and the same person. In 1654 he negotiated the peace with Cromwell, in which it was arranged that no member of the house of Orange should be made high admiral or stadtholder. The Orange party became more powerful, William (afterwards William III. of England) became stadtholder, the influence of De Witt declined, and he resigned the office of grand pensionary. His brother Cornelius was imprisoned and tortured, and Jan De Witt had gone in his carriage to receive him as he came out of prison, when he was set upon by the populace and killed.

Born at Dort, 1625; died 1672.

DE WITT, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 675 square miles. Pop. 17,000. Clinton is the capital.

DE WITT, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 968 square miles. Pop. 10,082. The capital is Clinton.

DHOLPORE, dol-pore', a protected state of Hindostan, on the left bank of the Chumbul. Area, 1,250 square miles.

DHOLPORE, capital of the above state, on the left bank of the Chumbul, 35 miles S. of Agra. It has several mosques and tombs. Lat. 26° 41′ N. Lon. 77° 58′ E.

DHOORCATTEE, door-kat-te', a very small protected state of Hindostan, in the valley of the Jumna. It is not more than five square miles in extent, but is noticeable as containing the peak of Toongroo, 10,102 feet high. Lat. 31° 8′ N. Lon. 77° 40′ E.

DHUBBOOEE, dub-boo-e', a decayed town of India, 225 miles N. of Bombay. It bears the appearance of having once been large, its walls being three miles in circumference, with fifty-two towers, and many richly-sculptured Hindoo temples. Pop. small, and there are nearly as many monkeys as men.

DHULAK, dul-lak, an island in the Red Sea, 25 miles from Massouah. Ext. 23 miles long, with an average breadth of 15. Its inhabitants are mostly employed in the coral fishery.

DHUMTOUR, or DUMTAUR, dum-tor', a valley in the Punjab, British India, traversed by numerous streams, and containing a number of scattered villages, which, in the aggregate, form a large population. It grows sugar, and cattle are extensively reared. Lat. between 34° and 34° 10′ N. Lon. between 72° 55′ and 73° 15′ E.

DHUMTOUR, the chief town of the above district, 16 miles E. of the Indus, on the route between Alloch and Cashmere.

DHURRUMPOOR, dur-rum-poor', a Rajpoot state of India, inclosed by Bandsda, the Daung, the Penth, and Surat. Area, 225 square miles. No longer officially recognised.

DIABLERATS, de-abl'-ra, a mountain of the Bernese Alps, between the cantons Berne and Valois. It is 10,670 feet above the level of the sea. It is remarkable for the catastrophes caused by the falling of immense masses of rock, in consequence of the disintegration of the lower strata by the action of water. Two such falls occurred in 1714 and 1749.

DIADIN, di-a'-din, a town of Turkish Armenia, on the right bank of the Euphrates. Pop. 3,000.

DIAGORAS, di-ag'-o-ras, a Greek philosopher and poet, a disciple of Democritus. Having been the victim of a perjury which remained unpunished, he passed from superstition to atheism, and was generally called the Atheist. He was driven from Athens on the charge of having turned into ridicule the Eleusinian mysteries.

Born at Melos, in the 5th century B.C.; died at Corinth.

DIAMANT, de'-a-mang, a town of Martinique, in the Antilles, 8 miles from Port Royal. It is near a volcanic mountain, called Morne de Diamant, nearly 1,600 feet in height. Pop. 1,600.

DIAMANTINO, de'-a-man-te'-no, a city of Brazil, in the province of Minas-Geraes. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, 5,700 feet above the level of the sea, and is the centre of a district. Pop. 14,000.

DIAMANTINO, another town of Brazil, at the confluence of the river of that name and the Ouro. Pop. 4,500.

DIAMANTINO, a river of Brazil, rising in the province of Matto Grosso, uniting with the Ouro, 70 miles N.W. of Cuyaba, and forming an affluent of the Paraguay.

DIAMOND HARBOUR, di'-a-mond, is on the left side of the river Hooghly, British India, 30 miles below Calcutta, of which it is the harbour for large ships, and with which it is connected by a good road and a telegraph line.

DIAMOND ISLAND, is in the estuary of the Bassain river, Burmah, on the E. coast of the Bay of Bengal. It is 12 miles S. of Cape Negrais, and abounds with turtles.

DIANA, di'-an'-a, in Roman mythology the daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and twin sister of Apollo. Having to fulfil three distinct offices—viz., one on earth, and the others in heaven and the infernal regions—she received, in consequence, three distinct names. On earth she was known by the name of Diana, and was the goddess of hunting and chastity; and, as Lucina, was invoked by women in childbed. In heaven she was known as Phœbe, and was the goddess of the moon, as Apollo, her brother, was the god of the sun. In Tartarus she was known as Hecate, and presided at all transformations and punishment. Many adventures are ascribed to Diana. She changed into a stag the hunter Actæon, who had watched her as she bathed. Although the patroness of chastity, she had loved Endymion, Pan, and Orion. She is represented with a quiver, and attended with dogs, and sometimes drawn in a chariot by two white stags. She was the Artemis of the Greeks, known also as Selena, the goddess of the moon; and is supposed to be the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, whose worship was introduced into Greece with that of Osiris, under the name of Apollo. The most famous of her temples was that of Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world.

DIANA OF POITIERS, Duchess of Valentinois, was descended from a noble family of Dauphiny. At an early age she married the Grand Seneschal of Normandy, but was left a widow at the age of thirty-one, and became the mistress of the Duke of Orleans, afterwards Henry II. of France. during whose reign she exercised almost unlimited power. After his death she retired into privacy, and founded a charitable institution for the support of widows.

Born 1499; died 1566.

DIANO, de-a'-no, a town of South Italy, 45 miles E. of Salerno. It is beautifully situated on a hill overlooking the Calore, in the midst of the fertile vale of Diano. There are a strong castle and several churches. Pop. 6,500.

DIARBEKIR, de-ar'-be-ker', a city of Asiatic Turkey, and capital of the pashalic of the same name, near the right bank of the Tigris. It is encompassed by a lofty thick wall of black stone flanked with towers. On the N. side of the town is a strong castle. The streets are paved, but narrow and dirty. The houses are built of hewn stone, and present a handsome appearance, and many of them are elegant. There are several fine bazaars well stored with rich merchandise, large mosques, and five Christian churches. Manf. Formerly considerable, but now, except silk, unimportant. Pop. 40,000, consisting of Turks, Armenians, Kurds, Jews, and Christians. The town occupies the site of the ancient Armida, the scene of frequent conflicts between the Romans and the Persians, and of a terrible massacre by the latter in 502, when 80,000 of the inhabitants were killed. The town came into possession of the Turks in 1515.

DIAZ, BARTOLOMMEO, de'-az, a Portuguese navigator of noble family who met at the court of King John II., some eminent geographers and men of science, and being desirous of making discoveries, obtained the command of two vessels, and set out on a voyage to the West Coast of Africa. He discovered the Cape of Good Hope, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Tempests; but on his reporting this, in 1486, to John II., king of Portugal, he commanded it to be called Cabo de Buena Esperanza, or the Cape of Good Hope. He afterwards joined an expedition to Brazil, but was lost in a storm.

DIBDIN, CHARLES, dib'-din, an actor, dramatist, and distinguished sea-song writer. He was educated at Winchester, and originally intended for the church; but going to London, at the early age of sixteen, he produced an opera, called "The Shepherd's Artifice," which was brought out at Covent Garden. In 1778 he was appointed musical manager at Covent Garden. Subsequently he built the "Circus," afterwards called the "Surrey;" and in 1788 published his "Musical Tour." In the following year he gave his entertainment called "The Whim of the Moment," of which he was sole author, composer, and performer. In this piece he sang his ballad of "Poor Jack," which completely won the ear of the public; and, from that time, his reputation as a balladist was established. He wrote no fewer than 200 songs. Many of his lyrics have great merit. They have solaced the seaman during his long voyage, sustained him in the storm, and inspired him in battle; and they have been quoted to restore the mutineus to order and discipline. In 1805 he retired from public life, and received a government pension of £200 per annum.

Born at Southampton, 1745; died 1814.

DIBDIN, REVEREND THOMAS FROGNALL, was the son of a brother of Charles Dibdin, captain of an East Indiaman, celebrated in his brother's song as "Poor Tom Bowling, the darling of our crew." He lost his parents when only in his fourth year, and was designed for the law, but ultimately became a clergyman, and an eminent bibliographer. In 1809 appeared his "Bibliomania," and an enlarged edition in 1811. The work was well received, and brought him £200 of profit, and considerable reputation. After it, came his "Topographical Antiquities of Great Britain," the "Bibliotheca Spenceriana," the "Bibliographical Decameron," and several other "Antiquarian Tours." He was the founder of the Roxburghe Club, a literary association, instituted for the purpose of reprinting books. He also wrote "Reminiscences of a Literary Life," and several theological works.

Born at Calcutta, 1776; died 1847.

DICEARCHUS, di'-se-ar'-kus, a Peripatetic philosopher of Messina, in Sicily, whose treatise on the Geography of Greece was published by H. Stephens in 1589, and by Hudson in his collection of writers on geography, in 1709. His principal philosophical work was one "On the Soul," which he divided into three dialogues, and which argued against its existence.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

DICK, THOMAS, LL.D., dik, the "Christian philosopher," was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards entered the ministry of the Secession Church. Much of his time was passed in teaching and lecturing on scientific subjects. He also contributed to many periodicals, whilst producing the following more permanent works; "The Christian Philosopher;" "The Philosophy of Religion;" "Philosophy of a Future State;" "On the Mental Illumination and Moral Improvement of Mankind;" "Christian Beneficence contrasted with Covetousness;" "Celestial Scenes;" "The Solar System;" "The Atmosphere and Atmospherical Phenomena;" and "The Telescope and Microscope." Some of these works have been translated into other languages, and the "Solar System," into the Chinese. All his works have received the highest commendation, and merit a place in every Christian library. Towards the close of his life, a small pension was granted to him by the government.

Born near Dundee, Scotland, 1774; died 1857.

DICKENS, CHARLES, dik'-ens, one of the most eminent of English novelists, was the son of a clerk in the Navy Pay Office, who fell into poverty, and was imprisoned in the Marshalsea, young Charles being for a short time taken from school and sent to earn his living as a boy in a warehouse. He was afterwards a lawyer's clerk, but merged into a reporter for the newspapers. His first engagement was in the office of the True Sun, and his next in that of the Morning Chronicle, in the evening edition of which paper, first appeared his "Sketches of Life and Character." These were subsequently collected, and given to the world under the title of "Sketches by Boz." Their success induced an enterprising publisher to engage Mr. Dickens and Mr. Seymour, the comic draughtsman, "the one to write, and the other to illustrate, a book which should exhibit the adventures of a party of cockney sportsmen." The result was the "Pickwick Papers," a performance which, at once, placed Mr. Dickens in the foremost rank as a popular writer of fiction. After it, came his "Nicholas Nickleby," "Oliver Twist," the "Old Curiosity Shop," "Barnaby Rudge," and many more, teeming with original wit, humour, and sentiment, besides abounding with vivid descriptions of human life and character. In 1841 he paid a visit to America, where his fame had preceded him, and where he received a hearty welcome. On his return, he published a work recording the impressions made by his visit, a work which excited considerable anger in the States, from the freedom of the strictures on American manners and politics; an irritation increased by some scenes in "Martin Chuzzlewit." In 1845 he was appointed principal editor of the Daily News, a paper of liberal politics; but he did not long hold this position. To its columns he contributed "Pictures of Italy." On his retirement from that paper, he resumed the pen of fiction, and produced "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," several "Christmas Tales" (including the famous "Christmas Carol"), the "Child's History of England," "Little Dorrit," "A Tale of Two Cities," and "Great Expectations." In 1850 he originated a weekly periodical called "Household Words," and conducted it till 1859, when its issue was brought to a close, and it was incorporated with "All the Year Round." In 1867 he again visited the United States, and the old irritation having been forgotten, was most enthusiastically received. He gave in the principal cities the readings from his own writings, which he had made so popular and profitable in this country. At the time of his death, which was produced by over mental exertion, and occurred suddenly, he had just begun the publication of a new story, never completed, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Landport, Hampshire, 1812; died at Gadshill, near Rochester, 1870.

DICKSON, dik'-son, a county of W. Tenessee, United States. Area, 724 square miles. Pop. 21,460. Charlotte is the capital.

DICTYNNA, dik-tin'-na, a nymph of Crete, and one of Diana's attendants, who first invented hunting-nets. Some have supposed that Milos pursued her, and that, to avoid his importunities, she threw herself into the sea, and was caught in fishermen's nets, diktua; whence her name.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, dik'-tis, an ancient historian, who served under Idomeneus, king of Crete, at the siege of Troy; of which expedition he wrote an account. This work is said to have been the foundation of Homer's "Iliad." The book which is extant under his name is a forgery.

DIDEROT, DENIS, dé-de-ro, a French writer, was the son of a master cutler of Langres, in Champagne, where he was educated, and intended at first for the church, and afterwards for the law; but, from sheer indolence and the love of reading, he relinquished his plans, and gave himself up to literature and philosophy. His first work, entitled "Philosophical Musings," was published in 1740, and was afterwards reprinted under another title. Having married imprudently in 1743, he produced translations and essays for a small remuneration. In 1746 he was concerned in a Medical Dictionary, which suggested to him the idea of a "Dictionnaire Encyclopédique," which, with the assistance of others, he completed. His share in this work was large, and the whole of the articles on arts and trade were furnished by him. His own opinion of it, however, is not very flattering. "In its execution," said he, "I had neither time nor the power to be particular in the choice of my contributors, who were mostly very inferior men, badly paid, and, consequently, careless in their work." While engaged in the "Encyclopédie," he wrote some other books—a licentious novel, called "Bijoux Indiscrets," and two comedies, the "Fils Naturel" and "Père de Famille." In 1749 appeared his "Letters to the Blind," the free sentiments in which, occasioned his being imprisoned six months at Vincennes. On recovering his liberty, he wrote "A Letter on the Deaf and Dumb." His other works are, "Principles of Moral Philosophy," "Reflections on the Interpretation of Nature," "The Code of Nature," "The Sixth Sense," "Of Public Education," "Panegyric on Richardson," "Life of Seneca." Being compelled to sell his library, it was bought by the Empress Catharine of Russia, who made him librarian. Diderot was an ingenious, rather than a useful writer. His works are fanciful, and full of prejudices against religion. The last remark he was heard to make, by his daughter, shortly before his death, was, that "the first step towards philosophy is incredulity."

Born at Langres, in Champagne, 1713; died in Paris, 1784.

DIDIER-LA-SEAUVE, ST., saï'-ove, a town and parish of France, in the Upper Loire, 14 miles from Yessengeaux. Manf. Silks. Pop. 5,000.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, M. SALVIUS SEVERUS, did'-ius ju-li-aï'-nus, a Roman emperor, who was consul in 179. He purchased the imperial diadem of the soldiers at an enormous rate, in 193; but did not pay the sum agreed upon, and made himself odious by his luxurious and extravagant habits. Shortly afterwards, however, Severus was declared emperor by the prætorian bands, and Didius was slain, having reigned only sixty-six days.

Born at Milan, 133; died 193.

DIDO, or ELISSA, dï'-do, queen and founder of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. She married Sichæus, priest of Hercules, who, for the sake of his riches, was murdered by Pygmalion, her brother, and the successor of Belus. Dido, disconsolate at the loss of her husband, sailed with a number of Tyrians, and settled on the coast of Africa, where she purchased a tract of land, on which she built a citadel called Byrsa. This place soon increased, and her domains extended. Hiarbas, king of Mauritania, wooed her; but she rejected his suit; when he threatened to invade her territories. She requested three months to reconsider her refusal, and, in the interval, caused a funeral pile to be erected, on which she stabbed herself in the presence of her subjects. Virgil and Ovid have represented this action as the effect of grief, occasioned by the departure of Æneas, of whom she was enamoured.

Lived in the 9th century B.C.

DIDOT, FRANÇOIS, de-do, the founder of a family of French printers, distinguished for the elegance and correctness of the works produced by them. The firm was established more than 150 years since, and still exists with increasing reputation. His descendants were all men of marked ability.

Born 1689; died 1757.

DIDRON, ADOLPHE NAPOLÉON, dï-drawng, one of the greatest modern French students of mediæval Christian art, who made himself familiar with all the remarkable mediæval monuments in France and Greece. In 1848 he lectured on Christian iconography in Paris, and, afterwards, became editor of the "Annales Archéologiques." His principal work, however, is his "Iconographie Chrétienne," a portion of which has been translated into English by Mrs. Millington.

Born at Hauteville, 1806.

DIE, de, a town of France, on the Drôme, in the department Drôme, 30 miles from Grenoble. It is finely situated and strongly fortified. The cathedral, Calvinistic church, the bishop's palace, now used for public purposes, and an old Roman gate, are the chief structures of interest. Manf. Silks, woollens, paper, and leather. Pop. 3,300.

DIE, ST., dé-ai, a town and parish of France, in the department of Vosges, on the Meurthe, 25 miles N.E. of Epinal. There are an old cathedral church, and various educational institutions. Manf. Cotton-spinning, iron, and wire-works. In its neighbourhood are marble-quarries and copper-mines. Pop. 9,400.

DIEBITSCH-SABALKANSKI, HANS KARL, dé'-bitsh, a Prussian, who entered the military service of Russia, and in 1805 was wounded at Austerlitz. After the battle of Friedland, he rose to the rank of captain, and subsequently became major-general. He fought at the battle of Lutzen, and was at that of Dresden. In 1814 he opposed the hesitation of the allies to march on Paris, for which the emperor Alexander bestowed on him the order of St. Alexander Newski. In 1820, he became chief of the imperial staff of Alexander, whom he attended on his death-bed at Taganrog. In the war with Turkey in 1828-9, he took Varna, and greatly extended his reputation by making the passage of the Balkan, for which the surname of Sabalkanski was conferred upon him. He advanced to Adrianople, when the treaty of that name was signed, and which saved his army. In 1831 he was sent to quell the insurrection in Poland, and fought the battle of Ostrolenka. Thence he transferred his head-quarters to near Pultusk, where he died of cholera.

Born at Grossleippe, in Silesia, 1780; died 1831.

DIEMEN, ANTON VAN, dé'-men, governor of the Dutch E. India possessions, first went to India as an accountant, in the employ of his government. In 1625 he became a member of the supreme council, and in 1631 returned to Holland as commander of the India fleet; but the year following, went out again as director-general. Subsequently becoming governor-general, he greatly extended the Dutch interest in the East. In 1642 he sent Abel Tasman on a voyage to the south; the consequence of which was, the discovery of the island called after him Van Diemen's Land; but which name was changed, at the desire of the colonists, to Tasmania.

Born at Kuilenberg, 1593; died 1645.

DIEMEN'S LAND, VAN. (See TASMANIA.)

DIEPENBECK, ABRAHAM VAN, dé-pen-bek, an eminent Dutch painter, of the Flemish school. He was a fellow-pupil of Vandyke in the school of Rubens, at Antwerp. He was one of the best scholars of his great master, and acquired a high reputation. In 1641 he was elected president of the Antwerp Academy, an office which he held as long as he lived. He designed chiefly for the booksellers, and his works on canvas are very scarce. In the churches of Antwerp there are several painted windows by him.

Born at Bois-le-Duc, 1607; died 1675.

DIEPPE, dé-ep, a seaport town of France, in the department Seine-Inférieure, at the mouth of the river Arques, on the English Channel. Its streets are tolerably regular; the Grand Rue, above a mile in length, runs parallel with the sea. The principal public edifices are the two Gothic churches, St. Jacques and St. Rémi; an old castle on the W. side of the town (now occupied as barracks), a college, theatre, public library, town-hall, and baths. The ramparts form a pleasant promenade, and the town proper communicates with a suburb called Le Pollet, by means of a flying-bridge. The harbour, though tolerably commodious, is narrow. It is defended by an old castle and modern citadel. Dieppe is one of the principal watering-places in France, and receives a large number of visitors in the bathing season. Manf. Linen, lace, paper, and ivory wares. Pop. 20,408.

DIES, ALBERT, dees, a German landscape painter and engraver. After gaining a slight knowledge of art in Hanover, he proceeded to Düsseldorf, and thence to Rome, where he took up his abode in the neighbourhood of Tivoli and Albano. Here he devoted himself to the study of the ever-varying aspects of nature; and, in Rome, published, in conjunction with several German artists, a set of landscape-etchings. He now married a Roman lady, and, in 1796, returned to Germany, taking up his residence in Vienna. Here he rose into fame; but from having accidentally taken some sugar of lead, by mistake, for a medicine, he was afflicted with a nervous debility, which forced him to resign the use of his pencil. He now applied himself to poetry, in the study of which he had always been more or less occupied, and to musical composition.

Born in Hanover, 1755; died at Vienna, 1822.

DIEST, dé-est, a town of Belgium, in the province of Brabant, on the Demer, 17 miles N.E. of Louvain. In has three parish churches and several chapels. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, beer, and gin. A large yearly horse fair is held. Pop. 8,000. This town was taken by the duke of Marlborough in 1705, but retaken by the French, and dismantled in the same year. Recently it has been made a place of great strength by improved fortifications.

DIETRICH, CHRISTIAN WILHELM ERNST, dé-treesh, an eminent German artist, whose father was court-painter at Weimar, and from whom he received his first instructions in his art. In his 12th year he was sent to study at Dresden, and there, in his 18th, was presented to Augustus II., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, whose court-painter he became. He rose rapidly, and, subsequently, obtained the patronage of Augustus III. In 1763 he became one of the professors in the Academy of Arts at Dresden, and director of the school of painting in the porcelain-manufactory at Meissen.

Born at Weimar, 1712; died at Dresden, 1774.

DIEZ, FREDRICH CHRISTIAN, deez, German philologist. He was educated at Giessen and Gottingen, but was glad to obtain employment, first as a domestic servant, and afterwards as a private teacher. In 1830 he was appointed professor of modern languages at Bonn. His researches have been principally in the direction of Romanic languages, or modern languages derived from the Latin, and his works are highly valued.

Born at Giessen, 1794.

DIGBY, SIR EVERARD, dig'-be, an English gentleman, who was visited by James I. at Belvoir Castle, and knighted by that sovereign, when on his way from Scotland to ascend the throne of England. He was involved in the gunpowder plot, for which he was executed. He pleaded guilty at his trial, and endeavoured to extenuate his crime by alleging conscience as his motive.

Born 1581; died 1606.

DIGBY, SIR KENELM, son of the above, was brought up in the Protestant religion, and educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, where he studied philosophy; after which he made the tour of Europe, and was absent two years in France, Spain, and Italy. On his return, he received the honour of knighthood. In the reign of Charles I. he was appointed to several posts, and on occasion of some difference between England and the Venetians, was dispatched with a fleet into the Mediterranean, and gained considerable reputation by his conduct. About 1636 he quitted the Church of England for that of Rome, and vindicated this change in a piece, entitled, "A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of a Religion." At the commencement of the civil war, he was imprisoned by the Parliament in Winchester House, during which time he wrote a compilation of Brown's "Religio Medici." In 1643 he regained his liberty, went to France, and, soon after, travelled into Holland to visit Descartes, with whom he established an intimate friendship. When Cromwell assumed the government, he ventured to visit his native country, and was frequent in his attendance at the court of the Protector. He also became a member of the Royal Society, and was one of the council. He wrote "A Treatise on the Nature of Bodies;" "On the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul;" and several other works. His autobiography was published in 1827. Sir Kenelme's wife was Venetia Anastasia Stanley, distinguished for her beauty, which he tasked his ingenuity to preserve, by the invention of cosmetics for her use. There is a portrait of her by Vandyke, in Windsor Castle.

Born 1603; died 1665.

DIGBY, JOHN, an English nobleman, who was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to James I., who sent him ambassador to Spain. In 1618 he was made Lord Digby, and in 1621 sent ambassador to the emperor of Germany. In 1622 he was again sent to Spain to negotiate a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, and, the same year, was created earl of Bristol. On his return, he and Buckingham preferred charges against each other in parliament, which ended without trial. When the civil war broke out, he went abroad, and died at Paris, 1653.—He wrote some poems.

Born at Coleshill, Warwickshire, 1580.

DIGBY, LORD GEORGE, an English nobleman, the son of the above, received his education at Oxford. He became a member of the Long Parliament, wherein he, at first, opposed the court, but afterwards joined the royal party, and was expelled. He exerted himself in the service of Charles I., and when that monarch was put to death, his lordship was exempted from pardon, when he went abroad. At the Restoration he was made knight of the Garter. In 1663 he impeached Lord Clarendon in the "House." He wrote a play called "Elvira, or the Worst not always True," which was printed in 1667.

Born at Madrid, Spain, 1612; died at Chelsea, 1677.

DIGGES, SIR DUDLEY, digs, was educated at University College, Oxford. He was knighted by James I., who sent him ambassador to Russia; but in the parliament of 1621 he resisted the Court measures, and so continued to do in the next reign, for which he was sent to the Tower. In 1636 he was bought over by the grant of the mastership of the Rolls. He wrote,—1. "A Defence of Trade," 1615, 4to. 2. "A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject," 4to. 3. "Speeches in Rushworth's Collections." 4. A collection of letters, which appeared after his death, under the title of the "Complete Ambassador."

Born 1583; died 1639.

DIMSDALE, THOMAS, dimz'-dail, a celebrated physician, who accompanied the duke of Cumberland in his expedition against the army of Prince Charles Stuart, as assistant-surgeon, and continued in that capacity till the surrender of Carlisle, when he returned to Hertford. In 1761 he commenced practice, and became celebrated by his successful mode of inoculating for the small-pox. In 1768, accompanied by his son, he went to Russia, and inoculated the empress and grand-duke, for which he was created a baron of the empire, physician to her majesty, and counsellor of state. A gratuity of £12,000 was given him for his journey, and a pension of £500 a year. In 1781 he again visited Russia, to inoculate the two sons of the grand-duke. The year preceding, he was elected member of parliament for Hertford, and again in 1784, on which he quitted practice. About this time he had the misfortune to lose the sight of both eyes by cataracts, from which he was relieved by Baron Wenzell. In 1790 he retired from parliament.

Born in Essex, 1712; died 1800.

DINAGEPORE, din-a-ge-por', a district of British India, in the Bengal presidency, inclosed by Rungpoor, Purneah, Rajeshahy, Mymunsingh, and Boglipoor. It is level, and intersected by watercourses, producing two crops of rice a year. It grows, besides, cotton, wheat, barley, millet, sugar, pepper, and ginger. It also rears horses, sheep, cattle, goats, and swine. Manf. Silks, cottons, paper, leather, and pottery-ware. Area, 4,126 square miles. Pop. 1,514,346. Lat. between 24° 53′ and 26° 38′ N. Lon. between 82° 2′ and 89° 16′ E.

DINAN, dé-nang, an old town of France, in the department of Côtes-du-Nord, 13 miles S. of St. Malo. It is situated on the summit of a steep hill on the Rance, inclosed by walls, and is defended by an old castle, which now serves as a prison. The boulevards are planted with trees, and are laid out in gardens, which afford agreeable walks. Its principal buildings are the beautiful cathedral of St. Sauveur, a town-hall, commercial college, concert-hall, and public library; and there are many picturesque old houses and arcades. Manf. Sailcloth, linen and cotton fabrics, shoes, hats, and leather. It has both beet-root factories and salt-refineries, besides a trade in hemp, thread, and linen. Pop. 7,000.—This place was often besieged during the middle ages; and, in 1373, was taken by Duguesclin, and, in 1379, by De Clisson.

DINANT, a town of Belgium, in the province of Namur, on the Meuse, 14 miles S. of Namur. Its principal buildings are the ancient and richly decorated church of Nôtre Dame, the town-house, once the palace of the princes of Liege, a college, hospitals, schools, and charitable institutions. There is a citadel, on a lofty hill overlooking the town. Manf. Hats, paper, woollens, cards, cutlery, vinegar, glass, and gingerbeer. It has marble-works, soap-works, salt-refineries, and breweries. Pop. 6,100.—This place was taken by Philip, duke of Burgundy, in 1466, when 800 of its inhabitants were taken by twos, tied back to back, and thrown into the Meuse. The town was also razed to the ground; but in 1493 it was rebuilt. In 1554 and 1675 it was again taken by the French.

DINAPOOR, din-a-por', a town and military station of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, on the Ganges, 10 miles above Patna. Pop. 28,000.

DINARCHUS, di-nar'-kus, an orator of Greece, who established himself at Athens, and there received large sums of money for the composition of orations, which, as a foreigner, he was unable, himself, to speak. Accused of taking bribes from the enemies of Athens, he went into voluntary exile, about 340 B.C., but was recalled, after an absence of fifteen years. Three of his orations, only, have come down to us, and are in Stephens's Collection, 1575.

DINARIC ALPS, di-nar'-ik, a portion of the Alpine system, which connects the Julian Alps with the branches of the Balkan, in Turkey. (See ALPS and BALKAN.)

DINOCRATES, di-nok'-ra-tees', an architect of Macedonia, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, which had been burnt by Erostratus, extended and beautified Alexandria, at the command of Alexander the Great, and was called into Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus. To him, as well as to others, has been ascribed the gigantic project of cutting Mount Athos into the form of a statue, holding a city in one hand, and in the other, a basin, into which all the waters of the mountain should empty themselves.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

DINWIDDIE, din-wid'-de, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 616 square miles. Pop. 32,870. The capital is Dinwiddie Court House.

DIOCLETIAN, CAIUS VALERIUS, di-o-klé'-she-an (surnamed Jovius), a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family, and raised from a common soldier to the rank of general. On the death of Numerian, in 284, he was chosen emperor. He took Maximian to be his colleague, and created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he styled Cæsars. He was a great commander, and a patron of learning; but, in 303, stained his reign by a persecution of the Christians. He renounced the crown in 305, and retired to Salona, where he died.

Born at Diocles, in Dalmatia, about 245; died 313.

DIODATI, GIOVANNI, de-o-da'-te, theologian, member of a noble Italian family. He adopted the Protestant faith when young, went to Geneva, and his talents were so remarkable that at the age of 21 he was appointed professor of Hebrew. In 1608 he became a pastor of the Reformed Church, and in the following year professor of theology. He was one of the authors of the articles of the Synod of Dort; translated the Scriptures into Italian and French, and gained a great reputation as a preacher.

Born at Lucca, 1576; died 1649.

DIODORUS SICULUS, (of Sicily), dī-o-dor'-us sik'-u-lus, a Greek historian, who travelled in Asia and Europe, and lived several years in Rome, where he produced his Historic Library, or a Universal History, in 40 volumes, which contained the history of the world, from the creation to 60 B.C. Unfortunately, of these, only 15 books and a few fragments remain. Though his chronology is erroneous, and there are many great defects in his writings, they are, nevertheless, extremely valuable, containing, as they do, facts to be met with in no other collection.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DIOGENES, di-odj'-e-neez', a Cynic philosopher, who being forced to leave his native country with his father, who was accused of coining false money, went to Athens, and applied himself to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynics. He carried the austerities of his sect to a great extreme, wearing a coarse ragged cloak, living on the meanest food, and lodging under porticoes and other public places. It is said that he also took up his residence in a tub, and that this became his favourite abode. On a voyage to the island of Ægina, he fell into the hands of pirates, who sold him as a slave. His master, however, made him free, and entrusted him with the education of his children. At Corinth he was visited by Alexander the Great, who, on approaching him, said, "I am Alexander the king;" to which the other replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." The monarch then asked him if he could render him any service: "Yes," said he, "not to stand between me and the sun." The independence of mind shown by the philosopher, struck the king, and he said, "If I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes." There is a story that, being questioned why he carried a lantern in the daytime, he said he was looking for an honest man. He is supposed to have died at Corinth in the public street, where he calmly awaited his end, and a public funeral was decreed him by the Athenians. The people of Sinope erected statues to his memory.

Born at Sinope, a city of Pontus, 414 B.C.; died 323 B.C.

DIOGENES, surnamed the Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Chrysippus, and the successor of Zeno as teacher of philosophy. He accompanied Carneades and Critolaus on the embassy from Athens to Rome. His works are lost.

Lived about 200 B.C.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, la-er'-shee-us, a Greek historian, who wrote "The Lives of the Philosophers," in 10 books.

Born at Laerta, in Cilicia; died 222.

DIOGENES APOLLONIATES, a-pol-lo'-ne-a'-tees, a Greek natural philosopher, who maintained that air, with an intellectual energy is the primal element of all things.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

DIOMEDE ISLANDS, in Behring's Strait, between the most westerly point of America and the most easterly of Asia. Their names are Fairasey, Krusenstern, and Ratmanoff. Lat. (central point), 65° 46′ N. Lon. 168° 55′ W.

DIOMEDES, di-o-mé'-dez, in Homeric legend, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He often engaged Hector and Æneas, and wounded Mars and Venus in battle. In the famous games instituted by Achilles, he gained the prize in the chariot race, and defeated Ajax in single combat. He went with Ulysses to steal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva, in Troy, and assisted in murdering Rhesus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horses. On account of his wife's infidelity, he went to Italy, and built a city, which he called Argyrippa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he perished by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who, in the excess of their grief, were changed into birds resembling swans.

DIOMEDES, in Greek legend, a king of Thrace, a son of Mars and Cyrene, who fed his horses with human flesh. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy them, and, accordingly, the hero, attended with some of his friends, attacked Diomedes, and gave him to be devoured to his own horses, which he had fed so barbarously.

DION, di'-on, a celebrated patriot of Syracuse, who was the disciple and friend of Plato, when that philosopher was at the court of Dionysius, whose daughter, Arete, Dion married. Being afterwards ill-treated and banished his country by Dionysius, he resolved upon revenge, and, with a small force, landed in Sicily during the absence of Dionysius, and entered Syracuse in triumph. The tyrant, informed of this, hastened to Sicily, and made a violent assault on the citadel, in defending which Dion was wounded. Being supplanted by Heraclides, the commander of the Syracusan fleet, who had defeated that of Dionysius, Dion retreated to Leontium, whence he was recalled when the city was besieged by another force sent against it by Heraclides. He relieved the place, pardoned his enemies, and retired to a private station. In a subsequent conspiracy he fell by assassination.

Died 353 B.C.

DION CASSIUS COCCEIANUS, a Bithynian historian, whose father was proconsul of Cilicia, whence Dion went to Rome; and here his pleadings recommended him to notice, leading him, at length, to the office of consul, which he twice held. He wrote in Greek the "History of Rome," from the building of the city to the reign of Alexander Severus, the greatest part of which, however, is lost.

Born at Nicæa, in Bithynia, 155; died 225.

DION CHRYSOSTOMUS ("golden-mouthed"), Greek rhetorician, a native of Bithynia, who visited Rome, but having offended the Emperor Domitian, was compelled to fly. He returned after the death of that emperor, and obtained the favour of Nerva and Trajan. About eighty of his orations are extant in a complete form, and fragments of others.

Died 117.

DIONYSIUS I., dī-o-nish'-e-us, king or tyrant of Syracuse, who, from being a plain citizen, employed in a public office, became commander of the forces, overthrew the government, and assumed the title of "tyrant," equivalent to king, in 404 B.C. He gained several victories over the Carthaginians, and made successful inroads into Italy, and was the most powerful warrior and statesman of his age. Dionysius affected a taste for polite literature, and repeatedly contested the poetical prize at the Olympic games, without success, but gained several prizes at Athens. To raise money for his expeditions he plundered the temples, and committed dreadful cruelties. There is a legend, that being of a suspicious disposition, he caused a subterraneous prison to be so constructed as to carry, by tubes to his private apartment, every sound or speech uttered by its prisoners. A cave, known as "the ear of Dionysius," is still shown.

Born 430 B.C.; died 368 B.C.

DIONYSIUS II., the Younger, the son and successor of the above, whom he exceeded in cruelty, but whose equal he was not in policy. He sent for Plato to his court, profiting little, however, by the conversation of that philosopher. He banished his brother-in-law, Dion, and obliged his wife to marry again, which so enraged Dion, that he gathered an army, and drove the tyrant from Syracuse, B.C. 357. Dionysius returned about ten years afterwards, and was expelled by Timoleon; on which he fled to Corinth, where he died in great poverty.

Born 397 B.C.; died 343 B.C.

DIONYSIUS, historian and critic of Halicarnassus, in Caria, who was invited to Rome about 30 B.C., and there wrote his "Roman Antiquities," only eleven books of which are extant. He is esteemed for his impartiality, and particularly for his chronological accuracy. Besides this work, we have one written by him, entitled a "Companion," of some ancient historians, and another on the "Structure of Language."

Died 7 B.C.

DIONYSIUS, called the Tyrant of Heraclea, in Pontus, married the niece of Darius, and greatly enlarged his territories. He was, it is said, of a most corpulent habit, so that it was impossible to awake him without piercing his flesh with pins.

Born 359; died 304 B.C., aged 55.

DIONYSIUS (the Areopagite), a native of Athens, and a member of the Areopagus, where he sat when St. Paul was brought before him, and made his famous speech respecting the "unknown God," which was the means of the conversion of Dionysius. According to some accounts, he was consecrated bishop of Athens, and suffered martyrdom. There were printed at Antwerp, in 1634, 2 vols. purporting to be his works; but their authenticity is questionable.

Died 95.

DIONYSIUS, surnamed the Little, from his short stature, a Romish monk, who drew up a body of canons, called "Collectio, sive Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum," translated from the Greek; he also compiled a body of decretals. To him is attributed the invention of the Victorian period, or chronological mode of computing the time of Easter.

Lived in the 6th century.

DIONYSIUS, ST., elected Pope, 259; and held a council against the Sabellians (a sect who held what were considered the heretical views of the Trinity).

Died 269.

DIOPHANTUS, di-o-fan'-tus, a mathematician of Alexandria, to whom is attributed the invention of algebra, which he probably derived from the Hindoos. Six books of his, on arithmetic, were published in Greek and Latin at Paris, in 1621.

DIOS-GYOR, dé'-os-ge-or, a town of Hungary, on the Sznikva, 60 miles N.W. of Debreczin. There are gold and silver mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,800.

DIOS, NOMBRE DE, dé'-os, a town of Mexico, on the road from the mines of Sombrerete to Durango, from which it is 50 miles distant. Pop. 7,000.

DIOS ZEGH, zai, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Er, 23 miles S.E. of Debreczin. Wine and tobacco are produced in the vicinity. Pop. 3,500.

DIOSCORIDES, PEDANIUS, di-os-kor'-i-dees', a physician and botanist of Greece, who wrote five books on the Materia Medica, containing the medical virtues of plants. These are the most abundant source from which we can draw a knowledge of the botanical attainments of the ancients.

Born at Anazarba, Cilicia, 40.

DIPPEL, JOHANN CONRAD, dip'-pel, a German physician, was the son of a clergyman, and at first studied theology at Giessen, and afterwards read medical lectures at Strasburg, which place he was compelled to leave in consequence of being engaged in a fatal brawl. He asserted that he had discovered the philosopher's stone, and other wonderful secrets. After rambling from place to place, he settled at Hamburg; but was given up to the Danish government for some freedoms he had taken in regard to the government of that country, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the island of Bornholm. After seven years' confinement, he was set at liberty, and, about the same time, was invited to Sweden, to attend the king, who was dangerously ill. The influence of the clergy, however, procured his expulsion in 1727. He then went to Germany, and in 1733 gave out that he would not die till 1808; but the year following, he was found dead in his bed. He wrote a number of enthusiastic books, under the name of "Christianus Democritus." In the midst of his extravagancies, however, Dippel did some good. He made several useful discoveries; amongst others, those of the animal oil which goes by his name, and of Prussian-blue.

Born near Darmstadt, 1672; died 1734.

DIPPOLDISWALDE, dip-pol'-dis-valdé, a town of Saxony, on the right bank of the Weisseritz, 12 miles S.W. of Dresden. There are a fine Gothic church, a castle, and town house. Grinding stones are quarried in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,800.

DIRÆ, dí'-re, the daughters of Acheron and Nox, who persecuted the souls of the guilty. They are the same as the Furies, and some suppose they are called Furies in hell, Harpies on earth, and Diræ in heaven.

DIRCE, dir'-se, a woman whom Lycus, king of Thebes, married after he had divorced Antiope. In consequence of her cruelties to Antiope, she was tied by Amphion and Zethus, the sons of Antiope, to the tail of a wild bull, and dragged over rocks, thus dashing her nearly to pieces. The gods, pitying her fate, changed her into a fountain, in the neighbourhood of Thebes.

DIRK-HARTOG ISLAND, dirk har'-tog, lies off the W. coast of Australia, and has a precipitous coast. It is 45 miles long, by 10 broad. Lat. 26° S. Lon. 113° E.

DIRMSTEIN, dirm'-stine, a town of Bavaria, 6 miles S.W. of Worms. It contains a castle, once the residence of the bishop of Worms. Manf. Earthenware. There is a sulphur spring in the vicinity. Pop. 2,000.

DIRSCHAU, dir'-sho, a fortified Prussian town, 20 miles S.E. of Dantzic, on the left bank of the Vistula. Manf. Leather. There are five annual fairs. Pop. 3,000.

DISAPPOINTMENT, ISLANDS OF, a group in the S. Pacific Ocean, so named by Commodore Byron, and discovered in 1765. Lat. 14° 5′ S. Lon. of the middle, 145° 4′ W.—The name also of several other islands and capes.

DISCO, dis'-ko, an island at the northern extremity of Davis Strait, separated by Weygat Strait from the coast of Greenland. There are coal-mines, stone quarries, and fisheries. The island belongs to Denmark. Lat. 69° 11′ N. Lon. 53° 20′ W.

DISCORDIA, dis-kor'-de-a, in Greek legend, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and sister to Nemesis, the Parcæ, and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, because she was there the cause of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, this goddess was not invited; and the neglect so irritated her, that she threw an apple into the midst of the gods, with the inscription of Detur pulchriori—"Let it be given to the most beautiful." This apple was the cause of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. She is represented with a pale ghastly look, and her garment is torn. Her head is generally entwined with serpents, and she is attended by Bellona. She is supposed to be the cause of all the dissensions which arise upon earth, public as well as private. (See PARIS.)

DISCOVERY BAY, the name given to a large bay on the coast of New Guinea or Papua. (See PAPUA.)

DISCOVERY PORTS, a harbour of Oregon, on the W. coast of North America, stretching inland for 8 miles, and defended by Protecha Island.

DISMAL SWAMP, dis'-mal, a very large morass, covered with tangled reeds, bearing timber, and a thick undergrowth, nearly 30 miles in length, by about 10 broad, partly in Virginia, and partly in N. Carolina, United States, having an area of about 300 square miles. In it is Lake Drummond, 7 miles in length, and it is traversed by a canal named after it.

DISNA, dis'-na, a Russian town, at the mouth of a river of the same name, 109 miles N.E. of Minsk. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 5,300.

DISRAELI, ISAAC, dis-rai'-le, English author, was a descendant of a family of Spanish Jews, who, in the 15th century, fled from the religious persecutions in Spain, and settled in Venice, where they assumed the name of Disraeli, "which was never borne before or since, by any other family." The father of Isaac came to England in 1748, and made a fortune by commerce. Isaac was educated at Leyden and Amsterdam, and was intended for the pursuits of commerce, but having a strong aversion to that line of life, he was suffered to apply himself to literature, and, after some performances in the region of poetry and romance, he published, in 1791, a small volume entitled "Curiosities of Literature." The success of this volume stimulated him to pursue his researches in the same path, and the one had become six volumes, full of interesting matter. In 1795 appeared his "Essay on the Literary Character," which was succeeded, at various periods, by "Calamities of Authors," "Quarrels of Authors," an "Inquiry into the Political Character of James I.," "Literary Miscellanies," "Life and Reign of Charles I.," and a few other works. In 1841 he published his "Amenities of Literature," and, afterwards, amused the remainder of his days with revising what he had before written.

Born at Enfield, 1766; died at Bradenham, Buckinghamshire, 1848.

DISRAELI, BENJAMIN, the Right Honourable, statesman, novelist, and poet, the son of the preceding, at an early age discovered such precocity of talent as seemed to prognosticate future success in the paths of literature; but, after an education in a private school, he was placed in an attorney's office, where he continued for some time as a preparation to an appointment in a Government office, which, however, he did not obtain. In 1826 he became a contributor to a paper started in the Tory interest, and called The Representative. This paper lived only five months; but it seems to have had some effect upon the mind of Mr. Disraeli, in so far as to give it a political bias. In 1828 appeared his novel of "Vivian Grey," which was, at various times, succeeded by "Contarini Fleming," "The Young Duke," "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy," "The Rise of Iskander," "Henrietta Temple," "Venetia," "Coningsby," "The Sibyl," and "Tancred." Besides these, he produced, in 1834, a quarto poem, entitled "The Revolutionary Epic;" and, in 1839, "Alarcos, a Tragedy." He also wrote some pamphlets, and a biography of Lord George Bentinck. Whilst thus actively engaged in the world of letters, he was continually before the public as a politician. In this character, however, he did not figure so satisfactorily as in that of a writer of fiction. After travelling in Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Syria, between the years 1829 and 1831, he returned, and stood for the representation of the borough of Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire, in the interest of the radical reforming party. He was unsuccessful, but nothing daunted; and, in 1833, he came forward in the same interest as a candidate for Marylebone. Here he was again unsuccessful, notwithstanding that he declared himself the friend of triennial parliaments and of vote by ballot. Having failed as a Radical, he, in 1835, came forward as a Conservative candidate for the borough of Taunton. He was still unsuccessful; but, in 1837, as a Conservative, he was returned member for Maidstone. His first speech in the House was, like his first attempts at political representation, a complete failure. His speech was laughed at throughout, and he was compelled to sit down before it was finished. This, however, he did not do until he had said, "I have begun, several times, many things, and often have succeeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." These words proved prophetic. The time did come when he was listened to, with the most anxious eagerness. By marriage with the wealthy widow of Mr. Lewis, who had been his colleague in the representation of Maidstone, he became independent in position, and by 1841 he was recognised as the leader of "the Young England party." Between that year and 1846 his attacks upon Sir Robert Peel were as frequent, as they were often brilliant and severe. He was then member for Shrewsbury, and, in 1847, was elected member for Buckinghamshire. In 1848 his friend Lord George Bentinck died, when he became leader of the old Tory or Protectionist party in the House of Commons. In 1852 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Derby, but, in the same year, that administration fell upon his own budget. In 1858 Lord Derby again came into power, and Mr. Disraeli was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in 1859 introduced a measure of Parliamentary reform, the rejection of which led to the resignation of the Ministry. On the return of the Earl of Derby to power in 1866, Mr. Disraeli resumed his position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and carried the Reform Act of 1867. The Earl's health failing, he retired in February, 1868, and Mr. Disraeli succeeded him as Premier, and his wife was created a peeress as Viscountess Beaconsfield. The Ministry resigned in the following December; but Mr. Disraeli returned to power in 1874. In 1876 he was raised to the peerage as Earl of Beaconsfield. His party having suffered a defeat by the General Election of 1880, he resigned office.

Born at Islington, London, 1805. Died 1881.

DISS, diss, a town of Norfolk, on the north side of the Waveney, 18 miles S.W. of Norwich. St. Mary's Church is a large and handsome Gothic structure, and there are several other places of worship. Manf. Brushes, yarn, and hosiery. Pop. 3,164.

DIVIATICUS, di-vi-at'-i-cus, a chief of the Ædui, mentioned by Cæsar and Cicero. He belonged to the order of the Druids, and is supposed to have possessed occult knowledge.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DIVINI, EUSTACHIUS, de-ve'-ne, an Italian who distinguished himself by his skill in grinding telescope-glasses. In this, however, he was soon outstripped by Huygens, who introduced such improvements as enabled him to discover Saturn's ring. Divini contested the truth of this, Huygens replying and Divini rejoining.

Born 1620; died 1664.

DIVIS, de-ve, an old district of France, in the province of Dauphiné. It was ceded, in 1414, by Louis de Poitiers to Charles VI.

DIXAN dix'-an, a town of Abyssinia, kingdom of Tigré. Lat. 15° N. Lon. 39° 32′ E.

DIXMUDE, dees'-mood, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, on the right bank of the Yser. There is a large and handsome Gothic church, with a beautiful rood screen. The chief trade is in agricultural produce, especially butter. Pop. 4,000.

DIXON'S ENTRANCE, a strait on the N.W. coast of North America, between the Prince of Wales Archipelago and Queen Charlotte Island. It is about 100 miles in length.

DIZFUL, diz'-ful, a city of Persia, on the river of the same name, here crossed by a bridge of 20 arches, 30 miles from Shuster. It is the capital and chief mart of the province of Khuzistan. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 32° 10′ N. Lon. 48° 34′ E.

DIZIER, ST., de'-ze-ai, a town of France, on the Marne, and in the department Haute-Marne, 10 miles N. of Vassy. It is tolerably well built, and has a church, town-house, commercial college, and court of commerce. Manf. Cotton, and iron goods, with a trade in timber and iron. Boat building is carried on. Pop. 7,500.—The emperor, Charles V., besieged and took this place in 1544; and in its neighbourhood Napoleon defeated the allies, in two battles fought January 27 and March 27, 1814.

DJAGARAGA, ja-ga-ra'-ga, a town of Java, 48 miles S.E. of Samarang. There is an elegant mosque. A trade is carried on in rice, cotton, thread, and wool. Pop. 6,000.

DJEMILAH, je-mil'-la, an ancient city of Algeria, 50 miles W. of Constantine. There are extensive and very interesting remains of the old Roman city.

DJEZZAR, jez'-zar, ("butcher,") the name given to Achmed Pasha, the Turkish governor of Acre, when besieged by Napoleon. He gave money for every head of a Frenchman brought to him, and executed his wives, several at a time, without the slightest compunction, if they offended him. He was originally a slave and rose to command by a series of murders and treacheries.

Born in Bosnia, 1735; died at Acre, 1804.

DJOKJOKARTA, jok'-jo-kar'-ta, a Dutch residency of Java, near the middle of the S. coast of that island. It is fertile and abounding in forests of teak-wood; and producing rice, coffee, and tobacco in abundance. Pop. 326,000.

DJOKJOKARTA, chief town of the above settlement, is the seat of a Dutch resident, and a native sultan, who has a guard of armed young females, from amongst whom he frequently selects his wives. Pop. 90,000.

DJOWF, jouf, the chief place of a fertile district of the same name, in the N.W. of Arabia. The houses are interspersed among large gardens Pop. 17,000.

DMITROV, me'-trof, an old town of Russia, on the Takhrama, an affluent of the Volga, 40 miles N. of Moscow. There are a college and seven churches. Manf. Silk, cotton goods, and leather. Pop. 8,000.

DNIEPER, ne'-per, anciently the Borysthenes, a large river of European Russia, rising in a marsh in the forest of Walchonski, in the north of the government of Smolensk, and after a course of more than 1,000 miles, falling into the Black Sea on its northern side, between Oczakov and Kinburn. Its principal affluents are the Berezina, Druz, Bug, Pripet, Poj, Desna, Soula, Koral, and Samara. Below Ekaterinoslav, there are many rapids.

DNIESTER, nees'-ter, the ancient Tyras, a large river of Europe, which has its source in a lake amid the Carpathian mountains, in Austrian Galicia, and, after a winding course of 600 miles, chiefly through the south of Russia, empties itself into the Black Sea between Ovidiopol and Akerman. Its principal affluents are the Botna, Stry, Reout, Podhora, and Sered.

DOAB, do-ab', a word derived from the Sanskrit, applied to a country between two rivers. It is especially given to the tract of British India, between the Ganges on the N.E., and the Jumna, on the S.W., about 500 miles long and 55 miles broad.

DOBBERAN, dob'-be-ran, a town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, three miles from the Baltic. It has a sea-bathing establishment, and is much frequented for the sake of its mineral springs and baths. Pop. 4,000.

DOBELL, SYDNEY, do'-bel, English poet, son of a wine merchant of Cheltenham. In 1850 he published "The Roman," a long poem, which at once attracted great attention. This was followed by "Balder," "Sonnets on the War," and other poems, displaying great energy and beauty of language, with, in some passages, an over-vivid imagination. He was one of the writers satirically described as the "spasmodic poets," but a man of unquestionable genius.

Born in London, 1824; died 1874.

DÖBELN, de(r)'-beln, a town of Saxony, 35 miles S.E. of Leipsic. It stands on an island formed by the Mulde, and has two churches, an hospital, and several schools. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton goods, brass-ware, and hats. Pop. 10,000.

DOBEREINER, JOHANN WOLFGANG, do-be-ri'-na, German chemist, who, having for a short time engaged in trade, was appointed professor at Jena in 1810. He made several important discoveries, and published treatises on chemistry.
Born at Hof, 1780; died 1849.

DOBRENTEI, GÁBOR, do-bren'-ti, Hungarian poet and antiquary, who, when a youth, established a society for the study of the Hungarian language and literature, and afterwards studied at Leipsic. He afterwards settled at Pesth, where he held various civil offices. He attempted to establish the Hungarian Academy, of which he became secretary in 1831. His greatest work is the "Ancient Monuments of the Hungarian Language;" and he translated Molière, Shakspeare, Schiller, and wrote biographies, odes, and other poems.
Born at Nagy-Szöllos, 1786; died 1851.

DOBROWSKI, JOSEPH, do-brow'-ske, Hungarian philologist, who, at the age of 19, entered the order of Jesuits. Between 1780 and 1787 he edited a critical journal of Bohemian and Moravian literature, which was stopped by the authorities. He wrote numerous works on the Bohemian language and the Slavonic dialects. His last years were clouded with insanity.
Born near Raab, 1755; died 1829.

DOBRUDSCHA, or DOBRUSKA, do-brood'-ska, a town of Bohemia, 15 miles from Königgratz. Pop. 2,500.

DOBRUDSCHA, the north-eastern portion of Bulgaria, in European Turkey, having Wallachia on the W., Moldavia on the N., and the Black Sea on the E. It is low, sterile, and destitute of water. Anciently this region, known as Scythia Minor, was crossed from the Black Sea to the Danube by the wall of Trajan. This was one of the theatres of the Russian war of 1854-56.

DOBSCHAU, TOPSCHAU, or DOBSINA, dob'-sho, a town of Hungary, 14 miles N.W. of Rosenau. Copper, silver, iron, and cobalt are worked in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5,400.

DOBSON, WILLIAM, dob'-son, an English painter, who imitated the manner of Vandyke, by whom he was introduced to Charles I. He painted both in history and portrait with great excellence.
Born 1613; died 1647.

DOCE, RIO, do'-sai, a river of Brazil, rising in the south of the province of Minas-Geraes, and, after a course of about 330 miles falling into the Atlantic, in lat. 19° 36′ S.

DOCKUM, dok'-um, a town of Holland, province of Friesland, on both sides of the Ee. It is surrounded by walls, and has good public buildings. Manf. Earthenware, salt, wool, beer, and gin. There is a large trade in cattle, flax, chicory, and shrimps. There are three cattle and horse fairs. Pop. 4,700.

DODD, WILLIAM, The Rev., dod, an unfortunate English divine, who studied at Cambridge, where he took the B.A. degree in 1750, and, in 1753, entered into orders. He soon became a popular preacher in the metropolis, and in 1766 he took the degree of LL.D., at which time he was chaplain to the king; in 1771 he published "Sermons to Young Men," and the year following, obtained the living of Hockloff, in Buckinghamshire. The rectory of St. George, Hanover Square, becoming vacant in 1774, he sent an anonymous letter to the chancellor's lady, offering £3,000 for the presentation. Being discovered as the writer of this letter, King George III. caused him to be struck out of the list of chaplains. On this he went abroad, and meeting his pupil, the earl of Chesterfield, at Geneva, that nobleman presented him with the living of Winge, in Buckinghamshire. This generosity he ill requited; for, being of an extravagant disposition, and more expensive in his habits than his income would allow, he forged Lord Chesterfield's name to a bond for £4,200, in the hope of being able to take it up before it was due; but the fraud was discovered, and he was tried, convicted, and hanged at Tyburn. He published a translation of the poems of Callimachus; four volumes of "Sermons on the Miracles and Parables;" "A Collection of Poems;" "Reflections on Death," 12mo; "Comfort for the Afflicted," 8vo; and after his death appeared his "Thoughts in Prison," with his life prefixed. He also selected the "Beauties of Shakspeare," which he interspersed with criticisms throughout the body of the volume.
Born at Bourne, in Lincolnshire, 1729; died 1777.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP, D.D., dod'-ridj, an eminent dissenting divine, who, after several preferments, settled at Northampton, as minister and tutor, and acquired a great and merited reputation by his learning, candour, and piety. Many eminent persons were educated under him, and he held friendly relationships and correspondence with the greatest dignitaries of the established church. Being of a consumptive habit, he went to Bristol, to endeavour to improve his health; but finding little or no benefit from the change, he went to Lisbon, where he died. He published a number of excellent works, the principal of which are, his "Family Expositor on the New Testament," the "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," of which numerous editions have been printed; the "Life of Colonel Gardiner;" and "Sermons on the Evidences of Christianity."
Born in London, 1702; died 1751.

DODDRIDGE, a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 10,552. The capital is West Union.

DODGE, dodj, a county in Wisconsin, U.S. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 45,931. The capital is Juneau.

DODGE, a county of Minnesota, United States. Pop. 11,344.

DÖDIBERG, do-dé'-bairg, a summit of the Swiss Alps, 17 miles from Glarus, having an elevation of nearly 11,900 feet.

DODINGTON, GEORGE BUBB, Lord Melcombe Regis, dod'-ing-ton, politician and diarist. He belonged to a wealthy family of Dorsetshire named Bubb, entered Parliament for Winchelsea in 1715, and soon afterwards went as envoy to Spain. In 1720 he became possessed of a large estate, and took the surname of Dodington. He held office under Sir Robert Walpole, and afterwards attached himself to the party of the Prince of Wales. He frequently changed sides, office and emoluments being the chief objects of his ambition, and in 1761 was advanced to the peerage. He was the friend of many of the most distinguished men of his time, but was remarkable for excessive vanity, amusingly displayed in his "Diary," published 22 years after his death.

Born 1691; died 1762.

DODONA, do-do'-na, a town of ancient Greece, in Epirus, or, according to others, in Thessaly. There was, in its neighbourhood, a celebrated oracle of Jupiter, supposed to be the most ancient of all Greece. According to tradition, it was founded by a dove, which, in company with another, took flight from Thebes, in Egypt, and alighted, one at the temple of Ammon, and the other at Dodona, where with human voice, it informed the natives that the surrounding ground should, in future, be endued with a prophetic spirit. Oracles were, therefore, in consequence, frequently delivered by the sacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. The oracles of Dodona were generally delivered by women. The city of Dodona was destroyed 219 B.C., but afterwards restored, and existed until the 6th century.

DODONIDES, do-don'-i-dees, the priestesses who delivered oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona.

DODSLEY, ROBERT, dods'-le, an author and bookseller, but who first figured in life as an apprentice to a Nottinghamshire stocking-weaver, and afterwards as footman. While in this station, he published a volume of poems by subscription, entitled "The Muse in Livery." His next piece was a dramatic trifle called "The Toyshop," which had the approbation of Pope, and was brought upon the stage with so much success, that the author was enabled to start as bookseller in Pall-Mall, where he carried on an extensive business many years, and then left it to his brother. He also wrote the "King and Miller of Mansfield," which was followed by a sequel to it, named, "Sir John Cockle at Court." His greatest dramatic effort, however, was the tragedy of "Cleone," which was successfully brought out at Covent Garden theatre. He also produced a little book entitled "The Economy of Human Life," which, owing to a notion that prevailed that it was the production of the earl of Chesterfield, had a large sale. In 1760 he published select fables of Æsop and other fabulists; to which he prefixed an essay on fable. He also edited a valuable collection of poems by different authors, and a collection of plays. Mr. Dodsley was likewise the projector of the "Preceptor," a useful book for youth, and of "The Annual Register," a work of high and deserved reputation, which has been continued to the present day.

Born at Mansfield, 1703; died at Durham, 1764.

DODSWORTH, ROGER, dods'-worth, an English topographer, who collected the antiquities of Yorkshire, in 162 folio volumes, which are in the Bodleian library at Oxford.

Born in Yorkshire, 1585; died 1654.

DODWELL, HENRY, dod'-wel, a learned writer, who, after various vicissitudes, was, in 1688, appointed Camden professor of history at Oxford, but was deprived of that place in 1691, for refusing the oaths to King William, on which he retired to Cookham, and afterwards to Shottesbrooke, in Berkshire. In 1701 he published an account of the ancient Greek and Roman cycles, a quarto volume, of which Dr. Halley had a high opinion. His most famous book was on the "Natural Mortality of the Soul," which made a great noise, and was answered by several writers, particularly Dr. Samuel Clarke. He wrote and edited several other works.

Born at Dublin, 1641; died at Shottesbrooke, 1711.

DODWELL, HENRY, son of the above, was bred to the law, and was an active promoter of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. He wrote a pamphlet, but did not affix his name to it, entitled, "Christianity not founded on Argument," in which, under the pretence of friendship, he endeavoured to undermine the Christian religion. It was answered by Dr. Leland, Dr. Doddridge, and the author's brother William, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became D.D., rector of Shottesbrooke, prebendary of Salisbury, and archdeacon of Berkshire.

Died 1742.

DOESBURG, dees-burg, a town of Holland, in the province of Gelderland, on the right bank of the Yssel. It is surrounded by walls with planted ramparts. There are two large churches and an arsenal. The trade is chiefly in agricultural produce, especially mustard. Pop. 4,400.

DOGGER BANK, dog'-ger bank, an extensive sandbank in the North Sea, between the coasts of Denmark and England, the W. extremity reaching nearly to Scarborough, Yorkshire, and the E. to within 60 miles of the coast of Jutland. It is about 320 miles long, and from 40 to 60 miles broad. The cod fisheries are important. In 1781 a naval conflict between the Dutch and English fleets was fought on the Dogger Bank. Neither could claim the victory.

DOGGET, THOMAS, dog'-get, the legator of "Dogget's coat and badge," was an Irish actor and dramatist, who excelled in the representation of comic characters, playing at Drury Lane theatre, and becoming joint manager of that house. He left a legacy to provide a coat and badge to be rowed for, from London bridge to Chelsea, by six watermen, yearly, on the 1st of August, the day of the accession of George I.

DOLLART BAY, or THE DOLLERT, dol-lart', a large arm of the North Sea, extending between Hanover and the Netherlands, at the mouth of the river Ems. It is said to have been formed, in 1276, by an inundation of the sea, which swept away nearly 34 villages, and enlarged by another inundation in the 16th century.

DOLLINGER, JOHANN, JOSEPH IGNAZ VON, dol'-len-ger, German theologian, who studied at Würzberg and Bamberg, and entered the Roman Catholic priesthood in 1822. He distinguished himself as a writer on theological subjects, and from 1845 to 1847 represented the University of Munich in the Bavarian church. In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Parliament, and has since been regarded as the leader of the great German movement for the separation of Church and State, the surrender of the pope's temporal power, and the denial of the doctrine of Papal infallibility. He is a scholar of wide culture, and has published many historical and literary works, besides those of an entirely theological character.

Born at Bamberg, Bavaria, 1799.

DOLLOND, JOHN, dol'-lond, an eminent English optician, descended from French refugees, who, though put to the trade of silk-weaving, devoted himself to the study of astronomy, which led him to consider the means by which the power of the telescope might be improved. Commencing business as an optician with his eldest son Peter, he invented the achromatic object-glass, and succeeded in applying the micrometer to reflecting telescopes, and made many other improvements. He received the Copley medal of the Royal Society, of which, in 1761, he was elected a fellow. He was a good classical scholar, and modern linguist. The business founded by him still exists in St. Paul's Churchyard.

Born in Spitalfields, 1706; died 1761.

DOLO, do'-lo, a town of Italy, 12 miles W. of Venice, on the Brentano. There are many handsome villas in the vicinity. Pop. 3,600.

DOLOMIEU, DEODAT GUY DE, do'-lo-me-u-(r), French geologist and mineralogist. He was one of the knights of Malta, but having killed an officer in a quarrel, was condemned to expulsion, but the pope obtained for him a pardon. He afterwards made scientific explorations in Italy, Sicily, the Tyrol, and Malta. He then served with Bonaparte in Egypt, but on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina. Sir Joseph Banks, president of the Royal Society, interested himself successfully for his release, which he obtained in 1801. His principal works are, "Voyage to the Isles of Lipari in 1781;" "Memoir on the Earthquake of Calabria in 1783;" "On the Origin of the Basaltes;" "A Mineralogical Dictionary." He was commander of the Order of Malta, a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and also of the National Institute.

DOMBROWSKI or DABROWSKI, JAN HENRYK, dom-brov'-ske, a Polish general, who, in 1791, was engaged in the cause of the independence of his country against Russia and Prussia. Obliged to take refuge in France in 1796, he there formed a Polish legion, and had the command of it in the Italian campaign. In 1806, after the battle of Jena, he hastened to Poland, and there assembled a force of 30,000 men, which he united with Napoleon's army. In 1812, having made the greatest exertion to cover the retreat of the French from Moscow, he led the remains of his army beyond the Rhine. He was appointed, in 1815, commander of the cavalry, and senator of the new kingdom of Poland, but did not long enjoy these new dignities.

Born near Cracow, 1755; died 1818.

DOMENICHINO or DOMENICO ZAMPIERI, do'-main-e-ke'-no, an Italian painter, who studied in the school of the Caracci, where his fellow pupils, from his slowness, called him the "Ox." On this, one of his masters told them, that "this ox would in time make his ground so fruitful, that painting would be fed by what it produced." The prediction was verified. He was remarkably successful in frescoes, and was also deeply skilled in architecture, and filled the appointment of architect to Gregory XV.

Born at Bologna, 1581; died 1641.

DOMFRONT, dom-front', a town of France, department of Orne, on the rock above the Varenne, 35 miles N.W. of Alençon. The town is ill-built and dirty. There are an ancient town and ruined castle. Pop. 4,800.

DOMINGO, SAN, do-min'-go, the capital of the Spanish part of the island of Hayti, in the W. Indies, and the first or oldest city in the Western world, at the mouth of the Ozama, which forms its harbour. The plan of the city is quadrilateral, and it is wholly surrounded by a rampart. The houses are well-proportioned, with flat roofs, and a courtyard in the middle, with surrounding galleries inside, and balconies to the street. Its public buildings are a cathedral, which was finished in 1540; a barracks, in which is the arsenal; a palace, and several convents and nunneries. Its trade is very limited, the harbour being unfit for large ships. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 18° 29′ N. Lon. 69° 57′ W.

DOMINGO. (See HAYTI.)

DOMINIC, ST., DE GUZMAN, dom'-e-neek, a Spanish priest, who founded the order of the preaching friars called Dominicans, and, according to some authorities, the powerful Inquisition, but others declare that it existed before him, having been founded in 1184. He, however, was the first to receive from the pope the title of inquisitor-general. He instigated the terrible persecution of the Albigenses. He was canonised by Gregory IX.

Born at Calahorra, in Old Castille, 1170; died at Bologna, 1221.

DOMINICA, or DOMINIQUE, dom'-e-nē'-ka, an island in the British West Indies, belonging to the Leeward group, lying about 25 miles to the N. of Martinique. It is 29 miles long, with an average width of 16. The island is volcanic and mountainous, interspersed by many rich and beautiful valleys. Its loftiest summit attains an elevation of 5,314 feet, which, with the exception of Cuba, Hayti, and Jamaica, is higher than any of the other West India islands. It is well watered. The shores are little indented, and there are no harbours. Prince Rupert's Bay, at the N.W. end of the island, is safe and convenient.—Pro. Coffee, sugar, maize, cotton, cocoa, tobacco, timber, and cabinet wood. Poultry, game, and bees, are abundant. Exp. Sugar, coffee, rum, molasses, cane-juice, cacao, and copper-ore. Pop. 29,000. Lat. 15° 18′ N. Lon. 61° 29′ W.—This island was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was claimed alternately by England, France, and Spain; but ceded to Great Britain in 1763. In 1802, it again came into possession of France, but restored to England in 1814.

DOMINICA, REPUBLIC OF, a state occupying the eastern portion of the island of Hayti. The republic was founded in 1843, but after 17 years of political anarchy reverted to Spain; but a revolt broke out in 1863, and a republic was again established. Pop. 136,500. (See HAYTI.)

DOMINICA, or OBEVAHOA, one of the Marquesas islands in the South Pacific Ocean. It is about 18 miles long and the same in breadth, very hilly, and well wooded. Lat. 90° 34′ S. Lon. 139° 4′ W.

DOMINIS, MARCUS ANTONINUS DE, dom'-i-nes, an ecclesiastic and mathematician, who, having studied at Loretto and Padua, became bishop of Segni, and afterwards archbishop of Spalatro; but having opposed the power of the Pope, and, as he stated, adopted Protestant doctrines, resigned those preferments and came to England in 1615, and was appointed by King James I. dean of Windsor. Very soon, however, he desired to return to the Catholic Church, and went to Rome, where he was charged with heresy, and imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo, where he died. Official condemnation being afterwards passed on him, his body was taken up and burned. He was possessed of considerable scientific knowledge, and wrote a treatise on the rainbow.

Born at Arba, in Dalmatia, 1566; died at Rome, 1624.

DOMITIAN, or DOMITIANUS, TITUS FLAVIUS, do-mish'-e-an, the son of Vespasian, and a Roman emperor, who obtained the imperial dignity on the death of his brother Titus, A.D. 81. The commencement of his reign seemed auspicious to the happiness of the Romans; but he soon discovered the wickedness of his disposition, and gave way to the most detestable crimes. He assumed the title of deity, murdered or banished almost every eminent Roman citizen, bribed the army, encouraged gladiatorial shows, in which he sometimes took part himself, taking care to be the victor and killing his wretchedly armed opponents, and amused himself in catching flies, and sticking them on a bodkin. His cruelties rendered him so odious that he was afraid of his own shadow. He was assassinated by conspirators encouraged by his wife Domitia.

Born 52; died 96.

DOMITIANUS, DOMITIUS, do-mish'-e-ā'-nus, general of Diocletian's army in Egypt. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Alexandria in 286, and fell by violence two years afterwards.
